

LIBRARY
OF THE UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS

052

N

v.2

Return this book on or before the Latest Date stamped below.

Theft, mutilation, and underlining of books are reasons for disciplinary action and may result in dismissal from the University.

University of Illinois Library

JAN 26 1986

BUILDING USE ONLY

JUL 22 1984

JUL 22 1984

NOV 25 1995

DEC 09 1995

DEC 17 1996

NOV 19 1996

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2021 with funding from University of Illinois Urbana-Champaign

<https://archive.org/details/nation2190unse>

314

The Nation.

VOLUME II.

October 5th, 1907, to March 28th, 1908.

LONDON: 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN,

The Nation.

INDEX.

POLITICS AND AFFAIRS.

	PAGE		PAGE
Advantage of Liberalism, The	292	Future of Portugal, The	661
American Armada, The	38	Future of the Black Republics, The	894
America, The Re-making of	522	Future of the Government, The	624
Armaments, The Prime Minister and	556	Future of Unionism, The	4
Armaments, Policy and	815
Austrian Lead in the Balkans, The	697	German Legends, Two	294
		Germany, England and	74
Balfour, The Nullity of Mr.	260	Germany, The Danger Point with	860
Balkans, The Austrian Lead in the	697	Government and International Peace, The	520
Bülow, The Cynicism of Prince	329	Government's Problem, The	36
		Growth of Modernism, The	175
Camarilla and Absolutism, The	144
Changing East, The	458	Historical Study of Religion, The	459
Chaos of a Great State, The	261	Hope for Macedonia	782
Christmas Appeal, A	456
Clash of Commerce and Militarism, The	696	"Impatience" of the Idealist, The	109
Contemporary Myth, A	523	Invention and Progress	111
Control of Foreign Affairs, The	263	Ireland, The Real Danger in	662
Cost of Old-Age Pensions, The	293	Irish University Bill, The	893
Critical Year, A	488
Cynicism of Prince Bülow, The	329	Joining of the Battle, The	813
		Kaiser's Ideas, The	225
Danger Point with Germany, The	860	Kirkdale, A Note on	6
Decline of the Oxford Movement, The	295
Delcassé, The Episode of	626	Last of the Conservatives, The	924
Disorder and Disestablishment	752	Last Stand of the Moors, The	559
Drink against Commonwealth	892	Law Court as a Theatre, The	423
		Legal Minimum Wage, A	387
Eight Hours Day, The	896	Liberalism, The Advantage of	292
End of a Revolution, The	490	Liberalism, The Real Enemies of	420
End of a War-Scare, The	927	Liberal Intervention, The	660
England and Germany	74	Liberal Party and the Estimates, The	781
Episode of Delcassé, The	626	Licensing Bill and Its Purpose, The	783
Estimates, The Liberal Party and the	781	Licensing Bill, The Moderation of the	861
Europe, The New Situation in	750	Licensing Reform, The Lines of	330
		Limits of Anglo-American Arbitration, The	864
Foreign Affairs, The Control of	263	Lines of Licensing Reform, The	330
Foreign Policy of Queen Victoria, The	140	Little Protectionist, The	224
Foreign Policy, The Spirit of our	748	London and Its Unfed Children	422
Free Traders and Confederates	557

POLITICS AND AFFAIRS (continued).

	PAGE		PAGE
Macedonia, Hope for	782	Proletariat and War, The	39
Moderation of the Licensing Bill, The	861	Prospect in Parliament, The. By C. F. G. Masterman, M.P.	643
Modernism, The Growth of	175	Queen Victoria, The Foreign Policy of	140
Moors, The Last Stand of the	559	Railway Crisis and Arbitration, The	141
Moral of Mid-Devon, The	593	Railway Mismanagers	72
Mr. Birrell's Success	385	Real Danger in Ireland, The	662
Mr. Haldane's Ideas	421	Real Enemies of Liberalism, The	420
Mr. Haldane's New Model	457	Rebellion—Mongering in Natal	332
Mr. Roosevelt's Sermons	333	Rebellion of Natal, The	925
Natal and the Empire	386	Rise of Mohamedan Democracy, The	595
Natal, The Rebellion in	925	Russian Elections, The	5
Natal, Rebellion—Mongering in	332	Second Educational Compromise, The	780
Nation and the Railways, The	698	Seven Years' Peace, The	172
New Education Bill, The	558	Socialism in Liberalism	37
New Phase of the Land War, The	262	Socialism of the Labour Party, The	592
New Situation in Europe, The	750	Social Mission of the Church, The	75
New "Times," The	521	Sound Principles of Taxation	625
New Trend of Politics, The	328	South Africa, The New Helots of	489
Nullity of Mr. Balfour, The	260	Spirit of our Foreign Policy, The	748
Obstacle to Women Suffrage, The	816	State and Unemployment, The	862
Old-Age Pensions, The Cost of	293	Test Case, A	143
Only Way Out, The	108	Time Limit and Investors, A	627
Our "National" Church	7	Towards Federation	73
Panic and Its Meaning, The	174	Two German Legends	294
Paper Fortunes and Misfortunes	492	Two Presidents	8
Peckham, The Answer to	924	Two Unionist Voices, The	384
Persian Parliament, The	227	Untrodden Field in Politics, The. By the Right Hon. Winston S. Churchill, M.P.	812
Policy and Armaments	815	Use of the Tar-Brush, The	173
Policy of the Minimum Standard, The	700	Wanted—An Unemployment Bill	895
Policy of the South African Dominion, The	663	What the Housing Bills Should Do	594
Portugal, The Future of	661	Women in Industry	110
Present Duty of Free Traders, The	749
Prime Minister and Armaments, The	556
Programme for 1908, The	226

LIFE AND LETTERS.

	PAGE		PAGE
A Day of Rest	232	Broadland in Winter	180
A Man of the People	268	Careful Man, The. By John Galsworthy	817
An American Statesman	145	Case against the Censorship, The	145
An Artist's Politics	80	Character of the Saint, The	269
An Umbrian Realist	179	Choice of Books, The	299
A Personally-Conducted Tour. By Kusiali	464	City of God, A. By Henry W. Nevinston	629
A Puritan Document	177	City of the Middle Age, A	599
Arya Samaj, The. By Henry W. Nevinston	753	City of the Soul, A	867
A Shy Neighbourhood	463	Comfort. By John Galsworthy	928
Autumn Song of the Robin, The	43	Conquerors, The	561
Beauty of the Winter Iris, The	668	Crime and Punishment	390
Best Children's Books, The. By Mrs. Frederic Harrison	363	Dance of Death, A	931
Boy and Girl School, The	527	David Friedrich Strauss	598
		Decadence	631

LIFE AND LETTERS (continued).

	PAGE		PAGE
Diary of a Revolution, The	426	Peasant's Hope, The	334
Dictator of Portugal, A	786	Poetry of the Bible, The	785
Disease, The Recurrence of	493	Poets as Observers of Nature	231
Dislike of the Intellectual, The	297	Portuguese Monastery, A	496
Dragon Man, The. By John Masefield	41	Re-appearance of Asia, The	666
England and Mr. Meredith. By G. M. Trevelyan	668	Rich Man's Dilemma, The	865
English Race, The	267	Riddle of the Middle Ages, The	898
Ethics of Violence, The	665	Roar, The	600
Extinction of Birds, The	391	Russian Priest, The	667
Fame. By Walter Herbage	497	Sarah Bennet's Possession. By W. F. Harvey	428
Fear of Waste, The. By K.	868	Scare-Mind, The	754
Francis Thompson	270	Secrets of the Sea	13
France, The Limitation of	494	"Season, The"	818
Friendship	495	Seekers, The	336
Giants of the Sudan, The. By Sir Alfred Pease. I.	337	Sex War, The	597
Do. do. do. II.	393	Shaker of Things, A	820
Heart of the Hebrews, The	298	Sisters of Fear	702
House of Silence, The. By John Galsworthy	77	Soul of a People, The	899
How the People Live	630	Soul of Religion, The	563
How to Make a Rose Garden	146	Sport. By John Galsworthy	702
In Praise of Mushrooms	147	Spring in India. By Henry W. Nevinson	819
Insect Raider, The	787	Successor of Newton, The	425
Life of a Fox, The	528	Super-Wealth	229
Light of Conflagrations, The	755	Tent Folk, The	44
Lights, The	427	The Mother. By John Galsworthy	265
"Lord of the World." By Henry W. Nevinson	461	Titan, A	866
Love Letters of a Statesman	230	Triumph of the Sweet Pea, The	756
Man and His Microbes	266	Trouble Among the Trout	300
March Grey-Face	821	Tulips, Old and New	462
Militarism, The Cant of	10	Undying Hope, The	392
Miss Tormentilla's Bracelet. By M. Sturge Henderson	9	University Reform	42
Modern Daffodils and Narcissi	900	Uses of the Autumn Campaign, The	114
Money. By John Galsworthy	525	Vanished Children	11
Morals of American Commerce, The	178	Village Library, The Making of a	529
Mortal Meaning of Fog, The	389	Warriors of Spring	932
Mother-Confessors, The	564	Water Fowl in London	632
Nature's Sacraments	78	Wayfarers. By A. R.	79
New Electioneering, The	929	When We Can Fly	562
November Pike, A	115	Winter Sleep	335
Old Order, The. By John Galsworthy	113	World as a Tune, The. By Lascelles Abercrombie	897

CONTEMPORARIES.

	PAGE		PAGE
I. Francis Joseph	339	IV. "The Lady-in-Chief" (Florence Nightingale)	903
II. Governor Hughes	674	V. The Celebration of Genius (Shakespeare and Tolstoy)	934
III. The Abbé Loisy's Farewell. By W. S. T.	703

ART, MUSIC, AND THE DRAMA.

ART.				THE DRAMA.
			PAGE				PAGE
Beauties at the New Art Gallery	793	A Censured Play	45
Mr. Brangwyn's Exhibition	935	A Licensed Play. By M.	670
Old Masters at Burlington House	537	A Modern "Mystery" Play. By M.	536
The Royal Academy and Its Associates	635	A Parable of England. By M.	823
				A Study in Drab. By M.	634
				Hamlet and Rosmer. By M.	759
				Sarah Bernhardt's Secret	116
				Mr. Shaw's "Cæsar" and the Critics. By M.	338
				Mr. Shaw's Gospel of Common Sense. By M.	501
				The Censored Play. By M.	301
				The Dramatic Critic of the "Times." By D.	706
				The Primitives. By M.	791
				The Song of Songs. By H. W. N.	871
				"The Thief"	234
				Towards a National Theatre	567

SCIENCE.

	PAGE		PAGE
A Triumph of Telephotography. By Prof. George Minchin	235	The New Botany	790

PRESENT DAY PROBLEMS.

	PAGE
A Defence of Unlicensed Playing. By Professor Gilbert Murray	117
Mr. Morley and Indian Reform. By Sir W. Wedderburn	788
Scotland and the Peers. From a Scottish Correspondent	901
The Anglo-German War of Armaments. By the Right Hon. Lord Eversley	601
The Helpers	432
The Ruin of Macedonia. By C. F. G. Masterman, M.P.	182

OPEN QUESTIONS.

	PAGE
Are Riches the Wages of Efficiency? By J. A. H.	183
A Tariff as a Cure for Unemployment. By J. A. H.	933
Ireland, The Situation in	14
Is Socialism a Spoils System? By J. A. H.	148
Is Socialism Plunder? By J. A. H.	82
Is Socialism Tyranny? By J. A. H.	118
The Four-fold Path of Socialism. By J. A. H.	302
The Need for a New Corrupt Practices Bill. By Arthur J. Williams	936
"The Right to Labour." By J. A. H.	673

LETTERS FROM ABROAD.

	PAGE		PAGE
An Order of India. By Henry W. Nevinston	431	The Land Question in German Towns. By Ed. Bernstein	498
Another Combes Ministry? By R. E. D.	869	The Naval Race and German Finance. By Ed. Bernstein	757
A Re-appearance. By the Abbé Dimnet	633	The Popular Struggle in Prussia. By Ed. Bernstein	565
A Sicilian Superman. By Salvatore Cortesi	822	The Prospect in Portugal. By "Observer"	395
Germany's Ireland. By Ed. Bernstein	341	The Revolt in German Radicalism. By Ed. Bernstein	705
German Socialism and the Colonial Question. By Ed. Bernstein	46
The Character of William II. By Ed. Bernstein	233

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

	PAGE		PAGE
Casa Blanca: The French Case (Robert Dell); "The Grip of the Specialist" (James Pearse, M.D., and "A Critic of the 'New Religion'"); The New Testament (W. H. Griffith Thomas, D.D.); The Unrest in India (A. J. Butler); "Tyrants of the Road" (J. Leng Sturrock); "Silly Social Functions" (V. Churchill) ...	17	tant Elector"); Flogging in India (Joseph Collinson); Ruskin Hall (P. J. Dear); Supply of Female Labour (B. Brookesbank) ...	305
"Tyrants of the Road" (Thomas Ogilvy and "Civis Universitatis Edinensis"); "Casa Blanca: The French Case" (R. B. Cunninghame Graham and Lieut.-Col. D. Scot Skirving); "The Cant of Militarism" (Anti-Militarist); The Kirkdale Contest (William J. Downie); "Arbitration v. Trial by Jury" (Montagu Ryland and "Verb. Sap."); Overstrain in the Services (Arnold White) ...	47	The Decline of the Oxford Movement (G. K. Chesterton); "The Ruin of Macedonia" (Charles F. G. Masterman, M.P.); The West Hull Election and Electoral Reform (John H. Humphreys); "Who are the Members of the Church of England?" (H. J. Bardsley); The Critics and "Waste" (E. A. Baughan); Mr. Galsworthy and Woman Suffrage (Emily Tomlinson); Alliteration's Artful Aid (G. E. Mitton); "William Allingham" (H. M. Gray); Metaphor ("Irish-American"); "Trouble Among the Trout" (Wilson H. Armitstead); Lord Roberts (Ian Mac-Alister) ...	344
A Remarkable Little Book ("Historicus"); Is it Plagiarism? ("Puzzled"); "Insurance v. Trial by Jury" (The Writer of the Article); "Socialism in Liberalism" (E. O. Post); "The Cant of Militarism" (George F. Shee) ...	83	"What is the Church, and who are its Members?" (The Dean of Ripon and C. J. Back); The Decline of the Oxford Movement (G. K. Chesterton and W. Scott Palmer); Arnold v. Borrow (L. I. Guiney); The Danger of Premature Burial (Jas. R. Williamson); The Passing of Russian Autocracy ("An Eye-Witness"); "The Ruin of Macedonia" (G. F. Abbott) ...	397
Ireland and Liberalism ("A Protestant Elector"); The Case for Women's Suffrage (Christabel Pankhurst); "Socialism in Liberalism" ("A Liberal of the Centre"); "Tyrants of the Road" ("Quercus Robur," D. K. Auchterlonie, and J. Leng Sturrock); A Censored Play (Joseph A. Leckie and Maurice G. Holmes); "Casa Blanca: The French Case" (Douglas Fox Pitt); "The Cant of Militarism" ("A Civilian") ...	121	The Size and Cost of the Fleet ("Retrenchment"); The Decline of the Oxford Movement (G. K. Chesterton and "A Reader"); Crime and Punishment (Tighe Hopkins); The Noise Nuisance (Frederick Verney, M.P.); Hood's Poetry (C. E. Maurice); The Entente in Forestry (Charles Hancock, B.L.); Japan in Korea (Saul Sang Lee and James Hunchu Song); "The Ruin of Macedonia" (A. P. Irby); Poor Law and Old-Age Pensions (Canon Arthur W. Jephson); Cattle Driving ("One lately returned from Ireland"); The House of Lords and the Referendum (G. L. Bruce) ...	434
The New Marriage Act and the Bishops (J. F. W.); "Ireland and Liberalism" ("A Non-Catholic Elector" and "X."); "The Censorship of Plays" (Frederick Wellen and Gilbert Murray); Women's Suffrage (Evelyn Sharp); "Socialism in Liberalism" (O. E. Post) ...	151	"The Best Children's Books" (Lady Rendel); The Study of Religious History (Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter and L. R. Farnell); "The Decline of the Oxford Movement" ("Modernist," L. Waters, and "Oxonian"); Mr. Haldane's Ideas ("Liberal Pacifist"); "The House of Lords and the Referendum" (John H. Humphreys); "The Cost of Old-Age Pensions" (Albert Raphael); The Baghdad Railway ("Continental"); The Meaning of Irish Politics (Robert Lynd) ...	467
Socialism and a Spoils System (Mildred Minturn Scott and Arnold Lupton); A Story of Herbert Spencer (W. L. W.); Sunday Silent Services (Charles E. Noverre, J.P.); The New Marriage Act (George Whale); Who are Members of the Church of England? ("Audi Alteram Partem"); "A Test Case" (D. M. Mason); Conscription (Lieut.-Col. D. Scot Skirving) ...	185	The State of the Militia (A. M. O.); "The Decline of the Oxford Movement" (Wm. Scott Palmer); Mr. Haldane and the Initiative (Maxwell Rouse); Size and Cost of Fleet (J. Mackenzie); "The Virgin Birth" (Wm. Windsor); England's Generosity to Ireland (Murrrough O'Brien); "Vital Causes of Irish Discontent" (E. D.); Land Legislation in Roumania (A. Stead); Premature Burial (J. H.); Schoolboy Mistranslations ("Magister"); The Birch Rod for Old Tramps ("Veteran Criminologist") ...	502
The Censorship of Plays (G. Bernard Shaw); The Ruin of Macedonia (G. F. Abbott and T. Palmer Newbould); "Who are the Members of the Church of England?" (The Rev. Bernard J. Snell, H. R. Humphreys, and H. J. Bardsley); The Birching Incident in Calcutta (James Luke); A Sunday Post for London (Francis H. Jones) ...	237	"The Recurrence of Disease" (J. H.); "The Decline of the Oxford Movement" ("A Man in the Street"); The Black Death in Spain (Sir Robert A. Hudson); "Premature Burial" (Basil Tozer and "Live and Let Live"); "The Virgin Birth" ("Your Reviewer"); The Real Irish Question (Robert Lynd); "The Best Children's Books" (Richard Franklin Jupp); A Crowd's Grievance ("A Spectator") ...	530
"Who are Members of the Church of England?" (The Dean of Ripon); "The Censorship of Plays" (Violet Hunt); The Ruin of Macedonia (Charles Roden Buxton); The Plight of the Assistant Master (Alfred Fellows); A Sunday Post for London (Charles E. Noverre and Philip J. Dear); "Coke of Norfolk" (J. F. Collier); A Correction (T. Rice Holmes); Retrenchment and Social Reform ("Salus Populi") ...	274	Letters by a Working Man ("A Mere Pen-Driver"); The Housing Question in German Towns (T. C. Horsfall); The Premier's Pledges ("Retrenchment"); Music-Hall Wrestling (P.
Industrial Arbitration (Joshua Rowntree); Mr. Galsworthy and Woman Suffrage (G. Calderon); "The Ruin of Macedonia" (T. Palmer Newbould); "Who are Members of the Church of England?" (H. J. Bardsley and J. F. W.); Wanted, a New Honours List (R. S. Fraser); A Foreign Affairs Committee (Noel Buxton); Sunday Letters in London (Alfred Marks); Belgians and the Grand Challenge Cup ("Fair-play"); "Ireland and Liberalism" ("A Protes-

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR (continued).

	PAGE		PAGE
Beaufoy); British Journalism and the Anti-Christian Movement ("A Paris Correspondent"); "The Recurrence of Disease" (Lieut.-Col. D. Scot Skirving); "New Worlds for Old" (Archibald Constable & Co.); "The Virgin Birth" (Wm. Windsor); "The Best Children's Books" ("Early Victorian"); Village Libraries (Lady Rendel); Children's Thoughts ("Parent"); "Premature Burial" (Jas. R. Williamson); The Tactics of Women Suffragists (E. L. C. Watson); "Mr. Stead and the Navy Estimates" (H. S. Perris)	568	Ram); The Effects of a Bread Tax (R. Shindler); "A Woman's Charter" (Susan Cunningham and Janet Elizabeth Leitch); "Simple Bible Teaching" (John Evans)	707
The Defeat in Mid-Devon (Charles Roden Buxton, Montague Fordham, and the Rev. D. K. Auchterlonie); What the Tariff Reformers are Doing ("Free Trader"); A Woman's Charter (Mrs. Frederic Harrison); "Village Libraries" (O. M.); The New Education Bill (J. Allanson Picton); "The Housing Question in German Towns" (T. C. Horsfall); Premature Burial (William Tebb); The Real Irish Question (E. R. W.)	604	The Nation and the Railways (R.); Housing in German Towns (Professor Rud. Eberstadt); What the Housing Bill Should Do (E. L. C. Watson); The Russian Priest (F. W. Groves Campbell); The Blasphemy Laws (The Rev. Stewart D. Headlam); British Journalism and the Anti-Christian Movement (Richard Davey and Robert Dell); "A Woman's Charter" (Ottillie Hancock and Evelyn Sharp); The Suffragists and the Law (W. M. C.); "England and Mr. Meredith" (A Dutchman)	761
The Child and the Coming Bill ("A Clergyman's Wife"); "Simple Bible Teaching" (John Evans); An Experiment in Education ("Educational Expert"); "British Journalism and the Anti-Christian Movement" (Richard Davey, Robert Dell, and Bernard Lord M. Quillin); The Best Children's Books (M. J.); "Village Libraries" (A. R. F.); What the Housing Bills Should Do (Murrrough O'Brien); The Rush for Small Holdings (Frederic Impey); The Moral of Mid-Devon (The Rev. R. J. Bond); "The Mother Confessors" ("A."); "The Scot of the Eighteenth Century" (G. W.); Mr. Campbell's Sermons (Ernest W. Leighton); "A Woman's Charter" (Emily Tomlinson, Lilian Harris, and Emily Ashton)	636	Ecclesiastical Questions in Parliament (The Dean of Ripon); Methods of Propaganda (Lieut.-Colonel D. C. Pedder); Liberal Defeats (A Yorkshire Liberal); The Liberal Party and Votes for Women (Woman Liberal); The Crux in "The Tempest" (N. W. Hill); "England and Mr. Meredith" (G. M. Trevelyan); The Education Bill (W. G. H. G.); The Blasphemy Laws (J. H. and C. S.); "The Beautiful Duchess" and "The Douglas Cause" (Horace Bleackley); The Boy and Girl School (J. P.)	794
"Waste" and the Censor (G. Bernard Shaw); The Revival of Home Rule (A. M. Sullivan); Simple Bible Teaching (J. Allanson Picton); The Church and the Liberal Party (Lieut.-Col. D. C. Pedder and A. J. B.); The Historians' History (Aylmer Maude); Mid-Devon and the Small Holdings and Allotments Act (The Rev. J. Frome Wilkinson); The Best Children's Books (M. J.); "A Woman's Charter" (Mrs. Frederic Harrison and E. L. C. Watson)	675	The Education Bill (G. L. Bruce); The New Botany (Frances P. Loosmore and A. J. B.); The Problem of the Lords (Edwin Hill); "The Suffragists and the Law" (Christabel Pankhurst); "Votes for Women and the Liberal Party" (Eliz. B. S. Wilkinson, E. C., and Emily Ashton); Austro-Hungary (W. H. Shrubsole); An Interchange of Compliments (National Observer)	824
Is the Church the Clerical Party? (The Dean of Ripon); The Spirit of Expenditure (George McCrae, M.P.); "The Church and the Liberal Party" (Cheshire Incumbent); "Dear Old Charlie" and the Censor (Wm. Poel); The Rush for Small Holdings (Ernest E. Taylor, Montague Fordham, and Frederic Impey); The Government and Irish Liberalism ("An Irish Liberal"); "Lucretius, Epicurean and Poet" (John Masson); "The German Codes" (Ernest Schuster); Germany and the Powers (Francis		The Urgency of Women's Enfranchisement (Kate A. Hessel); Compensation for the Publican (Lawrence L. Savill); Weak Points in the Children's Bill (W. A. Brend); Our "National" Games (A Player); The Kaiser's Letter (Læsus); The Rush for Small Holdings (G. Montagu Harris); The Preservation of Mews (John Fletcher Little)	873
		"The Second Educational Compromise" (L. M. B.); The Obstacle to Woman Suffrage (Christabel Pankhurst); "Votes for Women and the Liberal Party" (Another Liberal Woman and Another "Woman Liberal"); The New Botany (Ida Sharp); Are Armaments Necessary? (A. R.); Morocco (Douglas Fox Pitt); "The Rich Man's Dilemma" (F. U. Laycock)	904
		Licensing and Insurance (Ernest W. Leighton); Religious Instruction and the Rights of Parents (G. L. Bruce); Liberal Organisation (John Griffiths); Women and the Peckham Election (St. John G. Ervine); Women and Liberalism (Margaret Ashton, Helen Violet Taylor, and Susan Cunningham); "The Rich Man's Dilemma" (F. U. Laycock); The Perils of Land Purchase (R. L. Outhwaite)	936

DIARY OF THE WEEK, 1, 33, 69, 105, 137, 169, 221, 257, 287, 325, 381, 417, 453, 485, 517, 553, 589, 621, 657, 693, 745, 777, 809, 857, 889, 921.

THE WORLD OF BOOKS AND BOOKS TO BE READ, 16, 52, 86, 120, 150, 188, 242, 273, 304, 342, 396, 430, 466, 500, 534, 566, 603, 642, 672, 714, 760, 791, 828, 872, 908, 941.

TRADE AND FINANCE.

THE WEEK IN THE CITY (By "Lucellum"), 28, 64, 100, 131, 164, 200, 252, 284, 320, 412, 448, 512, 548, 584, 616, 652, 688, 724, 772, 804, 832, 884, 916, 952.

	PAGE
INSURANCE.
Arbitration v. Trial by Jury	26
Our Case Agency Commission	356
Last Year's Home Fires	582

POETRY.

	PAGE		PAGE
A Christmas Carol. By James Flecker	470	On a Railway Platform. By Alfred Noyes ...	341
A Maiden and Her Hair. By William H. Davies	272	Soul and Body. By Lascelles Abercrombie ...	309
An Irish Mother. By Percy French	641	The Awakening. By Dora Sigerson Shorter ...	827
A Royalist in Spring-Time. By W. J. Cameron ...	713	The Dream of Sully Prudhomme. By Herbert
At Sea. By "N."	236	Trench	870
Baby Love. By James Flecker	607	The Keeper. By Alexr. J. Grant	940
Ballade of the World in Shadow. By Ethel Talbot	907	The Pantheist. By G. M. Hort	765
Hope and Despair. By Lascelles Abercrombie ...	679	The Three Women of Endell Street. By Ernest
In the Cool of the Evening. By Alfred Noyes ...	81	Rhys	394
Looking Eastwards. By James Flecker	791	The Trance. By Lascelles Abercrombie	498
Mary at Dawn: A Christmas Song. By L.		To the World and a Poet a Thousand Years Hence.
Studdiford McChesney	438	By James Flecker	537
My Garden. By Adeline Mary Banks	119	Unrest in Autumn. By Dora Sigerson Shorter ...	184
October. By J. W. Feaver	15	Ut Caro Infirma! By Lucy Lyttelton	567
		Vox Marium. By J. W. Feaver	149

REVIEWS OF BOOKS.

	PAGE		PAGE
Abraham Lincoln. By Henry Bryan Binns ...	476	Children's Books, Various. [Evelyn Sharp] ...	370
Act of God. By Robert Elliott	23	Children's Children. By Gertrude Bone	444
Adventus Regni: Being Sermons Preached at St.		Chinese Empire, The. By Marshall Broomhall ...	765
Mary's, Paddington Green. By A. L. Lilley ...	126	Christianity and Common Life. By the Rev.
A Garden of Shadows. By Ethel Tindal Atkinson	680	H. R. Gamble	684
Age of Louis XIV. The Cambridge Modern		Christian Marriage. By H. Hensley Henson ...	684
History, Vol. V.	715	Churches Separated from Rome, Thè. By Mgr. L.
American Revolution, The, Part III. Saratoga		Duchesne	684
and Brandywine Valley Forge. By the Right		Coke of Norfolk and His Friends. By A. M. W.
Hon. Sir George Otto Trevelyan	87	Stirling	192
An Artist's Reminiscences. By Walter Crane ...	54	Collected Works of Oscar Wilde, The	909
Ancient Britain and the Invasions of Julius Cæsar.		Come and Find Me. By Elizabeth Robins ...	879
By T. Rice Holmes [E. C.]	716	Comments of Bagshot, The. Edited by J. A.
Anglo-Chinese Commerce. By A. J. Sargent ...	765	Spender	472
Annals of an Eton House. By Major Gambier		Compensation Act, 1906, The. By Clement
Parry [B.]	768	Edwards, M.P.	94
Atlantic Monthly, The	402	Complete Mountaineer, The. By G. D. Abraham	946
Awakening of China, The. By W. A. P. Martin	765	Comrades. By Maxim Gorky	24
A Walking Gentleman: By James Prior	128	Court Theatre, 1904-1907, The. By Desmond
		MacCarthy	88
Bath under Beau Nash. By Lewis Melville ...	277	Consideration of the State of Ireland in the Nine-
Beethoven. By Romain Rolland. Translated by		teenth Century, A. By G. Locker Lampson ...	94
F. Rothwell	507	Contemporary France. By Gabriel Hanotaux.
Benaparte in Egypt, and the Egyptians of To-day.		Vol. III.	125
By Haji A. Browne	731	Criminals and Crime. By Sir Robert Anderson...	247
Book of Saints and Wonders, A. By Lady		Criminal Investigation. By H. Gross	247
Gregory	846	Critical Examination of Socialism, A. By W. H.
Books for Boys, Various. [John Masefield] ...	372	Mallock	798
British Writers on Classic Lands. By the Hon.		Cults of the Greek States. By Lewis Richard
Albert S. G. Canning	58	Farnell. Litt.D. Vols. III. and IV. [Rev.
Broken Road, The. By A. E. W. Mason	510	Principal A. M. Fairbairn, D.D.]	53
		Denizens of the Deep. By F. Martin Duncan
Cambia Carty and Other Stories. By William		[G. M. M.]	368
Buckley	478	Die Orientalischen Religionen. Von E. Lehmann
Canon and Text of the New Testament, The. By		and others	88
Caspar René Gregory, D.D.	474	Dorchester (Lord): The Makers of Canada. By
Censorship of the Church of Rome and Its Influ-		A. G. Bradley (Rt. Hon. Lord Eversley) ...	20
ence upon the Production and Distribution of		Dyott's Diary. Edited by Reginald W. Jeffery.
Literature, The. By George H. Putnam ...	158	2 vols.	609
Character and Comedy. By E. V. Lucas	350	Early Christian Ethics in the West from Clement
Children's Book of Stars, The. By G. E. Mitton		to Ambrose. By H. H. Scullard	944
[G. M. M.]	366

REVIEWS OF BOOKS (continued).

	PAGE		PAGE
Empress Pulcheria, A.D. 399—432, The. By Ada Teetgen	573	Hubert and John Van Eyck: Their Life and Work. By W. H. James Weale	575
English Socialism of To-day. By H. O. Arnold-Forster	766	Incarnation and Recent Criticism, The. By R. J. Cooke, D.D.	442
English Stage of To-day, The. By Mario Borsá. Translated by Selwyn Brinton	847	Inclinations. By Edward A. Storer	681
Europe and the Turks. By Noel Buxton	576	Ingoldsby Legends of Mirth and Marvels, The. By Thomas Ingoldsby, Esquire	248
Explorer, The. By W. S. Maugham	577	In Grasmere Vale, and Other Poems. By James A. Mackereth	681
Factors in Modern History. By A. F. Pollard... ..	506	Interludes and Poems. By Lascelles Abercrombie	845
Fairy Tales. Various	365	Island Pharisees, The. By John Galsworthy	769
Famous French Salons. By Frank Hamel	943	James Francis Edward: The Old Chevalier. By Martin Haile	644
Fifty Years of Modern Painting. By J. E. Phythian	911	Jeanne d'Arc. Illustrated by Boutet de Monvel... ..	368
Flower Grouping, in English, Scotch, and Irish Gardens. By Margaret Waterfield	850	King of the Air, The. By Herbert Strang [G. M. M.]	366
Fly on the Wheel, The. By Katherine Cecil Thurston	912	King over the Water, The. By A. Shield and Andrew Lang	644
For the Baby's Stocking. Various	378	La Féminisme. Par Mme. Avril de Sainte-Croix. Preface de Victor Marguerite	89
Forty Singing Seamen. By Alfred Noyes [Professor C. H. Herford]	944	Later Nineteenth Century, The. By George Saintsbury	767
François Rabelais. By Arthur Tilley. French Men of Letters Series. [T. H.]	543	Law of Private Property in War, The. By Norman Bentwick	280
Frederic Douglass. By Booker T. Washington	476	Lay Sermons and Addresses. By Edward Caird... ..	155
From the Niger to the Nile. By Lieutenant Boyd Alexander	797	Leaves from a Life. Anon.	799
Fruit of the Tree, The. By Edith Wharton	352	Leaves from the Notebook of Lady Dorothy Nevill	441
Fynes Moryson's Itinerary	877	Legend in Japanese Art. By Henri L. Joly	471
Garden that I Love, The. Second Series. By Alfred Austin	717	Les Evangiles Synoptiques. Par Alfred Loisy [B.]	829
George Meredith, Novelist, Poet, Reformer. By M. Sturge Henderson	310	Les Maitres du Roman Espagnol Contemporain. Par F. Vezinet [Major Martin Hume]	734
Gift-Book, The. Various	374	Letters and Papers, Foreign and Domestic, of the Reign of Henry VIII. Vol. XX., pt. 2. Arranged by James Gairdner, C.B., and R. H. Brodie [Professor A. F. Pollard]	90
Glade in the Forest, The. By Stephen Gwynn	478	Letters from Percy Byssche Shelley to Elizabeth Hitchener: Now First Published. [Professor Edward Dowden]	829
Goldsmiths' and Silversmiths' Work. By Nelson Dawson	732	Letters of Dr. John Brown, with Letters from Ruskin, Thackeray, and Others. Edited by his son and D. W. Forrest, D.D.	348
Heart of the Northern Sea, The. By Alvide Prydz	96	Letters of Edward Lear. Edited by Lady Strachey [G. K. Chesterton]	878
Heine's Book of Songs. Translated by John Todhunter	473	Letters of Samuel Reynolds Hole, Dean of Rochester, The. Edited with a Memoir by George A. B. Dewar	246
High Tops of Black Mount, The. By the Marchioness of Breadalbane	21	Letters of Queen Victoria: A Selection from Her Majesty's Correspondence, 1837—1861, The. Edited by A. C. Benson and Viscount Esher [The Rt. Hon. Lord Eversley]	154, 190, 213
Historians' History of the World, The. [Professor A. F. Pollard]	909	Life and Letters of Sir Henry Wotton, The. By Logan Pearsall Smith	277
Historical Essays and Studies. By Lord Acton. Edited by J. N. Figgis and R. V. Laurence [H. F.]	506, 538	Life of Gilbert Burnet, Bishop of Salisbury, A; Scotland, 1643—1674, by T. E. S. Clarke, B.D., Minister of Saltoun; England, 1672—1715, by H. C. Foxcroft. With an Introduction by C. H. Firth, Regius Professor of Modern History	439
History of Aythan Waring, The. By Violet Jacobs	647	Life of the Salmon (The): With Reference more Especially to the Fish in Scotland. By W. L. Calderwood	541
History of Freedom and Other Essays, The. By Lord Acton. Edited, with an introduction, by J. N. Figgis and R. V. Laurence [H. F.]	506, 538	Life of Tom Morris, The. By W. W. Tulloch, D.D.	157
History of Modern Painting, The. By Professor Richard Muther [Professor C. Waldstein]	540
History of Painting from the Fourth to the Early Nineteenth Century. By Professor Richard Muther [Professor C. Waldstein]	540
History of Venice. Part II. By Pompeo Molmenti. Translated by Horatio F. Brown	403
House of Lynch, The. By Leonard Merrick	196
How to Fish. By W. Earl Hodgson [Rt. Hon. Sydney Charles Buxton]	244

REVIEWS OF BOOKS (continued).

	PAGE		PAGE
Life of William Laud. By the Rev. W. L. Mackintosh [Professor A. F. Pollard]	440	Principles of the German Civil Law, The. By Ernest J. Schuster	688
Liverpool. Painted by J. Hamilton Hay. Described by Dixon Scott	852	Prisoner at the Bar, The. By Arthur Train	247
London Parks and Gardens. By the Hon. Mrs. Evelyn Cecil	849	Prometheus Delivered, and other Poems. By Bernard Drew	681
Lover's Hours, The. By Filson Young	681	Proportional Representation. By John R. Commons	476
Lucretius, Epicurean and Poet. By John Masson	645
		Rachel Chalfont. By Sophie Cole	948
Man and the Cassock. By Mrs. David G. Ritchie	611	Répertoire Biographique de l'Episcopal Constitutional [1791—1802]. Par Paul Pisani	850
Matterhorn, The. By Guido Rey	473	Reproach of the Gospel, The. By the Rev. James H. F. Piele	684
Memoirs of Monsieur Claude, Chief of Police under the Second Empire. Translated by Katherine Prescott Wormeley	830	Rise of the Greek Epic, The. By Gilbert Murray [Professor J. B. Bury]	401
Memoirs of the Comtesse de Boigne. Edited by M. Charles Nicoulaud	879	Romance of the World's Fisheries, The. By Sidney Wright [G. M. M.]	368
Milan under the Sforza. By Cecilia M. Ady ...	610	Roman Journals of Ferdinand Gregorovius, 1852—1874, The. Translated by Mrs. G. W. Hamilton	156
Modern Egypt. By the Earl of Cromer. First notice	942	Roots of Reality, The. By E. Belfort Bax	22
Modernism and Romance. By R. A. Scott James	680
Mr. Gladstone. By D. C. Lathbury. Leaders of the Church Series	575	Scot in the Eighteenth Century, The. By the late Dr. John Watson	608
Mr. Strudge. By Percy White	577	Shadow Show, The. By A. St. John Adcock	681
		Sheaf of Corn, A. By Mary E. Mann	647
Napoleon's Men and Methods. By Alexander L. Kielland. Translated by Joseph McCabe	56	Small Holdings of England, The. By L. Jebb	58
Natural History for Children. Various	376	Somehow Good. By William de Morgan	683
New Theology Sermons. By the Rev. R. J. Campbell	542	Some Literary Associations of East Anglia. By William A. Dutt	124
New Worlds for Old. By H. G. Wells	910	Songs of Life and Love. By May Aldington	681
Nietzsche in Outline and Aphorism. By A. R. Orage	820	Son of the Bondwoman, The. By E. P. Bazan. Translated by Ethel H. Hearn	314
Northern Iron, The. By George A. Birmingham	478	Spring in London: A Poem on the Nature of Things. By E. A.	681
Norwegian Fjords, The. Painted and Described by A. Heaton Cooper	852	Stooping Lady, The. By Maurice Hewlett	60
Nos Enfants. Par Anatole France	368	Story of a Beautiful Duchess, The. Being an Account of the Life and Times of Elizabeth Gunning, Duchess of Hamilton and Argyle. By Horace Bleackley	682
Notes on Xenophon and Others. By Herbert Richards	480	Studies, Historical and Critical. By Pasquale Villari	848
Novels—Various	480, 720, 852	Studies in Poetry. By Stopford A. Brooke [Professor Edward Dowden]	310
Nun, The. By René Bazin	800
		Tales of Two People. By Anthony Hope	160
Odes and Epodes of Horace, The. Translated into English Verse by John Marshall, LL.D. ...	311	Tennyson, The Works of. Annotated by Alfred, Lord Tennyson. Edited by Hallam, Lord Tennyson. Poems. Vol. I.	574
Old and New Japan. By Clive Holland	471	Thomas à Kempis: His Age and Book. By J. E. G. de Montmorency	412
		Thomas Hood: His Life and Times. By Walter Jerrold	404
Paradise of the Fathers, The. Translated by Ernest A. Wallis Budge	348	Three Plays with Happy Endings. By St. John Hankin	194
Passages from the Past. By His Grace the Duke of Argyll	280	Thyrsis and Fausta. By Rosalind Travers [Professor C. H. Herford]	944
Pekin to Paris: An Account of Prince Borghese's Journey Across Two Continents in a Motor-Car. By Luigi Barzini	718	To-morrow in the East. By Douglas Story	443
Per Aspera ad Astra. By David Firangçon-Davies	681	Truth about the Congo, The. By Frederick Starr	92
Petrarch, his Life and Times. By H. C. Hollway-Calthrop	312
Philosophy of Common Sense, The. By Frederic Harrison	471	Valerie Upton. By Anne Douglas Sedgwick	282
Plantagenet Roll of the Blood Royal, The. The Exeter Volume. By the Marquis of Ruigny	28	Vie de Jeanne d'Arc. Par Anatole France	843
Political History of England, The. Volume XII., 1837—1901. By Sidney Low and L. G. Sanders	539	Virgin Birth of Christ, The. By James Orr, D.D.	442

REVIEWS OF BOOKS (continued).

	PAGE		PAGE
Wanderings in Arabia. By Charles M. Doughty. Arranged with Introduction by Edward Garnett [R. B. Cunninghame Graham]	510	With the Border Ruffians: Memories of the Far West, 1852-1868. By R. H. Williams. Edited by E. W. Williams	609
Weavers, The. By Gilbert Parker	510	Woman in Transition. By Annette M. B. Meakin	646
William Allingham: A Diary. Edited by H. Alling- ham and D. Radford	313	Women's Suffrage, The Case for. Edited by Brougham Villiers	89
William Blake. By Arthur Symonds	124	Works of Louisa Alcott, The. [G. K. Chesterton]	364
William Jordan, Junior. By J. C. Snaith	544
William Pitt, Earl of Chatham. By Albert von Ruville. Translated by H. J. Chaytor and Mary Morrison	245
Windfall, The. By Charles Egbert Craddock	406
With Airship and Submarine. By Henry Colling- wood [G. M. M.]	366

BOOKS IN BRIEF AND SHORT NOTICES, 60, 62, 64, 98, 100, 130, 162, 196, 198, 200, 247, 250, 316, 354, 356, 408, 410,
446, 480, 508, 512, 546, 548, 578, 612, 648, 652, 686, 688,
720, 722, 770, 802, 832, 852, 880, 913, 948.

AUTHORS' INDEX.

	PAGE		PAGE
Abercrombie, Lascelles.—		Feaver, J. W.—
Hope and Despair	679	October	15
Soul and Body	309	Vox Marium	149
The Trance	498	Flecker, James.—
The World as a Tune	897	A Christmas Carol	470
Banks, Miss Adeline Mary.—My Garden	119	Baby Love	607
Bernstein, Edward.—		Looking Eastwards	791
Germany's Ireland	341	To the World and a Poet a Thousand Years Hence	537
German Socialism and the Colonial Question	46	French, Percy.—An Irish Mother	641
The Character of William II.	233	Galsworthy, John.—
The Land Question in German Towns	498	Comfort	928
The Naval Race and German Finance	757	The Careful Man	817
The Popular Struggle in Prussia	565	The House of Silence	77
The Revolt in German Radicalism	705	The Mother	265
Bury, Professor J. B.—The Purgation of Homer	401	The Old Order	113
Buxton, The Rt. Hon. Sydney Charles.—“How to Fish”	244	Sport	702
Cameron, W. J.—A Royalist in Spring-Time	713	Graham, R. B. Cunninghame.—A Scholar Gypsy... ..	844
Chesterton, G. K.—		Grant, Alexr. J.—The Keeper	940
How Pleasant to Know Mr. Lear	878	Harrison, Mrs. Frederic.—The Best Children's Books	363
Louisa Alcott	364	Harvey, W. F.—Sarah Bennet's Possession	428
Churchill, The Rt. Hon. Winston S., M.P.—The Untrodden Field in Politics	812	Herford, Professor C. H.—Pastoral and Adventure	944
Cortesi, Salvatore.—A Sicilian Superman	822	Hort, G. M.—The Pantheist	765
Davies, William H.—A Maiden and Her Hair	272	Hume, Major Martin.—Modern Spanish Novelists	734
Dimnet, M. l'Abbé.—A Re-Appearance	633	Lyttelton, Miss Lucy.—Ut Caro Infirma!	567
Dowden, Professor Edward.—		Masefield, John.—
A Shelley Affinity	829	Books for Boys	372
Studies in Poetry	310	The Dragon Man	41
Eversley, Rt. Hon. Lord.—		Masterman, C. F. G., M.P.—
Carleton, Lord Dorchester	20	The Prospect in Parliament	643
The Anglo-German War of Armaments	601	The Ruin of Macedonia	182
The Letters of Queen Victoria. I.	154	McChesney, Mrs. L. Studdiford.—Mary at Dawn: A Christmas Song	438
Do. do. II.	190	Minchin, Professor G. M.—
Do. do. III.	243	A Triumph of Telephotography	235
Fairbairn, Rev. Principal A. M., D.D.—Greek Religion	53	Science for Young People	366
		Murray, Professor Gilbert.—A Defence of Un- licensed Playing	117

AUTHORS' INDEX (continued).

	PAGE		PAGE
Nevinson, H. W.—		Wedderburn, Sir William.—Mr. Morley and Indian
A City of God	629	Reform	788
An Order of India	431	Williams, Arthur J.—The Need for a New Corrupt
"Lord of the World"	461	Practices Bill	936
Spring in India	819	B.—Abbé Loisy on the Synoptics	829
The Arya Samaj	753	Annals of an Eton House	768
The Song of Songs	871	E. C.—Ancient Britain	716
Noyes, Alfred.—		D.—The Dramatic Critic of "The Times"	706
In the Cool of the Evening	81	R. E. D.—Another Combes Ministry?	869
On a Railway Platform	341	H. F.—The Creed of the Catholic Liberal	538
Pease, Sir Alfred.—		J. A. H.—
The Giants of the Sudan. I.	337	Are Riches the Wages of Efficiency?	183
Do. do. II.	393	A Tariff as a Cure for Unemployment	933
Pollard, Professor A. F.—		Is Socialism a Spoils System?	148
A Whited Sepulchre	909	Is Socialism Plunder?	62
The Priest as Biographer	440	Is Socialism Tyranny?	118
The Statecraft of Henry VIII.	90	The Four-fold Path of Socialism	302
Rhys, Ernest.—The Three Women of Endell Street	394	The Right to Labour	673
Sharp, Miss Evelyn.—For the Real Child ...	370	T. H.—The Great French Story-teller	543
Shorter, Mrs. Dora Sigerson.—		K.—The Fear of Waste	868
The Awakening	827	Kusiali.—A Personally-Conducted Tour	464
Unrest in Autumn	184	M.—A Licensed Play	670
Sturge Henderson, Mrs. M.—Miss Tormentilla's		A Modern "Mystery" Play	536
Bracelet	9	A Parable of England	823
Talbot, Miss Ethel.—Ballade of the World in		A Study in Drab	634
Shadow	907	Hamlet and Rosmer	759
Trench, Herbert.—The Dream of Sully Prudhomme	870	Mr. Shaw's "Cæsar" and the Critics	338
Trevelyan, G. M.—England and Mr. Meredith ...	668	Mr. Shaw's Gospel of Common Sense	501
Waldstein, Professor C.—Muther's History of		The Primitives	791
Painting	540	N.—At Sea	236
		A. R.—Wayfarers	79
		W. S. T.—The Abbé Loisy's Farewell	703

The Nation

Vol. II., No. 1.]

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1907.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE	PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK ... 1	LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—	Casa Blanca: The French
The Future of Unionism ... 4	Case. By Robert Dell ... 17
The Russian Elections ... 5	"The Grip of the Specialist." By James Pearse, M.D., and
A Note on Kirkdale ... 6	"A Critic of the 'New
Our "National" Church ... 7	Religion" ... 19
Two Presidents ... 8	The New Testament. By
LIFE AND LETTERS:—	W.H. Griffith Thomas, D.D. ... 19
Miss Tormentilla's Bracelet. By M. Sturge Henderson ... 9	The Unrest in India. By
The Cant of Militarism ... 10	A. J. Butler ... 19
Vanished Children ... 11	"Tyrants of the Road." By
Secrets of the Sea ... 13	J. Leng Sturrock ... 19
MUSIC:—	"Silly Social Functions." By
The Cardiff Festival ... 13	V. Churchill ... 19
OPEN QUESTIONS:—	REVIEWS:—
The Situation in Ireland ... 14	Carleton, Lord Dorchester. By the Rt. Hon. Lord
POETRY:—	Eversley ... 20
"October." By J. W. Feaver ... 15	Lady Breadalbane at Home ... 21
THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 16	The Roots of Reality ... 22
Books to be Read ... 16	A Romance of the Sea ... 23
	The Novel of the Week ... 24
	INSURANCE:—
	Arbitration v. Trial by Jury ... 26
	THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 28

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

DISESTABLISHMENT was the subject chosen by the Bishop of Norwich for his Presidential address to the members of the Church Congress on Tuesday last. The visible changes involved in such a step would not, he said, be so striking as many people imagined. The Bishops would no longer have seats in the House of Lords, the State chaplaincies would cease, possibly the boards of management throughout the country would be less willing to appoint chaplains to public institutions, and it would no longer be an established rule that the Sovereign should be consecrated by the Chief Bishop of the Church. On the other hand, the Church, as a religious community, would gain much greater freedom. She would have power, without any interference from the State, to enact bye-laws enabling her to shape her system so as to meet the changing conditions of the time. All this would, he thought, be welcomed by "many of our best and most earnest spirits, who chafe under our inability to effect the reforms we desire and work independently on our own lines." He feared, however, that disestablishment would "be accompanied by a measure of more or less sweeping spoliation," and although admitting that the loss would certainly not fall upon the parochial clergy, he was of opinion that the parochial system would break down in a disestablished church. Sir Edward Russell read a striking paper on the same subject. Following the Bishop of Carlisle's recent address, he declared that, owing to the Catholic revival, the Church of England was becoming more and more a sect. Popular self-government of that Church would draw forth money and develop financial skill, it would freshen the vitality of episcopal control, curb pernicious eccentricity and superstitious retrogression, and generally make the Church a more intellectual as well as a more spiritual Communion.

* * *

A CERTAIN gladiatorial interest always attaches to the Congress from the annual opportunity it gives for the discussion of questions of ritual and ceremonial. The subject of the Prayer-Book and Modern Needs was dealt with by the Dean of Canterbury, the Dean of Lichfield, Mr. Athelstan Riley, Dr. Griffith Thomas, and other speakers. The principal fact made clear in the debate was that the Evangelicals, as represented by the Dean of Canterbury, would hold themselves compelled to leave the Church if a new rubric appointing a special vestment for use in the Communion Service were officially adopted. The Dean of Lichfield's attitude in pleading for the optional use of such a vestment instead of insisting upon its universal obligation seems to indicate a willingness on the part of High Churchmen to come to terms. Other subjects discussed were Church Finance, Religious Education—when the Bishop of Manchester insisted upon preserving the denominational character of the voluntary schools—Old Testament Teaching, and Christianity and Economic Problems. The debate on Socialism was introduced by Archdeacon Cunningham, who stated that Socialism as an ideal and an inspiration appealed to an immense and a rapidly growing number of people in the present day, but that from a Christian point of view it was a very meagre ideal, because it could not be universal, and because it involved a materialistic assumption. Both of these latter arguments were controverted by succeeding speakers, Mr. F. Rogers, in particular, contributing an impressive speech in support of the Socialist ideal.

* * *

In a recent issue of the "British Weekly" the Editor took Mr. Lloyd-George somewhat severely to task for what he considered his lukewarmness in regard to Disestablishment. In the current issue of the "British Weekly" Mr. Lloyd-George replies with characteristic vigour to the charge. "I know," he says, "that if the cause of Welsh Disestablishment miscarries inside the Cabinet, Welshmen will blame me, and rightly so. I am willing they should censure me if I fail them. But if I see them through, I shall ask their leave to speak my mind freely of those who have hinted that I was capable of selling my country." For the rest Mr. Lloyd-George states that a Welsh Disestablishment Bill is likely to be an item in the Sessional programme of 1909, though this forecast is dependent upon the unlikely event of the House of Lords bowing to the resolution of last Session, and accepting the Education and Land measures which will be put up to them a second time next Session.

* * *

No change has taken place this week in the deadlock between the Railway Companies and the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants. But an important Conference is to be held this week-end at Manchester, between the representatives of the various railway workers' unions, to consider a proposal for federation. Should the result of this Conference be to secure the formal co-operation of the locomotive men, the situation will at once become more grave, for the real weakness of the Amalgamated Society consists in the fact that it does not command the adhesion of the main body of the drivers, and contains too large a proportion of porters, and other men, whose places can be filled without great difficulty or excessive risk. The locomotive men, however, under the skilled guidance of Mr. Fox, are pursuing a policy of reasonable caution, and are not likely to commit themselves unless they calculate that a co-operation with the Amalgamated Society will force the Companies to conference, so yielding the possibility or probability of a peaceful settlement. Meantime, the policy of the Companies, as illustrated by the recent concessions of the Scotch Railways to their employés, and the rise in wages by which the Great Northern has just pacified their striking foundrymen, is directed towards dividing the forces of discontent, and lightening the hostile vote in the forthcoming ballot of the union men.

* * *

UNLIKE most "conferences," that held last Monday on the "Living-in" System at Toynbee Hall, under the presidency of Lord Hugh Cecil, afforded a genuine discussion of a live issue. The dangerous and degrading element of "truck" is gradually disappearing from our industrial system: as regards the wages of men it has almost gone. The system of "Living-in" practised by large grocery and drapery establishments and a few "general stores," by which board and food are given as part-wage, is the largest survival in any occupation where men are employed, though for women domestic service furnishes the largest remaining example. There is, of course, something to be said for the system, on the score of morals, as of economy: under the benevolent employer retaining some relics of the old personal nexus, a humanising social influence may be exercised. But in the large modern store this personal nexus inevitably gives place to a mechanical rule, which interferes with individual liberty, and absorbs in the firm the entire control of the personal life of the employé. That living-in can be made cheaper for the employer and for the shop assistant than the usual outside lodging, admits no doubt, and some interesting estimates were submitted by employers to the Conference. But why should there not be enough spirit and business capacity in the employés of a large firm to enable them to organise on their own behalf and run upon co-operative principles a cheap hotel or large lodging-house? The real solution surely lies in this direction.

* * *

In presenting a portrait of Mr. Thomas Burt to the Newcastle Liberal Club, last Monday, Sir Edward Grey touched with great felicity the note of personal character as a factor in politics. There is no more respected, no more dignified figure in our political life, than Mr. Burt, who in a few days' time completes his seventieth year. At ten years old a worker in the mines, long years of manual toil gave him that thorough knowledge of Northern industrial life which was his first, though by no means his sole, qualification as Labour leader and Parliamentarian. In him the tough, practical Northumbrian character is softened and illumined by greatness of heart and intellect, which have won for him friendship and admiration in every circle of his countrymen. Presenting an example of the successful union between Liberalism and Labour, he never compromised a principle in doing so. Though the Northumbrian miners have not always seen eye to eye with the main body of trade unionism, and Mr. Burt has sometimes taken a strong stand against the policy of the new trade unions, no man in the modern working-class movement is listened to with more respect by the younger and more ardent spirits in the various Congresses in which he has taken part, or is valued more as a private counsellor. Sir Edward Grey spoke no light words of compliment when he said: "There is no cause, no question, no controversy, with which Mr. Burt dealt, which he did not elevate and ennoble with the fineness of his own spirit; and there was no man, friend or opponent, who got into contact with him without coming away the better for it."

* * *

THE dignified and powerful articles appearing in the "Times" of Monday and Tuesday last, in which Father Tyrrell dealt with the recent Papal Encyclical, will be welcomed by all who care for the cause of liberalism in religion. They show that the modernists have no intention of lowering their flag at the bidding of those obscurantists who speak through the mouth of Pius X. Father Tyrrell's closely reasoned examination of the basis on which the scholastic theology rests, his learned appeal to history, and his scathing denunciation of the morality of the priesthood in those countries—Spain, Southern Italy, Sicily, South America—where obscurantism has entire possession of the field, form an unanswerable indictment of the system for which the Pope demands universal adherence. And there is little doubt that Father Tyrrell's rousing manifesto will find support from many who consider themselves as good Catholics as Monsignor Montagnini or Cardinal Merry del Val. As Father Tyrrell implies, the modernists number not only some "priests and laymen," but "Cardinals, Archbishops, and Bishops" in their ranks. They may be hopelessly outnumbered both in the hierarchy and in the rank and file of the clergy, but their numerical deficiency is more than counterbalanced by the learning, breadth of view, and sincere zeal for spiritual Christianity, which they possess.

* * *

In May last Lord Curzon, as Chancellor of the University of Oxford, issued a public appeal for funds to enable the University "to continue its great and beneficent work in the cause of national education." A committee was formed and much spade-work has been done, the results of which are recorded in a circular letter just issued by Lord Curzon. The public was invited last May to subscribe £250,000. Towards this sum £55,000 has now been promised, the two largest subscribers being Mr. W. W. Astor and the Hon. T. A. Brassey, who give £10,000 each. As yet there is no such response as the leading American Universities are wont to expect from their alumni. We observe that Lord Curzon claims that "the education of the Empire is vitally involved" in his appeal. The list of donations does not indicate that the Imperialist examples set by Mr. Rhodes and Mr. Beit have proved very efficacious. As regards Oxford men, the far stronger feeling of affection for their College undoubtedly impairs the force of an appeal issued on behalf of the University. Moreover, the belief that, though the University is poor, the Colleges are rich and can be made to contribute more largely to a central fund, is very prevalent.

* * *

In the absence of full reports of what Mr. Keir Hardie has said in Bengal in interviews and public speeches, it is prudent to refrain from any commentary. It is impossible to believe that he can really have compared our measures of repression (open as they are to some criticism) to the Armenian atrocities. His argument that since Canada is fit for self-government, India must also be fit, evidently needs a context to make sense. We notice that in his telegram Mr. Hardie states that the papers which condemn his "extreme" utterances have been misled by Reuter. Meanwhile the prosecutions for Press offences and "seditious" speeches are growing unpleasantly frequent. One of them incidentally reveals the fact that flogging is used as a means of punishing political offences. A Bengal student named Susil Chunder Sen was, as the "Times" reported on Wednesday, "birched by order of the Presidency Magistrate for participation in the Bow Bazaar riot." Public flogging, carried out at the triangle placed outside every magistrate's court, is still the rule in most Indian provinces. But the flogging of an educated man for a political offence is surely a novel infamy. The flogging of "politicals" is rare even in Russia. Its frequency under Austrian rule in Italy was one of the circumstances most potent in alienating the sympathy even of English Conservatives in 1848. Mr. Morley's attention will, we hope, be directed to this disgraceful incident.

* * *

It was a fortunate coincidence that Mr. Taft, the United States Minister of War, should have been present at Tokio, as guest of the Japanese Government, to stamp out the sparks of the incendiary policy which a section of the New York Press has just been emitting. The "Sun" and the "Times" are the principal offenders. The former dares to assert that "The Navy is going to the Pacific for war, and Japan recognises the fact, and is energetically preparing for it"; the latter taunts Japan with "the sudden cessation of pin-pricks when Tokio learned that the Armada was to be moved to the Pacific." The Sunday supplement of the "Tribune," the staid and more reputable paper, of which Mr. Whitelaw Reid is proprietor and was editor, begins the publication of a serial story describing a war between Japan and the United States. Mr. Taft stigmatised this wild outburst of yellow journalism as "infamous," and, speaking at a banquet on Tuesday, said, "There is only a little cloud over our friendship of fifty years, and the greatest earthquake of the country could not shake our amity."

* * *

In his speech at St. Louis last Wednesday, Mr. Roosevelt gave a most comprehensive and outspoken statement of his industrial policy and of the constitutional situation it involves. By a series of enactments, such as the Sherman and the Elkins' Acts, the vague general powers over inter-State commerce conceded by the Constitution have been crystallised into a tolerably rigorous federal control over railroads and other transport companies. But can these powers be stretched so as to enable him to achieve his other great object, of fastening federal restraints upon manufacturing trusts and other industrial corporations doing business outside the State in which they are incorporated? The plain way out of the difficulty would be an amendment to the Constitution; but the conditions of such amendment are so rigorous as to make this course impracticable. Therefore, Mr. Roosevelt resorts to an elastic view of constitutional interpretation. The Constitution is to be interpreted "as a living organism, designed to meet the conditions of life," and "The meaning of the Constitution is to be sought as much in the national life as in the dictionary"—an obiter dictum of a former judge of the Supreme Court, which, when uttered, greatly scandalised the legal purists, who regarded it as a licence to convert a written into an unwritten constitution. This doctrine of Mr. Roosevelt is in some respects the most revolutionary of his utterances.

* * *

THE concluding sittings of The Hague Conference possess scarcely a vestige of interest. The project for obligatory arbitration and a permanent court is still being dressed up in formal phraseology as "a recommendation to Governments," though the failure of the Conference to agree on any definite plan for the composition of a Court has robbed it of any practical value. The Austrian delegation, with the support of the other members of the Triplice, has made the unwelcome suggestion that the Tsar should be recognised as the permanent convener of the Conference. The British and American delegations happily refrained from expressing their assent. The Russian drafting of the programme and the uninspiring presidency of M. Nelidoff have had much to do with the relative sterility of this Conference.

* * *

THE Moroccan crisis is passing through a phase of stagnation. The Sultan is still awaiting the visit of M. Regnault at Rabat, and the result will show whether in the impending struggle for the throne he will be definitely recognised as the protégé of France. The only new diplomatic feature is a French proposal that French warships should enjoy the right of searching European vessels in Moroccan waters for smuggled arms. Germany has signified her assent. Spain stands aloof from the proposal, and her continued "disloyalty" to the partnership in Morocco is beginning to excite sharp comments in Paris.

* * *

AN Austro-Russian Note, addressed, as the result of a meeting at Vienna between Baron Aehrenthal and M. Isvolsky, to the Greek, Servian, and Bulgarian Governments, may serve a useful purpose. Article III. of the Mürzsteg Programme foreshadowed a delimitation of administrative areas in Macedonia, in accordance with the distribution of races. This incautious phrase, hinting at something like partition, may have played a part in encouraging the Greeks to undertake their campaign of conquest against the southern and central Bulgarian villages. With the partial connivance for nearly two years of the Turks, they have been converting whole districts by force to the Greek Church. The Note explains that conquests so acquired will not in any case be considered as valid by the Powers, and adds that no delimitation can take place until tranquillity is restored. Meanwhile the Turks seem at last to have realised that the Greeks, so useful in combating the more numerous and more rebellious Bulgarians, are at length becoming dangerous, and three of the more guilty Bishops and some of Consuls are likely to be expelled. The Bishop of Drama, indeed, has already been removed to a monastery on Mount Athos. The attitude of the Bulgarian Church is in sharp contrast to that of the Patriarchate. The Exarch has just warned his Bishops against assisting the Committees, and dismissed some forty teachers who had relations with the Bulgarian bands.

* * *

THE difference in culpability between Greeks and Bulgars is indeed so striking, that this Note has been sharply criticised by the Russian Press, which argues that the Russian policy, fortified by the Anglo-Russian agreement, ought no longer to follow an Austrian lead. It is argued with some reason that there really was no ground for addressing a remonstrance to Sofia. This renewal of interest in Balkan affairs, which is evident even in the Cadet and the Radical papers, is the first direct consequence of the Anglo-Russian entente. Following, as it does, on the visit of the Grand Duke Vladimir to Sofia, it seems to give promise of a forward policy, though not, we hope, an adventurous policy, on Russia's part in the Balkans. It is generally assumed in these articles that the Agreement gives Russia, albeit tacitly, a free hand in the Balkans, and the "Novoe Vremia" writes in a violently anti-German strain. The danger of all this is obvious. The good, if Sir Edward Grey will now venture to press for more drastic reforms in Macedonia, is no less clear. Russia, at least, would not now oppose an executive control, and France follows Russia.

* * *

AN interesting scheme of historical teaching is to be inaugurated under the auspices of the London County Council. In the days of the old School Board lectures on the local history of various parts of London were delivered to the teachers in the London schools, but this new scheme takes the history of London as a whole, and the syllabus has been drawn up with a view of describing the development of civic institutions and life, and showing the place that the City holds in the general history of the country. The lectures are open to all teachers in London schools, both elementary and secondary, and are to be given in five different centres, so as to meet the convenience of teachers from all parts of London. They are being organised and delivered by Mr. K. H. Vickers, lecturer in Modern History at University College, Bristol. It is hoped that a new interest in the teaching of history will arise when the general movements of the country at large can be illustrated by the history of a locality with which both teacher and taught are familiar.

Politics and Affairs.

THE FUTURE OF UNIONISM.

WHAT precisely is to be the line of cleavage within the Unionist Party? The question, raised as it is, by a fairly continuous discussion in the Unionist journals, is one which Liberals will do well to weigh as dispassionately as they can. It is doubtless human or pardonable to indulge in some inward satisfaction at the thought that the divergencies which so long harassed ourselves have now beset our opponents. We may legitimately, in this instance, thank Providence that the mad dog has passed to the other village. But, perhaps, we shall be better employed in studying the character and causes of the cleavage that reveals itself. This examination is pretty sure to throw light not merely on the future of parties, but on the nature of the powers at work in our political life.

The fissure in the party takes the shape for the moment of discontent with the leadership of Mr. Balfour—a discontent voiced in particular by Mr. Jesse Collings. In part, this discontent is merely the old protest of the Tariff Reformers, of which we have heard intermittently ever since 1903. Mr. Balfour's gyrations on the Fiscal question lost him the confidence of the country, but did not gain him the Chamberlainites. The disaster of the General Election appeared to bring him closer to them, and the "Valentine Letter" of February, 1906, was very naturally interpreted as a final surrender. But this judgment failed to do justice to Mr. Balfour's dialectical dexterity, and the close of the second Session of Parliament seems to have left the Tariff Reformers as discontented as ever. A minority in the country, they contend that they control the numerical majority of the party and inspire the whole of its enthusiasm. They hold the party in short, but not the party machine, nor the party leader. So far, this is a situation with which we have long been familiar. What is more interesting is the insistence on social reform as bound up with Mr. Chamberlain's propaganda. It is true that the connection was suggested at the very outset of the Chamberlain campaign. Old Age Pensions were to be among the good things which a Colonial Preference was to bring. But as the controversy developed, it was not so much actual legislation as the inherent economic advantages of Protection—such as high wages and continuity of employment—which were urged by Tariff Reformers. Indeed, when Mr. Chamberlain was explaining that he would use the new taxes to remit old ones, in order to lay no increased cost upon the poorer consumers, he would certainly have found it hard to say where he was going to get the money for extensive schemes of social reform. We do not know whether by this time Tariff Reformers are prepared with some new method of explaining how we can at the same time have our cake, in the shape of a handsome revenue available for social reforms, and also eat it in the form of reduced taxes on tea and sugar. But however this may be, they are now insisting to us that the cause of Preference is also that of social reform. By Protection we are to combat Socialism.

How is this to be? The line of thought is tolerably clear, and rests on ideas which are worth setting out because they are likely to become the basis of political controversy for some years to come. The political or imperialistic side of the Tariff Reform propaganda will probably in future take a second place. It will be tacitly recognised that taxes on food and raw material are not within the reach of practical politics. Stress will be laid on the position of our manufactures, on the necessity of keeping our markets and enlarging them by retaliation, on the power of Protection to give continuous employment and high wages, on the desirability of stopping the competition alike of the sweated foreign workman and of his products. In a word, the cry will be for a heavy tariff on manufactured goods, and this will be recommended in particular by a promise to expend the revenue so to be raised on Old Age Pensions, or other popular social proposals. The result is to be that Free Traders and Socialists will be dished, so to say, in one cooking. Of the two, however, the Free Trader alone will be fully conscious of what is happening to him. The Socialist, it is expected, will be killed, flayed, spitted, roasted and eaten without being aware of the process. He is to get everything he wants in the way of relief for the poor—only without knowing it he is to pay for it all in the shape of increased taxation. True Socialism, we are told by Tariff Reformers, is compatible with Free Trade alone, because Free Trade involves direct taxation and direct taxation tends to fall more and more upon wealth. Hence given Free Trade, every new Social reform that costs money benefits the poor at the expense of the rich. Establish Protection, on the other hand, and the sting of Socialism is drawn. The poor may have all the reforms they desire, but the cost will fall on them as consumers. They will in effect be paying out of one pocket into another.

Which of these considerations are the least unsound we must leave for the moment to the reader to determine. What we have to point out at present is that Protectionist social reform as an alternative to Socialism is likely to become the cry of one section, and that the larger and more enthusiastic section of the Opposition. Socialism, it will be said, is the enemy; but Socialism in these democratic days is not to be met by a frontal attack. A policy of masterly concession, of concession in appearance, which always preserves the real strongholds in their present hands, will best serve our turn. We must feed the children, support the aged, find work for the unemployed. All this and much else we will do for the poorer classes, but all the time we will make them pay for it without knowing. Such, it would seem, is to be the Tory democracy of the future. Opposed to it, within the same party, is the Toryism of the Cecils, which seems destined to revert more and more to the high and dry Conservatism of the "True-blue" Church and State variety. Its fate, we may take it, is bound up with that of the House of Lords. It has no strength in the people, and can avail only so far as the popular will is frustrated by the peculiarities of our Constitution. The country desires movement, progress, and a drastic remedy for the evils incident to the modern industrial system. The vital controversies of the future will turn, we may take it, on the measures by which these evils are to be remedied, and if the Protectionist cure is spurious it will be for us Free Traders to propound one that is genuine.

THE RUSSIAN ELECTIONS.

FOR the third time in two years Russia is passing through a General Election. There is something a little startling in the mere use of such a word to describe the singular process by which the Duma is chosen. To the European mind it conjures up the picture of a public campaign, in which leaders address mass meetings, candidates talk politics to great crowds at street corners, and the Press pours forth polemics, addresses, and appeals. In Russia they conduct their elections under martial law. We doubt if any of the popular leaders has ever in his life addressed a free public meeting held with open doors, unless it were during the brief period of licence which followed the general strike in 1905. Only the reactionary parties may meet in public at all, and even to the Constitutional Democrats the use of the Press is denied. Such organisation as there is, resembles a conspiracy; such election literature as there is, is either lithographed by amateur enthusiasm, or printed "underground." For the third time, the electoral period finds the real leaders of the people either, like Professor Miliukoff, disqualified by some technical trick, or sheltering in some foreign asylum, like the more prominent men of the Labour and Socialist Parties. Candidates seldom venture to wear their colours in public, and the majority of those so far elected at the primary stage, are described officially as "neutral," "non-party," or "independent." A Western democracy, forced to choose a Parliament under such conditions, would either rebel, or else abstain altogether from the miserable farce. It is a proof of the oddly developed instinct of the Russian people for corporate action, in the face of obstacles that would drive any other race to despair, that it can by some secret alchemy of combination, extort victory even from these conditions.

It is quite certain that the ordinary methods of terrorism and repression would have failed at a third trial, as they failed on the first two occasions. The manipulation of the register always left a substantial progressive majority; the exclusion of "dangerous" candidates only opened the path to younger and equally "dangerous," though less conspicuous, leaders. In a few constituencies it is probable that during the second elections reactionaries were chosen by the votes of "dead souls," but in the absence of secret balloting, the methods of arbitrary arithmetic, so common in Spain, are not open to the bureaucracy. But at this election it really seems as though M. Stolypin had assured to himself a majority in advance. For the new electoral "law," proclaimed in defiance of the Constitution, has given to the larger landowners of Russia a voice which actually predominates over that of all the rest of the population. The system of indirect election, with its elaborate arrangement of class curiæ, and its grouping of constituencies by race, is full of pitfalls and tricks, but its main effect is to place at the disposal of the landlords in the second stage of the elections, some 2,594 electors, as against the 2,567 who represent all the rest of the population. Each elector of the landlord class, as Professor Miliukoff has shown in an interesting article in the "Contemporary Review," will represent only 28 persons on the average, and the result is, of course, to place the fate of the next Duma at the mercy of a series of constituencies which are comparable only to the "rotten boroughs" of our own pre-Reform period. The amazing thing is that despite these elaborate precautions, it is by no means certain that M. Stolypin will obtain the majority for which he has intrigued. The landlord vote will not be unanimous. There are still many Liberals left in the class which created the Zemstvo movement, and the Conservative vote is split between the Octobrists and the various monarchist groups. The popular constituencies on their side betray no symptoms of a reaction. The plain fact is that there is in Russia no real reactionary party. Even in the Church and the bureaucratic services it is only on the higher ranks that the Government can absolutely depend. The Bishops have some difficulty in dragooning the rank and file of the priesthood, which sent four ardent progressives to the second Duma. The reactionary newspapers depend on official subsidies, and, even so, are often obliged to distribute their copies gratis. The League of True Russian Men exists only by hiring hooligans, and its funds come largely from a single person—probably a Grand Duke—whom its organs describe reverently as "the mysterious unknown." Without some basis of spontaneous reactionary sentiment among the masses of the people, the effort to create a Conservative Party at the polls must ultimately fail. If M. Stolypin does obtain a majority, it is fairly certain that it will be neither considerable nor homogeneous. On the other hand, a politician so competent as M. Pergament, formerly the Deputy for Odessa, has actually ventured to publish a forecast giving to the progressive parties a fairly substantial majority. The more mature and organised parties, who have borne the brunt of the Governmental repression, will doubtless enter the third Duma in greatly reduced numbers, but with the aid of the vague and undogmatic progressive groups, it is quite conceivable that they may succeed in forming an Opposition majority.

The real obstacle which the progressive parties have had to face is not reaction but apathy. It is certain that if, by a miracle of combination and enthusiasm, a Liberal Duma could be elected, it would be immediately dissolved. The plain man has asked himself why, if this is so, he should trouble himself to elect a Duma at all. The Social Revolutionary party has deliberately boycotted the elections, and the register, which sometimes contained the names of only one-tenth of the qualified electors, proves that its attitude was shared by vast numbers of Russians who agree with it in little else. There were even moderate Liberals who affected to think that an Opposition Duma would be a disaster, since its dissolution would be the signal for the cancelling of the October Constitution and a frank return to the old régime. It was only the more enlightened of the Cadets and Social Democrats who had the wisdom to see the moral importance of an impressive demonstration. Let us at least show, they argued, that the people still demand a Constitution, that neither terrorism nor trickery can weary or discourage us, and if the Tsar does, after all, break his oath and restore unchecked autocracy, that will be for his people a moral victory, and for the foreign financiers, on whom he depends, a clear advertisement of the instability of the present régime. Whatever the result, it is certain that the Cadets will not enter the third Duma with their former constitutional illusions. Even if they can obtain a majority, they will not repeat their cautious and loyal attempts to save Russia by using their legislative initiative. With or without a majority the only value of the Duma to the progressive parties is now the fact that it will serve as an effective platform, for it will still be the one assembly in Russia in which free speech is possible. The Cadets used to denounce this heresy when the Social Democrats uttered it during the brief life of the second Duma. They tried, with a sincere and self-sacrificing energy, to work out legislation on a moderate basis which a reasonable Government might accept. They made no attempt to claim responsible government, played the thankless part of a moderate and compromising centre, and refrained from any demonstration which could have been construed as a definite challenge to M. Stolypin. Their reward was a demand for the arrest of some fifty members of the Duma, and its suppression even before that demand had been refused. They were wise to make the attempt, which failed, but it is an attempt which no self-respecting party could repeat. They realise now, as clearly as the Socialists, that only some movement or crisis outside the Duma can save the Duma from impotence. Years may pass before approaching bankruptcy or a general strike, or a series of risings and mutinies compels the bureaucracy to surrender once more, as it did in the momentary panic of 1905. In the meantime, while Russia is in reality as far as ever from possessing a Constitutional government, something has certainly been gained. The people has passed through an intense and trying period of education which has left it tired, but stripped of mischievous illusions. It demands now as its chartered rights what formerly it claimed only as its aspirations. It is fighting an enemy who has once been beaten, an enemy whose broken oaths have placed him even legally in the wrong. There is a Liberal Press, which cannot be entirely silenced, and the parties which used to have their headquarters abroad are now domiciled in the country. Above all, the Duma, by bringing together Poles, Georgians, Jews, and Mohammedans, with Russians, has created a sense of unity which never existed before. These are gains which will survive, whether the third Duma be suppressed like its predecessors, or survives to register by an unrepresentative vote the momentary triumph of the bureaucracy.

A NOTE ON KIRKDALE.

THE bye-election at Kirkdale, which resulted in the return of a Conservative by almost precisely the majority at the last General Election, excited an interest far in excess of the immediate practical results. The Socialists, fresh from their triumphs at Jarrow and Colne Valley, adopted their wonted tactics. They descended in multitudes from all the neighbouring towns, they spoke in marquees, street corners, from waggons, and lorries, everywhere, indeed, where an audience could assemble. They entered into the fight with the swing and earnestness and fire which deserve to command success. The Conservatives were at first bewildered by the vehemence of the onslaught. Later, the Liverpool traditions, and the working-men's caucus, together with the turning of the whole contest into a religious and Protestant rally, enabled them to maintain their old position. The episode in many respects, has been almost comical. It is a bye-election in the slack season. Just as in the newspapers all consideration of immediate politics is then swept away, and replaced by vivacious correspondence upon "What is Socialism?" or "Is Religion a Failure?" so at Kirkdale in a September contest, nothing seems to have been heard of the questions of pressing interest. It may be, perhaps, that the interest of these pressing questions is exaggerated, or it may be that the absence of an official Government candidate rendered their discussion something like a performance of "Hamlet" without the Prince of Denmark. But, for once, the curious idealism which lurks in the popular English crowds was allowed full play. And the election, instead of being fought upon Tariff Reform, Old Age Pensions, the House of Lords, or any specific Liberal, Labour, or Conservative programme, resolved itself into a violent discussion as to the nature, meaning, and scope of Socialism. Into such a discussion, of necessity, there entered those religious interests which have for so long dominated the politics of Liverpool, and unedifying recriminations, on the one hand, denounced Mr. Hill as an Atheist, on the other, inquired pointedly whether Mr. Balfour was a Christian, and why Mr. F. E. Smith never attended prayers in the House of Commons. The Conservatives cannot be exonerated from the charge of originating such deplorable invective. Assailed by the sudden and almost bewildering activity of the new Labour propagandism, they seem to have sought to turn the flank of their attack by branding them all as Atheists. It is the old charge, which once served so well as a cry against Radicalism when some of its advocates appeared to be blasphemous assailants of the Established Church. "It will be said," wrote Dr. Jelf to Maurice, in a famous controversy, "Mr. Maurice is identified with Mr. Kingsley, and Mr. Kingsley is identified with Mr. Holyoake, and Mr. Holyoake is identified with Tom Paine. There are only three links between King's College and the author of the 'Rights of Man.'" A similar frantic logic appears to have been exercised at Kirkdale. Socialism, of course, has no more to do with religion or its absence, than Liberalism or Conservatism. There are thousands of Christian Socialists, there are thousands of Socialists non-Christian. An economic organisation of society can never replace or interfere with any conceptions of the ultimate meaning of the Universe. But "Socialism is Atheism," according to Mr. Macdonald's testimony, was on every wall, and the burden of Mr. McArthur's speeches was, "Socialists are Atheists: they will destroy our family life." "They will substitute for marriage something even worse," as one of their friends expressed it. A specially reprehensible item in a rather squalid campaign was the issuing of extracts from one of Mr. Blatchford's philosophical books as a political leaflet. "I do not believe in God. I do not believe in the efficacy of prayer," they ran in raw, cold sentences. The split in the Protestant vote was averted. "I have voted against you: I—I—am rather ashamed, but I could not stand that leaflet," said a workman to me on the day of the poll." Mr. Blatchford has no more claim to speak for the religion of Socialists than (say) the Bishop of Birmingham or the Rev. R. J. Campbell. The Liverpool Tories have just saved the seat by such tactics: it is doubtful if they have any large cause of congratulation at such a result.

If a considerable section of Continental Socialism, especially in Germany, appears as Atheistic, that is because a considerable section of the Continental proletariat, especially in Germany, has ceased to believe in the Christian religion. Socialism may be impracticable:

it may be undesirable: it may be the vision of a better time which can never extend to the solid earth out of the region of dreams. But a complete Socialistic organisation is as entirely compatible with any form of faith amongst its members as is a complete individualistic organisation, or as that rather tangled mingling of individualism and collectivism which makes up the chaotic organisation of to-day. Meantime, we cannot but rejoice at this new spirit of eager hope and purpose, which has entered politics in this twentieth century. The danger has always been a kind of lassitude, in which the common people would sink into indifference: believing the party struggle to consist merely of interested controversy between those who have the power and those who wish to supplant them. This new violent thing, with its ardour, its blind faith, its voluntary service, its power of sacrifice, will act as a general stimulus, bringing men back to the challenge of bedrocks, fundamental questions, and compelling them to face real things. A Liberal Party and Government perpetually going forward on the path of social amelioration, never content to acquiesce in the present undesirable conditions of urban and rural poverty, has nothing to fear from the impulses of this novel activity. Rather should it rejoice that the harvest of reaction which always must come when any party has occupied the dominant position for a number of years, seems likely to turn towards those who accept, even in an intensified form, all the main Liberal principles of home and foreign policy. There was danger at one time that an "inevitable" swing of the pendulum would establish in five years or ten a Protectionist Government in power. That danger would seem to be averted. We shall not see in that time a Socialist administration. But we shall see a sufficient number of Labour and Socialist representatives to ensure that in any future combinations or coalitions for the next generation, the Protectionist remnant will never be in a position to realise its disastrous programme.

OUR "NATIONAL" CHURCH.

THE annual meeting of the Church Congress began on Tuesday last at Yarmouth, and a variety of questions affecting the interests and institutions of the Church came up for discussion in the course of the week. This Congress, coming as it does at the end of a long list of predecessors, cannot be said to present any particularly novel or interesting features, and, although several of the papers are sane, sober, and sensible, none of them are likely to make any perceptible mark on the fortunes of the Church. As we look down the list of names of the selected readers and speakers we observe a considerable proportion of the same people who have figured in the same capacity before; the old actors are playing the same old parts, and, although as a rule they continue to play them very creditably, the public would be pleased to see a larger collection of new faces on the stage. The great defect of every Church Congress is that it is too much dominated by the ecclesiastical mind, and that all the topics discussed at these gatherings are treated too exclusively from the clerical point of view. The result is that the proceedings of a Church Congress, interesting as they sometimes are, possess comparatively little value as an index of the ideas and feelings of the lay members of the Church. In hardly any religious community is there such a wide gulf between the lay and ecclesiastical mind as exists in the Church of England. In many cases the parson mixes freely with the members of his congregation; he is on terms of friendship and familiarity with them; on most political and social subjects he holds opinions very similar to theirs; but in matters of fundamental religious import he seldom knows what his parishioners are thinking, and if he did know he would generally discover that the dogmatic elements in Christianity, which he valued so highly, had little or no meaning for the vast mass of the people who from time to time attend his church. While the great body of the clergy have been steadily becoming more clerical and sacerdotalist, the bulk of the laity have become more latitudinarian, and liberalism in religion was never more widely spread among the lay members of the Church of England than it is to-day. It is the existence of facts of this kind which destroys the value of a Church Congress as an indication of the collective mind of the contemporary Church.

This anomalous and paradoxical situation is almost entirely the result of the existing system of ecclesiastical patronage. All the highest ecclesiastical patronage in this country is in the gift of the Prime Minister of the day, and for the last quarter of a century, to go no further back, the whole of this patronage has, without one brief interval, been exercised in favour of the sacerdotal party in the Church. The nominees of the Prime Minister and the Lord Chancellor, that is to say, the bishops, deans, canons, and other important dignitaries, have in their turn a vast amount of ecclesiastical patronage at their disposal, as well as considerable influence with private patrons. The result is, that the whole of the machinery of the Church has fallen into the hands of men of one ecclesiastical type. It is a type representative of the clerical, not the lay mind, and its opinions, however loudly it may speak in the name of the Church, must not be regarded as synonymous with the ideas of the average unobtrusive church-goer. It is a very remarkable circumstance that the State, which was supposed to represent the lay element in the Church, has been the principal means of making the sacerdotal element almost omnipotent at the present moment within the Church. This condition of things has been produced by the well-known ecclesiastical leanings of the late Mr. Gladstone, and the prolonged predominance of the Tory Party. Mr. Gladstone believed, from conviction, in extreme High Church principles, and the Tory Party believed from policy that those principles were one of the best props of its power.

As the Bishop of Carlisle has recently said, the effect of this policy, which has been pursued with great astuteness and persistency, has been to de-nationalise the Church. Sir Edward Russell, in a paper which he read at the Congress, confirmed the opinion of the Bishop, and said that "the Church of England was becoming more and more a sect. Moreover, there was a growing willingness not only to tolerate the trend towards turning the Church into a sect, but so to behave in the interim that when the Church did become a sect it would, in the absence of strong popular correction, become a very narrow sect indeed." The Bishop of Norwich, who delivered the presidential address, chose Disestablishment as his subject, and seemed prepared to meet that event with a considerable degree of equanimity. But would it be possible for the people of England to allow a very narrow sect, such as an experienced observer like Sir Edward Russell forecasts, to become possessed of all the property of the Church of England which was not claimed by the State? A great responsibility rests upon the Liberal Party in this matter, and it is well that we should look ahead. Liberal statesmanship must not confine itself to contemplating disestablishment as an end in itself. It must take a wider outlook. It must carefully consider what sort of institution it is entrusting with vast amounts of ecclesiastical property when the separation between Church and State has become the law of the land. An institution such as Sir Edward Russell foresees would have no moral claim to be called the Church of England. The whole machinery of that Church might be in its hands; it might be in possession of almost all the bishoprics, deaneries, canonries, and benefices in England, but it would not represent the lay mind of the Church. It would have no right to be entrusted with the funds of the Church or to speak authoritatively in its name.

Difficulties of this kind might have very serious consequences to the religious peace of the nation unless Liberal statesmanship quietly deals with them when it has the power. To all appearance, several years of power are still in front of the present Government. It is time that it attempted to develop something which could be called an ecclesiastical policy. Religion has deep roots in the minds of the English people, and a party which ignores the religious side of English life is ignoring a force which may one day suddenly rise up and destroy it. It is perfectly certain that the people are prepared to see the Prime Minister and the Lord Chancellor attempt to do something which will bring the ecclesiastical dignitaries in the Church into closer harmony with the great body of lay opinion. It cannot be said that they have done much in this direction up to the present time. Of the three Bishops whom the Prime Minister has appointed, two are notorious Tories, and one of the first acts of the third, who was supposed to have Liberal sympathies, was to attack the Government which appointed him in the columns of the "Times." Mistakes of this kind should be avoided in the future. They lead to charges of insincerity—charges which have no foundation in fact—but which are difficult to answer from a public platform. The prestige of a great party is always seriously imperilled when it can be successfully attacked on small issues which every man can understand. Chinese labour was not a colossal issue, but it appealed to the man in the street, and did much to shatter the Tory majority. The Liberal Party cannot afford to have it said that the Liberal Government has no faith in its own friends.

TWO PRESIDENTS.

THE unveiling last Monday by President Roosevelt of a memorial to his predecessor was an occasion that had all the appositeness of a supreme contrast. It would, indeed, be difficult to imagine two men wider apart in policy, in political methods, and, above all, in personality, than the late and the present ruler of the United States. The American Presidency is an intensely human office, dependent for its influence at least as much on the man who occupies it as on its Constitutional prerogatives. His character and disposition, his instinctive ways of handling men, count in the long run for more than his opinions. Every President is largely the prisoner of the Constitution, and the degree of freedom he is able to wrest depends rather on personality than prescription. The delicate adjustments, the nice equipoises, the triple system of balances involved in the American form of Government; the potential friction which it generates; the limitations which for the positive work of legislation make the President far less effective than the British Premier; the temptation which he can hardly resist to subordinate everything to the attainment of "harmony" by a judicious humouring of the Bosses, or by allowing the Senate to distribute his patronage for him—form together a situation in which the Presidential ego is and must be the determining factor. Mr. McKinley's conception of his office and its duties were such as spring inevitably from his temperament. A solidly serious, sincere, and scrupulous man, happiest probably when getting up the case for Protection, poring over statistics and trade reports, and painfully collating "the facts," with few ideas, interests or convictions, either political or intellectual, outside of the fiscal question, and with an experience of the world limited to Canton, Ohio, and the lobbies of Congress, he was evidently meant to rule in times of peace, with plenty of leisure to think things out, and look up the authorities. The Spanish War, and its rapid, complex issues took him out of his depth, and he quietly surrendered himself to the current. Great things happened during his Presidency, but he can hardly be said to have presided over them. At best they flowed through him as through a funnel. His mind and disposition were altogether of the kind that asks for guidance, and, when the oracles differ, tries hard to "solder close impossibilities, and make them kiss," and is willing to wait in patience for the unmistakable cue.

To one of his persuasive, mobile, accordant disposition, it came natural to regard the Presidency as a sort of conduit-pipe between Congress and the electorate, and to dissociate it from any idea of leadership. Mr. McKinley accepted fully and heartily the doctrine that the President should follow, and not attempt to guide, public opinion. The old tag Vox populi, vox Dei, was more than an old tag to him; it was the guiding principle of his whole political conduct and policy. He had, perhaps, no views, except on Protection, that he would not have felt it both a duty and an inspiration to sacrifice at the bidding of the people. His ear, as the Americans used to say, was always to the ground, because that was where he conceived it ought to be. His ways of dealing with Congress were those of adroit persuasion. He consulted everybody, humoured everybody, put himself frankly in the hands of his friends and, making the utmost use of his patronage as a gentle weapon of conciliation, usually contrived to reach his goal. He oiled the machinery of Government with loving and imperturbable patience, and the wheels ran with an ease unknown since Washington's first term of office. But it was a smoothness purchased at the cost of many dubious bargains, much flabbiness of aim and method, and not without an appreciable disturbance of the balance of power arranged by the Constitution. There were times when the Presidency, as a controlling and directing authority, seemed almost in abeyance, when one had to look in the Senate and among a favoured group of Bosses to find the real head of the United States. But as against this there were at least two compensations. Washington was at peace, and the wishes of the people got themselves translated into law with unexampled despatch.

It was certain from the first that Mr. Roosevelt, whatever else he might be, would never be a President of this stamp. With him leadership is an instinct, self-suppression unthinkable, and struggle a great gladness. He is a man of insistent, dictatorial, almost hectoring temperament, with a passion for scoring hits, and for scoring them off his own bat. As a devotee of the political short cut, it frets him to have to dance attendance on cumbrous Constitutional processes. He prefers to go straight ahead, and wait for the Senate to be prodded after him by public opinion. His inclination is all on the side of pushing the prerogatives of his office to their uttermost, and though we regard the cry that he is a "usurper" as in any serious sense absurd, it is no doubt true enough that Mr. Roosevelt would rather have his own way by overriding the Constitution than keep to its strict letter and lose some point he was bent on carrying. In his hands the balance of power has inclined even more decisively towards the White House than in his predecessor's hands it inclined towards the Senate. Mr. Roosevelt has not only revived the Presidency, but has distinctly expanded it. He not only suggests policies, but has all the appearance of dictating them. The appearance is possibly a defect of manner merely. Mr. Roosevelt is not a conciliatory man, there is a Wellingtonian vigour in his way of stating a case, and the suppleness of Mr. McKinley, and his extreme skill in the smaller arts of managing men, are qualities that his successor rather despises than otherwise. They are qualities, at any rate, that he makes little effort to practise, and that scarcely, indeed, consort with his headlong mind, his categorical temperament, and the presence in him of a self-confidence so overpowering that it is all but impossible for him to do justice to "the other fellow." He has provided the American people with a new spectacle, that of a President sitting with conspicuous looseness in the party saddle, making his own appointments, annexing a goodly half of his opponent's programme, and imposing measures upon a refractory legislature by the force of public opinion. Mr. Roosevelt has, it is true, very thoroughly assimilated the perilous doctrine that the end justifies the means; cases have occurred in which his policy can only be defended on grounds other than ethical; and the Rooseveltian swing, if at one point it seems to fall little below Lincoln, seems at another not to rise much above Mr. Richard Croker. His head may occasionally strike the stars, but his feet are always on the solid earth. He knows what makes life worth while, but he also knows what makes politics possible. His is a nature always seeking, struggling, reaching, sometimes rushing forward, yet always in touch with the expediences, always as vehemently practical as it is vehemently aspiring. The result is at times a compromise that disconcerts his best admirers, and that introduces a strain of complexity into a nature that at bottom is both elemental and elementary. When it comes, however, to a question of writing measures on the Statute Book, it is an interesting point whether the conditions of the American system do not prescribe as the most successful if not the most inspiring President, a McKinley rather than a Roosevelt.

Life and Letters.

MISS TORMENTILLA'S BRACELET.

MISS TORMENTILLA JONES stopped and looked in at a window. James was expecting she would bring the present home with her, and it was obvious James must not be disappointed. Rapidly she ran her eye over the goods the shop front displayed, dismissing the bulk of them as impossible, but hovering here and there in an uncertainty of thought.

She was startled by a voice at her elbow; it was a voice she had not heard for twenty years, and she hesitated an instant before she turned to the speaker. Her agitation was apparent and, observing it, the owner of the voice hastened to press his advantage. "Miss Tormentilla," he repeated, "Miss Tormentilla, I have come home."

This time the lady he addressed turned towards him; she had completely recovered her dignity and her tone was restrained. "You are rather late in arriving, Thompson," she said.

The christian name struck on his ear, and he paused for a moment to weigh its meaning. After years of companionship with persons of pettier resources, he underestimated Tormentilla's habitual directness, and jumped to an unwarrantable conclusion.

"You will spare me an hour," he said. He wore a carnation in his grey frock-coat, and a certain sprightliness Tormentilla had noted in his appearance seemed to have communicated itself to his speech.

She looked him in the eyes, her silence being just long enough to make it perfectly clear that his words had been heard. Then she spoke:

"Is not this change delightful, after the fog?" she said, lifting her eyes from his face to a patch of delicate blue that was appearing behind the chimney-pots over the way.

The newcomer bowed, smiled, and adroitly followed her lead. He had, he said, travelled overland from Marseilles and throughout the journey the weather had been detestable. He had, he supposed, felt it the more in contrast with the charming climatic conditions he had experienced in the Mediterranean. At this point his eyes twinkled, for long ago Tormentilla Jones and Thompson Holder had had lessons together, and when they had quarrelled Tormentilla's craving for details of travel again and again had humbled and brought her to his feet. At that time his parents had been living in Egypt, and he had been out to them for a couple of months. In reality his knowledge was small, but, boylike, he had made the most of his advantage, and Tormentilla, in her thirst for information, had been willing to acknowledge his superiority. Now it flashed through his mind that, if her attitude in this matter was at all what it had been of old, he was better equipped as an authority. But he realised already that the task he had undertaken would not be easy. During the years of his absence it had not been his habit to think much of the friends and relations left behind him in England. Most of the time he had been too busy fighting his way to the position he now occupied, but, vaguely, he had always intended some day to return and reclaim the playmate of his youth. This morning he had been lying in wait for her. Before she arrived he had felt no misgiving; but now he was uncomfortably conscious that certain things lay between them which Tormentilla would find it difficult to forgive; one of them being the fact that his mother had passed out of life in ignorance of the whereabouts even of the son she adored.

Already Tormentilla's rebuff had come dangerously near to a dismissal, and, after all, was there any object in prolonging the interview unless he saw some chance of getting the lead into his own hands? They had drifted along the pavement as they talked, and he had become conscious that Tormentilla was bestowing on the shop windows a scrutiny that he could not believe was characteristic. A look of anxiety that was growing in her face did much to restore his self-confidence. He addressed her, and this time she turned with a start—

"Before I went away you detested shopping. If you are not in the mind for it to-day, may I be of service? It is so long since I spent a Christmas in England that I shall enjoy it."

Her aspect had changed. There was an uncertainty that was almost appealing in her manner,—"I am so stupid at getting things for myself, and now James has commissioned me to buy him a present."

Holder hastily collected his memories of Tormentilla's brother. But, in spite of his efforts, they remained scattered and hazy. James was rather a colourless person. After a pause he ventured to suggest a walking stick or an umbrella.

Tormentilla interrupted him—"The present is not for himself," she said. "It is for him to give to," she hesitated, "a friend whom he intends to marry."

"Ah—something suitable to open negotiations." Holder's statement was a question.

"No; not exactly that," Tormentilla replied. She was in no way embarrassed now; she was merely thinking of Holder as an unexpected ally in an enterprise that was difficult, and obviously if he was to prove serviceable he must be thoroughly informed.

"They have known each other for years and James has determined upon marrying her. What he desires is something, not ostentatious, but of sufficient value to make his meaning unmistakeable."

"How much is James proposing to spend?" Holder's voice, for the first time in the interview, betrayed a slight nervousness. Money, he knew, had always been scarce at the Vicarage, and he seemed to himself suddenly to be vulgarly rich. But he need not have feared. For the moment their positions were reversed. An undisguised pride swelled in Tormentilla's reply.

"Twenty pounds," she said, "is his limit."

"Ah." By the gravity of his tone and a slight inclination of the head, Holder conveyed his appreciation. Miss Tormentilla immediately fell in with his suggestion, and as they made their way to a jeweller's it was clear that he led and she followed.

Brooches and bangles were brought forth for Tormentilla's inspection and Holder stood slightly in the background watching her. The things were attractive enough in their way, and Tormentilla was in a biddable mood and showing no desire to be critical. But he knew that, as yet, nothing had appealed to her or stirred her imagination.

The shopman was looking past Tormentilla to the more promising customer behind. He thought the pair ill-assorted, and in truth was not quite certain if they were shopping in company. Tormentilla bent over the tray. Catching the man's eye, Holder's lips moved—

"Antiques—garnets, old paste," he murmured.

A moment later opals and pearls, emeralds and topaz were swept to one side, and Tormentilla was confronted with relics of a day that is gone. Her eyes kindled, and she lifted a band of dull red stones embedded in silver. Their attraction, she supposed, was probably a matter of association based on memories of her childhood, but the garnets seemed to her to be dignified and distinguished in contrast with the modern and more glittering stones. She would have liked them as they were, but James, she knew, would feel differently: she could imagine his horror of "second-hand" articles. She was unaware that her thought had been expressed till she found that the shopman was replying to it.

"Certainly, Madam, certainly, a modern setting of course. Something of this kind?" And he began sketching a design on the lid of a box that lay near him. He began at the outer edge, marking first the smallest stones that were to lie furthest along the band. Finally, he placed the central stone, saying as he did so, "It is, perhaps, unnecessary to draw the other side, Madam?"

Hitherto Tormentilla had been marvelling at his ingenuity; now she interrupted, laying her hand upon the drawing and speaking almost sharply: "That—the big one," she indicated the large central garnet, "must be put straight, and not endways."

"Straight, Madam?" For a moment the salesman's suavity had forsaken him; the suggestion was unexpected, and he prided himself on matters of taste. Tormentilla's manner on entering the shop had been apologetic, and he had thought her old-fashioned dress shabby. The astonishment conveyed in his tone bordered on insolence, and somewhere in the background Holder emitted a chuckle.

Tormentilla drew on her glove. "I misunderstood," she said; "you had determined on a design. I had presumed the bracelet could be made up to order."

When the instructions were finally taken and the two were leaving the shop, Holder turned to his companion. She looked twenty years younger and her cheeks were aglow.

"I was glad," he said, "that you settled that brute, but why in the world did it matter?"

In speech as in looks she was for the moment the old Tormentilla. "It mattered, mattered tremendously," she said, "for it wasn't just a present."

Holder was obstinate; he forgot to be politic, for the past stirred in him strangely and the dispute seemed of moment.

"No," he said, "I cannot agree. The stones were rectangularly set in the band, and you fancied they had carried a message before. Very well, but in other respects you had altered their arrangement."

* * * * *

Tormentilla lifted the lid, and a bracelet the exact counterpart of the one she had bought three days earlier for James was disclosed to her view. Stamped in gilt letters on the case was the name of the Bond Street jeweller from whom the first had been obtained. Clearly some mistake had been made; either the shopman supposed that a pair of bracelets had been required, or he was unaware that the order had been executed.

About to replace the bracelet in the box, preparatory to packing and re-addressing it, her eye was caught by a slight difference in design between the new arrival and its forerunner. Here the central stone was set diamondwise where earlier it had been horizontal. Tormentilla experienced the same sense of disapproval to which she had given expression in the jeweller's shop. Then, suddenly, she understood, and in setting down the box her hand trembled. Something prompted her to look up.

Thompson Holder stood in the doorway.

Boldly, nonchalantly, he strolled into the room and seated himself on the arm of the sofa. His heart was in his mouth, but he showed no sign of trepidation.

"At the lower end of the Mediterranean," he began.

For a second Miss Tormentilla seemed about to leave the room, and his fate hung in the balance. Then she turned,

"How many days this side of the Canal?" she demanded, and sat down on the sofa.

M. STURGE HENDERSON.

THE CANT OF MILITARISM.

THE quarrel on militarism between the two sections represented by M. Hervé and Herr Bebel at the recent Socialist Congress at Stuttgart drags out and dramatises an issue which lurks in every party of political and social progress. In every country the aristocracy, the oligarchy of wealth, and a large contingent of the solid middle class favour the maintenance of a strong professional army, partly to furnish a decorative career to their sons, but mainly to serve as a police reserve at home and as an instrument for the forcible extension and maintenance of foreign markets and preferential areas of investment. Everywhere the workers who pay this blood tax are restive, and the more suspicious members of the bourgeois and professional classes, though not hostile to the policy, resent the growing burden of its cost, while a small but growing number of thinking citizens see in militarism the gravest concrete peril to the advance of civilisation. Among the anti-militarists very few are prepared to dispense entirely with an army, trusting to Providence without powder or to naval defence: the issue upon which they are divided is the alternative of a reduced professional army, or a national militia, based either upon voluntary or even upon compulsory service. For it is fair to recognise that certain genuine haters of war and militarism are to be found among those who hold that the obligation to defend one's country in extremity is binding on all citizens, and involves some process of general military training. Most Liberals, however, regard any proposal of compulsory or general training with an aversion even deeper than that with which they regard the perils of military professionalism. But when confronted with the choice of a national volunteer service and a small professional army they falter, fumble and refuse a decision. It is difficult to blame this indecision. They dread the known tendency of a great professional instrument of force to crave employment, and, if England alone were at stake, they would become whole-hearted members of the "blue-water school," contented with a small, well-paid militia, or even an unpaid force of patriotic volunteers. But the Empire precludes this choice. Here the Empire means pre-eminently India. Aware that we hold India by bonds of force and not of love, they are yet not prepared to risk its loss, and this position ties them to a professional army. Were it not for this Imperialist burden, which they cannot shuffle off, they would thankfully rely upon a volunteer service for home defence, accepting Mr. Balfour's assurance that "serious invasion of these islands is not a possibility which we need consider."

The actual drift is towards a compromise, making for the smallest professional army consistent with the safeguarding of India, backed by a moderate and mainly non-professional force for home defence. The absence of any important issues in foreign policy, the strong positive bonds of friendship with powerful States, and the new security upon our Indian frontiers, are strong supports for this anti-militarist movement.

We rehearse here these obvious facts in order to utter some plain necessary words upon the tactics to which the militarists are now resorting to defeat the pacific movement and to strengthen this hold upon the bodies and the souls of our people. Finding their opponents in this country thus hesitating between a small professional army suitable for foreign service and a larger, looser voluntary force for home defence, they see their opportunity, and, while resisting any real reduction of the former, fling their full energy into developing the idea of a national force to be in appearance voluntary, in reality compulsory, nominally enlisted for home defence, actually available for foreign exploits.

It is difficult to describe the modes by which this conspiracy against the peace and progress of our country is advanced, without seeming to impute a too conscious cunning to machinations which are largely instinctive. For a variety of causes, into which we cannot enter here, some ill-feeling has arisen of late years between certain interests in Germany and Great Britain: for other causes sentiments of national unity accompanied by a desire for fuller native participation in government have been astir in India. Yet it is our deliberate conviction that the fierce inflammation of the public mind directed by every art of misrepresentation and exaggeration against German hostility and Indian sedition has been mainly designed to meet the anti-militarist movement in Parliament and in the nation. But tactics even worse than this are employed in the campaign which Lord Roberts has been stimulating in the country. A notion used to prevail that a soldier was a blunt outspoken man who did not mince his words, went straight to the heart of his matter, and left sophistry to lawyers and politicians. If such a soldier, full of professional zeal, and, perhaps, genuinely alarmed at what he deemed the defenceless position of his country in the face of an armed world of potential foes, had come forward urging the plain duty of Conscription as necessary for the safety of the Commonwealth, we might not have accepted his pleading, but we should, at least, have respected his honesty and courage. But Lord Roberts and his National Service League have become aware that "Conscription" is a most unpopular word, and that the idea it denotes is hateful to the people: they also understand that the German scare has not succeeded well enough to enable them to float Conscription upon a dread of invasion. What have they done? Two honest courses were open; to abandon the campaign for Conscription, or to begin the slow spade-work needed to implant an unpopular idea in the national mind. Lord Roberts and his friends have taken neither course. They have preferred a disingenuous shuffle of terminology and an appeal to motives which are not honest. For a full justification of these serious charges we must refer our readers to a most incisive pamphlet by Mr. J. A. Farrer,* dealing with the campaign of the National Service League. When Lord Roberts began his movement in the afterglow of the Boer war, he dared to utter the word Conscription. Now in the new preface to his volume of Speeches, entitled "A Nation in Arms," "it is not Conscription that the League advocates but National Service." So Conscription becomes "compulsory service," and in the latest edition "compulsory service" becomes "compulsory training," in order to convey the suggestion that education rather than actual fighting is the object. Mr. Haldane's quibbling upon the vital issue as to the obligation of a Territorial Army to serve abroad will be fresh in the minds of all: the general desire of our Conscriptionists is to keep carefully in the background this dreaded aspect. Note even the careful ambiguity of Lord Roberts' words at Liverpool: "I do not advocate compulsory service abroad under any circumstances." Yet the hollowness of such prevarication is made manifest when he unburdens his soul in the freer atmosphere of the House of Lords: "The public restrict their ideas to the defence of this country. They are much troubled with the smaller details of home defence, forgetful of the larger issues which mean so much to them, and which may, and probably will, require our being prepared, as a Continental nation, not only to defend our possessions in the East, but to take an important part in affairs nearer home." Here is full-blown Continental militarism, conscription, foreign service and all. But will our people have it? Lord Roberts and his League suspect a deficiency of fighting spirit in the nation. What do they do? Looking round, they see several popular alarms raised by hygienists, economists, educationalists, and moralists, relating to physical degeneration, industrial inefficiency, and moral decadence. "Here is our chance," they say: "universal military service is the panacea:" it will serve, as their official organ avers, "to improve the moral and physical condition of the nation, and thereby to increase its industrial efficiency." Mr. Farrer gives some amazing instances of the successful inroads of this new moral gospel in the Church, the Bar, and the Medical professions; but with a quite accurate instinct the League has sought its gladdest audience among the colleges and schools where sport and social flunkeydom temper, if they do not diminish, our education. When we see grave schoolmasters and college dons bubbling with enthusiasm for Conscription on the ground that "the training of the whole manhood of the nation in discipline, duty, obedience to authority, manliness and self-mastery, would prove a moral factor of untold value in the life of the people," we doubt whether any other people has ever rivalled us in the power of cant. The recent brutalities disclosed in French and German military life, the open animalism of our own garrison towns, the annals of crime and of suicide in armies, the crowding of ex-army men in our workhouses and tramp population, the life of fatuous frivolity and vice led openly by most officers, are a strange commentary upon the "manliness" and "self-mastery" impudently claimed as virtues of militarism, and apparently accepted as such by not a few of our spiritual pastors and masters.

The supreme cost of militarism is not the vast amount of money spent on war and armies, not the waste of industrial energy or the destruction of life and property involved. It is the degradation of our moral currency by false motives and spurious ideals. Lord Roberts and his friends appear to have reached the really terrible conviction that the only method by which full-blown Continental militarism can be imposed upon our people is to "become a lying spirit in the mouth of the Lord's prophets," using every instrument of moral education which the school, the Church, the Press provide, for the poisoning of the soul of the nation.

VANISHED CHILDREN.

THEY stand there in the past—all those vanished children. We know so little about them. Their own parents and teachers who wrote of them and sometimes loved them, knew so little about them. They occupied that dream-world of childhood, which scarcely changes with the hurrying centuries. Above their heads beat the great movements of history; wars, religious transformations, discoveries of science and invention; movements which sometimes made that dream-world all golden, sometimes covered the sunshine with grey cloud. You may see them in the Elizabethan garden, in that "Golden Age" between two periods of upheaval; playing amongst the "roses and tiger-lilies, pinks, gilliflowers and forget-me-nots, all the sweets that run riot" there. They endure, brave if uncomprehending, through the troublous time of the great Civil war; like little Mary and Catherine Stanley when their mother is defending Lathom House against the Governor of Manchester; "never startled by any appearance of danger." "On one occasion when they were sitting at breakfast with their mother, a shell burst in the very room where they were, and these little creatures hardly winced; they neither fled nor cried, but kept their seats, only turning a little pale." "They had stomachs to digest cannon" is the verdict of the admiring chronicler. Puritanism lays its cold iron hand upon them; compelling them to childish bewilderments, childish repentances of childish sins; through such stern teachers as the Reverend James Janeway, informing them that no child is too little to be forbidden entrance into hell. The Restoration spoil and pampered them; the eighteenth century in its stagnant decline alternately neglected and bullied them. They pass through it all, the caprice and changing fashions of men, enduring it as best they may; filling still all the dead years with something of the fragrance of children's laughter and tears.

* "Moral Cant About Conscription." International Arbitration Peace Association.

Something of that fragrance also has passed into Mrs. Godfrey's delightful researches gathered together in this good volume. "English Children in the Olden Time" (Methuen & Co.) is a miscellany of gleanings from the memoirs of various ages. A door is opened if but for a minute; we are allowed a limited peep upon that children's world of long ago. Now we are watching the little pages surrounding the little Edward IV., with the sage advice given in "The Babe's Boke" to these "six enfautes": how to eat at table, how to behave in presence of their lord; "not to scratch themselves, nor lean against a post: to keep hands, head, and feet still, and not to handle things while being spoken to." There are indications even in that much misunderstood medieval time of the serious laughter of children. Behind the pestilences and the great wars and the delirium of human violence, we see these bands of happy boys and girls, with their old folk songs which have survived, pathetic anachronisms, even in the slums of the modern city. There are children singing in the Rogation processions for the blessing of the fields, children dancing round the May-pole, children performing in Mysteries and Moralities, children watching the medieval "Wild Beast Show," and acting at Christmas the pageant of St. George and the Turkish enemy. And, indeed, the whole age retained something of the quality of childhood: a childhood that never grew up. "Dancing was a passion with everybody," is the testimony (not quoted by Mrs. Godfrey). "From the Queen to the milkmaid, all the women danced; from the king to the craftsman, all the young men danced. They danced in the streets whenever it was possible, which was one of the reasons why May Day was so joyous and festival. The more courtly people had dances dignified and stately. . . . They danced together singing minstrels' songs. They danced in the garden, they danced in the meadow, they went out at night to dance with tapers in their hands; they danced to beautiful music, played by an orchestra." Dancing children in an age long dead; left in such calamities as the Black Death, to "the mothering of the East wind;" that is "Merrie England."

How their presence sweetens and softens the stern, violent pages of history. Mrs. Godfrey makes no mention of that old French Court of children, so charmingly described in Miss Sichel's "Catharine," where the little Guises played together with the little royal Princes who were to come to such unimaginable ends; and little Mary of Scotland, before she was in her teens, could justly claim the title of "Queen of Hearts"; surely (in the knowledge of coming shadows) the most pathetic company of children which ever assembled under the sun. But she can show us much that subsequent events have invested with a fine air of kindness and pity. Here is Mary of England, then twenty-one years old, holding the little Edward at the font for his christening, and in the procession leading by the hand her little four-year-old sister Elizabeth. Or the great Lord Strafford, the best hated man in England, then on his way—all unknowing—to the scaffold, commending to the kindness of Lady Clare his two motherless little girls; parting with them because they can learn better with their grandmother than they can "with their poor father, ignorant of what belongs to children." "Nan, they tell me, danceth prettily," he writes in pride, "which I wish (if with convenience it might be) were not lost, more to give her a comely grace in the carriage of her body, than that I wish they should much delight or practise it when they are women. Arabella is a small practitioner that way also, and they are both very apt to learn that or anything they are taught. Nan, I think, speaks French prettily."

Or here is Charles Stuart himself, "the Man of Sin," romping in the great nurseries with his children; or refreshing himself with the company of the children at Hampton Court, a prisoner; or parting, amid lamentable scenes, from Harry and the little Elizabeth at the end. "They gave him," says Sir Thomas Herbert, an eye-witness, "such pretty and pertinent answers as drew tears of love and joy from his eyes; and then, praying God Almighty to bless them, he turned about, expressing a tender and fatherly affection. Most sorrowful was the parting, the young Princess shedding tears and crying most lamentably, so as moved others to pity that formerly were hard-hearted; and at opening the bed-chamber door, the King returned hastily from the window, and kissed 'em and blessed 'em: so they parted."

The eldest son, Charles, that cynical, enigmatic figure in later history, appears in a new light as protesting "in a round text hand" against taking physic. "I would not have you taking too much physicke," he writes to his tutor, the Earl of Newcastle, "for it doth alwaies make me worse, and I think it will do the like with you." And his brother, James, the sour, fanatical bigot of tradition appears here transformed into a high-spirited boy of fourteen, celebrated for his skill at hide-and-seek in the grounds of St. James' Palace. Through such a reputation he escapes from his attendants while they think he is hiding more securely, slips out into St. James' Park, is hastily transformed into a girl, with a light skirt and red petticoat; is regaled with his favourite "Wood Street Cake," but urges "Do anything with me rather than let me go back again," and gets away safely from Gravesend to Holland. His little sister, Anne, starts on a longer journey. In her last illness this baby of three "being minded by those about her to call upon God, even when the pangs of death were upon her, 'I am not able,' saith she, 'to say my long prayer' (meaning the Lord's prayer), 'but I will say my short one—Lighten mine eyes, O Lord, lest I sleep the sleep of death.' This done," says Fuller, "the little lamb gave up the ghost."

They were so extraordinarily precocious; with their little heads crammed with grammar and languages at the age of five or six: repenting their sins—under the Puritan régime—at two or three; fully equipped for the buffeting waves of the world when just out of their teens. We are apt to utter complaints, with an undertone of pride in them, at the hurrying rush of modern life. What of these vanished children? Nor is our boasted elementary education much more than a revival and a reminiscence. Richard II. receives a petition demanding that villeins be restrained from sending their children to school, because the ambition to rise in life by becoming a "clerk" was taking so many workers from the land; just as Mr. McKenna might receive such a petition to-day from the Dorset County Council. The request is refused, and a new enactment is made later that every villein should have the right to send either son or daughter to school as he pleases. There is an enormous child happiness in it all, as well as child misery. One meets such sternness as that to the boy of nine (not quoted by Mrs. Godfrey) who, in 1630, was condemned at the Berkshire Assizes and executed "for example" for "burning a house or two": "who only said upon the ladder 'Forgive me this, and I'll do so no more.'" And by the side of this sternness is a great compassion and tenderness: revealed in such experiments as Dean Colet's Catechism, begging "all lytel babys, all lytel chyldrene to lerne gladli this lytel treatise;" or his request to his St. Paul's school scholars: "lift up your lytel white hands for me, which prayeth for you to God." From far off Elizabethan times comes the protest of Bishop Earle against the too harsh treatment of the child. "Wee laugh at his foolish sports, but his game is our earnest: and his drummes, rattles and hobby-horses but the emblems and mockings of men's businesse. . . . The elder he growes, hee is a stayre lower from God; and like his first father, much worse in his breeches. . . . Could hee put off his body with his little coate, he had got Eternitie without a burden, and exchanged but one Heaven for another." That advice has not been excelled or outgrown in the experience of three hundred years.

SECRETS OF THE SEA.

THE immensity of the area that the sea perpetually covers is exasperatingly accentuated by the fringe that it leaves dry for a few moments at the lowest spring and autumn tides. We follow it up with greed to the last inch, and inspect all there is to be seen with a minuteness that will perhaps never be rendered possible by the deep-sea dredges and other contrivances for probing the mysteries of the perpetually sub-marine. A grotesquely spotted cottus is pounced on in the fancied security of its sea-weed bower. It gasps as though in astonishment at our temerity, puffs out its spine-covered head, extends its wing-like pectorals and emits a small hiss or shall we say a rattle like that of the "fretful porcupine," or the stiff feathers of a full-panoplied turkey-cock. We replace the mighty atom at the edge of his pool and he darts off at immense speed to a retreat deeper among the anemones and fringed sea-weed.

We have scarcely time to interview a shanny or two and a pot-bellied rockling when the rolling out of the tide ends as though with a snap, for it has been held up by a wind from the sea, and the same force now helping instead of hindering, the waves come rushing up into the rocky pools. First the blennies and lashers welcome the intruding "vril" of the great waters; then sundry sharp-pointed crabs covered with sea-weed fronds to match their normal envelopment, hermit crabs thrusting sharp nippers from the shelter of purloined whelk-shells, and isolated fishlings resembling small antherines; then skipping shrimps and sand crabs in the furthest pools up-shore. With surprising speed, this big spring-tide races over the flats, then growls and roars up the beach of pebbles and ends by dashing fountains of spray over the granite and concrete embattlements behind which the town shelters. The sky of the setting sun is a palpitating furnace between purple and salmon red, and the fountains with which the sea drenches the promenade are like rich wine. The glory fades after the sun has shot into an uncoloured sky long rays of red, like the arms of a world reluctantly dragged below the sea. Then the full moon sails aloft, and the waves shower pearls and diamonds as they roll in, swing and clash against their own backwash and fling high an ineffective ton or two of the weight with which they would have swept away a summer's building.

With a line thrown from the parade at a less boisterous high tide we dragged up a few of the comparatively deep-sea creatures that come in when the water covers the children's playing-ground. Flounders, here called "butts," heavily mottled on one side, dead white on the other, and with a trick of sometimes wearing their eyes on the left side instead of the right; dabs or sandlings with the white side semi-transparent and eclipsing the flounder in the elegance of their whole make-up; the inevitable eel, a very young cod, and a fish declared on a balance of opinion to be a smelt. A jury of professional fishermen, each of them in a measure disqualified by the prior statement that smelts never visit this shore, handle the tender, large-eyed capture. Each man sniffs it with wide nostril, some declaring that there is no smell of "cucumber" as there should be if it were a smelt, others pretending that there is. At any rate we have shaken the tradition that the smelt does not visit here.

When the tide has been running down a few hours, we embark in order to take a deeper sample of the sea. We row out over more than a mile of water never fished except by the unknowing, yet doubtless containing many a worthy as well as many a little-known creature. As we pass, our fisherman points out a deep hole among the rocks in which bass may be taken at any time, and there are places especially favourable for catching mackerel on a spinner. The bulk, however, of several hundred square miles of sea known to our guide is such as he would not deign to cast a line in. We anchor at last at the intersection of two carefully noted imaginary lines that fix our position almost to the yard. The scour of the current seems to have given us here a submarine river bed and a total depth of five or six fathoms, and it is here that a great many fish spend the slack hours of the day. We have even found a favourite hole in the river, for whereas the next boat is having little sport, our fish are biting almost continuously. The sturdy "butt" puts down its head and offers immense resistance for its size. Two dabs hooked at once (and once we have three) make us hope for a sun fish or a large plaice at least. The next capture fights to and fro, obviously a round fish. A pollock comes aboard in all the freshness of its livery, especially the bright green back that earns for it the local name of "grass fish"; then a horse mackerel green mottled, fine tailed and partly ganoid like its surface-swimming congener, but with immense goggle eyes fitted to the twilight of deep water; lastly, the first real codling of the season, raising hopes of much sport, but turning out to be the only one of the day.

We get our fisherman, while he threads on our bait or takes off the catch, to tell us of other samples he has seen. He speaks of the North Sea cod that, hauled a few feet from the bottom, cannot regain it, but floats to the top, even if the hook has come out, of the seasonal blindness of the mackerel, that makes it catchable in nets, of how the great rays or skates are caught, and of other marvels most nearly touching his profession of sea-reaper. And he tells us as much as he knows of some stray catches. It is evident from his description that once he has come across the opah, that brilliant inhabitant of our seas that seems to be the sole survivor from almost tropical conditions, that Britain has had in turn with other climates. "Purple, and red, and green," says our fisherman, "in sharp streaks like a flower-bed, with white spots on all the colours, and brighter rings round them, his fins streaming like a girl's red hair, and nearly as deep from back to belly as he was long."

There is a sniff as though someone had scorned our friend's narrative. We turn in time to see a porpoise wheeling under, a few feet from the boat. He takes only a turn or two, and then, finally, dives from sight, rejoining all those things from the sea-serpent downwards, that the sea for the most part keeps from our eyes. What are the five or six species flapping in the bottom of our boat, compared with those even that have regarded the bait to-day five fathoms beneath? Whether we receive a tug or no, the hooks are clean after resting for only a few minutes down there. Some uninvited marauders come up in the shape of crabs, despised "jills," as well as edible crabs, running into such sizes as are seen on the fishmonger's slab. But what other forms are crawling, sliding, swimming, wriggling in the few yards covered by our lines? We know many of them through the dredge, but however carefully we have combed the bottom, can scarcely expect to know more than a bare majority, even at that depth, while the scattered snippets we drag from the deep valleys under sea explode as they pass into water of less pressure, or are at any rate expanded into caricatures of their deep-sea selves. When we know the monster pike or carp that a mere duck pond can hide for years, and only reveals on the day it is drained for cleaning, we can just faintly imagine the forever unknown contents of the deep sea.

Music.

THE CARDIFF MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

THE Musical Festivals this year are rich in novelties; there were seven of them at Cardiff last week, and there are to be another seven next week at Leeds. It is noteworthy, too, that new works by the people whom Mr. Walkley would call "the old gang" are in the minority. Sir Hubert Parry contributed one novelty to Cardiff, and Sir Charles Stanford will give another to Leeds. Dr. Cowen, though he has hitherto been classed with "the old gang," is much too adaptable a composer to remain among them. He is not modern in the sense that Mr. Bantock and Mr. Holbrooke, for example, are; but he is acute enough to see that some kind of modern idiom is necessary nowadays, and clever enough to be able to talk quite interestingly in one—whether his own or anyone else's does not greatly matter. Most of the other English composers represented by novelties in this year's Festivals are young men—Mr. Granville Bantock, Mr. Hamilton Harty, Mr. Vaughan Williams, and Mr. Rutland Boughton—who, whatever musical creed they may profess, are not at all in sympathy with the heavy kind of art that was cultivated by the "leaders of the Renaissance" ten to twenty years ago. So that even if all these novelties should not live for ever, it is good to have heard them, and wise of the committees to have included them; whatever the net musical gain may be it is certain that we are at least not standing still.

One of the Cardiff novelties—Mr. David Evans's cantata, "The Coming of Arthur"—was, no doubt, a concession to local feeling; the composer is a prominent musician in the town, and lecturer on music at the Cardiff University College. Dr. Herbert Brewer's setting of the old ballad of Sir Patrick Spens marks an advance on his previous work. It bears many traces of the two influences that Dr. Brewer, like so many other organists, has felt most strongly—first of all, that of the formal, square-toed kind of music that for the whole generation previous to ours was thought to be the only style worthy of an honest Englishman, and secondly, that of Elgar—not the Elgar of "Gerontius," but the Elgar of "King Olaf." Yet there are many individual things in the new work, and some rather striking characterisation in the scoring, which make it probable that Dr. Brewer will do still better when he has found his own feet. Dr. Cowen's setting of Mrs. Browning's "He giveth His beloved sleep"—a typical example of that lady's half poetic, half abortive verse—is clever enough, as all its composer's music is, to be worth hearing once or twice; but it does not come from and does not lead to deep conviction. Mr. Vaughan Williams' two Rhapsodies upon Norfolk folk-tunes suffered only from two defects—the tunes were not particularly good, and Mr. Williams' treatment of them was hardly any better. His new work for the Leeds Festival next week will prove more interesting.

Sir Hubert Parry's "Vision of Life" was acclaimed by one critic as "the climax of the Festival," and voted by almost everyone else extremely dull. We are a rather curious people; many of us are still so much under the sway of the old oratorio spirit as to feel that it is rather sinful to sing very ardently about love, and that we ought to enjoy a setting of a highly moral text even if the music be poor. An article in the present number of the "Zeitschrift der internationalen Musikgesellschaft" may serve as an illustration; the writer falls foul of the libretto, "Cleopatra," that has been given to the musical competitors for the prize offered by the Norwich Festival Committee, asks whether "any respectable English composer" will dream of setting it to music, and regards it as "almost an insult to the English art now being nobly led in purity by such men as Parry, Stanford, and Mackenzie." Strauss's "Salome" is also bespattered with contumely because the subject is not "pure." The trouble, however, is that most people, if they cannot get good music to good subjects, would rather listen to good music composed to a naughty subject than to bad music composed to a virtuous one. "Salome," after all, keeps us awake, while most of our "pure" composers send us to sleep. There is not a line in "The Vision of Life" that could offend the purest taste; but there is also not a page in it that anyone would go through fire and water to hear again. It may do no harm to the moral sense, but it leaves the aesthetic sense decidedly chilly.

Mr. Hamilton Harty is still a very young man, so that there is no need to grumble at him for not quite reaching, in his music to Keats's "Ode to a Nightingale," to the full height of the wonderful poem. He has certainly got the wrong atmosphere occasionally; whatever changes the music may undergo, it should never be strenuous, never lose the one fundamental note of sadness, here and there refined into ecstasy. But the Ode is in many respects first-rate, the orchestration being especially fine. Altogether it is a work of great promise.

The most eagerly expected novelty was, of course, the second part of Mr. Bantock's "Omar Khayyam." There were one or two dissentient voices, but the critics as a whole were almost unanimous in recognising the power and beauty of the new work. Mr. Baughan, in the "Daily News," rather oddly failed to see any "first-hand originality" in it; what strikes many of us in the work is the number of musical things in it to which one can find no equivalent elsewhere. Huge choruses like "Earth cannot answer," or "And has not such a story," for example, in the First Part, or the inexpressibly profound and touching trio, in the Second Part, to the stanzas commencing "What! out of senseless Nothing," really bring a new note into our music. In spite of one or two passages of lesser inspiration —for it is almost impossible to keep a composition of this length at the same level throughout—"Omar Khayyam" is a remarkably fine and in some respects unique work. Like "Gerontius," it will have to win its way slowly into the affections of the ordinary audience; but when it is properly known it will be recognised as much the finest of English choral and orchestral works on a non-sacred subject—the only one, indeed, that for range and intensity of feeling and general musical power can stand by the side of Elgar's great oratorio.

Open Questions.

THE SITUATION IN IRELAND.

THAT the Government has scored a success in the last Session of Parliament is now generally admitted. Much valuable legislation has been passed. The administration of the country has been carried on in accordance with the wishes of the great majority of the people. It is true that much more could have been done but for the obstacle of the House of Lords. That body has been effective, perhaps, as much by the fear of what it would do as by actual interference with proposed legislation. The main cause of the weakness and consequent failure of the Irish Councils Bill was the vain desire to frame a measure that might possibly commend itself to the Peers. It is now evident that no measure of the kind would have had a chance of passing the Lords. They believe that they justified themselves and even acquired popularity in the country by their action in throwing out the Home Rule Bill of 1894, and it is certain that, no matter how small and timid might be the measure submitted to them in 1907, they were determined to repeat their success. The mistake that the Liberal Cabinet made was to listen to those who would persuade them that the Lords would accept a small measure. The Irish people, on the contrary, believed that while a scheme framed on lines so narrow, distrustful and unexpected, was certain to be rejected by the Peers, it would have been made the high-water mark for Liberal legislation at the next General Election. Consequently the Nationalist Convention determined to have none of it, and to await the future when the Liberal Party would again appeal to the country untrammelled, it is hoped, by the pledges given by the least democratic of its adherents. Whether the Irish were right in their determination history will prove.

The Councils Bill having been disposed of, the Government felt that something had to be done for Ireland. Mr. Bryce, acting under rather doubtful advice, and on almost the last day that he was in Dublin, developed a scheme for the settlement of University education apparently with the design of binding his successor. That scheme followed the lines of greatest resistance, and aroused so much opposition in England as well as in Ireland, that it would have been injudicious in the extreme to attempt to legislate in accordance with it.

The land is always a fertile field for Irish legislation. The principle of compensation would seem to require as many Acts to undo the mischief wrought by the hundred and odd Statutes of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries as these Acts numbered. There is ample field for further agrarian legislation in Ireland. But Lord Dudley's Commission is still dragging its lengthening chain over the country, and it would not do to embark on legislative problems that that body was intended to consider and report on. One branch of the Land Question was, however, urgent and ripe. The Land Act of 1903 secured its easy passage largely in the hope that it would settle the evicted tenants question in Ireland. The Opposition of the late Tory Law officers, gloried in recently by one of them in the House of Lords, killed that hope and the sore was still there, irritating and unhealed. Mr. Birrell wisely determined to turn his attention to this matter and produced a Bill bold and satisfactory in its provisions.

It is characteristic of most aristocracies that they seek for agents of their cause from among a social class far beneath them, and for which they have in their hearts a supreme contempt. The Russian nobles, for example, have maintained their power and position by setting up a bureaucracy recruited from the plebs. The Irish Lords are no exceptions to this rule. They were determined to fight the Evicted Tenants Bill with all their energy as it contained provisions as to machinery and the principle of compulsory acquisition of land that were deemed highly dangerous. They secured as their chief champions, both in the Lords and Commons, champions not of their own class—condottieri prepared to fight under the banner of the rights of landed property—one the son of a country apothecary, the other of a city policeman. The fight was carried on with so much vigour and determination that the Bill was only saved from destruction by eliminating from it some of its most valuable provisions. Even as it was passed, it is a useful measure and may settle a question that has kept Ireland restless for twenty years.

The question is often asked—What is going to be the immediate future in Ireland? No one seems to know. The people undoubtedly were surprised and disappointed by the Councils Bill. They expected something quite different and refused even to consider it. They preferred to wait some more years in the hope of having their expectations realised.

In rejecting the proffered measure they are quite aware of what is before them, and they have turned their attention to the questions of the land and education. They look forward to measures for the settlement of the University question, and for facilitating the breaking up of the grass lands, by compulsory process if necessary. Mr. Birrell has undertaken to spend part of his vacation in considering Irish Education—a subject with which he is peculiarly qualified to deal—and the Congested Districts Commission will, it is expected, suggest methods for further land legislation. The Catholic clergy are largely interested in the first of these questions, the land-starved peasants in the second. Serious symptoms of unrest have been shown by the latter, and a new agrarian outrage has been invented, that of "cattle-driving."

During the years that followed the Irish famine in many parts of the country the people were gradually driven from the richer lands that could profitably feed bullocks to the bogs and waste lands that were useless except when occupied by human beings content or compelled to live below the standard of decent subsistence. Mr. Wyndham's Land Act contained provisions that enabled the Irish Estates Commissioners to purchase grass lands when voluntarily offered to them for the purpose of improving "uneconomic" holdings and restoring the people to the soil from which their fathers had been driven. The few instances in which the Commissioners were able to do this showed the people what was possible: what could be done to improve the condition of the peasants and to stem emigration were the peopleless lands populated. But the voluntary process is very slow. The owners showed symptoms of making arrangements with the graziers that might permanently deprive the people most in need of the land of the possibility of ever acquiring it. The Irish peasant learned from experience that if he remained quiescent, he was deemed satisfied, while if he did something that called attention to his needs and desires, although he might be branded as a criminal, he would be listened to. In former days his only weapons were the blunderbus and the shears. For adopting these methods of barbarism he might be denounced by a righteous British public as a savage, but, all the same, his grievances were examined. He has given up the blunderbus and the shears, and merely drives the objectionable cattle away from the lands which he thinks would be better occupied by human beings. He drives them away in the most humane manner, even in some instances bringing a waggon to carry the weaker animals, for which a long walk might be trying. But, notwithstanding this careful attention, he is as bitterly denounced as if he were a Staffordshire cattle maimer, and the orators of the Unionist Alliance in the shrillest tones call down the vengeance of the British people on a Government that tolerates for a day the frightful nightmare of anarchy and lawlessness that they picture as brooding over the country. To those who know Ireland well and who consider that a disease should be cured rather than let run its course so as to destroy the life of the patient, the unrest in the West is a symptom and an intimation that something is amiss. Repression will not cure it.

Poetry.

OCTOBER.

FLING no more your wealth untold;

Keep your gorgeous treasures.

Though you paved the woods with gold,

Winter has no pleasures

In your bribes, and will not spare

Till he strips your branches bare.

The woods are filled with whispering fears,

And every bough is sighing:

The sobbing leaves, all wet with tears,

Are fading, falling, flying,

For Winter's heralds loudly blow

And now must all your glories go.

This morning, down your choicest glades

His chilling mists were sweeping,

And now the cold sun's glimmer fades

And ashen skies are weeping.

They weep because this fairy-land

Must soon in dreary ruins stand.

Fling no more your wealth of gold;

Winter will not tarry.

Ere his icy arms enfold,

Haste away and carry

All your wealth, till once again

You may here in splendour reign.

J. W. FEAVER.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

MESSRS. SONNENSCHNEN will publish this autumn the long-delayed volume of selected articles and essays from the writings of the late William Clarke. To a large circle of literary men and journalists Mr. Clarke was known as one of the most profound thinkers and best-equipped writers of his time. Much of his work was anonymous, consisting of historical, political, and literary appreciations, contributed to daily and weekly journals; but in the later years of his life a number of important political essays from his pen appeared in the "Contemporary Review" and in leading American Reviews. His range of knowledge and of interest was encyclopædic and extended to America as well as to this country. With one of those extraordinarily minute and accurate memories so valuable and so rare in journalists he united a deep philosophic grasp of principles. As an interpreter of men, books, events, and movements he exercised a profound influence over the reading public of his day. This volume, containing a few of his longer essays on history and politics and a number of his most characteristic judgments upon literature and life, largely written for the "Spectator," is designed to preserve in permanent shape his most distinguished thoughts and utterances. It comprises also a section of his little work on Walt Whitman, the only book he wrote.

* * *

SPORTSMAN, statesman, soldier, moralist, and writer: such are the leading aspects of the most strenuous life. The new edition of the "Works of Theodore Roosevelt," to be published next week by Messrs. Putnams, gives a full revelation of his rich personality. It will, perhaps tax the patience of all, save the most insatiable of his worshippers, to read the six long volumes of his "Winning of the West," and the two volumes of "The Naval War of 1812," but Roosevelt as hunter and as ranchman is always a picturesque figure, while Roosevelt as political and social moralist, scourging corrupt bosses, coercing trust magnates, encouraging mothers of large families, and proclaiming the great mission of American Christianity, has won an unrivalled eminence throughout the English-speaking world. His volumes entitled "American Ideals" and "Addresses and Presidential Messages," throw real light upon the most influential preacher of our time.

* * *

NEXT week the Cambridge University Press will publish "The Life and Letters of Sir R. C. Jebb," compiled by his wife, Mrs. Caroline Jebb. It should prove a most interesting biography, for Jebb was not only a great scholar, but a forcible writer and a close student of modern educational problems. Jowett predicted that he would probably do more for Greek scholarship than anyone has since Porson, and it is scarcely an exaggeration to say that the prediction was fulfilled. The coming volume is largely made up of letters to his friends, among whom were numbered many of the most eminent names, both in the academic world and the world of affairs, but it also describes Jebb's life as professor at Glasgow and at Cambridge, his work in founding the British School at Athens, and his later career in Parliament. Dr. A. W. Verrall contributes a chapter on Jebb as scholar and critic, in which he draws an interesting comparison between Jebb and Addison.

"Sensibility, subtlety, delicacy, economy, reserve—these were, as I apprehend," he says, "the essential qualities of Jebb's mind, and the foundation of his skill in exposition. His central achievement, the edition of Sophocles, owes its success and the general recognition of its singular importance, to the happy application of these qualities, and a natural harmony between the expositor and the poet. Purity of stroke, the dislike of crudity, violence, and emphasis, an ever-present perception that what is most worth saying cannot—such is language—be said, but must, if it is to come with true force, be hinted and suggested, all these principles are common to the dramatist and the annotator. We have Sophocles illuminated by Addison."

* * *

MR. FISHER UNWIN has in preparation a volume by Professor A. W. Small, of Chicago, "Adam Smith and Modern Sociology," which promises to be a valuable contribution to economic theory. Professor Small's argument is that modern sociology is virtually an attempt to take up the larger programme of social analysis and interpretation which was implicit in Adam Smith's moral philosophy, but which political economists have neglected in their close attention to the mechanism of wealth-production. He holds that economic theory now stands at the parting of the ways and must either resume the position it occupied in Adam Smith's system, viz., that of a division of moral philosophy, or split up into a group of technologies.

* * *

AN interesting experiment is to be associated with the publication of a volume of "New Poems," by Mr. Herbert Trench, to be issued shortly by Messrs. Methuen. Mr. Trench believes that music cannot reach its highest without being led by poetry, and that in order to expand poetical ideas there is need of the great amplification and depth of resonance which music alone can give. Accordingly, the first poem, called "Apollo and the Seaman," in his collection is designed to be accompanied by orchestral music. Mr. Joseph Holbrooke, the composer of "The Bells," of last year's Birmingham Festival, has written a symphony for seventy performers in illustration of Mr. Trench's poem. The intention is that the symphony shall be played in darkness at the Queen's Hall, the text of the poem being thrown by rays upon a large sheet page by page in exact time with the music. Musicians who have heard the work believe that it may be the beginning of a new and beautiful art-form, and that, by opening a way out of the Strauss stage of programme music, it may give a new stimulus to both arts. Dr. Henry Wood has promised his co-operation, so that the experiment will, at any rate, be made under favourable conditions.

* * *

THE announcement that a memoir of Thomas Hood, by Mr. Walter Jerrold, is shortly to be published by Messrs. Alston Rivers, is sure to be welcomed by all lovers of literature. The best of Hood's serious poems, such as "The Bridge of Sighs," "Ruth," and "The Song of the Shirt," will always be remembered, and his humorous verse, though now neglected, often reaches a high level. The memoir written by Hood's son and daughter fifteen years after his death is both dull and inaccurate. The best account of his life accessible up to the present is the short introduction to Hood's works contributed by Canon Ainger to Messrs. Macmillan's "Eversley" series.

* * *

"THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW" will in the future issue a literary supplement giving more special attention to new books than has been found possible in that journal before. Mr. Birrell contributes an article on "The Critical Faculty" to the opening number. "The perfect critic is," he says, "an impossibility, and the most fascinating chapters in the history of criticism will always be those personal records of literary sensations, peculiar to the individual who records them." Mr. Birrell himself has given us a delightful series of these impressions, though perhaps M. Anatole France's "La Vie Littéraire" is the best example of this species of criticism that has ever been written.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The American Revolution." Part III. By Sir George Otto Trevelyan. (Longmans, 12s. 6d. net.)

"Life in the Homeric Age." By T. D. Seymour. (Macmillan, 17s. net.)

"Petrarch: His Life, Work, and Times." By H. C. Holway-Calthorp. (Methuen, 12s. 6d. net.)

"The Roman Journals of Gregorovius, 1852-1874." Translated by Mrs. G. W. Hamilton. (Bell, 10s. 6d. net.)

"Innocent the Great." By C. H. G. Pirie-Gordon. (Longmans, 9s. net.)

"The Popular Ballad." By Francis B. Gummere. (Constable, 6s. net.)

"The Last Days of Marie Antoinette." By G. Lenotre. Translated by Mrs. R. Stawell. (Heinemann, 10s. net.)

"The Elizabethan Religious Settlement." By H. N. Birt. (Bell, 15s. net.)

"The Andes and the Amazon—Life and Travel in Peru." By C. Reginald Enock. (Unwin, 21s.)

"The Reproach of the Gospel." By the Rev. J. H. Peilo, M.A. Bampton Lectures for 1907. (Longmans, 5s. 6d. net.)

"Comrades." By Maxim Gorky. (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.)

"Paul Ier de Russe avant l'avènement, 1754-1796." Par Pierre Morane. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit, 7fr. 50.)

"Cœurs en Deuil." Par Georges Ohnet. (Paris: Ollendorff, 3fr. 50.)

"Landstreicher." Von Hans Oswald. (Berlin: M.4.)

Letters to the Editor.

CASA BLANCA: THE FRENCH CASE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The letters in regard to the bombardment of Casa Blanca, which were published in THE NATION of August 31st and September 14th, make such serious accusations against the French Government, the French admiral, and the Foreign Legion, that I have thought it desirable to obtain a statement about the matter from an authorised quarter. Circumstances have prevented me from doing this earlier, but yesterday I had an interview with M. Georges Mandel, chef-adjoint du cabinet to the Prime Minister, who had had before him a French translation of the letters, and who was good enough to make the following statements, which, I have every reason to believe, reflect the opinion of M. Clemenceau, whose colleague M. Mandel has been for several years.

M. Mandel began by expressing his profound regret that calumnies such as even that portion of the foreign press which is more or less hostile to France has not ventured to publish should have been published in a country which is united to France by the strongest ties of friendship.

In regard to the two letters under consideration, M. Mandel pointed out that the first was written by a gentleman who has apparently a bitter animus against the French as a nation, who was not himself on the spot, and who accepted without investigation statements the accuracy of which he was not in a position to test. The second was written by a lady who did not give her name. The two letters, moreover, although they agreed in attacking the French, were far from being in agreement as to the facts. According to Mr. Cunninghame Graham's witness, Dr. Robert Kerr, the French made a brutal and quite unprovoked attack on a harmless and peaceable people. There had indeed been a trifling incident on July 30th, in which some Frenchmen, two Spaniards, and an Italian were massacred in cold blood without a shadow of an excuse; but judging from Dr. Kerr's remark about the "long suffering of the Moors," his only feeling would seem to be one of surprise, if not of regret, that this had not occurred before. After this little amusement, the long suffering people, according to Dr. Kerr, completely quieted down, and they were going about their ordinary avocations in an orderly and peaceable manner when, on August 5th, the brutal French incontinently landed and proceeded to massacre them unarmed. This at least is what one would gather from Mr. Graham's report of Dr. Kerr's letter. "A woman who was there," M. Mandel remarked, tells a very different story. According to her, "the whole place was in a ferment and it was not safe to go out." On July 31st "the Jews were scuttling about like rabbits," and the long suffering Moors were beating them. "Every man, woman, and child was armed with guns, stones, sticks, or large pieces of wood, and all quite mad." There was another panic on the following day, when, according to Dr. Kerr, order was restored. On August 2nd the writer, like most other Europeans, took refuge on a ship in the harbour, because "our house being far from the French Consulate, we should have had no protection." On August 4th things were quieter, and the writer and her husband went on shore, but did not venture to stay there. On August 5th the French troops were landed and the bombardment began. "The looting began directly the first shots were fired," and there was "a great deal of fighting in the town." According to Dr. Kerr, "there was no resistance." "A woman who was there" was naturally distressed at such a scene, but later on she remarks that her servants "had defended the house splendidly, having killed between them fourteen Arabs. They were very pleased with themselves, and had managed to collect a quantity of loot." Moreover, the twenty defenders of the British Consulate "ran short of ammunition, and it was touch-and-go whether they would be able to hold out; they had to charge the mob with bayonets." All this does not quite square with Dr. Kerr's picture of a ruthless massacre of unarmed and inoffensive people who offered no resistance.

I put to M. Mandel in the first place Dr. Kerr's statement that the French supervision of the customs was the last straw. He pointed out that the customs are the guarantee of the loans which Morocco has obtained from Europe. France is by far the largest creditor, and it is in accordance with the Algeiras agreement that she has established a rigorous control of the customs. "We," said M. Mandel, "did not force our money on Morocco; she came to us to seek it. It would be more accurate to say that the massacre of July 31st was the 'last straw,' and that the French Government has been ever too long-suffering. That massacre was the last of a series of crimes and outrages, in face of which the French Government had not the right to remain inactive. Mr. Graham could hardly be serious when he spoke of 'a legal execution of the murderers.' He must be aware that there was no authority in a position to arrest or punish them. The time had come when France was compelled to act in order to protect the lives of her subjects and of other Europeans. That right was denied to her by Mr. Cunninghame Graham. It was true that he also apparently denied it to his own country, and perhaps his dislike of France was really due to her friendship with England."

M. Mandel gave an emphatic denial to Dr. Kerr's statement that the Sultan's uncle had been able to restore order, and declared that Dr. Kerr's picture of the condition of Casa Blanca bore no relation to the facts. The town was invested by thousands of the tribes, and the massacre of July 30th was followed by murder and pillage. Several hundred Jews were massacred, women were outraged, and the town was in a state of panic. Of these horrors Mr. Graham and Dr. Kerr said nothing, and for the victims of the "patriots and heroes" they had not a word of pity.

I then asked M. Mandel the reason of the bombardment. He replied that the French Consulate was in imminent peril, and that the bombardment was necessary to create a diversion and enable the troops that had been landed to relieve it. The assertion that the troops were landed merely to give an excuse for a bombardment he explicitly denied.

I next questioned M. Mandel about the specific charges of brutality made by Dr. Kerr. He replied that the statements as quoted by Mr. Cunninghame Graham lacked the details which would enable them to be investigated. Undoubtedly people had been killed; that usually happened when there was fighting. And, when a small body of troops had to repress a mob overwhelmingly superior in numbers in the streets of a town, how was it possible for the troops to avoid shooting women who might happen to be in the mob? The French Government deeply regretted the loss of life, but what other course was possible for it? If it could be proved that atrocities such as those mentioned had actually been committed by any soldiers of the Foreign Legion, those soldiers would be duly punished, but it was obvious that at present there was no sufficient data. M. Mandel remarked, however, that Dr. Kerr would seem to have the gift of ubiquity, and it would be interesting to know how he managed to see so much. Was he by any chance fighting on the side of the Moors?

M. Mandel said that he wished to add something in regard to the general question of the French action in Morocco. Mr. Cunninghame Graham distinctly implied that France was invading Morocco with the intention of occupying it permanently. According to him, the "patriots and heroes" who massacred Jews and outraged women were "fighting in defence of their native country." On the contrary, the action of the French Government was solely directed towards the repression of bandits and murderers, and the restoration of order. The pillage and outrages continued even after the French troops had landed. Had no action been taken, Dr. Kerr would probably have been murdered with all other Europeans by the Arab tribes. It was all very well for Dr. Kerr to write on September 2nd, "everything here is perfectly quiet." Would he have been able to write that if the tribes had been allowed to do as they pleased? France was not at war with the Sultan of Morocco, and had shown by her whole conduct in the matter her desire to avoid bloodshed and to withdraw as soon as she could possibly do so. She had done everything in her power to attain the desired end by negotiation, and there now seemed every probability that the negotiations would be successful. The bellicose party in France had even attacked the Government for its pacific dispositions. M. Mandel concluded by repeating his regret that such reckless charges against the French Government and the French nation should have been made by Englishmen, and expressing his belief that they did not express the general feeling of the English people.

I may add that to base accusations against the French character, as Mr. Graham does, on the alleged action of the Foreign Legion is singularly illogical, since among the many races represented in the Foreign Legion the French is by no means the most conspicuous.—Yours, &c.,

ROBERT DELL.

9, Boulevard Maiesherbes, Paris,
October 2nd, 1907.

"THE GRIP OF THE SPECIALIST."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The writer of the article in your last issue on "The Grip of the Specialist" asks what is to be the attitude of reasoning men towards the growing power of specialists? He vouchsafes, however, no fresh answer to the question. I would suggest that no such answer is needed because the present attitude is the only possible one. I write not as a specialist, but as a humble general practitioner whose patients owe much to the knowledge and skill of those in the higher ranks of the profession. It is impossible for a layman to realise the extraordinary development which has taken place in recent years in the science and art of medicine, a development so great that it is out of the question that the ordinary practitioner should be able to keep in touch with every latest advance. Specialism is wholly to the advantage of the public; if here and there it is abused, the blame lies not so much with the profession as with that class of patient which demands specialist advice for every minor ailment and delights in new-fangled ideas. It is difficult to read the meaning of your writer's complaint: he bewails the discovery of the rôle of the appendix: "now we know it to our cost." What is the cost? There is the harvest of lives innumerable delivered from the fear of death; is this no recompense? Why is it more harmful for a man to know he has an appendix than to know he is the possessor of a nose? The latter is equally liable to disease. In truth, many of the writer's sentences remind one of nothing so much as the sense of oppression arising from a horrible nightmare. "When he is taken ill it becomes a matter of chance whether he is forced to undergo a dangerous operation, is put upon a novel and hazardous diet, is sentenced to two months' close confinement, or to a long term of distant exile." "Of chance," be it observed! Does the specialist spin a coin to decide his method of treatment? Truly it is an appalling picture, but equally truly it is the product of a disordered imagination. Does every illness where a specialist is summoned involve the consideration of these terrible alternatives? Is every operation dangerous? Is every system of diet hazardous and novel? Have no patients been cured by these means or even by the dread ordeal of two months' close confinement? Finally, is any patient forced to undergo any treatment?

But one's controversy with the writer goes deeper than this. He, indeed, has some complimentary words to say regarding the devotion and sacrifice of the profession, but these are only the gilded coating of a bitter pill. He discusses "the network of community of interests with its system of profit-sharing and commissions"; if the writer means by this that there exists such a system between general practitioners and specialists, such a statement is absolutely false, and I challenge him to produce a single instance thereof. Then there is the innuendo that "it is more profitable to keep ill than to cure." Personally, I should have thought that the reverse was true, and I know no medical men who have tried to establish a connection on this basis, while the experiment does not sound a hopeful one. Such an innuendo is unworthy of a serious writer.

I do not intend to suggest that all specialists are white-robed members of a holy priesthood, with no thoughts save of altruism and self-sacrifice. They are human and have their living to make like the rest of mankind. Here and there may be one who abuses his position, but to deduce from this the statements in your contributor's article is a travesty of argument. There is no other body of men who so readily give of their best without fee or reward.—Yours, &c.,

JAMES PEARSE, M.D.

Trowbridge, October 2nd, 1907.

[Dr. Pearce presents a travesty of our argument and thus has no difficulty in refuting it. We did not deny the utility of medical specialism: we merely presented the dangers and difficulties such professional specialism involves. We did not question the services which modern surgery renders, but its perilous excesses admitted by a large section of the medical profession. The element of chance of which we wrote was not applied to the action of the individual specialist: his treatment is quite often a matter of fixed routine: but for the ordinary patient, unable to canvas the virtues and defects of specialists, it is largely a matter of chance what specialist he consults, and, therefore, to what particular treatment he is subjected. As for the element of force, the patient is morally compelled to adopt the treatment that is urged. Finally, on the question of "community of interests," we did not assert that commissions were given by specialists to general practitioners; even were this the case, it must obviously be difficult to publish instances. We do assert, however, that the community of interests between chemist and doctor is often represented in a definite pecuniary bond. Dr. Pearce presents fairly enough the obvious "professional" reply; he minimises the danger, throws the blame on the "patient" public, and fails to appreciate the insidious operation of profit-making motives in a highly competitive profession.—EDITOR, THE NATION.]

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I can fully confirm the accuracy of your reflections on the grip of the specialist from a somewhat bitter experience of my own. Some time ago I suffered a breakdown due to overwork and was advised to consult Sir A. B., whose reputation is European. This busy man devoted at least five minutes to my case, telling me that my only chance of recovery was to take the rest-cure at a home in the south of England, the address of which he kindly gave me. In reply to my inquiry I learnt that the terms for the "cure" were £10 10s. per week, exclusive of the local doctor's fee. Whilst considering these terms an intimate friend wrote to say he had mentioned my case to an acquaintance, an eminent Harley Street physician, who said I had consulted the wrong man, that Sir A. B. was a surgeon, whereas I needed a physician; this specialist, whom I will call Dr. C., added that the rest-cure was an exploded remedy, only suitable for hysterical women and dipsomaniacs, that I should have to pay a ridiculous sum for the privilege of lying in bed and drinking a number of glasses of milk per day, and that I should emerge at the end of six weeks less well than when I entered. This judgment coming from a high priest of the New Religion warped my mind from the rest-cure, a process already begun by the cost involved. Breaking the canon law of professional etiquette, I consulted one of the first physicians of the day, Sir D. F., who ordered me to proceed without delay to the village of —, situated on the edge of the desert of Sahara, otherwise he would not answer for the consequences. To this end I called at Messrs. Cooks, the tourist agents, where I fortunately met one of their representatives who had just returned from the locality in question. He informed me that it was quite the wrong time of the year to go to —, that the rainy season had commenced, and that the only hotel had been closed, not to re-open until four months later. Congratulating myself on my narrow escape from the second prescription, I communicated my information to Sir D. F., who received it with composure, exclaiming, "Really! It was delightful when I was there," he having visited the place at another season of the year. I suggested the High Alps, to be told if I went there in my present condition I should in all probability contract phthisis, "which abounded in Switzerland." A medical acquaintance of considerable parts who knows every inch of Switzerland with affectionate intimacy, ridiculed this notion, alleging that there were more microbes to be met in the "Tuppenny Tube" than in all the sanatoria of Switzerland. By this time, weary of conflicting advice, I did what I thought best myself with the happiest results. I enclose my card.—Yours, &c.,

A CRITIC OF THE "NEW RELIGION."

October 1st, 1907.

THE NEW TESTAMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your article last week you say that "About the middle of the second century, the Christian communities scattered throughout the Roman empire were convulsed by dissensions about the fundamental ideas of their faith. At this period there was no authoritative New Testament; the contending factions appealed, in confirmation of their contentions, to the considerable mass of literary documents thrown up by the new movement. In order to put an end to these controversies, the Church made a selection, which it declared to be canonical or authoritative, from this mass of literary material; this selection is the New Testament very much as we have it now."

Will you kindly give me the historical proof of this work of the Church in the second century? By this, I mean the contemporary, or at least early, evidence on which the statement is based.—Yours, &c.,

W. H. GRIFFITH THOMAS.

Wycliff Lodge, Oxford, Sept. 25th, 1907.

[Dr. Griffith Thomas is asking a question which would carry us much beyond the limits of an ordinary answer inasmuch as it would involve a discussion of the meaning and value of the Patristic literature of the second century. We must content ourselves with referring him to Professor von Schubert's "Outlines of Church History," an excellent book, by a sound Protestant and distinguished historian, which we are happy to see has just been translated into English. In the second century, von Schubert says, "the struggle against Gnosticism and Montanism in conjunction with a crisis within the Church marked a turning-point; and, following closely upon the general institution of monarchical bishops, the collections of Scripture were adjusted, and made an authoritative rule for the Church in general—in other words a canon." See page 65 of English translation. But the whole chapter should be read as it summarises the latest results of criticism in this obscure field of enquiry.—EDITOR, THE NATION.]

THE UNREST IN INDIA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I send you the enclosed extracts from a letter received the other day by my daughter, a Newnham student, from a college friend of hers—Indian by birth, but domiciled, with some of her family, in England—in the hope that it may interest some of your readers who concern themselves about Indian matters. It struck me as very interesting, from the mixture of English school-girl (if I may so speak of a Newnham graduate) and observer of Indian society from both sides.—Yours, &c.,

A. J. BUTLER.

Wood End, Weybridge, Sept. 29th, 1907.

"There is so much feeling now between English and Indians. They are mostly at daggers drawn, and the papers don't overrate the unrest in India. The English have a circle of their own; then of the educated Indians there are two camps, the pro-English and the ultra-national or Swadeshi, who won't go to an English shop or buy English goods when possible. These distinctions cause a great deal of unrest and quarrelling, as you may imagine, as all parties hate and despise each other. For myself, I feel we fall between the two, being neither one thing nor the other—a great mistake. For being English in education and point of view, one can't help seeing all the good in the English arrangements and government. And being Indian by birth and feeling, one longs for a national India. Yet one can't sympathise with the extreme Swadeshis, and one sees that the English despise and, to a great extent, ill-treat the natives. So what is one to do? . . ."

"TYRANTS OF THE ROAD."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As a reader of THE NATION may I be allowed to offer one or two (as I venture to think) indisputable propositions respecting the motor car.

1. The motor car in itself represents a marvellous development in road locomotion, and is proving most useful in peace and in war, i.e., for doctors, parsons, transport agents, farmers, commanding officers, postal deliverers, commercial travellers, and all who move even from one parish to another.

2. Objection to the motor car arises from (a) inconsiderate driving; (b) the dust which the traffic creates.

3. The motor car industry is a very valuable one to the country, and, as such, is to be encouraged: it affords a vast field of employment, and the services of motor men are also in widespread and constantly increasing demand.

As with all inventions, the motor car is liable to abuse, but the vast majority of drivers are considerate drivers and have no desire to take life, their own or other people's. It is uncharitable and illiberal to condemn all motorists because a few misbehave. The ill deeds of the few receive much attention in the Press: the kind deeds of the many are seldom reported. Your correspondents, as practical men and progressives, would do well to address themselves to the same consideration of the traffic, remembering that the King, Princes, Peers, Prelates, Cabinet Ministers et hoc genus omne are motorists, and that Parliament will never listen to the advocacy of proposals for the control of automobiles which one would almost imagine were advanced merely in a playful spirit of humour.—Yours, &c.,

J. LENG STURROCK.

Dundee, Sept. 30th, 1907.

"SILLY SOCIAL FUNCTIONS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—If it is not too late to refer to the article on "Silly Social Functions" in your issue of the 14th ult., I should like to suggest some other remedy for the evil than that put forward by the writer. Great philanthropic or educational movements, which have at all times provided subjects of interest to those who care for deep thinking, are hardly likely to supply the recreation now found in "teas" to that class of society in which this form of "absurdity" is chiefly indulged.

But might not the standard of these lighter amusements be improved? Is there no way of cultivating the lost art of conversation (if we ever had it), and could not this be done at these very entertainments?

If the competition, instead of being a comparatively brainless one, took the form of original story-telling, the narration of some actual experience if possible, but which might also include the description of the plot of either a book or play, the legendary art might once more perhaps be revived, and incidentally the power of expression be vastly improved. The aversion of the average Englishman or woman from making even the simplest kind of speech is largely due to fear of the sound of his own voice.

It need not be made compulsory for everyone present to tell a story, but the desire of competing is a strong incentive on these occasions, and would probably prevail over lack of habit, while the prize for the best story should be adjudged by the votes of the majority.

Many developments could be made, and the entertainment further defined by confining the narration to biographical or historical subjects (of course, this would involve some preliminary trouble), but in every case the speaker would have to use his own words. Anecdotes, however good, ought to be avoided, as the possibility of a "chestnut tea" would only add another form of inanity to those already existing.

Perhaps some adventurous spirit will risk a failure to carry out this idea.—Yours, &c.,

V. CHURCHILL.

Amsterdam, Sept. 30th, 1907.

Reviews.

CARLETON, LORD DORCHESTER.*

As one of a series of biographies of the "Makers of Canada," Mr. Bradley has written a most interesting volume on Guy Carleton, the first Lord Dorchester. Carleton, as I shall call him, and as he is best known in history, came of a good stock in the North of Ireland, of that blend of Scotch and Irish blood which has given to England so many of its most capable leaders in war and in civil affairs. He was born in 1724, and, entering the Army, soon acquired a reputation as an able officer. When, in 1758, General Wolfe, after his brilliant exploit at Louisberg, was appointed to the chief command in the expedition against Quebec, he was most anxious to have Carleton on his staff. The King, however, refused his assent to the appointment, angered by some disparaging remarks which Carleton was reported to have made as to the Hanoverian troops, a dire offence to his Majesty of German blood. It was only after repeated applications, backed up by Pitt himself, that the King finally relented, and signed the warrant of appointment. Carleton, who was thenceforward known as "one of Pitt's young men," acted as Quartermaster-General in this expedition, and commanded a regiment of Grenadiers on the Plains of Abraham when Wolfe was killed, and he himself was badly wounded.

A few years later—in 1766—and not long after the conclusion of peace with France, which ceded Canada to the British Crown, Carleton was appointed Governor of the new colony, at first as deputy in the absence of the Governor, and later as full Governor. He held this post for nearly twelve years, and again later, after an interval of a few years, for another term of ten years. It is not too much to say that but for his sagacity, foresight, tact, and courage during these two critical periods Canada would have been lost to the British Crown and would have become an annexe to the great Republic growing up alongside of it.

Carleton's career may be considered under four very distinct phases, in each of which he accomplished work which alone would have entitled him to a record in the history of the British Empire. The first was from his assumption of the government of Canada in 1766 till the passing in 1779 by the British Parliament of the Quebec Act, which conceded to the French Canadians the maintenance of their civil institutions. The second was his brilliant and successful defence of Quebec against the attack by the American forces under Montgomery and Arnold, in 1775-6, his subsequent advance across the frontier, and his destruction of the American flotilla on Lake Champlain. The third was his command of the British forces in New York in 1782-3, during which he had to carry out the invidious task of finally withdrawing the defeated troops, and large number of loyalists, who preferred to emigrate rather than remain under the tender mercies of the victorious republic. The last was his second governorship of Canada from 1786 to 1796, during which the province of Upper Canada was separated from that of Lower Canada, and both were granted full representative institutions, and when he guided the colony through the critical period of the earlier years of the long war between England and France, which might easily have led to a revolt of the French Canadians and to the intervention of the American Republic.

Of the first of these it is to be observed that the population of Canada at the time of the conquest, numbering little more than 150,000, was almost wholly French. The first disposition of the British Government was to impose on these people the English laws as to their property and other civil rights. It was Carleton's merit that he recognised the supreme importance of conciliation, and that he urged upon the British Government the inexpediency and injustice of thrusting upon these conquered people a system of law to which they were averse. As a result of four years of negotiation, during which Carleton was detained in England, the British Government and Parliament were induced to pass the Quebec Act of 1774, which conceded to Canada the civil institutions of their old régime. This course had the advantage of conciliating two great interests—the feudal owners of seigniories and the Catholic clergy. If these two classes had remained hostile there can be little doubt that the people generally would have taken advantage of the revolt of the American colonies, and later of the war between England and France, to take up arms against the Government, and Canada would undoubtedly have been lost.

It was, indeed, touch and go with the peasantry. They were not to be relied upon for any defensive measures against the American invasion which took place in 1775. Some members of the colony decidedly sympathised with the invaders—at least, so long as they found a good market with them for their produce; but later they were alienated under the stress of military corvées, and when paid for their produce in much depreciated paper money.

The same considerations weighed with Carleton in his second tenure of office as Governor of Canada, from 1786 to 1796. In the meantime the increase of the non-French population had been very great, owing to the immigration from the American states of loyalists at the close of the War of Independence, and also directly from England. These mainly settled in the then almost uninhabited districts now known as Ontario, and a population grew up there nearly equal to the French of Lower Canada. These new immigrants would not brook the French law. It was due to Carleton again that this incompatibility between the British and French in the colony was recognised, and that a partition was agreed to by the British Parliament in the Canada Act of 1791, into two distinct provinces, Upper and Lower Canada, and that to each of them representative institutions, framed in accordance with the British model, were conceded. This, again, had the most fortunate result in contenting the people of both races, and in warding off difficulties on the one hand with the Government at Washington, and on the other with the French Government in the earlier years of the great war with France, which commenced in 1793.

Great, however, as were Carleton's merits as a civil governor, his military services were as great. His defence of Quebec in 1775-6, with but a handful of British troops, and with a most unreliable body of Canadian militia, against the combined force of Americans under Montgomery and Arnold was a feat of arms second only in importance to the original capture of the fortress by Wolfe. If Quebec had been captured there can be no question whatever that the whole of Canada would have been lost for ever to the British Crown.

Carleton's counter-attack, when reliefs at last arrived from England, was also a military performance of high order. He drove Arnold from his lines in front of Quebec. He then transferred his force across the St. Lawrence and through the intervening forest to the head of Lake Champlain. There he built a flotilla of gunboats and attacked and destroyed the American flotilla, which hitherto had commanded that lake and had barred the way to Ticonderoga. The further advance to this well fortified post had to be deferred till the following year, as operations during the winter were impossible. During the winter months plans were matured in England for the next year's campaign. Carleton's scheme for this was overruled by the Secretary of State, Germaine, the most incompetent Minister who ever, to the misfortune of England, determined its policy. Carleton was superseded—not on account of this difference of policy, but to pay off an old grudge on the part of Germaine for not having appointed some favourite of the latter on his staff. In his place the unfortunate General Burgoyne was appointed to the command of the invading force. Carleton's scheme had been the capture of Ticonderoga in the spring, and thence an advance to the North so as to cut off the New England Colonies from the other Colonies in revolt. Germaine's scheme was that the British force was to make its way from Ticonderoga to Albany and the Hudson River, and there to join hands with General Howe's army advancing from New York. Such a scheme depended for success on the co-operation and junction of two forces widely separated, and operating from very distant bases. But, incredible as it may seem, Germaine actually forgot to sign the despatch which had been drawn up in his department informing Howe of Burgoyne's movements, and instructing him to co-operate by a march towards Albany. Howe, therefore, in total ignorance of Germaine's scheme, instead of marching to meet Burgoyne on the Hudson River, moved his force to the south towards Pennsylvania. Burgoyne, under the belief that Howe was instructed to join hands with him, held on his course to the Hudson River in the face of overwhelming forces, and was compelled to surrender at Saratoga.

* "The Makers of Canada: Lord Dorchester." By A. G. Bradley. T. C. and E. C. Jack. 21s. net.

It is an interesting subject for conjecture what would have happened if Carleton had been left in command of the army advancing from Ticonderoga. He certainly would not have been caught in a trap at Saratoga. It is difficult to believe that so resourceful a man would have failed to make his movements known to Howe. But that General was so dilatory that some other disaster would probably have occurred.

Carleton rightly regarded his supersession in the military command as a censure. He resigned his post of Governor of Canada; but no successor could be found for him till the following year, when he returned to England—the only general, as Mr. Bradley says, who came home during the unfortunate war with the laurels of victory. Mr. Bradley gives us some short extracts from the correspondence of Carleton with Germaine. Of his despatch in answer to Germaine informing him of the appointment of Burgoyne, he says that it expressed the opinion in as forcible language as official etiquette admitted, that he “thought the Minister (Germaine) not only an ignoramus and a fool but a wholly mischievous person.” The only fault I have to find with Mr. Bradley’s work is that it does not give us this despatch in full—as also another despatch later, in which Carleton defended his whole policy during his twelve years’ tenure of office in Canada, his military achievements in the defence of Quebec, and his defeat of the American flotilla on Lake Champlain. On the nomination at last of his successor, Carleton wrote to Germaine in the following sarcastic and not undignified terms:—

“I have long and impatiently looked out for the arrival of a successor. Happy at last to learn his near approach, that, into hands less obnoxious to your lordship, I may resign the important commands with which I have been honoured. Thus, for the King’s service, as willingly I lay them down, as for his service I took them up—the most essential, and, in truth, the only service in my power to render your lordship’s Administration.”

Amends were later made to Carleton by the British Government for his treatment by Germaine, by his employment at the close of the American War, already alluded to, by his being raised to the Peerage, and by his being again, a few years later, appointed as the indispensable Governor of Canada, greatly increased by the immigration of loyalists at the close of the American War. His services there were almost as great as those in his first government. Truly it can be said of Carleton that he was foremost among the makers of Canada.

EVERSLEY.

LADY BREADALBANE AT HOME.*

BLACK MOUNT is a wild territory on the north of the Orchy and Loch Awe. Should you be travelling by rail to Oban, you will see the southern fringe of it as you go past Dalmally and onward; but the hills which will then be visible give only a vague idea of the grandeur beyond. Clachet is 3,602 ft. in height, and there are at least six other mountains of similar majesty. This region is the scene of the exploits and the reflections which are the subject-matter of the book before us. Lady Breadalbane seems to feel more at home when in it than she feels when anywhere else. On the Tops she has a sorrowful scorn for the life and the interests below. “We feel we have got just a little bit nearer the truth, because for a brief space we have been treading in truth.” Certainly one does have a sense of moral and intellectual exaltation when on or near the peaks; the question is, Does Lady Breadalbane express this consciousness exactly? Let us see. “Often,” she writes, “have I heard it remarked, ‘What can you find so fascinating in struggling up these hills just at the end to shoot a defenceless stag?’ I can hardly explain to questioners such as these,” she answers, “that the stag is the least part of it all . . . that the real enjoyment and pleasure consist in the close intercourse with nature—the solitude, the apartness, the constant variation of light and shade, the mystic vagaries of the fleecy clouds, the grandeur of passing storms, the tender sadness of the setting sun leaving his last rosy kiss on the brows of the peaks, and the quiet peace of evening, as we turn our steps towards home.”

These are not exactly the right words. Will Lady Breadalbane kindly face the facts? Saith she, “I will lift mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help,” and off she goes, armed with the latest thing in rifles, to that part of the holy ground on which the deer are likely to be reposing. Here we have incongruity. Perhaps, however, it is a discord of words only. Indeed, we are sure that it is no more. Lady Breadalbane would never dream of running for her ‘303 if she chanced upon a stag that had accidentally wandered into the park at Taymouth. Shooting him there would be a mean act. Shooting him near a Top is a different thing. Why? Ah, there’s the rub! Mr. George Meredith or Mr. John Davidson might be able to explain the difference in the right words. Lady Breadalbane has not done so. That is because she is an unsophisticated child of nature. She has artistic perception and literary impulse; but she lacks the reserve which practice brings to both. Being still a novice in expression, she does not yet perceive that emotions which cannot be accurately explained should be no more than delicately suggested. A deft suggestion is much more effective than an analytical statement which contains a flaw. Not having thought of this, Lady Breadalbane has written a rhapsody in which the incongruous note is frequent. Still, we have read every word of her book with keen interest, and that fact calls for explanation. A work which is so engaging cannot be less than a success. What is the secret of its charm? Where lies Lady Breadalbane’s witchery? Why are we not revolted with a lady who simultaneously lifts religious eyes unto the hills and a deadly weapon at the timid dwellers therein? These queries throw our syntax out of gear, and we must content ourselves with a general answer. Lady Breadalbane is never quite accurate when she is trying to put her ethical and other reflections into words. She is untold leagues from the truth of things when she says that “the stag is the least part of it all.” She herself will realise this when she recalls her expressed chagrin at a shot which missed or was too low. On the other hand, Lady Breadalbane invariably commands our unreserved respect when she does not go beyond her depth. Every one of her statements as regards matters of fact rings true. Whilst we boggle at many of her reflections, we are never in the slightest doubt as to her exploits. She is an expert deer-stalker, and her accounts of the sport are as clear to us as they would have been had we ourselves been present.

This is no small thing to say. Anyone who has ever engaged in deer-stalking, which is an extraordinarily cunning and arduous work, will grasp the considerableness of Lady Breadalbane’s achievement when we declare that her book is almost a perfect picture of the craft in its best estate. Some may question whether field sports are justifiable, and this doubt, indeed, was recently, in an article on “Play versus Sport,” expressed in our own pages; but that is hardly within the scope of our criticism. Only, let it in fairness be mentioned that Lady Breadalbane, though she herself has obviously never entertained the misgiving, does something to dispel it. She says: “To live carefully and to keep in good condition is one of the great gains achieved by such sport. To do justice to it, one must be ‘fit’ in every sense of the word, and this means a certain amount of self-denial which is very wholesome and beneficial to most of us.” There is more than a little truth in that remark. Then, what could be more heartening than Lady Breadalbane’s affection and respect for the gillies and others who share in her adventures? There is no humbug in the passages to which we allude. They are all genuine. In short, this book leaves upon our mind a singularly pleasant impression.

* “The High Tops of Black Mount.” By the Marchioness of Breadalbane. With Illustrations from Photographs. William Blackwood & Sons. 6s. net.

THE ROOTS OF REALITY.*

MR. BAX is wise in wasting no space in refutations of outworn theories of materialism and empiricism. He who would hope to scale the peak must camp above the snow-line, and begin his climb from that height. So in his Introduction our author assumes the essential positions of modern idealism, identifying reality with conscious experience, possible or actual, and adopting "self-consistency of consciousness" as the test of truth. But moving from these positions he takes a route of his own, determined primarily by the stress he lays upon the fundamental importance of the distinction between feeling and intellect as methods of experience. This distinction he sharpens by applying to the "feltness," or content of feeling, the term "a-logical." The particular drive of Mr. Bax's philosophy depends upon his assigning the priority in value to this "a-logical" element in the several processes by which he arrives at his final synthesis. Primarily his treatment stands as a protest against the barren intellectualism of the English idealists, such as the late T. H. Green and Mr. Haldane, who, following Hegel too nearly, produce a system which is a dance of "bloodless categories"—a system of relations in which the nature of the things related doesn't count. His criticism of the deficiencies of this typical product of modern academism is far more trenchant and successful than that of the Pragmatists or Humanists, whose stress on feeling in the sense of individual human wills suffers from the two vices, first of mistaking a psychological for a philosophic explanation, secondly from an unintelligible monadism. Mr. Bradley appears to so many modern readers of philosophy as having reached in this eternal struggle the golden mean that it is important to indicate the attitude taken by Mr. Bax to his standard theory of modern idealism. Except in one important matter, their difference is rather one of emphasis. For though Mr. Bax is disposed to class Mr. Bradley with the "pallogists" (those whose final explanation is in logical terms), he admits that the writer of "Appearance and Reality" has formally rejected and refuted the theory of thought-relations in vacuo, and claims for his Absolute, or final reality, the immediacy of individual direct experience as well as the completed harmony of thought-relations. "But Mr. Bradley's whole procedure consists in the endeavour to find an adequate logical formula for the a-logical, to make the logical absorb the a-logical without leaving a remainder over. His Absolute, in the last resort, means an ultimate reality that yet lacks the conditions of reality." But is this any more than to say that in the final formula, whatever it may be, you cannot present the substance or matter which you are formulating, and that even if you represent it, this representation reaches a virtually infinite degree of tenuity? What else can the highest generalisation or principle be except one which has most effectively rid itself of particulars? It is true that Mr. Bax appears in his final principle to retain a little more of the flesh and blood, the immediacy of "feltnesses": but he does so at the expense of the completeness or finality of his telos. "The whole question, to my mind, turns upon the distinction between regarding the Absolute as a wound-up whole, a closed system, a finally complete synthesis, and regarding it as principle merely, timeless principle of eternal change in time." But is Mr. Bax's Absolute, regarded as "an eternally completing, yet never complete, process of the self-realisation of the subject of our consciousness and of all possible consciousness" (p. 272) really an Absolute at all? The image of a general consciousness realising itself in a time process, presumably by means of an environment (for how otherwise?) may be a good place to leave off in trying to construct a complete principle or Absolute, but it is not that complete principle. What Mr. Bax, in his very keen criticism, really exposes is the futility of any attempt to formulate an Absolute, a futility inherent both in the nature of the task and in the character of the instrument of language with which it is sought to accomplish it. This conclusion our author sometimes seems to recognise, but he does not carry out the full implications of the admission that for his problem "solution in the formulæ of reflective thought would seem unattainable." The very categories, the whole process of formulation, rest, as Mr. Bax observes, in the last resort on feeling, the bed-rock of the a-logical. If, then, not merely in art and religion, but in philosophy itself, the ultimate arbiter is the a-logical, what becomes of the "self-consistency of consciousness" which we have taken for our standard of philosophic truth? If this self-consistency itself is ultimately a-logical, Mr. Bax appears to hand himself over either to the pragmatists or to some other order of non-intellectualists. It would have been far better to have dispensed altogether with ultimate arbiters and any sort of Absolute, seeing that from the start Mr. Bax had precluded himself from the possibility of giving a satisfactory, or even a consistent, meaning to these highest terms.

Not that we wish to condemn his reasoning as barren of fruits. On the contrary, his discussion is a genuine and highly important contribution to philosophic method, and some of its by-products are full of valuable nutriment. Particularly serviceable is the able elaboration of his doctrine that between the consciousness of the human ego and the general consciousness the concept of a Social consciousness must intervene. The following striking passage will indicate the significance of this line of thought:—

"We cannot get over the obvious impossibility that we, animal-human personalities shut up in our respective memory-syntheses, find in conceiving of a social-human personality, with its own self-consciousness, as much wider in scope and richer in content than the former, as the human-animal's is wider and richer than the sentience of the lower nerve centres that build up his body. But the lower nerve centre is equally unable to throw itself forward into the position of grasping the perfected psychical side, to which it contributes its quota, of the fully-fledged human being. Should the foregoing be true, it may be that we shall have to seek our 'God,' if he is to be a practical ideal, not so much in the realm of metaphysical analysis as in that of sociological research at its highest, or, as we may term it, in transcendental sociology." (p. 130.)

One or two acute excursions into the implications of the distinction of logical and illogical reveal both the subtlety of Mr. Bax's reasoning power and the complete honesty with which he follows where the spirit of his logic leads him. Perhaps the most interesting is the re-establishment of chance as a factor in human affairs. Causality being a pure creation of logic, its claim to absolute supremacy in a world of a-logic or feeling is ex-hypothesi invalid. In some curious illustrations we are led to a distinction between certain major issues or events which follow in orderly sequences of law and other minor incidents which impishly break in from a realm of pure chance. Mr. Bax goes so far as to deny the applicability of a law of causation to so-called games of chance, apparently holding that, since in a long series of tosses the number of "heads" and "tails" approximate in number, a person intervening when a great predominance of "heads" has turned up is reasonable in betting that the next toss will yield "tails." To our mind, however, such reasoning does not establish chance, but if it were correct, implies a direct chain of causation connecting the several tosses in such wise that a run of ten "heads" makes the eleventh toss incline to "tails." It may well be true that this "Theory of Chance" (if even this expression be not itself a contradiction in terms) follows from the penultimate distinction between logical and a-logical, but its necessary emergence really convicts the distinction of illegitimacy. The sharpness of this, or of some other antithesis, essential for the conduct of processes of reasoning, is always responsible for some dualism which comes home to the philosopher who seeks any ultimate synthesis. To insist, as Mr. Bax does, that "chance" is a "positive element of reality" is to make a statement which cannot even be made plausible, but involves one in worse contradictions the further one goes. If Mr. Bax likes to say that the merit of his Absolute consists in its self-contradictory character, which represents the triumphant representation of the a-logical, he has a sort of case. But we fear that it will be a subject of derision to the "Philistines," whom Mr. Bax seems to have so much in mind.

But while we think that Mr. Bax makes too much play with his "a-logical," and tries to build on it a sort of philosophic structure it will not bear, we hold him to have conferred a great service on modern thinking by enforcing the limits set upon successful system-mongering by the impossibility of expressing in logical terms the "stuff" of experience. No recent work of English philosophy better repays perusal.

* "The Roots of Reality." By E. Belford Bax. Grant Richards. 7s. 6d. net.

A ROMANCE OF THE SEA.*

It has been said that swans do not sing when dying; but the singing of the swan, like the burning of the Phoenix, is allegory, not natural history; all things sing or become intelligible when at the point of death. There is hardly a tradition of life, hardly a calling followed by men, which has not become intelligible, significant, even awful, before passing from the world, its work done. Our generation has seen a very great tradition of life pass from the world. It has seen the sailing-ship seamen, with their arts, and their ever-honoured virtues, pass, as it were, "down the side," to Davy Jones's receptive locker. Probably they went down singing, keeping good time, avoiding un-English trillos, with some such tune as "Rock and Roll me Over," or "Hanging Johnny," or, saddest of all, "It's time for us to leave her." Whatever they sang, they have gone, and there is nothing quite like them now left alive.

But before they went they made their way of life intelligible, according to the natural law. Various kinds of ships, and various kinds of experience in them, were made significant by the writers which they bred, particularly by Captain Marryat and by the two American writers, Dana and Herman Melville. They gave to the man-of-war, the trading brig, the merchant clipper, and the whaler, each with her minutely ordered society, their places in the intellectual kingdom. A few years later, George Cupples added to the list the East Indiaman. Then came Mr. Clark-Russell, to expand the marine museum with all manner of ships, from a frozen-in pirate, and a raised Dutch carrack, to a convict-ship and a schooner-yacht. Mr. Runciman sowed, Mr. Bullen watered, and Mr. Conrad brought us increase. The great days of the sailing ship are over, and the men of those days are gone; but their very glorious ghosts will live in Mr. Conrad long after the merrows of the sea have scattered their bones among the coral.

Among the sailing ships of those days, the emigrant ship was one of the most worthy of remark. She was not, as a rule, a clipper ship, a floating heap of canvas, "all legs and wings," beautiful exceedingly, driven till she groaned, so that she might break the record. She was an ordinary humdrum merchant vessel, chartered to carry emigrants, just as she might have been chartered to carry convicts. In herself she was nothing in particular; but she was the cause of remarkable features in others. She carried several hundreds of human beings, all tightly packed into her 'tween decks, for many long months together, through the tropics, through the Roaring Forties, through all the tumult of "heavy running." In doing this, she modified the characters of those human beings, she stripped each character of all pretence; she made life an intolerable burden to each individual. Even to-day, in a fast Western ocean steamer, the life of the emigrant is a hard one. He is cooped up for a week in a rather dark, dirty 'tween deck, full of fleas and other emigrants. He eats, and sleeps, and is sick in this 'tween deck, so that it is littered, after the first six hours, with indescribable filth, renewed at each meal. Broken meats, crusts of bread, pints of skilly, filthy tin plates and cups, greasy soup, and other messes, make the decks stink. If the weather is bad, the windsails are not set and the hatches are battened down; the air thickens and sickens; the iron bulkheads "sweat." The smells of oil, of engines, of hot metal, add to the noisomeness. The motion of the ship, the trembling and rolling and heart-sickening pitching, the cries and screams, the throes of the violently sick, the crashing of the green seas shipped, the whacking of the racing screws, in that horrid moment when she pauses to take it over her bows, all increase the horror. There is no comfort, no cleanliness, no possible pleasure; even drunkenness is hard to compass. One forgets that comfort and delight in life existed. If one is sick one has the spectacle, if well, the reality, of the soiled stewards at meal-times, heaving greasy meat to the hungry, with adroit flicks of the fork, from the greasy mess-kid, for the hungry to catch, or to pick up if they fail to catch, and to devour, without grace, beast-like, leaving gobbets on the table.

But in the old days of sail, when the week of misery was prolonged to four or five months, with restricted water allowance, and hardly any room, even for a fight, the emigrant's lot was like the lot of the woman in the Apocrypha, who was "sore vexed in her mind, and brought very low." As far as we know, his condition has not been imaginatively treated until the present time. We have now a book which shows with real skill, and real humour, how the emigrant fared in those old days; and how his women-kind became bitter, suspicious, back-biting, full of malice and uncharitableness, and how he and his brothers became irritable, callous, sudden and apt in quarrel, ready to "break out," with furious hysteria, like convicts in a prison, after the ship had been for a while at sea.

Mr. Robert Elliott, the author of this book, is a new writer. His first book, "Hi You," a work full of promise and suggestion, but written with rather too great an elaboration, was only published last year. In "Act of God" the situation is perhaps more commonplace; but the book is written with a fine economy of means; there is hardly an unnecessary word; the story is soundly constructed; it is strange that any writer's art should have matured so rapidly. It is the fashion among critics to condemn realism as "inartistic," and the condemnation weighs, we believe, among those who do not know how the same critics condemn the poetical as "unreal." Mr. Elliott has a good deal more sense than to pay any attention to the fashions of critics. He has seen, with his inner vision, an emigrant ship of the early eighties, old-fashioned enough to have a single mizen topsail (the fashion still lingers, reef-bands and all, in a few ships), but with a main skysail to give her style. He has looked upon her as a world to herself, as a little floating world, needing, and drawing to herself, certain human characters, certain eternal types of emigrants and sea-goers. He has taken upon himself to present the lives of those vagabonds; and it would be well for the reader to consider what that presentation implies. He has as his scene, or background, the ship the "Young Pretender"; but for his characters he has to turn to three or four different societies. He has his foremast hands (to come in through the hawse-holes), a pretty mixed company in themselves. Then he has his single men, and married emigrants, in the 'tween decks amidships, another mixed company. Then he has his single women (a company of Irish girls among them), living in a converted sail-room in the care of an acid matron. Lastly, he has his regular after-guard, captain and mates, cabin steward and doctor; and, to finish up with, two cabin passengers, an artist and his sister. As an effort of creation alone, "Act of God" is certainly remarkable, even though only two of the characters are complex, and placed in complex situations. Mr. Elliott has filled his ship with living human beings. He has as strong a sense of character as Marryat, and as delightful a sense of humour. His sense of tragedy is not yet finely developed. He has a fine opportunity for the display of tragical power in the character of Joanna Darcy, a young Irish girl slighted by her lover. He neglects this opportunity, and makes much of the crude and common tragedy of fire at sea, and the miseries of an open boat; not that these tragedies are easy to do, far from it; but there it is, the other is the harder and the more beautiful. We have read his book through some three or four times, and really it is worth it. No man has ever yet "done" a ship's entire complement so thoroughly. Very few novelists have been able to keep so many differing puppets moving, each in his own little orbit, no matter how often other orbits cross it. Mr. Clark Russell tried something of the same thing in his "Convict Ship," but Mr. Clark Russell's seamen, when touched by the tenderer passions, became theatrical. In Mr. Elliott's vision, the seaman who is his hero becomes, under those circumstances, the Bohemian which sailors generally are. Mr. Elliott's other characters are as consistent, and as natural, as his Patrick Hudson. Specially choice flowers in his bunch are his London women, Mrs. Jenkins, vulgar, coarse, and sentimental, with her inverted daughter Miranda, and her Italian husband. His aim has been to present, in full detail, the life in an emigrant ship, while showing something of various types of vagabond. In his vision, the vagabond lives easily, by avoiding the responsibilities and real issues of life. It is his lot to die easily, when brought before a tragic issue, leaving the burden of his vagabond errors upon those who, being of deeper character, can feel keenly and suffer sharply. Mr. Elliott's next task will be to present these deeper characters, leaving the vagabonds to their fate.

* "Act of God." By Robert Elliott. Duckworth & Co. 6s.

THE NOVEL OF THE WEEK.*

IN writing "Comrades," which may be styled a novel of a great revolutionary propaganda, genuinely inspired by the sufferings of the exploited Russian people, Gorky has brought up to date the literature of the popular struggle. It is interesting to compare "Comrades" with the novel "Virgin Soil," in which the great Russian writer, Turgenev, in 1877, made a close analysis and forecast of the Nihilist movement. His deep insight recognised that Young Russia was doomed to sacrifice itself in its revolt of idealism and of the Russian conscience against slavishness of spirit, and he prophesied that the Bureaucracy would prevail till leaders arose from the ranks of "the people" itself. A generation has passed, and from "Comrades" we see that the miracle has come to pass, and that the Government is now more in fear of the Russian working men and of the factory hands than of the students and "intelligentsi." The political prisons are crammed now with people from all classes of society, with uneducated and self-educated as well as with educated men.

The hero of "Comrades," Pavel, is the son of a factory locksmith, Michael Vlasov, a gloomy and ferocious man, who beats his wife and children mercilessly, and is hated and feared by everybody in the village. By Michael's figure Gorky symbolises the bitter legacy of oppression and evil in the Russian soul, just as by Pavel's mother, Pelagueya, Gorky typifies the countless generations of weak and suffering victims of centuries of violence and wrong. The oppressor and the oppressed—in these two is summed up a world of Russian psychology and social history. But Michael the locksmith dies suddenly and is laid in his coffin "with open mouth, his eyebrows knit as if in a scowl," and the lad, Pavel, recovering from a drunken bout one day looks at his mother fixedly, and for the first time understands what depths of despairing wretchedness is revealed in her troubled eyes, her body broken down with long years of toil and beatings, and her noiseless anxious listening movements. Mother and son gradually come nearer. Watching him the mother notices that Pavel soon begins to grow silent, absorbed and austere in his manner. He neglects the society of the factory hands, brings home books, and then, at length, introduces into his home "comrades" from the city, social democrats, "illegal people," such as Andrey, the Little Russian, Natasha and Sashenka, the student girls, and various socialistic workmen from his own and the surrounding factories. Soon a "circle" is formed, and stormy debates take place among the comrades, but the mother in bewilderment observes that all the conversations and disputes are pervaded by the same gleeful intoxicating and joyous enthusiasm, and in their ringing words is felt the same mysterious and mighty force—the idea of brotherhood, "the great, the invincible idea of the brotherhood of the workers of all countries":—

"And sometimes the mother was struck by the spirit of lively, boisterous hilarity that took sudden possession of them. It was incomprehensible to her. It usually happened on the evenings when they read in the newspapers about the workers in other countries.

"Then their eyes sparkled with bold, animated joy; they became strangely, childishly happy; the room rang with merry peals of laughter, and they struck one another on the shoulder affectionately.

"In the small room a vast feeling was born of the universal kinship of the workers of the world, at the same time its masters and its slaves, who had already been freed from the bondage of prejudice and who felt themselves the new masters of life. This feeling blended all into a single soul; it moved the mother, it straightened and emboldened her, as it were, with its force, with its joys, with its triumphant youthful vigour, intoxicating, caressing, full of hope."

This intoxicating feeling of devotion to a great ideal is the same that has inspired three generations of the most fearless and independent section of the Russian youth to shatter itself against the official gendarmerie that is called the Russian Government. For years the efforts of a few thousands of "deluded girls and boys" against the force, the majesty, the prestige of the all-powerful Government were ridiculed by officialdom in every European capital. But gradually Europe awoke to the meaning of the struggle, and the persistent strangulation of public opinion against official acts and edicts was bound to result, logically, in a struggle between the Government and the nation. To-day by the open violation of its pledges given to the nation, and by the illegal and utterly arbitrary treatment of the Duma, the Bureaucracy has hastened on the moral anarchy which is a prelude to its own disruption. But the signs of a violent social upheaval are more ominous to-day than ever before. To the struggle of the educated classes for constitutional government is now added a general struggle of the poor against the rich, of Labour against Capital, of the peasant against the landowner. It is small wonder that "Comrades" has been prohibited both in Russia and in Germany, for it expresses a bitter hatred of the alliance between Government and Capitalism, and, indeed, treats as its chief enemy that Capitalism which, in America as well as in Europe, brings with it "the physical and moral enslavement of the masses of the population" for the enrichment of a small section of the community. "Comrades" preaches the propaganda of the Social Democrats in a country where millions of workers can say with truth, "Who regards us as human beings? No one. We must all understand that no one except ourselves will help us."

The types of militant Socialists and revolutionists that pass before us in "Comrades" are, with scarcely an exception, mere mouthpieces for the propaganda of the general ideas. Both the hero, Pavel, and the Little Russian, Andriuslika, are highly idealised, pure, noble, lofty enthusiasts, consumed with love for humanity and hatred of social wrong, and both men might have stepped from the pages of Stepniak's novel, "The Career of a Nihilist," so identical is their moral attitude. But in the figure of Rybin, the staid, solid peasant "fed on centuries of distrust," Gorky has created the man from "the people," whose leading idea is "No good will ever come from the masters. Take my word for it." Rybin is the formidable type of man of whom another character remarks "When the peasant rises up he'll overturn absolutely everything. He will lay the land bare for himself when he rises to his feet. He will burn everything up, as if after a plague, so that all traces of his wrongs will vanish in ashes." And Rybin himself echoes Bakunin's prophecy that the excesses of the French Revolution will be as nothing compared to those of the Russian: "Our blood flows now for the truth. The people will perform great executions when they arise. This blood is theirs; it has been drained from their veins; they are its masters." But at present the Rybins are the small fighting minority in the mass of the people "faint-heartedly and secretly awaiting the coming of the truth," who "beat when the authorities compel you to beat, though maybe you weep inside yourself with pity." But a generation ago, when "Virgin Soil" was written, Rybin would have been but a figure of the fancy. To-day he is to be found throughout Russia, the peasant who dares to stand up against the authorities, "the bold man they'll get rid of—send to the other world." And the feeling of national exasperation against the official class which, to strike terror into the heart of the townsmen has deliberately organised massacres of innocent people, finds expression in Nikolay's words: "A whole nation is depraved. Savagery grows apace; cruelty becomes the law of life. A gang of stupid people protesting their pernicious power over the people, beat, stifle, oppress everybody. Others are poisoned with the desire of vengeance. They deprave the nation, the whole nation."

Undoubtedly the power of "Comrades" lies in the author's absolute conviction of the justice of his cause, in the deeply burning idealistic fervour of his moral ideas, in his hatred of cruelty, social greed and social injustice. In the figure of the mother, Pelagueya, Gorky has succeeded in animating a beautiful idea with the breath and force of a real human being. Pelagueya, whose old life sums up the darkness, the bitterness, and the dreariness of the life of the exploited poor, gives birth to a son who sacrifices himself for love of the common people, one of "those others who go to prison, to Siberia, who die for them, are hung." And gradually the son's example stirs the mother into the same intoxicating enthusiasm for the cause. She follows in his footsteps, and spreads the secret propaganda that in the end brings her to prison and exile. In the last pages, which describe her arrest, Gorky has concentrated the meaning of his book, so that even the dullest may understand.

* "Comrades." By Maxim Gorky. Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.

READY OCTOBER 16.

THE LETTERS OF QUEEN VICTORIA

A SELECTION FROM HER MAJESTY'S CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE YEARS 1837—1861.

PUBLISHED BY AUTHORITY OF HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

Edited by ARTHUR CHRISTOPHER BENSON & VISCOUNT ESHER, K.C.V.O.

With numerous Photogravures. Medium 8vo. Three Volumes. £3 3s. 0d. net.

The period covered by these volumes is a memorable one in the history both of Europe and England, and includes—The Queen's Marriage—The Adoption of Free Trade—The Repeal Agitation—Chartism—The Revolutionary Movement of '48—The Crimean War—The Indian Mutiny, &c.

This work is unique in more than one respect. On no occasion hitherto has the personal and official correspondence of a sovereign been officially laid before the public, and the fact that this can be done, practically without reserve, constitutes one among many testimonies to the greatness of Queen Victoria.

Her Majesty came to the throne when little more than a child, and had not merely to maintain, but to make, her position as a Sovereign, both among her own subjects, and among other civilised nations.

With what eminent success she accomplished this task is known to all the world, but how it was accomplished, and what difficulties had to be overcome, will be learned fully for the first time from these volumes. That the throne of Great Britain remained firm when other thrones tottered or fell, and that it still remains firmly established in the devotion and respect of the whole British race is, in great measure, due to Queen Victoria.

His Majesty the King has been graciously pleased to allow the publication of this correspondence which can hardly fail to enhance the love and honour universally felt for the late Queen, and to constitute the best and most lasting memorial of her because it can be possessed by all her subjects in their own homes.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE

(OCTOBER)

is filled with clever stories, poems, articles—all fascinatingly illustrated.

President Theodore Roosevelt

Contributes a Charming Study:

"SMALL COUNTRY NEIGHBOURS"

MADAME WADDINGTON

Writes Interestingly of

"CHATEAU AND COUNTRY LIFE IN FRANCE,"

"SPANISH IMPRESSIONS"

in Colour, is a Notable Contribution.

BUY SCRIBNER'S TO-DAY—TAKE IT HOME.

On Sale Everywhere. At One Shilling.

S. R. CROCKETT'S NEW AUTUMN NOVEL OF 120,000 WORDS. . . .

JUST PUBLISHED.

VIDA;

Or, THE IRON LORD OF KIRKTOWN.

By S. R. CROCKETT

Author of "Kit Kennedy," "Cinderella," &c.

Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top.
With four Illustrations on Art Paper.

6s.

JAMES CLARKE & Co., 13 & 14, FLEET, STREET, E.C.
And of all Booksellers.

OCTOBER IS THE GREAT MONTH
OF THE YEAR FOR NEW BOOKS,
AND PARTICULARS OF THOSE
FORTHCOMING WILL BE FOUND IN
THE OCTOBER "BOOK MONTHLY,"
NOW READY, 6d. NET. ITS VARIED,
INFORMING, AND EMINENTLY
READABLE CONTENTS INCLUDE
AN ARTICLE BY MR. G. K. CHES-
TERTON ON "LITERARY LONDON."

The OCTOBER "BOOK MONTHLY" begins a New Annual Volume, so now is the time to order the Magazine. The publishers, SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London, will send a specimen copy of the current number on receipt of 2d. to cover postage.

Insurance.

ARBITRATION v. TRIAL BY JURY.

It should be clear to every reasoning mind that the Arbitration Act of 1889—which embalms the principle of settlement of differences by arbitration—was conceived in the interest of the public. Before that time the Judges of the land had been jealous of any encroachment upon their prerogatives and had held that any agreement to settle disputes by arbitration was not binding in law inasmuch as it ignored the jurisdiction of the Law Courts. Such a narrow and prejudiced ruling could not be expected to prevail for any length of time, and the contention has been judicially declared by Lord Coleridge as “directly contrary to the spirit of later times which leaves parties at full liberty to refer their disputes at pleasure to public or private tribunals.”

In making arbitration a condition precedent to the right to bring an action at law, the Fire Insurance Offices pursue an equitable and a necessary course. From years and years of experience the procedure has been found expeditious and economical, and this can be gathered from the fact that Arbitrations can be heard at any time and place at the entire convenience of the parties in dispute. Where Judges and juries are called into exercise, the “law’s delays” have become proverbial and so costs accumulate to the legal heart’s content. This does not, of course, mean that lengthened hearings by arbitration may not prove expensive, but in comparison with a trial by jury it must be self-evident that there is really no comparison at all.

Seldom is the subject of reference other than a disagreement as to the amount of the loss. In all such cases it can be imagined there are involved intricacies in figures and many complexities in trade custom and dealing which are quite beyond the ordinary capabilities of a nondescript jury to define. In such cases of difficulty where could we expect to find the sympathies of the jury? Surely with the claimant as against the wealthy insurance company. And would not this easy method, or rather the want of method, in settling the matter in dispute serve to quiet the jury-conscience for their lack of ability or energy to discern truly the equity of the position? Sheer weariness of complex details would be a powerful factor in bringing the jury to a decision. Why even the Judges themselves when the case has been brought into Court and they find the dispute only a question of figures, will make such suggestions to counsel that they cannot avoid agreeing to a reference, and this after all the preliminary expenses of a trial have been incurred. As an instance of the procedure in such cases, I may mention one I heard a few days ago—that of a tenant farmer whose apple orchard in Gloucestershire had been destroyed by fire, and for which he had been paid his claim of some £150 odd for fruit trees and apples destroyed, under the heading of “growing crops,” in an ordinary farming stock insurance. Subsequently, the landlord, as the owner of the trees, brought an action against his tenant for having put the whole of the proceeds into his pocket, and not re-instated the apple trees. The manager of the Fire Office tells me he was subpoenaed from London to give evidence of the payment, and after this important man had been kept hanging about the Court for three days before the case was called, the Judge, as soon as he heard that the point at issue was to define the loss for the trees as against that for the apples, declined to go into the details on the ground that it was a waste of his time and that of the Court, and must first be subject to a reference to decide the amount in dispute.

Let it be remembered that in several Courts in which questions of fact are determined, trial by jury is quite unknown. In the Chancery Courts where the Judges determine rights of way and grant injunctions to restrain nuisances; in the Commercial Court, to which mercantile men now take nearly all their disputes; in the Bankruptcy Court, which deals with such questions as whether a bankrupt has been guilty of extravagant living or has fraudulently made away with any part of his estate—in all these Courts the jury-box has no place.

No human tribunal is, of course, infallible, and legally trained umpires, as well as juries, may make mistakes. But surely there is less likelihood of a miscarriage of justice where the question is left solely to the judgment of a man of judicial habit of mind, well versed in the grasp of facts, and analysis of motives. He must feel a deeper sense of responsibility than a scratch crew of men of all sorts and sizes. He has to live by his reputation, whereas a jury can shift its responsibility through its anonymity.

The Fire Office which looks to maintain its business and extend its connections cannot afford to treat its claimants in a litigious spirit—it would be suicide pure and simple. It seeks no more than bare justice and fair dealing, and its aim and desire is—knowing the inestimable value of personal recommendation—that the contract of indemnity, to which it sets its seal, should be full and complete, nay more, that all cases of doubt should be treated with generosity. As a matter of fact, arbitrations and suggested arbitrations form an almost negligible percentage of the losses adjusted in the year. It is an axiom that British Fire Offices have to seek abroad for legal precedent and authorities in their business, owing to the absence of litigation on this side. In our everyday experience, one knows that most people are prone to regard their geese as swans, and hence it is that claimants are found who take a monstrously inflated view of the value of their property. To bring a commonsense view to bear on the question in dispute, it would certainly seem a severe expedient to have recourse to the expensive machinery of the Law Courts—somewhat like employing a steam hammer to crack a nut. What readier method could be devised than referring the points at issue to an independent practical arbitrator?

Let us examine the procedure by arbitration. The Condition as adopted by some of the leading offices runs as follows:—

“All differences as to the liability and the amount of the liability of the company in respect of any claim for loss or damage, or otherwise, arising out of this policy, shall be referred to the decision of an arbitrator, to be appointed in writing by the parties in difference, or, if they cannot agree upon a single arbitrator, to the decision of two arbitrators, one to be appointed by each of the parties in writing, or in the case of the disagreement of the arbitrators, of an umpire to be appointed in writing before entering upon a reference. The costs of the reference (but only between party and party) and of the award shall be in the discretion of the arbitrator, arbitrators, or umpire making the award, and the obtaining of the award shall be a condition precedent to any liability of the company or any right of action against the company in respect of any claim. And after the expiration of one year after any loss or damage, the company shall not be liable in respect of any claim therefor unless such claim shall in the meantime have been referred to arbitration.”

Where is the hardship in this procedure and where is the Fire Office benefited unduly, or the claimant in any way damnified? The policy-holder possesses, as here shown, precisely the same right of nomination as the Office, and this fact disposes of the suggestion that the arbitrators are dominated by the influence of the Insurance Companies. The Offices are always well pleased when a suitable arbitrator of practical experience can be agreed upon. It then becomes a very simple matter to settle, and the trouble, time, and cost of the hearing are altogether inconsiderable. If two arbitrators and umpires have to consider the matter it follows that corresponding increases in the trouble, time, and cost of the hearing must be expected. But this is nothing compared with the elaboration of procedure when the case has to be tried by a Judge and jury. In an arbitration the laws of evidence are not so rigidly adhered to as in an action, for in honest claims there is a mutual desire to arrive at the true facts of the case unfettered by red-tape. In other cases, where the claim is manifestly fraudulent, or fraud is at least suspected, the examination of the claimant is generally the means either of substantiating the fraud or showing the suspicions to be groundless or incapable of proof. In these cases also, reference to arbitration will almost always terminate the proceedings; for the evidence elicited will satisfy either the Office or the claimant that it would be unwise to prosecute the matter further. Neither is the claimant injured by the reference, for he would be compelled to go into the witness-box and give the same evidence in open Court; and this, in certain cases where fraud has been substantiated, has been followed by an indictment by order of the Judge in a Criminal Court.

NOW READY. THE OCTOBER ISSUE OF
THE ALBANY REVIEW

Edited by CHARLES RODEN BUXTON.

Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

CONTENTS—CURRENT EVENTS; THE WORKING OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN AUSTRIA—Professor Josef Redlich; THE INTERNATIONAL SOCIALIST CONGRESS, R. C. K. Ensor; SOME UNPUBLISHED LETTERS OF LAFCADIO HEARN—Edited by Osman Edwards; OUR PRESENT VOCABULARY—Lady Bell (Mrs. Hugh Bell); THE STATE AS OVER-PARENT—G. F. McCleary, M.D.; MR. HENRY ARTHUR JONES' "HYPOCRITES"—E. A. Brougham; THE FUTURE OF TRADE UNIONISM—G. R. S. Taylor; E. L. GODKIN—Professor N. V. Dicey; THE POLITICS OF A BIOLOGIST—Hon. Bertrand Russell; THE CHARACTER AND MODERN THOUGHT—Alfred W. Benn; FROM GERSON TO GROTIUS—G. P. Gooch, M.P.; IN PRISON—Maxim Gorki.

Now Ready. At all Libraries, Booksellers, and Railway Bookstalls.

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, VIGO STREET, LONDON, W.

CARTOONS by "F. C. G."

(Sir F. Carruthers Gould.)

Short Stories. Book Reviews.
Interviews with Public Men. Nature and Science.
Literary Articles. Survey of the Week.
Problems and Prizes. Dress, Pastimes, &c., &c.

Are some of the Features every Week in

THE

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER,

Weekly Edition "Westminster Gazette,"

Price One Penny, of Newsagents and Bookstalls, or delivered with the early morning mails on Saturday, post free from the publisher, 1½d. a week.

Offices: TUDOR STREET, LONDON, E.C.

MR. R. B. HALDANE AND
"PUBLIC OPINION."

THE Right Hon. R. B. Haldane, M.P., Secretary for War, has addressed the following letter to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION:—

WAR OFFICE, 1st October, 1907.

Dear Mr. Parker,

I think that in the new form of "Public Opinion" under your editorship, you do well to make prominent what is concrete and living in the shape of the opinions maturely formed of men who are trying to do the work of the nation and of journalists the standard of whose criticism is high. What interests people is that which is expressed in a concrete form and has in it the touch of humanity. The views of strenuous spirits and the criticisms of really competent critics given in their own words comply with this condition. Your paper will succeed if it can only keep up to this standard, and I think you have brought it on to the right lines.

Yours faithfully,

R. B. HALDANE.

Percy L. Parker, Esq.,

Office of "Public Opinion,"

Temple House, Tallis Street, E.C.

PUBLIC OPINION.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF CURRENT THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY.
TWOPENCE WEEKLY.

Post free to any part of the World, 13/- Yearly, or 10/10 for the United Kingdom.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST

NEW PART OF
THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION

By the Right Hon. Sir GEORGE OTTO TREVELYAN, Bt.

Part III.—SARATOGA AND BRANDYWINE—VALLEY FORGE—ENGLAND AND FRANCE AT WAR.

With Three Maps. 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

The previous Parts of the Work can be had as follows:

LIBRARY EDITION. Part I., 8vo., 13s. 6d. net. Part II. (two vols.), 8vo., 21s. net.

CABINET EDITION. Vols. I., II., III. (comprising Parts I. and II.). Crown 8vo, 5s. net each.

"An African Jungle Book."—Standard.

JOCK OF THE BUSHVELD

The Story of a Dog and his Master.

By SIR PERCY FITZPATRICK.

With numerous Illustrations by E. CALDWELL.

Large Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

"The best book of African hunting stories since Selous . . . The book is splendidly illustrated."—Star.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

THE DIARY OF MASTER WILLIAM SILENCE

A STUDY OF SHAKESPEARE AND OF ELIZABETHAN SPORT.

By the RIGHT HON. D. H. MADDEN, M.A., HON. LL.D.

Vice-Chancellor of the University of Dublin.

With additions to the Notes, and a Preface containing observations on the Study of the Personality of Shakespeare, as revealed by his writings. Crown 8vo, 6s. 6d. net.

INNOCENT THE GREAT: an Essay on his Life and Times. By C. H. C. PIRIE-GORDON, B.A. With 4 Maps and 8 Genealogical Tables. 8vo, 9s. net.

WILD AND CULTIVATED COTTON

PLANTS OF THE WORLD: a Revision of the Genus Gossypium, framed primarily with the object of aiding Planters and Investigators who may contemplate the Systematic improvement of the Cotton Staple. By SIR GEORGE WATT, C.I.E. With 53 Plates, 10 of which are coloured. Royal 8vo, 30s. net.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED AND ENLARGED.

AN INQUIRY INTO SOCIALISM. By THOMAS KIRKUP. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

SECOND EDITION.

BRITISH INDUSTRIES: A Series of General Reviews for Business Men and Students. By Various Authors. Edited by W. J. ASHLEY, Professor of Commerce in the University of Birmingham. Crown 8vo, 5s. 6d. net.

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION.

NEOLITHIC DEW-PONDS AND CATTLEWAYS. By ARTHUR JOHN HUBBARD, M.D., and GEORGE HUBBARD, F.S.A., F.R.I.B.A. With 29 Illustrations from Photographs. Post 4to, 4s. 6d. net.

LITURGICAL STUDIES. By the Very Rev. VERNON STALEY, Provost of the Cathedral Church of St. Andrew, Inverness. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

CONTENTS.—National Ceremonies consistent with Catholic Principles—Notes on the Kalendar of the English Church—The Origin of the Festival of the Magi—The Origin of Saints' Days—St. Enurchus: a Liturgical Problem—The Commemoration of King Charles the Martyr—The occurrence of Festivals and Holy Days—The Lent Fast: Its Origin and Development—Te Deum and Benedicite, and Alternative Canticles—A Liturgical Perplexity—The Occasional Prayers—On Certain Eucharistic "Amens"—Prayer Book Revision—The Posture of the Minister during the Reading of the Collects—Index.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF ELIZABETH M. SEWELL, Author of "Amy Herbert, &c. With Portrait. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., 39, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

The Week in the City.

THOSE who were prophesying a week or two ago that this autumn would after all pass by without any severe monetary drain, are already changing their minds. I have never thought myself that the banking difficulties caused by undue inflation of credit in so many parts of the world (notably in Egypt, the United States, Canada, and Germany) could be so easily smoothed away. The latest addition to the Finance Hospital is Hungary, where there has been an epidemic of failures. A strong impression was caused in the City by the decrease of nearly $2\frac{1}{2}$ millions in the Bank Reserve, shown by Thursday's return, and rates for three months' bills promptly hardened to about 4 1-16. Some shrewd observers say that, in spite of the temporary excess of money in the short loan market, the discount rate is likely to be maintained by mere anxiety, especially if money continues to flow out of this country to Egypt and the Continent. Curiously enough, the hardening of the discount rates has not injured the Consol Market, which indeed has shown a welcome and unexpected strength. The revenue returns for the half-year are remarkably favourable, and point to a much bigger surplus than Mr. Asquith had estimated for.

TURKISH EMBARRASMENTS.

The state of Turkey may well alarm the financiers of Europe. It should be a warning to them not to go on lending money to the Sultan to be frittered away in his utterly incompetent and generally corrupt departments. Reuter's telegram about the old bridge between Stamboul and Pera throws a lurid light upon the bankrupt condition of Turkey. The flower of the Anatolian peasantry (the backbone of Turkey) are being drafted off to die miserably in the Yemen or in Macedonia. And in both places war expenditure has been causing huge deficits. Add to this a failure of the harvest, and it is hard to see how the poor can keep themselves alive.

THE CANADIAN PANIC.

The warnings I have given over and over again to investors to beware of high-priced insecurity in connection with popular Canadian railways and land companies has been fully justified of late, and during the last week there have been a series of breaks and rebounds which shows how thin the ice is in certain places. There is no doubt, of course, about the wonderful progress Canada has been making; but finance has attempted to discount that progress much too heavily, especially in the direction of land speculation. Everyone in Canada who possessed the gambling instinct and an empty purse seems to have bought land to resell upon the "pay by instalment" system, and to have borrowed the money from a bank. For a time, of course, all went well, and lots of fortunes were made; but now the reverse process is beginning. In this column we were alone in pointing out that Lord Strathcona's rose-coloured speech at the meeting of the Hudson's Bay Company afforded no real ground for anticipating a rise in the price of the shares, but rather the contrary. We drew attention to the telegram about land sales, and laid emphasis upon other unfavourable features which lurked within an exterior of unexampled prosperity. We suggested that prices of land might be "firm" as reported if the company chose to restrict its sales. But firmness so obtained is, of course, only another name for weakness, or reduction in demand. We are now informed that "the sales of farm lands and town lots by the Hudson's Bay Company for the six months ended 30th ultimo amounted, approximately, to £54,000, payable over a term of years, and cash receipts to £127,000, as compared with sales for £218,600 and cash receipts for £147,600 for the corresponding six months of 1906." The figures are eloquent enough. The shrinkage of sales to a quarter what they were in the corresponding six months of last year is a fact that easily turns the scale against all the rhetoric that has been talked by the Canadian company promoters.

THE IRON TRADE.

A well-informed writer in Pittsburgh has been attacking the Wall Street theory that a very severe break in iron prices will have to follow the collapse in copper. It is not denied, he says, that pig iron is likely to decline somewhat further, and $19 per ton is figured as a possible basis within the next few weeks, as against $21.50 to-day, and a high price for the year of $23.25 for large lots and $24 for a few car-lot shipments. It is also true that demand for the metal is quite as dull as at any time during the past two months. But on the other hand, available supplies of pig iron are comparatively trivial, and stocks are not accumulating. While production of copper is being curtailed as much as 60 per cent., pig iron output for August was only 43,600 tons below the May record, and the September production will not fall seriously below August.

While copper was advancing from 15 to 26 cents per pound in about sixteen months, beginning in 1905, iron rose only from $15.50 in July, 1905, to $23.25 for large and $24 for small lots, by the beginning of 1907. Billets sold at $22 per ton in the middle of 1905, and were forced as high as $30.50, but this was wholly due to the urgency of demand and the scarcity of the product. Shapes and plates were raised from a basic price of $1.60 to $1.70 per 100 pounds in 1905, and have since remained there, while Bessemer rails have been steadily quoted at $28 for about six years. Tin plate, which was $3.30 per 100 pounds, was advanced to $3.90, and sheets from $2.30 to $2.60, their present quotations, and wire nails, which were $1.75 in 1905, are now $2.05, having been marked up five cents per keg in the middle of last month.

LUCELLUM.

Shorter Notice.

THE SHADOW OF THE THRONE.*

THE Marquis of Ruvigny, in his third and latest volume, continues the heroic task upon which he has been actively engaged already for some years. He is making good progress in tracing out all the living blood descendants of the Sovereigns of this country. The issue of King Edward IV., and of his brother George, Duke of Clarence, has been enumerated in the previous volumes, the present one being devoted to the lines which spring from their sister Anne, Duchess of Exeter.

Already no fewer than 128,031 separate lines of descent have been worked out and systematically recorded; but as some of those who are included derive in many ways, the actual number of living descendants so far included in the Roll is only some 30 to 35,000. The author points out in his preface that now for the first time in the four centuries since the death of the Duchess of Exeter her blood is united with that of her brother King Edward IV. in the persons of the Princesses Alexandra and Maud, their mother, the Princess Royal, being descended from King Edward IV., whilst the Duchess Anne is ancestress of the Duke of Fife.

Books of Royal Descents have in the past been held rather cheaply, because only the isolated descents of those who paid for insertion were given in such pages, and some of these none too accurately; but the Marquis of Ruvigny has included every person whose descent it has been possible to trace out, and we trust his enthusiasm has met with its reward. One wonders how he has managed to retain the thread of research when dealing with the many families whose status does not secure for their pedigrees a place in the ordinary genealogical works of reference. In a large number of cases—for he touches the trading, shopkeeping, and even the labouring classes—his work must have been entirely original research. Did the Plantagenets, when they fought their bloody battles in the Wars of the Roses, ever contemplate a time when every well-born family in the Kingdom could claim kinship with the Royal Blood? or did any mediæval genealogist ever contemplate a book in which the names of those of Kingly descent would all some day be gathered together? Pedigree is but sentiment after all, but sentiment is worth cultivating when it links the present generation in ties of blood to those who made the History of the Realm.

It is good that this work of research should be done, and to the point he has reached, the author has done that work well.

* "The Plantagenet Roll of the Blood Royal." The Exeter Volume. By the Marquis of Ruvigny. T. C. and E. C. Jack. £3 3s.

Ah, fill the Pipe:—what boots it to repeat
How Time is flying underneath our Feet:
Unborn To-morrow and dead Yesterday,
Why fret about them if to-day be sweet!

Omar-Khayyám (modernised).

A Pipe of

PLAYER'S NAVY MIXTURE

makes

Yesterday a pleasant memory,
To-day a time of sweet enjoyment,
and its anticipation
Tomorrow brings peace of mind and contentment.

SOLD IN TWO STRENGTHS:

MILD, 5d.
per oz.

MEDIUM, 4½d.
per oz.

JOHN PLAYER & SONS, Nottingham, will forward Testing Samples post free to applicants mentioning this paper.

0443

A genuine high-class beverage of absolute purity, having the greatest strength and the finest flavour.
Made under ideal conditions of labour in an English
Factory, amidst pure and healthful surroundings, where the health and well-being of the workers receive the constant care of the firm.

BORD'S PIANOS

Illustrated
Lists of the
"BORD"

Pianos will be sent free, showing prices and rates
of hire of the various Models, on the THREE YEARS' SYSTEM, from 15s. per month. Second-hand, from 10s. 6d. per month.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

The "BECHSTEIN" Pianos may also be had on the same system, at advantageous prices and terms.

LIBERAL DISCOUNT FOR CASH.

CHAS. STILES & CO.,

74 and 76, Southampton Row, London, W.C.
PIANOS EXCHANGED.

ONE & ALL BULBS

The Brand Guarantees
One & All Quality.

ONE & ALL COLLECTIONS OF FLOWERING BULBS AND ROOTS.

Producing a most effective Display.

ESTABLISHED 1887.

ONE & ALL COLLECTION OF BULBS.

No. 1. For the Open Ground. Price 15/- 25 Anemones, finest mixed; 200 Crocus, in four colours; 13 Daffodils, double; 25 Daffodils, single; 24 Tulips, double, finest mixed; 24 Tulips, single; 24 Hyacinths, in three colours; 25 Iris, finest mixed; 25 Jonquils, Major; 25 Narcissus, Pheasant's Eye; 12 Narcissus, Polyanthus, mixed; 12 Narcissus, double white; 24 Ranunculus, finest mixed; 100 Snowdrops, selected; 25 Winter Aconites; 50 Scillas, 12 Allium Neapolitanum.

No. 2. For the Open Ground. Price 7/6. 12 Anemones, finest mixed; 150 Crocus, in four colours; 25 Tulips, double finest, mixed; 25 Tulips, single; 12 Hyacinths, in three colours; 12 Iris, finest mixed; 6 Daffodils, double; 12 Daffodils, single; 12 Narcissus, Pheasant's Eye; 12 Narcissus, double white; 60 Snowdrops, selected; 25 Winter Aconites; 12 Jonquils, single Major; 25 Scillas.

No. 3. For the Open Ground. Price 4/- 25 Snowdrops, selected; 100 Crocus, choice mixed; 25 Tulips, finest mixed; 12 Daffodils, double; 12 Narcissus, finest mixed; 12 Scillas; 12 Iris, finest mixed; 6 Hyacinths, choice mixed.

No. 4. For the Open Ground. Price 2/6. 12 Snowdrops, selected; 50 Crocus, choice mixed; 12 Tulips, finest mixed; 6 Daffodils, double; 6 Narcissus, finest mixed; 6 Scillas; 6 Iris, finest mixed; 3 Hyacinths, choice mixed.

No. 5. For Conservatory and Room Decoration. Price 16/- 24 Hyacinths, choice named; 12 Jonquils, double, sweet scented; 6 Polyanthus, Narcissus; 24 Tulips, named varieties; 100 Crocus, choice named varieties; 6 Early White Roman Hyacinths; 3 Lilium Harrisii; 12 Freesias; 24 Scilla Siberica; 50 Double Snowdrops.

No. 6. For Conservatory and Room Decoration. Price 8/- 12 Hyacinths, choice named; 12 Jonquils, double, sweet scented; 6 Polyanthus, Narcissus; 2 Lilium Harrisii; 18 Tulips, named varieties; 50 Crocus, choice named varieties; 12 Scilla Siberica; 6 Freesias; 25 Snowdrops; 3 Early White Roman Hyacinths.

No. 7. Popular Collection for the Open Ground. Price 1/- Containing 30 or more Bulbs of the following popular kinds—Snowdrops, selected; Crocus, choice mixed; Tulips, finest mixed; Daffodils, double; Narcissus, finest mixed; Scillas; Iris, finest mixed; Hyacinth, choice.

ONE & ALL is the registered Trade Mark of the AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL ASSOCIATION, Ltd. Name and address of nearest local agent, Catalogues and other details post free on application to Edward Owen Greening, Managing Director, Wholesale Seed Warehouses, 92, Long Acre, W.C.

ONE & ALL BULBS

Suction Gas Power.

80% REDUCTION

OF YOUR

GAS ENGINE

GAS BILL.

TANGYES Ltd., Birmingham.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout,
Bathrooms on every Floor,Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors, Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,CATALOGUES POST FREE.

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.,

Have the Largest Selection of Bibles,
Prayer Books, and Church Services.
Publishers of "The Marked Bible."CASH DISCOUNT.
30. IN 1s.

"Lectern Lesson Book," "Priest's Pocket Bible," "Daily Service Book," &c.

Thousands of Bibles, etc., at HALF-PRICE!*A. LIONEL ISAACS, 5, Pall Mall, S.W.
(CARLTON HOTEL BUILDING).Choice Books.
Rare Autographs and MSS.
Pictures and Prints.

CATALOGUES ISSUED.

TELEPHONE: 1784 CENTRAL.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold
and Exchanged.THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.
(And at READING.)

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.THE NEW AGE:An Independent Socialist Review of Politics, Literature and Art.*

Edited by A. R. ORAGE and HOLBROOK JACKSON.

EVERY THURSDAY: ONE PENNY.

Write for Specimen Copy to MANAGER, 1 & 2, TOOK COURT, E.C.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc.
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; ModerateSILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.*BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.BRIGHTON.*THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.BUXTON.*ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.CHINGFORD, ESSEX.*ROYAL FOREST HOTEL. Mr. John Brill.DARTMOOR-YELVERTON.*THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.DEAL*BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.EASTBOURNE.*CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.EXETER.*DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.GREAT YELDHAM-ESSEX.*THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.HENLEY-ON-THAMES.*RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.ILFRAOOMBE.*COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.LEEDS.*HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.LLANELLY.*CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.MALDON.*TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill. C. Simons, Manager.MALVERN.*HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.MANCHESTER.*THE PRINCES CAFE. Oxford Street.THE DEANS GATE HOTEL. Deansgate.MATLOCK.*SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).OXFORD.*BOARS HILL HYDRO. Bracing, dry, sunny. Tennis, &c. Garage.PENTRE.*PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.PLYMOUTH.*GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.PORTSMOUTH.*SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.SOUTHSEA.STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.SWANAGE."CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.TEIGNMOUTH.*REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.WHITBY.*WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.*WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell, Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

COUNTY OF LONDON.

The London County Council invites applications for the under-mentioned posts:—

1. ASSISTANT MASTER at the L.C.C. Camden Secondary School for Boys to teach Mathematics and Physics.
2. LECTURER IN BOTANY AND ZOOLOGY at L.C.C. Paddington Technical Institute, including the secondary school.

The candidate appointed to the latter post will be required to give about half his time to teaching in the secondary school and about half to evening and Saturday morning classes in the Institute. The total teaching hours will not exceed 25 a week.

The commencing salary in each case will be £150 a year, rising by annual increments of £10 to £300 a year.

A commencing salary higher than that stated above will be allowed to those candidates with satisfactory experience.

Applications should be made on Form T. S. 56, to be obtained, together with particulars of the appointment, from the Clerk of the Council, Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C., to whom they must be returned, not later than 11 a.m., on 24th October, 1907, accompanied by copies of three testimonials of recent date.

Candidates applying through the post for the form of application should enclose a stamped and addressed envelope.

Canvassing, either directly or indirectly, will be held to be a disqualification for employment.

Full particulars of the salary attaching to the above-mentioned appointments will be published on 7th October, 1907, in the "London County Council Gazette," which can be obtained from the Council's Publishers, Messrs. P. S. King and Son, 2 and 4, Great Smith Street, Westminster, S.W. Price (including postage) 1½d. an issue, or, for the year, a prepaid subscription of 6s. 6d.

G. L. GOMME,
Clerk of the London County Council.

Education Offices,
Victoria Embankment, W.C.
1st October, 1907.

CHRIST'S COLLEGE, BLACKHEATH, S.E.

Principal: F. W. AVELING, M.A., B.Sc.

Home Comforts. Practical Science Teaching. Public School Training.
Five Laboratories. Large Gymnasium.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.
BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

AUTUMN TERM OPENED ON SEPTEMBER 19TH.

For full particulars of Scholarships, and for copies of the School Prospectus, apply to the Head Master.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS AT END OF EVERY TERM.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.
Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

EDUCATIONAL.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, READING.

Principal: W. M. CHILDS, M.A.

An Illustrated Prospectus giving full particulars of the Courses of Study in Letters and Science, Agriculture and Horticulture, Fine Art, Music and Commerce may be obtained post free on application to the Registrar.

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

Boys from this PUBLIC SCHOOL have done well at the Universities.

The School stands in its own grounds of about 45 acres, high above the town and the Thames Valley.

For Honours List, Prospectus, particulars of Scholarships, and other information, apply to the Headmaster, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School.

HASLEMERE, SURREY.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS. Sandy soil; nine acres of ground; nearly 600 ft. above sea level.

Principals: Miss AMY KEMP, Camb. Certif. for Theory and Practice of Teaching (St. George's Training College, Edinburgh); Diploma for the Teaching of German (Berlin); and Miss HELEN T. NEILD, M.A. (Viet.), Classical Tripos (Camb.). Certificated Student of Girton College; 11 years at the Mount School, York.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD

MISCELLANEOUS.

CURIO HUNTING FOR PROFIT.—Private persons desirous of disposing of Antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the London Opinion Curio Club, 107, Regent Street, London, W. All those interested in Antiques and Curios are invited to call or write to the Secretary, 107, Regent Street, for prospectus and terms of membership.

CONCERTS.

LEEDS MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

OCTOBER 9th, 10th, 11th & 12th, 1907.

FIRST SEAT TICKETS FOR ALL CONCERTS.

SECOND SEAT TICKETS FOR SATURDAY NIGHT ONLY.

Full Programmes and information (free) on application.

Festival Office, Leeds.

FRED. R. SPARK, Hon. Sec.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION, INCLUDING POSTAGE,

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

Telephone No: Gerrard 4035.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.	Narrow Column. ¼ PAGE
Back Page, or Page facing matter ... }	£10 0 0	£5 10 0	£3 0 0	£3 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 10 0	2 10 0	3 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:

13 Insertions ...	8d. per line.
52 ,, ...	6d. ,,

EVERETT & CO.'s NEW NOVELS.

Recently Published.

THE CHATEAU OF MYSTERY.

By L. T. MEADE.

BLINDMAN'S BUFF.

By ALICE MAUD MEADOWS.

THE PURPLE FERN.

By FERGUS HUME.

THE ETERNAL DAWN.

By DAVID CHRISTIE MURRAY and EGMONT HAKE.

IN HONOUR'S NAME.

By A. KUPRIN.

Translated by W. F. HARVEY, M.A.

THE SHADOW OF EVIL.

By DICK DONOVAN.

THE JUDGE.

By ELIA W. PEATTIE.

THE SWORD OF PEACE.

By ALICE and CLAUDE ASKEW.

In the Press.

THE DEVIL AND DOLORES.

By ARTHUR APPLIN.

THE SIN OF PREACHING JIM.

By DICK DONOVAN.

THE SECRET DOOR.

By DEREK VANE.

THE HEAVENLY HAND.

By DAVID CHRISTIE MURRAY and EGMONT HAKE.

THE CURSE OF THE FULTONS.

By WALTER GROGAN.

THE PLAINS OF ALU.

By DOROTHY SUMMERS.

EZRA THE MORMON.

By WINIFRED GRAHAM.

THE MIKADO JEWEL.

By FERGUS HUME.

LONDON: EVERETT & CO., 42, ESSEX STREET, W.C.

DIGBY, LONG & Co.'s New & Forthcoming Books.

AUSTRALIAN SPORTING SKETCHES.

By G. A. Henty.

Times says:—"The Sketches are lively and graphic."

SKETCHES OF LIFE IN MOROCCO.

By K. Mansel Pleydell

Evening Standard:—"A vivid volume in which a rather intimately personal narrative adds to the picturesque realism of a spirited travel book."

THE PIROUETTE, and other Stories.

Second Edition, with portrait of the Author.

Spectator says:—"Decidedly original and worth reading."

HIS NEIGHBOUR'S LANDMARK. By "Alien."

Morning Post:—"A story that captivates and enthalls us."

BEATEN AT THE POST. By Burford Delannoy.

"This story is quite up to this gifted author's best style . . . Once begun it is impossible to lay it aside till the end is reached. All readers should hasten to add this book to their reading list." The Road.

LEAVES FROM THE LOG OF A SAILOR.

By W. Gordon Stables, R.N.

Daily Graphic:—"Dr. Gordon Stables preserves an enviable freshness in everything he writes. His 'Leaves from the Log of a Sailor' is brimming over with his rollicking spirits."

HIS SILENCE. By Iza Duffus Hardy.

Athenaeum says:—"The scene of this novel is laid in Florida, and the descriptions of life on the orange plantations in that country are vivid and picturesque."

THE CANKER. By James Blyth. Second Edition.

Daily Telegraph says:—"Mr. Blyth gives with genuine success an unvarnished, realistic picture of rustic life in a country village."

NELLA OF PRETORIA. By Mrs. Bowden.

Scotsman:—"Mrs. Bowden's heroine is of Anglo-Dutch descent, and unites the best qualities of both races. . . Here are lifelike descriptions of farm life in the Transvaal."

THE GARDEN OF EDEN. By Alice M. Diehl. Author of "The True Story of my Life," "A Man in Love," &c., &c.

THE LOVE OF SUSAN GARDIGAN.

By L. T. Meade. Author of "Stories from the Diary of a Doctor," "Bess of Delany's," &c., &c.

CASTLE MYSTERIOUS. By Alice Maud Meadows.

Author of "I Charge You Both," "When the Heart is Young," "Cut by Society," &c., &c.

THE CHANGELINGS. By Edgar Swan. Author of "A Fair Widow," "A Girl from Bohemia," &c.

THE SEALED MESSAGE. By Fergus Hume. Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab," &c., &c.

DR. SMITH OF QUEEN ANNE STREET, and other Stories. By Arabella Kenealy. Author of "Dr. Janet of Harley Street," "His Eligible Grace the Duke."

THE IRREVOCABLE, and other Stories.

By James Blyth. Author of "Juicy Joe," "The Canker," &c.

THE SILVER KING'S VENGEANCE. By Henry Herman. Author of "The Sword of Fate," &c., &c.

THE GOAL. By May Wynne. Author of "The King's Tragedy," "When Terror Ruled," &c., &c.

THE LUCKIEST GIRL IN YORKSHIRE. By Florence Marryat. Author of "The Beautiful Soul," "In the Name of Liberty," &c.

DOLLAR CITY. By Lucas Cleeve. Author of "The Dreamer," "The Confessions of a Climber," "Nathan Todd."

THE PRICE OF HIS SECRET. By T. W. Speight. Author of "The Mysteries of Heron Dyke," "The O'Hara Diamonds," &c.

THE QUEST OF THE CROOKED. By H. Maxwell. Author of "The Secretary of State," "The Marriage of Eileen," "In Slippery Places," &c., &c.

AN EVIL ANGEL. By Jean Middlemass. Author of "A Girl in a Thousand," "A Woman's Calvary," &c., &c.

LONDON:

DIGBY, LONG & CO.,
18, Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

The Nation

Vol. II., No. 2.]

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1907.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., ½d, Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	33	"Casa Blanca: The French Case." By R. B. Cunningham-Graham and Lieut.-Col. D. Scot Skirving ...	48
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		"The Cant of Militarism," By Anti-Militarist ...	48
The Government's Problem ...	36	The Kirkdale Contest. By William J. Downie ...	49
Socialism in Liberalism ...	37	"Arbitration v. Trial by Jury." By Montagu Ryland and "Verb. Sap." ...	50
The American Armada ...	38	Overstrain in the Services. By Arnold White ...	50
The Proletariat and War ...	39	THE WORLD OF BOOKS ...	52
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		Books to be Read ...	52
The Dragon Man. By John Maselfeld ...	41	REVIEWS:—
University Reform ...	42	Greek Religion. By the Rev. Principal A. M. Fairbairn, D.D. ...	53
The Autumn Song of the Robin ...	43	Painter, Poet, and Socialist ...	54
The Tent Folk ...	44	Napoleonic Scraps ...	56
DRAMA:—		The Outlook for Small Holdings ...	58
A Censured Play... ..	45	British Writers on Classic Lands ...	58
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—		The Novel of the Week ...	60
German Socialism and the Colonial Question. By Ed. Bernstein ...	46	Books in Brief ...	62
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—		THE WEEK IN THE CITY ...	64
"Tyrants of the Road." By Thomas Ogilvy and "Civis Universitatis Edinensis" ...	47

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

LAST Saturday, at Edinburgh, the Prime Minister opened the autumn political campaign, at a large meeting convened by the Scottish Liberal Association. After a brief but spirited summary of the legislative and administrative work done by the Government during the last two Sessions, Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman made a full presentation of the views and intentions of the Government in grappling with the land question and the House of Lords. Appealing to a Scottish audience, he reminded them of "a Session of legislative wreck, months of inquiry and labour thrown away," the destruction of the two great Scottish Land Bills by the Lords. He next set forth the general case for a policy of small holdings, as a remedy for the denudation of rural population, quoting striking instances of its success in Wales and in some Scottish counties, and exposed the mischief of the Lords' alterations confining the limits of the Bill and imposing on it the principles of the English measure. "On what grounds," he asked, "are we to be forbidden or discouraged from applying the principles of compulsory hiring and fair rents, and fixing of tenure to Scotland?" Then, turning to the wider aspect of the land issue, he quoted Lord Lansdowne's speech in the Lords, claiming for landowners "above all things, the right to select the persons to be associated with the proprietor in the cultivation of the soil," and vigorously exposed the social and economic implications of this doctrine. His strongest denunciation was reserved for the treatment accorded to the Land Values Bill, whose rejection he described as "a piece of arrogance and high-handedness which went to the extreme point of the pretensions of the House of Lords."

* * *

THE latter half of the speech was a very careful restatement of the Government's plan for dealing with the House of Lords in accordance with the Resolution of last Session. The ultimate power of legislation must be secured for the House of Commons, which, under a Parliament curtailed in duration to five years, and subject to the criticism and suggestion left to the House of Lords, will not be liable to any grave abuse of power. The most significant passage refers to the tactics of the Government in the coming Sessions. "It is our intention, early next Session, to send both the Small Landholders Bill and the Land Values Bill back again to the House of Lords. It may be desirable to hold a conference, as proposed in the plan. I do not know. Certainly the House of Commons will not be asked to devote much of its time to these measures. The House has already passed them by enormous majorities. They will be reintroduced and passed pro forma, whatever the issue may be so far as the other Bills which may be rejected are concerned. Of course, the grand issue must ultimately go to the country. It is quite possible—indeed, I think, highly probable—that before that comes, the Lords will have an opportunity of discussing the Bill giving effect to our Resolution, and that Bill, I venture to predict, will be passed by the House of Commons by majorities as large as the majority for the Resolution this summer."

* * *

THE railroad trouble will soon enter a new stage of intensity if the Central News is correctly informed in attributing to the Railway Companies' Association the intention of uttering an early declaration of absolute refusal to confer or to consider further the question of recognition of the Amalgamated Society. The five societies of railway men which met in conference at Manchester last Sunday showed a strong disposition to adopt the proposed federation of all labour forces on the railroads, though the absence of representatives of the Amalgamated Society caused a postponement of such action. The growing support of the general labour movement in the country is indicated this week by the announcement that the General Federation of Trades, the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress, and the Labour Representation Committee are conferring with a view to joint action should the matter come to a strike. Meanwhile, the annual congress of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, held at Middlesbrough, shows an absolutely solid support to the policy of Mr. Bell on the part of the 100,000 members of the Union. Analysing the figures of the trade, Mr. Bell showed that his Union was a stronger factor in the railroad world than the proportion of its membership to the aggregate of railway workers would seem to indicate.

* * *

MEANWHILE, the Government, in the shape of the Board of Trade, seems disposed to intervene in the quarrel as the protector of the public interests. This was clearly intimated by Mr. Lloyd George in an interview with the "South Wales Daily News" on Thursday. Questioned as to the powers of the Board of Trade under the Conciliation Act he said "You may depend upon it we will exhaust every power we possess to prevent such a catastrophe to the trade and industries of the country as would be involved in a great strike." Although nothing was said in answer to the appeal made in some quarters for a special Session of Parliament to be summoned to deal with the railway trouble, Mr. George stated that he was "in constant communication with the head of the Government in every aspect of the crisis."

* * *

AN important conference of persons interested in the working of the Small Holdings and Allotments Act of last session was held on Thursday at Leamington. It is intended that a series of like conferences should be held in various parts of the country, in order to explain the provisions of the Act, and to make known to the people the best methods of securing its application. In 1894, a similar course was taken in the case of the Parish Councils Act, and the two men then most prominent in the work were on Thursday once more to the fore—Mr. Arthur Acland and Mr. Corrie Grant. To a meeting gathered from all parts of Warwickshire and the adjoining counties, Mr. Acland addressed a spirited appeal, Mr. Grant following with a careful and accurate summary of the provisions of the new Act. The large number of questions put by members of the conference indicated the deep interest felt in the work. The impression conveyed by the meeting is that a widespread and genuine demand for land exists, at any rate in the Midland counties here represented. But it is recognised that no demand can become fully effective unless a serious campaign of education is carried on among the villages of the country.

* * *

THE "Times" occupies a position on the Continent somewhat different from its position here. It is always regarded as a sort of formal, almost official, representative of the influential classes of our nation. Such a power is obviously capable of grave abuse, and the leading article, headed "The German Emperor's Visit," in last Thursday's issue, affords a most conspicuous example. On the eve of the imperial visit, the policy of Germany, and, in particular, the motives of its Chancellor, are subjected to an analysis in which studied insolence predominates. It is suggested that "The visit might even be contemplated and undertaken in order to lend colour to quite unfounded representations, which, in the supposed interests of German policy, it might be thought expedient to make and to support." The Chancellor, we are told, "has taken a great deal of trouble for some time past, to convey to the general public in this country that he is exceedingly anxious to establish cordial and intimate relations with us. We need not scrutinise too narrowly the reasons for this marked attitude upon his part." This scrutiny is then applied, and it is plainly intimated that the Anglo-French entente and the backward condition of the naval building programme in Germany are the basis of this present amicable policy. Having applied this provocative interpretation, the article formally hedges, by a not less insolent suggestion that the Chancellor is sincerely repentant for "the insults and the calumnies which he allowed to be hurled at us and our soldiers in the German Parliament without anything more than a formal and faint-hearted remonstrance on his part." For a parallel to such language it is necessary to go to the "New York Journal" and its congeners.

* * *

THE plenary sitting of the Hague Conference on Wednesday introduced no new business, but it gave the English delegates an opportunity of entering a formal protest against the regulations adopted with regard to floating and anchored mines at sea. They complained that "adequate account had not been taken of the rights of neutrals to protection, nor of humanitarian sentiments, which cannot be neglected." That is a moderate way of describing a convention which will expose neutral liners on great international highways to the risk of encountering floating mines sown at random in the hope of destroying the enemy's warships. Baron Marschall von Bieberstein replied somewhat hotly that Germany yields to no country in the world in humane feeling, but he argued that such questions should be left to the consciences of individual naval officers. The report on the rights and duties of neutrals evoked another, though somewhat less emphatic, protest from the British delegation.

THE "Temps" published on Tuesday a long and vehement letter from M. Lambert, the French Principal of the Cairo School of Law, who recently resigned his post as the result of a prolonged quarrel with Mr. Douglas Dunlop, the "adviser" of the Ministry of Education. It is the story of a lamentable failure on the part of an official who has set himself to anglicise the educational system of Egypt, at the expense alike of French influence and of native aspirations. Into M. Lambert's personal grievances we need not enter—we know only one side of the case. The effect, however, in irritating French opinion, which is justly proud of its intellectual influence in Egypt, has been unlucky. The chief interest of the letter lies in M. Lambert's statement that in the college over which he presided, Mr. Dunlop's educational policy had had the effect of winning the entire body of some 400 students, with the possible exception of about a dozen, to the doctrines of Mustapha Kamel Pasha. These students will be the lawyers and officials of the future, and they will start their career bitterly hostile to English influence. The fact is that Mr. Dunlop, by his prejudice against native teachers, his hostility to the idea of a national university, and his bitter opposition to instruction in the vernacular, has done even more than Denshawai to foster the nationalist movement.

* * *

THE Belgian Parliamentary Commission, which is sitting through the vacation to revise the old draft Bill for the government of any future Belgian colony, has finally disappointed the hopes of the reformers. The new draft is in some respects an improvement on the old, but on the main point it marks no advance, for it would leave the finances of the Congo Colony as completely in the hands of King Leopold as are those of the present Free State. An amendment providing that the Budget should be submitted to the Chamber was lost by nine votes against seven. The King's partisans, and notably the "Indépendance Belge," point out that while Belgium will have no real control, it will also have no legal responsibility for the finances of the Congo Colony. The idea is, of course, to play upon the fears of the middle classes, who dread a colonial deficit, in order to induce them to accept a system of absolutism. The reformers are not strong enough to annex on tolerable terms against the will of the King, but it is quite possible that they are strong enough to prevent annexation on such terms as these.

* * *

HERR VON TSCHIRSCHKY has been replaced as German Foreign Minister by Herr von Schön, the present Ambassador in St. Petersburg. There is no reason to suppose that any profound political motive underlies the change. The Foreign Minister is rather a great permanent official than a statesman who enjoys the right of personal initiative. Prince Bülow, himself a professional diplomatist only slightly interested in domestic questions, follows the Bismarckian precedent by retaining the real responsibility for foreign affairs in his own hands. The alleged reasons for Herr von Tschirschky's retirement are probably the real ones—his health is bad, and he is a poor speaker, whose appearances in the Reichstag had been unfortunate. Herr von Schön comes of a prominent National Liberal family, and that party seems disposed to welcome his promotion. His reputation is that of a popular ambassador, whose pleasure it was to achieve his successes by suavity and persuasiveness.

* * *

ON Thursday, an impressive general strike, organised by the Socialists, was observed throughout Hungary as a demonstration in favour of universal suffrage. For twenty-four hours the railways were idle, the factories were closed, newspapers did not appear, and even the cafés were shut. Even in the villages the strike appears to have been complete. In Buda-Pesth an orderly crowd of 60,000 workmen marched to the Parliament Square to demand the suffrage. These tactics are a repetition, on an even more imposing scale, of the demonstration which succeeded so well in Vienna, and they are intended to prove to the Magyar feudal clique how easy it would be to organise a really prolonged and determined strike on the model of the Russian achievement of October, 1905. The Crown, however, is less able to use its influence in Hungary than it was in Austria, and the Magyars have a power of resistance which none of the feeble Austrian parties could have boasted. The question is one both of race and of class. The present franchise excludes the working masses, and the bulk of the Non-Magyar races. Only 5 per cent of the population has the suffrage at present (the proportion in France is 27 per cent.); and the Non-Magyar races, who are about 54 per cent. of the population, return less than 10 per cent. of the members of the Diet. The Magyars will, no doubt, be forced to extend the suffrage, but it is unlikely that they will admit the Slavs and Roumanians, without imposing a linguistic and educational test in Magyar. A feudal oligarchy so ancient and so impervious to liberal ideas will not capitulate at the first popular summons.

* * *

LAST Monday's Press contained the announcement of the death of Lord Brampton, better known by his earlier title of Sir Henry Hawkins. In his long career at the bar (he died at the age of ninety), he took part in an unusual number and variety of causes célèbres, the most notorious being the Overend Gurney prosecutions in 1866, the Tichborne case, and the great will case of Sugden v. Lord St. Leonards. He leapt into wide fame during the Tichborne trials of 1871-1874, and since that time continued to enjoy an unusual amount of public attention, and a popularity due not exclusively to his legal eminence. He was for many years Standing Counsel to the Jockey Club, and, as the "Times" obituary notice expresses it, "his arrangement of circuit business was sometimes found to be consistent with attendance at the most popular race meetings." In the first Tichborne trial his leader was the late Lord Coleridge, the announcement of whose son's appointment to the Bench appears, by a curious coincidence, in the same issue of the Press which announced Lord Brampton's death. We congratulate the country upon this appointment of a second Lord Coleridge as one of the Justices of the High Court. The fine presence and the eloquent tongue of his father have come down to him, and the fearless and vigorous sense of justice which have ever inspired his career, both at the Bar and in politics, will secure the confidence of the people in his administration of the law of the land.

* * *

THE death of Professor David Masson on Sunday last at the ripe age of eighty-six, removes a distinguished man of letters and a scholar of great and versatile attainments. Born at Aberdeen in 1822, he spent some time as a divinity student at Edinburgh under Dr. Chalmers, after which he began his literary career by editing a local newspaper. He came to London in 1847, where he made the acquaintance of Carlyle, John Stuart Mill, Mazzini, Herbert Spencer, and other notable figures of the literary and political world. Succeeding Clough as Professor of English literature at University College in 1853, he was appointed editor of "Macmillan's Magazine" five years later. He held both these posts until 1865 when he returned to Edinburgh to fill the Chair of Rhetoric and English Literature, the duties of which he discharged until 1895. Among those who attended his lectures were Lord Herschell, Ian Maclaren, Mr. J. M. Barrie, Dr. Clifford and Dr. Spence Watson. Masson's great work was the monumental "Life of Milton in Connection with the History of his Time," the first volume of which appeared in 1859. It was severely criticised by

J. R. Lowell, and the style bears many traces of Carlyle's influence, but the work is a triumph of patient and laborious research. It will probably remain as one of the best accounts of the Puritan Revolution in the language. Masson was a voluminous writer. Besides the Milton he published lives of De Quincey, Chatterton, and Drummond of Hawthornden, as well as several volumes of literary criticism.

* * *

THE death of Mr. Carvell Williams at the age of 86 has removed a lifelong champion of the cause of religious equality. Appointed secretary of the Liberation Society in 1847, he held that post for thirty years, during which he helped to bring to a successful issue the struggle against University tests, compulsory Church rates, and the refusal of churchyards for Nonconformist burial services, and to secure the disestablishment of the Irish Church. He continued to do active service for the Society until a year ago, and sat in the Parliaments of 1885, 1892, and 1895, retiring in 1900, in which year he was elected chairman of the Congregational Union, an honour very rarely accorded to a layman. He will rank as one of the foremost political Nonconformists of the nineteenth century.

* * *

THE week has been full of interest for theatre-goers, who have had opportunities of seeing no less than four new plays, together with one of the best Shakespearian revivals of recent times. On Saturday "Sweet Kitty Bellairs," a comedy by Mr. David Belasco, was given at the Haymarket. In spite of its dramatic merits, it can hardly be considered a successful attempt to recapture the spirit of the eighteenth century, so happily rendered in the novel by Mr. and Mrs. Egerton Castle, on which the play was founded. The revival of "As You Like It" by Mr. Oscar Asche and Miss Lily Brayton on Monday was an artistic triumph and ought to be seen by all lovers of drama. On Tuesday "The Sugar Bowl," by Madeline Lucette Riley, was redeemed from failure by the splendid acting of Miss Ellis Jeffreys. At the Kingsway Theatre on Wednesday Mr. A. P. Wharton, a new writer, gave "Irene Wycherley," a work of distinct promise and individuality, which was also notable for the re-appearance of Miss Lena Ashwell, whose rendering of the heroine's part was marked by artistic finish and restraint. Mr. Alfred Sutro's new play "The Barrier," produced at the Comedy on Thursday was unfortunate in its cast, although it furnished Miss Marie Tempest with a part which enabled her once again to show her wonderful powers as a comedy actress. The play itself is a powerful though somewhat rhetorical treatment of an unpleasant theme.

* * *

THE "Lusitania" has, in her second outward voyage, succeeded in wresting the blue ribbon of the Atlantic from the "Deutschland," having accomplished the voyage from land to land in four days, eighteen hours, at an average speed of 24'38 knots per hour, as against the 23'01 speed on the maiden voyage. She has further established a record for a day's steaming, having covered 619 miles between noon on Tuesday and noon on Wednesday. The "Deutschland's" record for a day's run is 23½ knots, and her record from New York to Plymouth 5 days, 7 hours, 38 minutes. Allowing for the difference in distance between the voyage of the "Lusitania" and of the "Deutschland," the latter's record has been beaten by over three hours. The Cunarder now holds the world's record for the fastest voyage across the Atlantic, longest day's run, and highest average for a day.

With this issue of THE NATION we publish a Supplement containing a full List of Books appearing in the Publishers' Autumn Lists, grouped under subject headings.

Politics and Affairs.

THE GOVERNMENT'S PROBLEM.

THE Prime Minister's speech at Edinburgh is an excellent opening for the Liberal autumn campaign. In tone and temper nothing could be better. From the persistently graceful and friendly references to Lord Rosebery on the one hand to the exposure of the true spirit of landlordism as expressed by Lord Lansdowne on the other, the speech showed a notable combination of suavity in manner with strength in substance. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, moreover, has one supreme quality as a leader. He leads. He is not for ever holding back, nor eternally ingeminating caution. He is with the advanced guard of Liberalism, and in the van of his Party, and, unfortunately, ahead, by no mean interval, of his Cabinet. If the problem of the Lords were to be in his hands alone, we should have no doubt about the issue. What is needed is a bold and speedy frontal attack, and the Prime Minister with his grasp of essentials, his belief in Liberalism, his buoyant confidence in democracy, is the man to lead such an attack. It is only when we look at the actual scheme of the Government and hear it recommended for its Conservatism by such exponents of the German school as Mr. Haldane, that a cold doubt begins to creep over us, and we have to ask ourselves how far the Liberalism of the constituencies and of the Prime Minister will have its way with the Government.

It is hard saying, but in this case the interests of Liberalism as a whole, and those of Liberal representatives, do not coincide. We are not for a moment imputing motives of self-interest either to Ministers or Members of Parliament when we point out that men in their position have a very natural and human bias in favour of prolonging the life of the present Parliament. The Minister who finds himself for the first time in office, with Bills to prepare and administrative measures to execute and all the absorbing work of a Department to master, is apt to sink himself in his work and, without any selfish interest, to dread more than anything else in politics that event which would or might interrupt the schemes he has in hand. The private member immersed for the first time in the busy life of House and Lobby, of debate and committee, is impressed by the opportunities of public service opened to him, and is very deeply convinced of the value of the great instrument of progress, the present overwhelming Liberal majority in the House of Commons. Whether in the end this instrument is capable of achieving its ends is another question. All the private member knows is that he has come into Parliament on the crest of a great wave of popular feeling, and that by every known law of politics that wave is likely to recede in greater or less degree before another election comes. Re-election is, at best, an uncertainty, a struggle, and an expense. How much wiser to keep to the bird in the hand and pass the secondary measures which the Lords allow, rather than fight for the fundamental issues on which they are adamant. Hence Ministers and members contemplate almost with ecstasy the long list of measures achieved, and allow the frustrated Bills to accumulate, not without a sigh, but without taking the necessary steps to ensure that they shall pass.

To the Liberal who is not in Parliament the question wears a somewhat different aspect. He is less impressed with the value of the machine, and more disposed to be critical of results. He sympathises with good and Liberal administration. Indeed, if there were rather more Liberalism in some Departments he would not take it amiss. But the more he is asked to contemplate the magnificence of the present Liberal majority, the more he is inclined to insist that such a majority ought to do something decisive for the democratic cause. He is pleased with long lists of useful measures mostly of the secondary rank, but he has to recognise that with the exception of the Trade Disputes Act, and the partial exception of the English Land Legislation, few of these go straight to the heart of any of the great social issues. He sees the education question unsettled, the Irish question unsettled, the great problem of poverty virtually untouched. What is worse, he sees no prospect under existing constitutional conditions of solving them, and he fears that if this "unparalleled majority" is living its full Parliamentary life without finding any solution for these fundamental problems, no long list of less controversial achievements will avail it in the day of reckoning. The "cup" will indeed be full, but not the cup of the Lords. Liberalism will have lost credit, perhaps for a generation to come, as an instrument of social progress. Nor will it avail the Liberal leaders in that day to protest that they would have done this or that had the Lords allowed. The electors laugh all such excuses away. It has been known from the first that unless the Lords were fought and beaten no one of these problems could be satisfactorily handled. To decline the fight is, therefore, to abandon all real hope of a solution.

These considerations have, doubtless, been making their way slowly among the most timid and most conservative of the Government's supporters. The policy of "filling up the cup" which was freely advocated at the critical moment is now proclaimed to be impossible. It is no longer an avowed policy to go on accumulating defeated Bills until Parliament dies a natural death. Instead it would seem that we are to have tactics of procrastination which will serve equally well to keep this present Parliament in being. We confess that we do not fully understand the Government's plan as foreshadowed by the Prime Minister. We rather lose count of the number of conferences with the House of Lords, the numbers of passings and rejections which a Bill is to undergo before matters come to an actual decision. But what we would point out is that except for the purpose of prolonging the life of this present Parliament this machinery of repetition is useless. There are two intelligible lines of reform. One is frankly to make the House of Commons master, without further application to the country. The point gained by this method is speed, effectiveness and decision. The other way is to secure some sort of appeal from the House to the country on issues of critical importance. The object of this method is to avoid the domination of a single Chamber. The Government's plan has the full merits of neither method. It professedly makes the House of Commons master of the situation without need of appeal either to a direct popular vote or a fresh election by the constituencies. But as interpreted by the more dilatory wing of Liberals it entails delays nearly as long and controversies as involved as the appeal to a second Parliament would involve. We rejoice to find in Mr. Lloyd George's speech on Thursday at Cardiff signs of a firmer policy more in accordance with the expectations of the rank and file of country Radicalism. It is evident that Mr. George at any rate believes that the second rejection of the Scottish Bills involves an early dissolution, and that a fourth Session is wholly dependent on their acceptance. We hope this pronouncement signifies that the Government is resolved to face the next Session prepared to deal with this matter not as "Conservatives" but as Liberals and believers in self-government.

SOCIALISM IN LIBERALISM.

THE charge of Socialism brought against the Liberal and Progressive Party by their Conservative opponents is commonly resented as a merely tactical device to shift the strain of political controversy from the Tariff issue and to blacken an enemy with a vituperative epithet. An effective technical answer is afforded by an appeal to the party of avowed Socialism which still continues to designate Liberals here, as upon the Continent, a party of capitalists. But motives and technicalities apart, there is enough substance in the charge, as applied to the section of Liberals committed to advanced social reforms, to demand a fair examination. For the first time in the history of English Liberalism, leaders with a powerful support of the rank and file have committed themselves with zeal and even passionate conviction to promote a series of practical measures which, though not closely welded in their immediate purport, have the common result of increasing the powers and resources of the State for the improvement of the material and moral condition of the people. These measures, aiming to secure the use and the value of the land for the people, to obtain for municipalities and other public bodies increased ownership or control of local services, to strengthen governmental supervision of private industries, to enlarge the public machinery of education, to afford increased public assistance to the young, the sick, the aged—such measures and the policy of public finance which they involve are correctly designated as "socialistic" in their character.

It is true that each measure is urged upon its separate merits, that the pace of its advancement and the spirit of compromise which dogs its footsteps hide the logic of the revolutionary process even from many of its active agents. For revolutionary in one sense it is. Not that it involves any violent breach of continuity with Liberal traditions, still less any such sudden dangerous disturbance of public order or of property as is commonly associated with the term. But the general underlying meaning and motive of the social policy, struggling now for the first time into clear consciousness, is the intention to use the popular power of self-government to extirpate the roots of poverty and of the diseases, physical and moral, associated with it. This process of practical reform, if it is to be effective, assuredly demands an interference by Government with existing rights of private property and private business enterprise, and an assertion through taxation of public rights of property, so novel in character and so considerable in size as to be rightly considered revolutionary. The real revolution is in the minds of men. This Parliament contains some scores of men passionately moved by a sense of social wrong, of undeserved poverty and riches, of baneful waste in the resources of the commonwealth, and eager to apply large organic remedies. It is the strength of these men's faith and the size of the remedies they are willing to apply that distinguish their social policy from the tinkering devices of the earlier programmes of the Liberal Party. Experience has taught them the profound truth of John Mill's saying: "Small remedies for great diseases do not produce small results: they produce no results."

Will this policy of social reconstruction go forward? The last century has shown several epochs of ebullience of the reform spirit in our nation. The thirties and forties were seething with constructive Socialism of a swift, idealist order. The Christian Socialism of a generation later was the sentimental utterance of popular protest against the new miseries of city poverty. The Radical Party of the late seventies and early eighties gave in their programmes a dim fragmentary reflection of demands in which the new teaching of Henry George and of Continental Socialism found vigorous expression. But these movements achieved almost nothing; their fervour was soon spent, their forces dissipated. Will it be the same with our Parliamentary party of social reform and the popular enthusiasm which swept them to the fore? Have they the principles, the strength of conviction, and the grit of character demanded for the task of constructive Liberalism assigned to them? The answer to this question we think depends upon how clearly the larger body of the party can be led to realise the grave historic nature of their task. Let them plainly recognise the truth that this is the last chance for English Liberalism. Unless it is prepared for the efforts, risks, and even sacrifices of expressing the older Liberal principles in the new positive forms of economic liberty and equality along the lines indicated in the programme of its advanced guard, it is doomed to the same sort of impotence as has already befallen Liberalism in most of the Continental countries.

We believe that what we term the advanced guard is well aware of the historical crisis which confronts them, that they are willing to make the necessary effort and to undergo the necessary risks. But can they succeed in rallying round them the genuine support of the Liberal "centre" in Parliament and in the nation? This "centre" is, alike in sympathy and in formal policy, more advanced than it has ever been before. But upon the critical issues of social reform it lacks passion and principle, and is continually disposed to enervating compromise. In Parliament it consists largely of well-to-do men whose social policy is weakened by fears of high taxation and of encroachments upon private profitable enterprise; in the country this same large class, well but not vigorously disposed towards social reforms, stands halting in opinion, fearful of the Socialistic movement, not because of any definite individualism or abstract theory of the limits of the State, but because certain spectres and phrases have got upon their nerves. Holding, as most do, a difficult and slippery footing in some business or profession, they are nervous about attacks on property, disturbance of business, bureaucracy, corruption, mob domination. Though not opposed to social experiments, they are not prepared for efforts or for risks, and their genuine desire to see improved conditions for the people is invalidated by an excessive belief in the possibilities of narrow forms of self-help, a survival of the laissez faire Radicalism of the Victorian age.

Unless a sufficient proportion of these men can be won over, their objections met, their fears dissolved, their sense of justice stimulated, the Liberal Party as the historic instrument of social reform is doomed to failure. For a small band of "righteous men" will not save a party; they must carry with them the majority of solid Liberals in the centre if the reform policy is to be substantial. Let it be clearly understood this policy cannot consist in mere economy, in good administration at home, peace abroad, in minor legislation for education, temperance, or even land reform. The volume, the direction, the pace, and the substance of the positive measures for improving the economic condition of the people must be adequate, and these conditions involve a larger provision of public income than is yet foreshadowed in any Governmental proposals, a larger development of interference with existing landed and other economic interests than is yet admitted.

Whether a sufficient Liberal Party can be brought to face this task, with its risks and difficulties, depends upon the education of this "middle" section in the principles of social reconstruction. For their real difficulties are mainly of principle. Any Radical social policy must, of course, involve a shedding of Whigs, even of a few honest Radical individualists, and of some Liberals whose business interests too closely based on privilege will dominate their policy. It is with the large remainder, probably a majority of the Liberal Party, that we are concerned. The situation, as we understand it, is this: Their mind is at present impeded for effective co-operation in the great work of social reconstruction by certain doubts and fears and difficulties, which are real in the sense that they are honestly held, and are important in that they rest not on points of practical detail but on deep-seated notions respecting the meaning and effects of social reconstruction.

These doubts and fears relate, some to Socialism, some to democracy, and are due in large degree to the spirit and the forms which social democracy have taken in the programmes of the Socialist parties, on the Continent and here. Though Marx and the philosophers of Socialism have been little read in this country, certain characteristics of their criticism, its materialistic interpretation of history, its crude assertion of the rights and functions of "labour," its wholesale repudiation of the legitimacy of rent, interest and profit, and its doctrine of the absorption of all industry by the State, have become accepted formulae, and have naturally been adopted as the authoritative exposition of the movement. Though this hard-cast revolutionary Socialism has softened even on the Continent and never had much vogue in this country, the milder and more opportunist brands suffer from excessive vagueness. If the Radical policy of social reconstruction is to be effective in this country this lack of intelligible formulation of principles must be remedied. The real difficulties must be met; the right limits of State and municipal collectivism must be laid down; the questions, how far brains, how far "labour," are makers of wealth, how far freedom of private profitable enterprise is essential to secure the work of "brains," whether efficiency of labour can be got out of public enterprise, whether the tyranny of bureaucracy would become unendurable, whether the tendency of such Socialism will be to dwarf individuality and to make for a dead level of humanity, whether the general result of impaired productive motives will lead to so great a diminution of wealth as no improvement in distribution can compensate—these and other not less radical questions which beset the wavering mind of our "centre" Liberals demand thorough and impartial consideration. Then there is the group of not less serious questions relating to taxation, condensed in the charge that "Socialism" consists in taking away the property of the rich and giving it to the poor, a policy alleged to be unjust in itself and disastrous both to the receivers and the taxpayers. The timidity of the Liberal centre is based primarily upon fears engendered by these questions which imperatively demand intelligible answers, if the Liberal Party hopes to press forward with energy and confidence along the path of social reconstruction to which it is formally committed, and upon which its future existence as a party depends.

THE AMERICAN ARMADA.

THE speech of Mr. Roosevelt at St. Louis and the subsequent declaration of his Secretary of the Admiralty do not serve altogether to remove the disquietude of the public mind as to the movement of the American fleet from the Atlantic to the Pacific. To carry sixteen battleships and six destroyers containing some fifteen thousand men, victualled and coaled for a voyage of several months in the dead of winter, is a project of no ordinary difficulty, risk and expense, and to represent it as a mere "practice cruise" to test naval efficiency, and incidentally to provide California with a patriotic show, can hardly be expected to carry conviction. We need not question the complete sincerity of Mr. Taft's amicable assurances at Tokio, or of Mr. Roosevelt's confident prediction of the early return of what Americans love to term their "Armada" to Eastern waters. But the President is a shrewd enough politician to be well aware that, whatever may be the actual condition of diplomatic relations between his Government and that of Japan, the sensation-mongering Press would work up a war scare. To the provocative language indulged in by certain influential New York papers, not usually designated "yellow," we called attention last week. Since then the unfortunate and mischievous language employed by Admiral Evans, who is to command the fleet upon its voyage, has given some authoritative colour to the incendiary talk, though it must not be forgotten that American naval and military men express their private judgments upon matters of high politics with a recklessness unknown in any European service. What really disturbs the mind of sober persons is not a belief that Japan is preparing for a naval struggle with the United States, or that the American fleet is moving into Pacific waters for the express purpose of providing against this contingency, but the injurious influence which these repeated and aggravated suggestions may have upon the mind of the most excitable and sensation-loving people upon earth. Mr. Roosevelt must have known that there was just enough plausibility afforded to the scare by the recent squabble between California and Japan upon the immigration question to give a bellicose appearance to the naval movement. It was not as if the transfer of the fleet had been a settled or a long-cherished design which he saw no sufficient reason to abandon. It was after the settlement of the Californian schools question by the substitution of a more irritating issue, which still remains an open sore, that this naval project was determined. In a word, it seems quite evident that Mr. Roosevelt wittingly furnished the material for a "scare." Why did he do this? Only two intelligible answers can be given. The first is that he genuinely believed it necessary to make a display of naval force in those waters which in a moment of rhetorical exuberance he once designated "an American lake," in order to provide against the possibility or probability of an attack from the only quarter from which an attack could be made. He disclaims any such interpretation and there appears no sufficient reason to refuse acceptance of his disclaimer. The issue of Japanese immigration, though containing grave ultimate implications, is not at present of such a size or inflammable character as to furnish a reasonable fear of collision between the two great nations. If by no higher reason, Japan is deterred by financial considerations from entertaining any such mad and barren exploit as scare-mongers impute to her. Indeed, the likelihood of any serious breach between these Powers is further diminished by the recent trouble in British Columbia, which makes it evident that some common policy must be devised in which Great Britain also must participate, for the settlement of the larger question of Asiatic immigration along the whole Pacific coast of North America. While we cannot conceal our belief that this meeting of white and yellow races in America and Australia is destined to be the most formidable aspect of the greatest of our world problems, that of race blending, in the future, we do not believe that the issue, even as regards Japan, is yet ripe for immediate settlement either by pacific means or by recourse to force.

We are disposed to look to a simpler explanation of the willingness of Mr. Roosevelt and his Government to furnish a war scare which they know possesses no present substance. Ever since his brief but sensational career as Under-Secretary to the Admiralty before the Cuban war, the President has been an assiduous advocate of a big navy. Every time he opens his lips on a political platform he preaches this gospel. America is to be a great world-power, possessed of an amplitude of physical power to fulfil her majestic mission. The completion of the Panama Canal in a few years will launch her on this larger destiny, and timely preparation for this new epoch must be made. Mr. Roosevelt knows that while the possession of the biggest navy in the world would be extremely popular with the ordinary good American, the fiasco of the Philippines has damped down for the moment the rising ardour of Imperialism among all more sober citizens. The temporary denudation of the Atlantic defences by an act suggesting not too definitely the likelihood of coming trouble in the Pacific will furnish an excellent object lesson in the necessity of ship-building. There can be no question but that this tactic will be a valuable assistant in enabling Mr. Roosevelt to obtain the large appropriation he desires for laying down four new battleships, in addition to the seven already in course of construction. It is the simplest and easiest way of getting a Pacific fleet and of enlarging the total naval strength of the nation.

Finally, the incidental service rendered to the Government by a parade of bellicosity when a Presidential election is approaching must not be left out of account. This may be regarded as an orthodox piece of campaigning tactics. At one time it took the familiar form of "twisting the British lion's tail," and brandishing the Monroe doctrine. More than once the United States has run grave risks of war in the playing of what is, in fact, a domestic party game. Though the other considerations we have named are probably dominant in Mr. Roosevelt's mind and underlie his determination to persist in the moving of the fleet, the politicians with whom he consults are well aware of the advantage of creating or conniving at a foreign situation which shall possess at any rate so plausible a semblance of a crisis, as to enable them to quote the familiar proverb about not swapping horses while crossing a stream.

Bearing in mind these probabilities we are not disposed to put a very serious interpretation upon this naval incident.

THE PROLETARIAT AND WAR.

THE early months of this year saw Prince Bülow engaged in welding together the middle-class parties of Germany into a patriotic coalition against Socialism. The autumn finds M. Clemenceau busied in a somewhat similar task in France. Socialism, with the Moroccan conflict and the Russian Revolution darkening an outlook to which the second Hague Conference has brought no light, has realised its mission as an international party with a new seriousness. Resolved to combat war by every means in its power, it has at least achieved this success, that it has compelled the two Powers most likely to make war to divert their attention from their external struggle, and to concentrate it on the preliminary necessity of combating anti-militarism at home. M. Clemenceau leading the campaign in France makes a spectacle at which the ironical imps of history must laugh. Unveiling at Amiens a statue to M. Goblet, and rallying in eloquent phrases the whole patriotism of France against the anti-militarist peril, he has had to listen to a chorus which reminded him of his past. It was he who overthrew, not once but five successive times, ministries in which M. Goblet was the moving spirit. It was he, too, who concentrated in "l'Aurore" during the Dreyfus affair, the moral force of the anti-militarist movement, welcomed M. Urbain Gohier as a collaborator, and gave to the conceptions of "L'Armée contre la Nation" their widest currency. If it is the crime of the Socialists that they have shouted "Better an insurrection than a war," they can at least point out that the Third Republic owes its being to men who dared to found it by an open revolution, under the cannon of an invading enemy.

The present campaign against Socialism is something more than an insincere game of party tactics. It does answer to a genuine terror in the minds of most patriotic Frenchmen. Acutely aware of the peril across the frontier, their fear is lest a loftier conception of international ethics and a more developed realisation of the burdens of militarism should disarm them in the face of an enemy who admits none of their scruples. But to this motive other tendencies have powerfully contributed. A long series of unpopular strikes, quarrels over the right of association, and, above all, a middle-class revolt against certain social reforms, had prepared the way for the campaign against Socialism, long before its leaders found the pretext of patriotism. The Ministry, moreover, has visibly exhausted its programme, and by turning aside to combat M. Jaurès, it creates a diversion, placates the middle-classes, and relieves itself once for all of the pressure on its own Left flank.

Against this tactical coalition, M. Jaurès opposes a really fruitful idea. He preaches it with a rare eloquence; he stakes upon its fortunes a career which promised a few years ago to make him one of the most influential of European statesmen; behind him stands a party which will face obloquy and petty persecution with a measure of faith and self-sacrifice more common in the history of religions than in that of parties. It is an idea which must be sharply distinguished from M. Hervé's cruder propaganda. M. Hervé has denied all patriotism, repudiated the very idea of nationality, declared that to the proletariat every country is a stepmother, and drawn the logical conclusion that even a defensive war should be opposed as stoutly as a flagrant act of aggression. The Unified Party, with M. Jaurès at its head, has repeatedly rejected M. Hervé's teaching; its chief has consecrated all his eloquence to a defence of the ideas of nationality and patriotism, and proclaimed in phrases which carry a deep conviction, the duty of revolt against foreign domination, and of resistance to foreign invasion. In a defensive war, his powerful pen and his magnetic speech would do the work which Gambetta achieved in 1870. His "anti-militarism" consists in this, that he holds it to be the duty of a conscious working-class to render an aggressive war impossible, by compelling capitalist governments to resort to arbitration. The aggressor he would define as the country which refuses to submit its cause to an international court, and he would penalise that refusal by organising a general strike, or even an insurrection.

Outside the ranks of his own party, there have been few attempts to answer this thesis by argument. No Republican can deny the right of insurrection in certain circumstances. No Radical can dispute altogether the obligation, at least, to consider arbitration. The only possible answer to M. Jaurès is, indeed, to assert, in one form or another, the maxim "my country, right or wrong." Within the party two lines of criticism are developing. M. Guesde says of anti-militarism what he said of anti-clericalism, that it is a deviation from the proper task of Socialism, which is to combat capitalism by a direct challenge in the economic field. M. Brousse, on the other hand, on behalf of the Possibilists, has stated, with the approval of the "Temps," what is no doubt the answer of the average patriotic man in all parties, "When your mother quarrels with a neighbour," he argues, "if you think her in the wrong you rebuke her at home, but you do not allow her to be beaten in the street. . . . You settle your account with your own Government after the war, but in the first instance you defend the country to which you belong." The parallel is not exactly convincing. A good man will not allow his mother to be beaten in the street, but neither will he join her in setting fire to the house of an obnoxious neighbour. The threat of "settling accounts" with a Government after a war is not impressive, for every Government knows that punishment at home is the penalty rather for failure than for injustice. The French settled their accounts with Louis Napoleon; the Germans made Bismarck the first Chancellor of a triumphant Empire. So long as Governments can count on the indiscriminating loyalty of nations, however provocative their conduct of diplomacy may have been, the check of public opinion is bound to be ineffectual.

The measure of acceptance which the thesis of M. Jaurès commands is the measure of the sincerity of any nation in its professed desire to avoid injustice and provocation. No nation really conscious of the justice of its cause would shrink from arbitration or mediation, or the calling of an international conference. There is, no doubt, some risk of partiality in the mediator, but it is as nothing to the risk that might will prevail over right in a war.

The practical difficulties in the way of an application of M. Jaurès' tactics are on the other hand immense. It is rarely possible to discriminate accurately between aggression and defence, and the adroit aggressor is the statesman who forces his opponent to take the first fatal step towards war. Again, it would usually happen, under existing conditions, that arbitration would be rejected not by one but by both parties to a quarrel. It is very doubtful, moreover, whether Socialism is anywhere strong enough to carry out an effective general strike as a protest against war. The Germans, who are incomparably the superiors of the French in organisation, are much more sceptical than M. Jaurès in their estimate of the powers of a proletariat. The first consequences even of a theoretic propaganda on these lines are to stimulate the solidarity of the middle classes and to provoke a reaction against pacifism. But the alarm which even good Radicals in France have shown is a testimony to the gravity of M. Jaurès' movement. No one laughs at him. He is denounced as a public enemy. Governments understand to-day that, if their armaments are nearly equal, it is the spirit of the masses in their conscript armies that will turn the scale of victory. A party which can make victory doubtful, can thereby make war impossible. The knowledge that a fair proportion of the army in a State which meditated aggression would fight half-heartedly is quite sufficient to make mediation the prudent course. If Socialism can achieve so much as this—and possibly it can—it can guarantee the peace of Europe.

Life and Letters.

THE DRAGON MAN.

THE old labourer who tells me about the fairies has a wide knowledge of the other spirits. He does not see them much himself, now that he is old; but there are fields near his home where he will not walk after sunset; and thorn trees which he would not cut for a crock of treasure. He is not afraid of the dark, he says, "unless the bulls is loose"; but the places which are "queer," and the places which are "gentle," he will not enter without prayer on nights when the inhuman things are powerful.

There is a ruined castle near his cabin. It is of the common square Irish type, though smaller than most, and more than usually ruinous. It was once the stronghold of a chief, and the scene of a murder which altered Irish history. According to the old man, it is one of the most haunted places in the province. "It's full of wraiths," he says. "There's lots of people have died in it, and their wraiths walk there." They do not trouble people, he tells me; but he thinks that there must be a treasure in the ruins, which they guard, until the children of the rightful owner shall come "from Ameriky, or perhaps Australia," to lay claim to it. I have sat through a summer twilight in the ruins, waiting for the wraiths to appear; but I was never so happy as to see them. The little square tower looks out upon the sea, upon a bay with rocky reefs at each horn of it; and it is pleasant to sit there, hearing the water breaking just below, and watching the ships go past. The wraiths did not appear to me; but the tower is "just full of them"; and the old man has told me the tale of some of those who walk there, and may still be seen there by mortal eyes from time to time.

"Very long ago," he says, "the castle was owned by a Scotchman named Carr, who had a large property in that part of Ireland. This Carr had a daughter, who was the most beautiful woman in the whole of the four provinces, so that men used to be breaking their necks leaning out of windows to look at her. The name of this daughter was Clelia, and her father had her married to one of the MacDonnells, who came over at the time of the Settlement. The MacDonnell's name was Andy, and after his marriage he lived at the little tower with his father-in-law, and helped to keep his land in order. When he had been married about the half of a year, he was called away to Scotland on business; for he was a great man in Scotland, and at that time there was 'to be marrying' between the royal families of Scotland and England, and he was wanted to carry a banner at the wedding. So he sailed away over the sea to Scotland, 'and his wife thought the time long that he was gone.' And the first month he was away he sent a present of gold; and the second month he was away he sent a present of silver; and the third month he was away he sent a Scotchman over to say that he would be back on the third day of the third week from then. So on the third day of the third week from then they made all ready for a feast, and they had fires lighted, and all manner of wine and ale got ready, besides a wine they had in those times made out of honey and the young tops of heather.

"So then they hoisted up a flag upon the castle, and they loaded guns to fire off as soon as he arrived, and they put down carpets to the beach for him to walk upon, and all the fiddlers and the pipers came; and the poets came from the back hills making up new songs. There were great poets in those times. When they made their poems they used to shut themselves up in their beds, for the beds then were shut-beds, like in the Highlands. And then they would put a great stone weighing twenty, or thirty, or forty pounds upon their stomachs, and keep there like that, lying still, with their eyes covered, till they'd made up their poem. This is the way they made their poems. There's few poets takes that trouble now. Indeed, I think there's few enough. There were poets then could wither up the thorn trees when the blossom was on them. There were poets then could draw the souls out of people, and turn back the tide of the sea, and make the sun drop blood, and the moon drop milk, and the stars drop rain. They had powerful songs in them, and dangerous ways in them, and a knowledge that wasn't right in them. They could turn into wolves and into salmon. They were mighty queer those poets. That was the kind of poets came out of the back hills, from as far as Connemara, to welcome Andy MacDonnell when he came from crossing the water.

"Now at last, when the sun was near to setting, the ship which brought Andy MacDonnell came round the Point yonder. She had a red flag flying, and she was a row-ship, with a lot of young men rowing in her, singing as they pulled. She came up the bay to near those rocks, when they flung a plank over the side, so that Andy might come ashore without wetting his stockings. So they let Andy get ashore, and then the ship rowed away. Then Carr went up to him and asked him why he was turning the ship away again.

"'Isn't that the ship you sailed in?' he said. 'Isn't that your own ship?'

"'It is not,' says Andy. 'My own ship's in Scotland. The King took a fancy to her.'

"So then Carr asked him what had become of all the men he had sailed with, and of all the rowers and pipers and sailormen who had gone with him abroad. And he answered that the King had taken a fancy to them, and that they were all with the King in Scotland, every man jack of them, down to Johnny O'Hara, the piper's boy. So Carr wondered a little at that, but said nothing; and they all went up to the castle to the feast, and Clelia was as happy as a young bird singing, or a young colt galloping, or a young fish leaping from the sea. She was as beautiful as the young corn growing, or as a red rose budding, or as a tall ship sailing. She was as merry, and as happy, and as glad to see Andy MacDonnell, her man, as a Scotchman is to find a sixpence, and an Englishman to make a sixpence, and an Irishman to spend a sixpence. The pipers piped, the poets sang their poems, the fires were lit, the guns were shot off. It was a great feast that night at the castle; and all were happy and merry, saving only Carr, who was wondering queerly about the ship and the men being left behind in Scotland.

"Now in all the gaiety and jollity you would think that no one would have time to notice anything except the beauty of Clelia, and the strength of Andy, and the sweetness of the singing of the poets, and the way the noise of the pipes went through one's marrow. You would think that with all the tumblers tumbling, and the dancers dancing, and the jesters jesting, that the soul of a man would be bothered indeed from noticing anything that was not jesting, or dancing, or tumbling, or piping, or singing, or telling good tales, or, maybe, taking something at the tables. But there were two things noticed. When Andy MacDonnell came over the shadow of the door to go into the castle, they called down the blessing of God on him, and he was too proud, they said, to give them any answer. It was a queer thing, they said, for a man to go across the sea and to come back too proud to give folk the blessing of God when they had done the like by him.

"It must be queer manners, and queer counsellors, and queer principles the King of Scotland has, they said, if he forgets to say 'God save you,' or 'The blessing of God on you,' when he comes into a house prepared for him. And another thing they noticed was that he would eat no meat at all, of all the deer, and the pigs, and the cows, and the sheep, and the poultry, and the rabbits which had been cooked at the fires and blessed by the priest. He would eat only a bannock from the hearth, and drink only from the still they had; but one of the cooks saw him afterwards eating a bit of raw meat that had been set aside from the dish. It was a queer thing, he said, that a man like Andy MacDonnell, who had eaten as bravely as the sea when he went to Scotland, should have come home pecking and twittering at his food, like a hen with the gapes, or like a saint at a fast, or like a man in love when herself is at his side. It was a queer thing, they all said; and it was another queer thing that he didn't sing in his cups, and that he didn't stand up to dance with his lady.

"But there was a queerer thing than that they noticed. There was a little lad of the McLearnons' running about barefoot among the horses of the guests from the back hills. He was a little wee lad, the nicest little lad you would be seeing; and his mother was a nice, clean, decent woman from beyond by Aghola. So when Andy MacDonnell was coming to the castle from the shore, this McLearnon woman takes up her little son in her arms, so that he might see the man pass, and have a story to tell when he came to have children of his own. And as Andy MacDonnell walked past him this little McLearnon looks at him, and he was near him, and he said to his mother, 'His honour's ears is pointed.' They were pointed just the same as the ears on a terrier, or on a calf, or a young colt. Wasn't it wonderful that no one had ever noticed that before, that he should have pointed ears, and no one see it? I'm thinking that was a great wonder. And what was wonderful was that neither Carr nor the lady noticed it. There was Carr welcoming his guests, and the lady glad to have her man back, so that neither of them noticed it at all. But the common people by the tower noticed it, and one of them said, 'There's an enchantment on him'; and another of them said, 'It was a fever did it, or else he's been sleeping in the moon'; and another said it was wearing the Scotch bonnet did it. Some said one thing, some another; but all of them thought it was a queer thing to see, and a great blemish on so handsome a man. So at last the wine was all drunk, and the candles all burned, and the meat all eaten, and all of the dancers tired. Then they passed round a cup of spiced beer, and they all took a drink of kindness, and so the feast came to an end, a little while before the day broke.

"Now, after that, things settled down as before. Andy MacDonnell lived on with Carr at the Castle, and in the spring they sowed, and in the autumn they reaped, and there was nothing much happened, except a little child was born to Clelia; and that was a queer thing, the child was. It was a little wee man of a child, and he was born with teeth in him, and the first thing his mother saw of him was that his ears were pointed; and the nurses said that that was a great shame, and she so beautiful a mother. There were other things besides that which seemed queer. Andy MacDonnell was another sort of a man than he had been. He used to go up beyond, in the back hills, at the time of a new moon. The shepherds saw him there, more than once they saw him, going round the carved stones there the wrong way, singing a kind of song. He got a bad name on to him for doing that; but that was nothing to what they caught him doing another time on the back hills beyond the wood there.

"There's a flat place there, where they used to hold cock fights in the old times. It was a religious place before that, where they did the old religion, and there's wraiths in it, besides themselves; and it was there they caught Andy. It was one twilight they caught him. He was standing naked on the grass, bowing to a great black goat; and every time he bowed, the black goat spoke to him in ancient Irish. Wasn't that a wonderful thing now? There was a strong magic in that; indeed there was. The shepherds didn't say anything, for Andy was a great gentleman, but they thought it a queer thing for all that. And Carr kept wondering all the time what had become of the ship, and of all the rowers and pipers and sailormen left behind in Scotland.

"Now just about a year after Andy MacDonnell had come home, he and Carr, and Clelia and the child, were sitting on the grass (on a carpet) looking out over the bay. It was one evening, getting towards sunset. As they were sitting talking, they saw a small boat pulling in to the bay, and Carr said, 'It's a tired man in that boat'; for he was pulling like a daft old gather-up of a fireman who didn't know an oar from a poker. And Clelia said, 'It'll be some poor man who has maybe lost his ship.' And Andy MacDonnell looked hard at the boat, and, says he, 'I'll be going in,' he says; 'the evening strikes cold,' he says. So he turned, and went into the house. There was no one ever saw him again.

"Now the boat ran ashore on the beach, and the tired man got out of her, just by those rocks; and he was tired indeed. He could scarce climb up that bank of shingle. So Carr looks hard at him.

"'Why,' he says, 'it's Johnny O'Hara, the piper's boy, that was left behind in Scotland. What news, Johnny?' he says.

"So Johnny comes near up to him and 'Bad news,' he says. 'It's bad news I'm bringing you this day. Your man is killed,' he says. 'Andy MacDonnell is killed,' he says. 'He was killed by the Scotch the day he was to have come home. And I've been a prisoner ever since.'

"So Carr got up on his feet, and he calls out 'Andy!' but no one ever came. And Clelia called out 'Andy!' but no one ever answered. And they went into the castle, but no Andy was there, and then they knew that they'd been living with a dragon-man, and that the real Andy had been dead a year. When Clelia knew that she'd been living with a dragon-man, she went upstairs to her room, and took out a kind of dirk she had, with a sharp point on it, and she said a prayer first, and then stuck herself, so that she fell dead. That was in one of the top chambers. It's all fallen in now, this long time; but that was where she killed herself.

"And when Carr knew that there had been a dragon-man, he looked at the child, and he knew it for a dragon-child because its ears were pointed, so he took it up and swung it against the tower wall, against these corner stones, until he had it killed. Then he went down the strand yonder, to that point of rocks below my cabin, and there he drowned himself. That's why the point is called Carr's Point to this day. He was the last man to live in the castle here. No one would ever live in it after that. The top floors fell in, and the woodwork rotted away; and now there's ivy all over it, and in it, and across it, as thick as kelp on the shore when the sea has been jobbed in the bay."

JOHN MASEFIELD.

UNIVERSITY REFORM.

LORD CURZON has proved himself an extremely energetic Chancellor. He had not been in office more than a few weeks before he issued a letter asking rich Englishmen to come to the rescue of their most ancient University, which was in a sad plight for money. He put the needs of Oxford at a quarter of a million. Last week he published an account of the reply made to that appeal, which shows that about a fifth part of the required sum has been subscribed. The letter announcing these contributions is accompanied by some information on the financial position of the University, and its more pressing academical needs. The Bodleian, we learn, has been allowed to fall into a melancholy neglect, and it would take £20,000 to buy the books that are wanted to fill the lacunae in this glorious but impoverished library. For the teaching of languages the present provision is miserably inadequate, and the authorities propose to endow Chairs in French, the Norman languages, to develop the new Taylorian Professorship for German, and to create a Professorship for Japanese. The scientific equipment of the University is quite deficient: in regard to engineering it cannot be said to exist, and the chemical and electrical laboratories that are wanted would cost £45,000. A brief analysis of the University Budget for some years shows that University finances provide a very slight margin for the satisfaction of these demands, and that outside help is indispensable.

We do not propose to discuss the questions which these suggestions raise, for they are not the questions of capital importance at the moment in the eyes of everybody who wishes to see Oxford occupying her just place in the national life. And the very form which Lord Curzon's appeal takes shows how impossible it is for those whose preoccupations are illustrated in this scheme to do justice to the larger issues on which the future of Oxford really turns. There is nothing here to show that Lord Curzon, or those who appeal with him 'to the generosity' of their countrymen, have any sympathy with the discontents which are assailing not the teaching of Oxford only, but her constitution and her atmosphere, her insularity. There are men of distinguished standing in the University who are keenly sensitive to the reproach, which they feel to be justly brought against Oxford, of isolation from the common life of the nation. There are, on the other hand, symptoms of impatience and resentment in the democracy which sees these ancient Universities, the nurseries of the race that governs its great possessions, distant and remote from its control and its habits. Every democratic movement which has a spark of imagination looks not merely to the surface of political life, not merely to Parliament, the great central institution, but to social institutions, the ways and methods in which men and women grow up, the ideas that set the fashion to a society. The modern democratic movement is no exception, and therefore it cannot leave the Universities on one side. The ancient Universities are not, as they were a century ago, scandals of sloth and corruption. They are not, as they were half a century ago, centres of superstitious intolerance and preserves of illiberal opinion. The great reformers of the last century left many bitter disappointments, but at least they released the Universities from that dishonourable bondage. But Oxford and Cambridge remain virtually as inaccessible to the democracy which is beginning to claim its share in the government of the nation as were the Oxford and Cambridge of sinecures and monopolies. This is the great and momentous fact that seems to possess no importance for the authors of the Oxford appeal.

It has been evident for some time that there is only one way of reaching those realities. Outside help is as indispensable to the effective reform of Oxford as it is to the effective provision of the resources Lord Curzon demands. A University Commission, on which all the great national interests will be represented, will be able to discover the means of bringing the ancient Universities into touch with the needs of a modern society. Interior discussion and agitation will do a great deal, but they cannot do justice to all the interests concerned, and the very constitution of the University hampers the power and influence of the reformers. The group of Oxford tutors whose articles in the "Times" presented the case for reform with admirable force, pointed out how much turns on the proper use of the endowments of the colleges. They showed that when the Commission established the new system of open scholarships in place of the old system of close scholarships, attached to a school or a locality, it abolished with a number of abuses a certain rough guarantee that scholarships would be used to bring poor men to the University. The present system of open competitive scholarships certainly fails in that object. These Oxford tutors proposed that scholarships should in future be University prizes, and that they should be honorary distinctions; that the money now given in scholarships should be given in exhibitions by colleges to help poor men, and that in every college there should be exhibitions limited to the pupils of schools of a certain district, and also special exhibitions for school teachers. By this means they contend it would be possible to bring Oxford into much closer relations with grammar schools and County Council schools, and as we develop a democratic system of secondary education it will react at once on the University. But any plan of this kind is effectively barred by the present system, for if boys are competing against each other for college scholarships, colleges are competing against each other just as eagerly for promising boys. It has been found extremely difficult to get the colleges to agree to any regulation that competition, and the intrigues and jealousies which have marked such attempts show how hopeless it is to expect any really significant reform from Oxford herself. Reform which takes something from the colleges in order to enrich and aggrandise the University will not be initiated by an Oxford in which the college interests are far too strong and the University has the mere shadow of power. If there is an institution which has the right to claim that sympathy and that pressure it is surely a University which has the rich traditions and the incomparable opportunities of Oxford. And if there is a Government which may be expected to resume the great task of University Reform, it is surely a Government which makes it its chief ambition to touch the institutions and the life of the State with the splendid imaginations of democracy.

THE AUTUMN SONG OF THE ROBIN.

SOME birds are seasonable at some, others at other times of year: Robin Redbreast is seasonable now. During the better part of July and August the old Robins are away; they have a new suit of feathers to put on, and prefer to see to this in private, as it is a nasty business. Their young meantime, no winter having taught them trustfulness, are not much in evidence, or show themselves chiefly in the course of their family quarrels, which are by no means mild. But by early September, his moult successfully accomplished, and his health and good spirits at their height, Robin returns to his familiar quarters, and prepares both himself to enjoy life, and to make it enjoyable for all who care to watch or listen to him. There is no time of day you can go out but he will let you know in the most confidential manner what he is doing; and, of course, as he has no tiresome household duties to attend to, his day is all his own. If you should chance to wake up before sunrise—and it would really be worth your while to do so now and then—you will find that he has the whole world to himself: of that mysterious and beautiful hour when the light intensifies in the East, and is diffused abroad, like a spiritual presence, there is no creature to remind you but the Robin, and day by day he heralds and celebrates it with the loveliest gushes of broken song, as if he first watched, then sang, then watched, then sang again: but, in fact, the joy of it is nearer to him than observation, and though it should be a cloudy or even a foggy morning, he would sing on just the same. He will be singing on and off the whole day through, for that matter, with intervals to display his new finery to your notice, and to assure you of his friendly disposition. The worms, of course, know more of his agility at this season than one could considerably ask them to describe. If you start a patch of digging and leave your spade idle for a minute or two, he will at once assert his rights by perching upon the handle, first chattering and dipping his breast, and then, after a moment of concealed alertness, diving upon his prey. Watch the thrush to get a contrast, and you will realise that for all his courtliness he is mere middle-class, when you set beside him Robin Redbreast. That long trot over the lawn betrays its motive at once to the very meanest of intelligences; then, the moment he sees a worm, the thrush stiffens with anticipation; and, when he has it, ten to one it is too big for him: proceedings will open with a tug of war (quite a low comedy affair), and terminate with the tiresome and protracted beating of the victim into fragments, to be swallowed one by one.

The Robin takes all his meals in the form of the most delicate of hors d'œuvres. I ought to add that I am not aiming at a scientific assertion: examined scientifically, his appetite would certainly turn out to be a scandal. I merely speak of artistic effect, and maintain that, all birds being voracious, there are few who have learned so complete a concealment of their voracity, such perfect table manners. Who ever saw a Robin bolt his food? His life, one may say, is one long dinner party, yet he is always in full dress, and never asks for the smallest abatement of ceremony: there will be a flutter of the wings, and a couple of dips or bows, at the very least, to every mouthful he swallows, and as likely as not some altogether inimitable antic into the bargain. And then that song of his: grace after meat! Keats says he whistles—

"With treble soft

The Redbreast whistles from a garden croft."

The robin in the great Ode whistled, you may say, to oblige: Keats wanted a mellow note to end on, and he gave it as a matter of course. No other robin whistled, or ever will. It is easier to say what he does not do than what he does. His song is like his flight, like himself, something entirely in its own kind, indescribable. Life it seems, comes to him in a perpetual series of waves and gushes; every movement is on an impulse, like an overflow of pleasure, and each is complete in itself. What he will do next you cannot tell: you are only sure it will be something that no one but himself could have done with an equal enchantment of dainty grace. It is the same with his song: when the cup of his joy runs over—and he keeps it always on the brim—you will hear an exquisite tinkle of cool falling drops, a cascade of fairy melody, ecstasy made audible: first one ripple comes, then another, or sometimes two on end; now a shorter, now a longer strain; each different from the rest, yet all alike; and always one note so high above the others that the ear hardly receives it as a sound, taking it rather for the thrill and rapture of the song itself. It is curious that none of our great poets has been at pains to celebrate the charm of it. Shakespeare and Wordsworth, and Shelley and Meredith, give all their laurels to the lark, with the result that in moments of antipoetic aggravation one is tempted to think the lark a somewhat showy fellow, and to suspect him of having taken the poets on their softer side, by doing what they would have liked to do themselves; whereas the robin, who comes to the back door for crumbs, disdains soaring, and will have none of them. They give him a place in their stock list of domestic properties, for a return. You might have supposed him a mere singing sparrow. The truth is that they dare not touch him. He reduces poetry to tall-talk. For he is a prince, and what are words but beggars?

Autumn, then, is the Redbreast's festival. He begins singing before dawn, and there is no one to disturb him or to answer him except the Redbreast from next door. Wet or fine is no matter: for he has an inner source of life, his warmth comes from within. Walking out lately one grey afternoon, I passed a couple of robins perched either side of the road, one on a gate, one high above his rival on a tree. First one and then the other thrilled and overflowed with song: I could see the passion of it vibrate through every feather, and the ripple of the sound pass over now this throat, now that. They were aglow with life, and with the joy of life, as they gave their prophecy of Spring, and perhaps there was more than idle fancy in the thought that it was the fire within them, burning through, that had kindled for each his patch of ruddy glory upon the breast.

THE TENT FOLK.

"VERY nice, deep, old-fashioned Romanies they are," says Leland. What a strange, problematic people, the gypsies! We may name them collectively, since, wherever encountered, the Roms are Roms ever; and they are one race. Ethnologists are now pretty generally agreed that they came forth from India; though when or from what spot on that mysterious continent are questions of somewhat idle speculation. At this day their tents are dotted over the world, but the tent folk themselves have remained well-nigh unchanged. There are the gypsy hordes of Europe, whose numbers fringe the million: Gitano, Bohémien (as the French call them), Zingaro, Zigeuner, Pharaon népek ("Pharaoh's folk"), Cigány, Heydens (Dutch, "heathens"), Atzigan. Over North America they roam as freely as in Asia; they are scattered along the northern coast of Africa; they have penetrated into Australia. You will meet them in Brazil and in China. But, the wide world round, they are indubitably one.

Their lithe and well-knit forms, their extreme ugliness or their irregular and unconventional beauty, their dusky hair, tawny, olive skins, and fine, white teeth, their smallish hands and feet, their extraordinary powers of endurance, and their indifference to all weathers except wind: these characters are proper to the Rom in almost every land. Remarkable, too, is the essential oneness of their language. It is impossible to doubt that in Romani we have an Indian tongue (Miklosich has reduced all gypsy talk to a single neo-Indian dialect); but amid many Roms there are many varieties of speech. Yet, foreign forms and idioms notwithstanding, the gypsy dialects of countries remote in space "are united and homogeneous, and form really but one language." Between the Bohémien of the French departments, neighbour to the Pyrenees, and the Magyar Cigány, it is "impossible to establish any difference"; and a wanderer from the shores of the Bosphorus or the valley of the Tigris would presently be on terms of conversation with the Romany camp on an English common. A German scientist, Schwicher, asserts that "almost the same habits, the same virtues, and the same vices are found among the gypsies of all countries"; and the criminal lawyer, Liebig, says, "one real and authentic gypsy is a type of all the rest."

To this it may be added that what a criminal lawyer cannot tell us concerning the sundry tribes of Continental gypsies is knowledge scarcely worth the having. Certainly in the rural parts of many countries of Europe the investigating magistrate has a gypsy to deal with at every turn. In south and south-east Europe, and specially in Austria-Hungary, observes Dr. Hans Gross, of Prague (one of the foremost criminologists in Europe), "a case is rarely met with in which gypsies do not play some rôle." On this side of the gypsy character Dr. Gross is a suggestive guide.

Doubtless society in all countries has very largely helped to make the Romany an outcast. In the main, he is a non-producer, and as a non-producer he is of necessity an alien in civilisation. But not only has the gypsy been immemorably neglected, he seems also to have been immemorably thrust apart and persecuted. He thrusts himself apart at this day, and consecrates his knowledge to all the arts of living at the expense of others; but who knows at what date he began to be forced by society into the place of the Ishmael, the pariah, the dacoit even of Europe? He is no longer, of course, the victim of active persecution; but he has been scourged and racked as a necromancer, and burned, beheaded, hanged, and quartered as a cannibal. The season of these dreadful visitations has passed, but the gypsy is still the most neglected soul in Europe. Small wonder, indeed, that his religion barely discriminates good and evil, and that he "makes practically no difference between dewel (god) and beng (devil)." Thanks to the divers malign influences of civilisation upon him, he has become, in certain countries, the adroitest rogue alive; and in the southern and south-eastern regions of Europe in especial he has no doubt well earned the grievous reputation he is heir to.

But for his cowardice, the gypsy would fill with fear any district he alights on; for he is a thief unrivalled in his line, and has a gift of cruelty when he finds a helpless foe. But he will fly like a hare from the meanest opponent. His unwillingness to face risk explains in some degree the skill with which his plans are usually laid. The town burglar might learn from him how to reconnoitre the scene, and how to make all secure before having at the "crib." Over the mere burglar, indeed, the gypsy has many advantages. He has been trained to his business from the day that he was first made to shy with stones at a mark, and to swing the pronged hook at a rag in the branches of a tree. Then he has retained certain very useful senses of the wild man. He can see in the dark, he can creep like a cat, he does not know fatigue, and he has a power matchless in Europe of finding his way anywhere. Again, he hunts, not singly nor in couples, but, as it were, in troops. The whole band are "in it" together. It is thus possible to arrange a complete line of sentinels and signallers, and the outposts are always admirably managed. As to his talent for effecting an entry, Dr. Gross says:—

"What the servant who has lived for many years in the house, and what the neighbours who have lived for a long time near by, have never noticed, the old gypsy-woman, who has come begging or fortune-telling, has observed in a very few minutes. . . . The place where "a mouse cannot have passed" has been passed through by a little gypsy boy as easily as if the door had been opened wide, and where an acrobat could not have gone the gypsy can conquer with his hook. The locksmith is capable of quickly and surely finding the faulty point in a grating, the system of a lock, or the feeble spot in a door-hinge, only if he is allowed to observe these objects from all sides; the gypsy needs but a glance or a jerk from outside to know exactly what he ought to do."

Once within, the Cigány, relying on his chain of sentinels and other safeguards, works calmly, neither hurrying nor botching his job. He is a great minder of doors, passages, windows, and ingresses and egresses of every kind. Rarely is he surprised from the inside. He deals with a door as if he knew that a detective lurked behind it; knows how to prop the door that opens this way, or to tie the door that opens that way—and the gypsy knot, whether of cord or wire, is a marvel of ingenuity. An old investigating officer in Hungary thinks that everything is possible to the gypsy, and such is his fame in this quarter of Europe that criminals of the town resort to him and live with him for a time, to get a knowledge of his methods.

From the middle ages he has carried the name and opprobrium of a child-stealer. Nevertheless, the theft of children is probably the one that he is least familiar with. The gypsies are an extremely prolific people, and need no other hostages to fortune than their wives and mistresses bring into the tribe. Children have no doubt been stolen by them, but probably, as a rule, for reasons linked with one of their tribal and historic superstitions. A dark-haired and dusky race, they have a belief that red or golden hair is lucky; and here and there, at one time and another, they may have carried off a child of this complexion. But on this count the evidence against the gypsies is very weak, and we may surmise that were they known and notorious robbers of children, they would long since have been lynched out of existence.

A graver charge assails them as subtle poisoners. Here, upon the issue of criminal trials in distant Europe, and upon a mass of popular testimony that courts have never sifted, the scales are against the gipsy. Medicines, potions, and talismans are natural arts and weapons of an outcast and degraded race; and the poisons of herbs, if known to any, should surely be known to the nomadic pariahs of the world, who have their dwelling at the sign of the stars. An evening's ramble within the boundaries of any parish in Europe will give the herbalist drugs enough to slay a dozen villages; and the wanderer by calling in all the waste places of the Continent may easily have amassed a knowledge of and a dreadful skill in the plants he has immemorially lived with. The medieval achievements in the way of poisoning have almost certainly been over-estimated, and nowadays we regard with wonder the credulity of the dupes of Brinvilliers and La Voisin in the age of Louis XIV. But certain secrets of poisoning have undoubtedly persisted. Many simple herbs of the field know how to poison themselves against the animals that would feed on them; and this knowledge helps them to hold their own in the struggle for existence. Some few extraordinary vegetable poisons the gipsies have extracted from the pretty little living beings of the hills, plains, and hedgerows, where they and theirs have pitched their tents for centuries. Their love potions are still a puzzle to the analytic chemist; and they have one mortal poison, the "drei," which baffles every laboratory in Europe.

The Drama.

A CENSURED PLAY.

MR. EDWARD GARNETT has now published "The Breaking Point" (Duckworth & Co.), and the world is able to judge between him and the Censor of Plays. The facts of the case may be briefly set forth. In December of last year Mr. Frederick Harrison accepted Mr. Garnett's drama for production at the Haymarket Theatre. Although that manager did not think there would be any money in "The Breaking Point," he said he would be proud to introduce the play to the public. Then began the comedy of censorship. Mr. Redford vetoed the production of the play because it has for its theme "the tragic emotions that arise from the position of a girl who is fearing to become a mother." Mr. Garnett naturally inquired the reasons for the Censor's decision. That amiable gentleman replied in a letter marked "private" which evaded Mr. Garnett's question, and enclosed a printed memorandum stating that "the Licensor has no official cognisance of authors as such." That memorandum should become as famous as the judge's question, "Who is Connie Gilchrist?" The private letter pointed out that Mr. Redford's "official relations" were "only concerned with managers of theatres," and that he had "hoped to avoid any possible appearance of censure on anyone by suggesting privately to Mr. Harrison the desirability of withdrawing the piece." From this it would seem that Mr. Redford meant to act kindly, and to shield Mr. Garnett from an official censure which would have placed him in the corner with D'Annunzio, Maeterlinck, Tolstoy, Brieux, Ibsen, Bernard Shaw, Wagner, Saint-Saëns, and others—a terrible punishment indeed! Mr. Garnett has proved himself a most rebellious child. He has refused to accept Mr. Redford's private suggestion that the play should be silently withdrawn, and by publishing the correspondence and the play itself has dealt a shrewd blow at the anachronism of a dramatic censorship conducted with the muddled amiability which Mr. Redford has displayed for the last twelve years. For this must be at once stated: there is not the faintest shadow of indecency in Mr. Garnett's treatment of a painful and tragic theme, and there is nothing in the subject itself that is calculated to do harm to the morals or even to the sensibilities of the community, unless indeed the Censor is of opinion that our method of coming into the world should be sedulously ignored. With such unnatural refinement he must expect to be in a minority.

Since Mr. Garnett has published his play it will be well to give a criticism of it before returning to a few general remarks concerning the Censor and his ways. Mr. Garnett, then, has not written a masterpiece. The psychological action of the drama is rather crudely constructed, and the central figure is always in the background. Grace Elwood is that central figure. She is drawn rather as a state of mind than as a human being, so that her tragedy seems impersonal. The tragedy is simple enough. Grace is in love with Mr. Lewis Sherrington, whose wife had run away with another man. That love has resulted in the possibility of her becoming a mother. Mr. Redford must have objected to that possibility alone, and the necessary but reticent allusions to it, for hundreds of plays are licensed in which the possibility has become a fact. Sherrington attempts to force Grace to come to him altogether, but she is torn between her love for him and her love for her father, an old professor whose work is made possible by her assistance. Grace knows her father well, and would restrain Sherrington from the course of conduct which seems right to him. The return of Mrs. Sherrington, who desires a reconciliation now that her lover is dead, precipitates matters. She is naturally repulsed by her husband, and immediately comes to the conclusion that there is another woman. Inquiries in the village elicit the fact that Grace and Sherrington are in the habit of meeting in secret. Mrs. Sherrington, in appealing to Dr. Elwood for help in bringing about a reconciliation between herself and her husband, uses this knowledge as a lever. Sherrington, informed by Grace of his wife's visit, immediately puts his resolve to action, and faces Dr. Elwood with a full confession. This is the finest scene in the play, and strikes genuine drama. Dr. Elwood, who naturally calls Sherrington a libertine and a scoundrel, cannot be made to see that his daughter's state of mind demands an outward pretence of forgiveness of her lover. Sherrington himself pleads hard, accepting every insulting epithet the old man hurls at him. Grace, we see, understood her father. Left behind in Sherrington's house, she knew that the interview would only result in her having to separate either from her lover or from her father. Her distracted state of mind suggests only one solution to the problem, and while the two men egotistically argue she creeps to the river and drowns herself. There is much promise in Mr. Garnett's work. The dialogue is tense, expressive, and literary without being artificial. The characters are well observed. Sherrington's selfishness is subtly drawn, and Dr. Elwood's egotistical claiming of his daughter's whole life makes the tragedy inevitable. A couple of minor characters are also clearly outlined. The emotional and tragic tension of the whole play is admirable, but Mr. Redford, had he been a critic, might have pointed out that the pathological state of Grace's mind, to which he has apparently objected as Censor, makes for weakness rather than strength, and he might have shown that her death cuts the drama short just when the clash of individualities has begun. It is impossible to read this play and understand the Censor's objection, if it were not that the censorship of plays is the perpetual comedy of our theatre.

That there should be a censorship at all is an insult to our intelligence and to our dignity as citizens, but at the same time, as a practical means of preventing abuse of public performances, it may have its uses. By prohibiting the production of a play, instead of stopping its performances after it has been produced, which, roughly speaking, is the procedure in every country but England, our theatre-manager is safeguarded against unnecessary loss of money. Indeed, our system of censorship seems to be regulated for the benefit of the theatre-manager, who is permitted to give entertainments which are essentially immoral, provided the immorality is of a popular nature. Mr. Redford licensed "The Spring Chicken," in which a young married man had periodical fits of unfaithfulness. The thing was hardly veiled for those of the dullest perceptions, but being tricked out in music and bad jokes, it was passed. Yet Mr. Garnett's play is prohibited because it shows us, in the most reticent manner possible, the terrible state of mind of an unmarried girl who is about to become a mother, and the ordinary male's denseness of sympathy in such matters. Mr. Redford licensed Mr. Hall Caine's "The Christian," in which the question of prostitution is treated in a popular and sensational spirit; yet he has prohibited the performance of "Ghosts," which deals with an evil in the austere manner of an artist. Mr. Redford licensed "Le Marquis de Priola," and "L'Education du Prince," both plays of frank salaciousness; yet he has prohibited "Monna Vanna," a tragic work of art. Season after season he passes songs and jokes in musical comedies which are evidently salacious in intention, and season after season he prohibits plays of moral aim because in dealing with life they necessarily deal with immoral as well as with moral conduct. One might almost think that Mr. Redford had a fixed idea that immorality must never be portrayed on the stage unless it arouses the chuckles of the conventional man of the world, and that plays which make an audience think about life are dangerous to the community. On any other hypothesis the extraordinary licensing of plays is inexplicable. If the chief function of his office be to prevent the stage being a political platform, the Censor has not fulfilled his duties, for over and over again he has licensed plays which contain offensive political allusions; if the chief function of his office is to prevent obscenity, then he has failed also, because he has passed many musical comedy libretti which contain vulgar and obscene suggestions. Finally, if he is to be the sole judge of what should or should not be treated on the stage, he has displayed an extraordinary lack of perception. It is absurd, however, that so momentous a decision should be placed in the power of one man, however gifted he may be. If the office of censorship is to be continued, and there may be practical reasons in favour of its continuance, it should be handed over to a committee capable of dealing with the subtle questions which are raised by the production of plays. A great art should not be at the mercy of one man, who may have curious and individual notions of what is fit or unfit for public entertainment. It behoves us no longer to submit to a censorship which robs us of our dignity and self-respect, and is making us ludicrous in the eyes of the rest of the world.

Letters from Abroad.

GERMAN SOCIALISM AND THE COLONIAL QUESTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Two Socialist Congresses have in these days been occupied with the Colonial question: the International Socialist Congress of Stuttgart, and the German Social Democratic Congress, held from September 16th to the 21st, at Essen, the home of the well-known Krupp works. The Stuttgart Congress has come to a purely negative vote, condemning the Colonial policy root and branch, and the Essen Congress, in accepting all the resolutions of the Stuttgart Congress en bloc, will be considered as having endorsed also its conclusions in regard to the Colonial question. This all the more since this question has, next to the military question, been particularly discussed at Essen, in the debate on the Stuttgart resolutions.

But already at Stuttgart the German delegation had, in their majority, come to a different conclusion, when they deliberated on the subject at their sectional meeting. And at Essen a rather strong undercurrent was manifested against the absolutely negative purport of the Stuttgart resolution. The authors and defenders of the latter found themselves in opposition, not only to revisionists—to use their much-misemployed designation—but also to Herr Bebel, so often the interpreter of the sentiments of the Radical wing of the Party. If, finally, the decisions of the Essen Congress were agreed to, it was for many rather an acceptance with the benefit of an inventory than their full endorsement in every detail. No unbiassed reader of the debates will deny it.

At first sight all this might appear an internal affair of the Social Democratic Parties, which does not concern any outsider. But Social Democracy is in all countries, England included, a gaining force in actual politics, and particularly in Germany it is, in spite of its defeats at the last General Election, such an important factor in public life that its feelings and attitude in regard to such a portentous subject as the Colonial question may in many cases influence the decision of the Government, or of the leaders of other parties. Full attention has therefore been given the matter by our political Press.

But in which direction will, or may, the dissensions of Socialists in regard to the Colonial question be of consequence? May they lead to a change in the attitude of Socialists towards militant imperialism?

As far as Germany is concerned, it can safely be said that the attitude of the Social Democratic Party to the Colonial policy of the Empire will, as far as their policy bears directly or indirectly on international politics, or the relation to other countries, be in no way changed. Uncompromisingly will the party oppose any policy in Colonial matters that might or could disturb friendly relations to other civilised nations. The narrow connection of the Colonial policy of the Empire with the so-called world policy of increased armaments and international meddling, is one of the main reasons—one may justly say the predominant reason—why German Socialists will continue to refuse the Colonial credits, whether the section that condemns every kind of Colonial policy under present conditions, or the section that admits exceptions, be at the helm of the party. In this respect there is no dissension, and there will and can be no dissension amongst Social Democrats. It is their unanimous opinion that all the best interests of the wage-earning class demand to-day the maintenance of peace and free intercourse between the nations, and it is perhaps not superfluous to mention that the very two members of the party who at Stuttgart fought the purely negative resolution on the Colonial question, Dr. David and the writer of this letter, are amongst the most unyielding Free Traders in the ranks of the party.

There are some other reasons, besides, that in Germany make for practical unanimity in the refusal of the Colonial Budget. One is the constitutional aspect of the question. There is no real Parliamentary Government in Germany. Ministers are not responsible to Parliament, they are the officials of the Emperor, who appoints them according to his own predilections. A party that upholds the sovereignty of the people is, under these circumstances, bound to refuse the Government any credits. And secondly there is the spirit of the administration of the Colonies; the rule of red tape there, of what Germans call Assessorismus, meaning the rule of legists who know only the letter of the law and nothing of the requirements of real life, and the unjust and brutal treatment of the natives, that make it impossible for Socialists to grant the said credits. On all these points German Socialists are agreed.

But then there remains very little to quarrel about, some readers will perhaps exclaim, and believe it to be a mere dispute on abstract theories, with no practical consequence at all. And in some respects the dissensions are, indeed, in the main theoretical ones.

Thus in Stuttgart the debate turned, inter alia, round the question whether the usefulness of the Colonies to the working-classes is only greatly exaggerated, or is altogether non-existent. This at first sight might appear to be only an abstract question, but if it comes in a Parliament to a proposal of giving up Colonies altogether, it would be a practical question at once. And some of the supporters of the opinion that Colonies are of not the slightest utility to the working-classes are at least consistent enough to advocate the immediate abandonment of the present Colonies.

The acceptance of this proposal would, in many cases, surely cause no great loss to the countries concerned, particularly if one puts against the profits drawn from the Colonies the costs of armaments, &c., which they necessitate. I understand that in some English papers much praise has been lavished on me for having maintained in a speech at Breslau that England had nobly done her duty towards her Indian dependency, and on the other hand an English paper of the movement to which I belong has uttered some strong words of blame against me for this heresy. Now I have hardly deserved the first, and I am not quite so great a heretic as my comrades of "Justice" seem to believe. I have refuted some exaggerated criticisms of English administration in India, but I have not at all said that everything is right in the Indian administration. I ventured to point out several subjects where, in my opinion, there is great room for improvement, and I added that if one considers all the expenditure and other sacrifices England incurs year after year, for the only purpose of securing her Indian possessions, how many places in Asia and Africa she holds at an enormous cost for this object alone, in how many respects she ties her hands, how many jealousies she evokes, against which she has to enter alliances otherwise rather objectionable and costly to boot, and what a drain on her intellectual forces these Indian possessions and their insurance mean, in our time when international competition puts every day stronger demands on the industrial, administrative, and commercial capacity of the nation—in considering all this, I added, one cannot help thinking that, from the economical standpoint at any rate, it would be better for the people of the United Kingdom if England got rid of India. But whether this would also be for the good of the peoples of India, and particularly the poor ryots, was in my opinion rather open to doubt. The same doubt dictates, I may add, the attitude of my friend, the eminent Dutch Socialist, Van Kol, in regard to Dutch India. To ignore this side of the question would, in my opinion, mean, as I said at Stuttgart, the policy of Pontius Pilate.

Surely the advantage of Colonial possessions is always conditional. At a given period a nation can only sustain a certain quantity of such possessions.

As long as she was ahead of all other nations in productive power, England could support a much larger amount than any modern nation. But the time of her industrial supremacy has passed away, or is at least nearing its end. Protectionism on the Continent and in the United States may protract the advent of the inevitable in some degree, but its hour will strike one day, and when the advantages Free Trade secures her to-day disappear, she would either have, I believe, to free herself of at least part of her Colonial burdens, or lose more and more of her trade, and with it of her regenerative forces.

So much for England. With Germany the question is quite different. Although her rural population is now decreasing, she could, with a yearly increase of about 800,000 heads, well stand more of Colonial possessions than she actually holds. Nor would the costs or outlay for the Colonies press very hard on her finances. She has now become a wealthy country, and could well afford the twenty or thirty millions (in marks) of her Colonial Budget, if the matter would rest there. But as it does not, as armaments on land and sea—and by and by also in the air—are so narrowly connected with it, the bill is here, too, so much larger than the benefit, that the opposition against the Colonial policy is at least perfectly intelligible.

Otherwise it is surely quite erroneous to ask whether colonisation benefits the workers as a class or not. Here the class-war theory is driven to a point where it ceases to be progressive or revolutionary in a historical sense, and tends to become reactionary. The present division of society into classes does not mean a segregation into castes separated from each other by Chinese walls. What benefits the industrial evolution of a country benefits also in a larger or smaller degree its wage-earners. Also the question of the rule of capitalism is mixed up in quite a wrong way with the Colonial question. The time has passed when it was a debatable question whether capitalism would and should expand to other parts of the world. To-day not expansion in itself, but only the forms and methods of expansion are still to be decided: whether it shall be capitalist companies fortified by hired mercenaries or capitalism controlled by responsible Governments. But in the minds of the majority of the Stuttgart Congress, as also of a considerable number of German Socialists, these issues are confused, and thus a policy of absolute negation is regarded as the safest attitude by so many people.

In Germany, as elsewhere, account must be taken of the humanitarian sentiment of Socialists, that abhors the cruelties and robberies committed almost everywhere on the native population where colonisation takes place, and also an equalitarian objection to the subjugation of one race or nationality by another. Praiseworthy and indispensable as the former sentiment is, the latter cannot be accepted without qualification. Its unqualified application to all nationalities and tribes, irrespective of their state of civilisation, has been explicitly repudiated by the three great theorists of modern Socialism, Karl Marx, Frederic Engels, and Ferdinand Lassalle. "The principle of free nationalities, conceived as the right of the national spirit to its own evolution," writes Ferdinand Lassalle, in his book on the Italian war, "is dependent on the condition that there is a national spirit, which evolves and keeps up pace with civilisation generally." "Otherwise," the great author of "The System of Acquired Rights" continues, "conquest becomes a right either at once, or it will be justified as such in the course of time." In the same vein Frederic Engels, during the lifetime of Karl Marx, and in accordance with him, repeatedly warned the writer, then the Editor of the "Social Democrat," not to allow his sympathy with subjugated nationalities to get the better of his historical insight in the laws of evolution. "I know," he wrote on February 22nd, 1882, "how much time and study it has cost me to get rid, but then thoroughly rid," he added, "of this sentimental sympathy." And six months afterwards, when I took sides with Arabi Pasha in his revolt against the Anglo-French control over the finances of Egypt, he pointed out how little Oriental pashas are to be trusted, how, for ages, it has been the fate of the poor peasantry of those countries to be deceived, and that one can "very well write for the poor oppressed fellah, without sharing his present illusions, and stigmatising the brutalities of the English without making ourselves the allies of their present military opponent." "We . . . are bound," he added, "to prove the theoretical insight we have also in these questions, by criticism."

I hope some of my English comrades will read this and ponder the words of these revered masters. They may at first sound strange to their ears, and apt to justify any acts of violence and oppression exerted by the capitalistic brotherhood, or in its name. But violence and oppression have been in the world long before capitalism existed, and do exist to-day where it is wholly unknown. Humanity is as yet not advanced enough to forego the application of force under all circumstances. Where two civilisations clash, the lower must give way to the higher. This law of evolution we cannot overthrow, we can only humanise its action. To counteract it would mean to postpone social progress.

The Stuttgart resolution on the Colonial question, and its acceptance at Essen, show that Social Democracy has not yet found the theoretical compass in regard to this problem. But the resolution supplies the elements of the theory to be found in the writings of the great masters, that spirit of resolute humanitarianism we sometimes miss in the deductions of the former.

ED. BERNSTEIN.

Letters to the Editor.

"TYRANTS OF THE ROAD."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—An ounce of accurate observation and of practice is worth one pound of theorising and moralising. My experience of motoring in different countries is the converse of that of Mr. Sturrock, given in your last issue. The vast majority of chauffeurs, private and professional, are inconsiderate, reckless, and foolhardy. The few only are careful and conscientious in their driving.

I was in the company of several motorists one evening last week. One gentleman had driven from London to Aberdeen. He was staying a night in Dundee on his return journey. The conversation for two hours was about the speed of their cars, how many miles an hour they went to Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and Braemar. They spoke with stern joy of passing every other vehicle on the road. There was not a word about beautiful scenery, historic places, or famous architectural mansions. That is a typical specimen of what takes place where two or three motorists are gathered together. The London gentleman was proud of his expeditious driving. He did not pull up, on one occasion, until a nervous passenger behind him started to his feet, pulled his coat, and beseeched him to go slower. On another occasion he fell asleep driving along the highway. He was awakened by boys shouting to him, "Stop! Stop!" and holding up their arms. "Oh, you should not drive like that," I mildly remonstrated. "It is so dangerous for yourself and for others." "He had no one to talk to," he replied, "and had fallen asleep." Motorists are a terror to women and governesses on country roads where children play.

The other winter I heard Mr. Sturrock deliver a lecture on motoring. The Forfarshire County Council, of which Lord Camperdown is Convener, had just passed bye-laws to regulate the speed of motors to safeguard the public. One of these enacted that motorists must slow down to the rate of five miles an hour (I quote from memory) when passing through a village, or at a narrow or sharp turn of the road. Mr. Sturrock ridiculed that bye-law, and all the motorists present condemned it. The County Council I defended, and strongly commended such a prudent bye-law for the safety of the public, especially country children. One instance may be cited of the superficial knowledge Mr. Sturrock possesses of motor affairs. He described and recommended an American invention to prevent "skidding." Mr. Shaw, a large motor manufacturer, said the invention had been on the market for two years, and was a failure. Any day in the week motors may be seen driven into this city-at from twelve to fifteen miles an hour through populous thoroughfares.

Are motors popular in Continental cities? They are with the wealthy classes. But, as they scorch along the highways as in Britain, peasants and pedestrians designate them cochons du chemin (road hogs).

It is to be hoped that a People's Parliament will increase, instead of decreasing, the penalties for infringement of the law, and that imprisonment, not a fine, will be imposed in reckless cases, and in all after the first offence.
—Yours, &c., THOMAS OGILVY.

Stoleswell, Dundee, October 7th, 1907.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Will you permit me to reply to Mr. J. Leng Sturrock's "indisputable propositions"? The first proposition is very doubtful, but the second, with amplification, will be generally admitted; as for the third, it is open to a direct negative. Briefly, the motor industry, according to Mr. Sturrock, "affords a vast field of employment," &c. How about the unemployment it has created? The harness-maker and the whipmaker are being ruined, to say nothing of middle-aged 'bus and cab drivers, who have been thrown out of work by these licensed engines of death. Motors have certainly increased employment in the undertaker's business, but have done little or nothing for the benefit of mankind. In regard to motor drivers being in demand, this is no doubt the case, but if Mr. Sturrock studies the London Press, he will find that, when we have an opportunity of forming a judgment through Police Court proceedings, the driver employed by the most notorious of the motorists is generally an alien. If Mr. Sturrock desires to improve his knowledge as to the attitude of the London Press towards the tyrants of the road, let him study the most rabid and unscrupulous organs of the Imperialists, and he will find that accidents are frequently excluded, and always minimised, unless they be of the dimensions of the Handcross disaster, which furnished good copy, and for that reason alone was published. Mr. Sturrock complains that "the kind deeds of the many are seldom reported." What are they? Presumably when a motorist has maimed a man for life, he takes him to the hospital, and inquires as to his health. I know the north, Dundee included, well, but I have never experienced such childlike innocence as that of your correspondent. Whether he likes it or not, Parliament will have to listen to the proposals for the control of automobiles, for Parliament knows that it is the servant and not the master of the people, long suffering as the populace—or perhaps plebs would please Mr. Sturrock better—be. To use that gentleman's own expression, his pleas for the motorist "one would almost imagine were advanced merely in a playful spirit of humour."—Yours, &c.,

"CIVIS UNIVERSITATIS EDINENSIS."

Common Room, Lincoln's Inn,
October 7th, 1907.

"CASA BLANCA: THE FRENCH CASE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I see that Mr. Dell has called on M. Georges Mandel, and has had an official denial of the facts stated by Dr. Kerr in his letter to the "Glasgow Herald."

If a French journalist, after Denshawai, had waited on a secretary of Lord Cromer's, what would have been the information that he would have received?

I do not blame M. Mandel; he was only acting as a loyal colleague and as a patriotic French citizen. As between him and Dr. Kerr, time can alone judge.

In regard to Mr. Dell, time also will be his physician, for it will remove his touching faith in official communications.—Yours, &c.,

R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM.

39, Chester Square, S.W.

October 8th, 1907.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. R. Dell's letter shows how mischievous were these recent letters about France in Morocco. The French Premier's chef de cabinet also has "pointed out" that Mr. Cunninghame Graham is "a gentleman apparently inspired by a bitter animus against the French nation." But for anti-French bias I was more struck with Mr. Fox Pitt's letter. He wrote:—" . . . the French are hardly in a position to regenerate any country. In proof of this statement, we have but to look at the low level (sic) to which modern French art and literature have sunk. Knowing as I do the evil effects of French rule in Algeria . . ." Well, really, I did not know that one judged the colonising capacity of France (or Britain) by an artistic and literary standard! As for Algeria, others differ from Mr. Fox Pitt; while as to Tunis, vide "Speaker" a while ago. In any case, just as there are some Francophobes left here, there are still some Anglophobe Chauvins in France, and I can well imagine one of them writing the above passage. Just substitute the word "English" for "French," and for "in Algeria," read "in India, Egypt, and Ireland."—Yours, &c.,

D. SCOT SKIRVING.

Lieut.-Col. Retired.

Wokington, October 7th, 1907.

"THE CANT OF MILITARISM."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There is so much of your article in this week's issue which will command the assent of English Liberalism, that it is surely a pity that the writer should end his criticism of militarism with a wholesale and extravagant attack upon the characters of British soldiers, both of commissioned and non-commissioned rank. It is, of course, mere self-deception to attempt to ignore the evils which must inevitably attend barrack life; but at the same time I believe it to be at once ungenerous and inaccurate to describe the morality of the army as appreciably lower than that of other professions. To judge from my own experience of army officers, and I am ready to admit it is not a large one, it seems to be ridiculous to describe the life most of them lead as one of "fatuous frivolity and open vice." Such an impression doubtless exists, and has been assiduously fostered both by drama and by fiction; but the officers of the present day, in line regiments at least, are happily but little like the guardsmen that adorn the pages of Ouida's novels; neglect of professional duties and ignorance of professional subjects have ceased to be marks of good form. The head and front of the officer's offending seems to be that in his leisure hours he seeks amusement and relaxation; in this I suppose he is not conspicuously different from the schoolmaster, the man of business, and even the M.P. It is deplorably unjust that occasional scandals in particular regiments should be considered sufficient evidence for discrediting the character of a whole class, as conscientious, as hard-working, and as honourable as any other in the kingdom.—Yours, &c.,

ANTI-MILITARIST.

October 7th, 1907.

[The exact line which divides "amusement and relaxation" from "frivolity and vice" is not easy to discover. What we had in mind was the part which the turf, the card-room, and other less worthy occupations play in the life of officers. Seeing that no Census of Occupations is applicable in this case, we willingly substitute the word "many" for "most" in our stricture. We cannot, however, admit that the average officer regards his profession as seriously, or labours at it as assiduously, as a school-master or the ordinary man of business. It is not many years since an indisputable expert, giving evidence to a Commission inquiring into the efficiency of the army, uttered the illuminating sentence, "It is bad form to be keen."—EDITOR, THE NATION.]

THE KIRKDALE CONTEST.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I thank you for the admirable article on the Kirkdale contest in your issue of the 5th inst? THE NATION is the only non-Socialist paper in which I have seen outspoken condemnation of the dishonourable tactics by which Kirkdale was won. The campaign of mendacity which has been so persistently and unscrupulously pursued at recent bye-elections seems to me a very grave sign of the corruption which has infected the great parties of the State. I have for some time past scanned the utterances of politicians of varied standing in both parties on Socialism, and have been astounded at the ignorance uniformly shown of the subject. The explanation was conveyed to me the other day in a paragraph from Saturday's issue of the "Times," in which the Hon. F. W. Lambton, M.P., who had spoken against Socialism at a meeting in Wynyard Park, replied to a challenge from the Newcastle Socialist Society to discuss the question at issue: "At Wynyard the other day, I spoke against Socialism as I understand it. I make no claim to 'spread the light' against Socialism! Any attempt to alter your convictions is far above my powers, but I can state some of my views, and listen to yours, if you like to have a meeting."

Now I appeal to you, Sir, is it either fair to one's political opponents or honest dealing with one's constituents to condemn a creed or policy not as it actually is, but as one supposes it to be? If Socialism, as these political sages understand it, had even a rough correspondence to the actual creed, one would not complain, but the travesty of it repeatedly presented in their speeches is so grotesque, and their criticism so childish and inept, as to be an insult to the intelligence of the audiences they address. For example, Mr. Lever last week discoursed solemnly on the interdependence of labour and capital. Socialists wanted to do away with capital, and that was absurd. From this text, he gave one of the most fatuous criticisms of Socialism I have yet read; I cannot suppose he was misrepresented, for I have heard Lord Lansdowne offer exactly the same criticism. It is by utterances like these that Members of Parliament have become a byword for ignorance and stupidity. Are they, one wonders, "crammed" by diligent secretaries, like Dickens's Mr. Grigsby?

If either of the gentlemen to whom I have referred had thought it a necessary part of their equipment as critics of Socialism, to read as much about the subject as they could find in a penny Fabian tract, they would never have been guilty of the absurdities to which they committed themselves.

I think the time has come when more serious and informed criticism of Socialistic proposals is called for. Even taking the matter from the lowest point of view—that of party policy—the present attitude of both parties to Socialism has been clearly shown to be quite futile and ineffective. The "strong common sense" of the working-classes cannot be trusted to reject Socialism. It is to this "strong common sense" the Socialist appeals, with every prospect of success. No one who has observed the work of Socialist propagandists, and witnessed the eager attention with which this gospel of social salvation is heard, and the demand for the literature of the movement, will be under any illusion as to the great future in front of it. There was a time within the memory of the youngest of us when Socialism was not even respectable, and "Socialist agitator" was a term of contempt. Now, it is not only the deluded, ignorant masses with whom the creed finds acceptance, but with an ever-increasing body of the middle-classes, with doctors, lawyers, clergymen, and professional men of all kinds. The rise of Socialism is a portent that signifies much more than has been generally recognised. The Socialist Party is a party in quite a different sense from the other two great parties of the State. It aims, not at advancing the interests of a particular class, but of the nation at large. It gives to mankind what the others give up to party; and it is the uncompromising foe of that tradition which makes the world of politics a stage for personal aggrandisement, and the gratification of personal ambition. Its members are earnest men, with clear and definite aims, which they pursue with a singleness of purpose and an almost religious enthusiasm, which must ultimately command success. It is gratifying to find a paper of such high standing as THE NATION welcome the advent of this new political force in the friendly spirit evinced in your "Note on Kirkdale." One could wish that that tone were more generally adopted, as no doubt it would be, if party interests could be as well served by honourable methods as they have been by methods one cannot describe so favourably.—Yours, &c.,

WILLIAM J. DOWNIE.

Staton House, Lanark.

October 8th, 1907.

"ARBITRATION v. TRIAL BY JURY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There are very few lines in this article that are not open to criticism. Even the truism enunciated in the first paragraph to the effect that the Arbitration Act, 1889, was conceived in the interest of the public is objectionable, for the reason that every other Act upon the Statute Book was similarly conceived.

The title itself is open to objection, and the entire article misleading, as the writer would seem to infer that the only alternative to arbitration is trial by jury. Is it to be assumed that the services of a jury would, as a matter of course, be requisitioned on the trial of any claim against an insurance office without regard to the question at issue? Questions of fact, as the writer himself states, are in many cases tried by a judge without the assistance of a jury, especially "in the Commercial Court." Is it too great an assumption to make—that a number of insurance cases now dealt with by arbitrators would be tried in that Court were it not for the fact of the arbitration clause in the policy?

It is a little difficult to appreciate what exactly is the point the writer of the article seeks to make unless it be to prove the assertion he makes that the fire insurance offices pursue an equitable and necessary course in insisting on arbitration. But what argument is adduced in the proof of this? I fail to see one.

That the offices favour arbitration there can be no doubt, otherwise they would hardly insist on the condition precedent in favour of arbitration—for what reason? For the reason that the "office which looks to maintain its business and extend its connections" does not hanker after a gratuitous advertisement in the Law Courts. By resisting a claim in open Court a certain amount of publicity attaches, and an office "cannot afford to treat its claimants in a litigious spirit," at any rate, in the full light of day. I am not suggesting that a respectable office would resist a claim before an arbitrator that it would not resist before a judge or before a jury, but it is of course obvious that in certain cases the public might consider an office was behaving badly in resisting a claim when in fact such office had all the law of the land on its side. To avoid the odium that would attach (and perhaps without justification) by a not infrequent appearance in the Law Courts, the offices have recourse to an arbitrator whose sitting is private. This would be my answer to the question asked in your article as to the way in which the fire office is benefited unduly by the arbitration clause.

It is little to be wondered at in the circumstances that the British offices have to seek abroad for legal precedent owing to the absence of litigation, or, more correctly, reported litigation, on this side.—Yours, &c.,

MONTAGU RYLAND.

43, Holland Park, W.

October 8th, 1907.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I answer a few allegations in the article on "Arbitration v. Trial by Jury," with special reference to Insurances, which appears in your current issue.

Your contributor, who is evidently biased in favour of insurance companies, makes vague general statements (inter alia) to the effect that "fair offices cannot afford to treat their claimants in a litigious spirit," that they "seek no more than bare justice and fair dealing," when they compel recourse to arbitration, thereby impliedly suggesting that justice and fair dealing cannot be obtained in English Courts of Law.

Your contributor asks, "Where is the hardship in the procedure of arbitration?" One hardship is the great increase of cost. The arbitrator is not infrequently a barrister of some eminence, and has to be handsomely paid for his services, whereas the Judge of the High Court is paid by the community at large. The great delay in the ordinary Courts of Law is referred to, but where arbitrators are, as not infrequently happens, busy men, much delay necessarily occurs before they can give their decision.

The truth of the matter is, Sir, that fire offices dread the publicity of Courts of Law, and endeavour to enforce arbitration on their unsuspecting clients, because they have good reason to welcome the privacy of the arbitration chamber.

All insurance (other than life) can be satisfactorily transacted with Lloyd's underwriters, whose policies contain no vexatious covenants of arbitration or otherwise, and the members of this Institution (with which I am wholly unconnected) are well known for the promptitude and liberality with which they settle all bonâ-fide claims. Trusting you may find room for views expressed on the other side to the "wealthy" insurance companies.—I am, Yours, &c.,

"VERB. SAP."

OVERSTRAIN IN THE SERVICES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—We are told by those who are in a position to know the facts that an attack on the Admiralty respecting the repairs of the fleet will be made during the coming autumn. So much time and brains are applied to the criticism of the matériel that we make no apology for drawing the attention both of the Admiralty and of the Army Council to one point in the management of the personnel of the fleet and the army, which is of even greater importance than the condition of hulls, engines, or armaments in his Majesty's fleet. What we are about to state is written with a sense of responsibility, and without any desire to censure either the heads of the services or their subordinates for conditions, unsatisfactory in themselves, which have arisen mainly as a consequence of the higher standard of duty imposed on officers of the navy and army since the close of the Boer War. Two propositions, at all events as regards the navy, we believe to be indisputable.

First: That the pressure of work required from naval officers, from midshipman to rear admiral, has greatly increased since October, 1904.

Second: That the increased strain on the nervous system and energies of the fleet is accompanied with an increase in the consumption of alcohol, which is undesirable in time of peace and a source of danger in time of war.

The difficulty is one which is not unknown in other fleets. Both the German and the Japanese Admiralties exact obedience to stricter regulations than those obtaining in the British Navy. Mess regulations relating to alcohol consumption in the navy have been revised from time to time, not always in strict fairness to the officers of the ward-room and the gun-room, as, for example, when naval officers were deprived of their rum rations without compensation. The stock of wines, spirits, and beer allowed on board, according to Admiralty regulations, is nominally limited to each mess. No alcoholic liquors may be sold or given away, except to guests in the ward-room, to any individual in the ship not belonging to the mess from which it has been obtained. Day and wine books are kept, and accounts are audited not later than the tenth of the first month in each quarter by a senior officer.

Mess statements of the ward-room mess are inspected monthly by the captain, and in case of the gun-room mess weekly. All wine debts must be paid monthly, and the wine bills of gun-room commissioned officers—that is, of sub-lieutenants—must never exceed two pounds a month, those of other officers over eighteen years of age 15s. a month, and those of gun-room officers under eighteen years of age 10s. a month. No actual limit is imposed on the wine consumption of ward-room officers, but should the captain discover from the mess statements or audited accounts that excess, extravagance, or irregularity has occurred in the case of any individual officer, he is to prevent a repetition of the excess, or to report the matter to the commander-in-chief. The common practice is for the captain to tell the delinquent officer that he is taking too much wine, and that he must moderate the amount of future mess bills. In theory the above regulations work well, but in practice the increase of naval work imposed on all officers during the last three years has led to much drinking that is entirely due to over-pressure producing mental and nervous strain. It should always be remembered that a naval officer, whoever he may be, belongs to the aristocracy of British physique and intellect. Entry to the navy is difficult. The desire to belong to the service ensuring the widely-spread desire of parents to have a son in the navy enables the Admiralty to pick and choose. From the time a boy enters Osborne until he hoists his flag as admiral, he is subjected to a continuous winnowing process in competition with every officer of his rank and standing. This alone is sufficient to prevent recourse to alcohol as a source of sensual enjoyment. The excess of wine, &c., consumed in the navy is due to the same cause as that which induced the earlier competitors at Brooklands to administer oxygen to their racing automobiles in the last lap. They rode to win. Take the case of an engineer of a flag-ship who is suddenly ordered to obtain full speed, and who knows (as in the case of the manoeuvres) that full speed is required for a chase, and that the chase may last for forty-eight hours. Full speed in a first-class battleship is usually restricted to a period of eight hours, and even for that time the strain on everyone in the engine-room is inconceivable to an ordinary landsman. The mental and physical exertion required from commissioned engineer officers during the period of full speed lasting more than a few hours involves exactly the case of overstrain to which allusion has been made. Knowing the facts, is it likely that the captain will scan too jealously the wine bills of officers whose splendid exertions may have won for the ship the congratulations of the admiral and set an example to the fleet? If the case of overstrain in engineer officers can be explained by the citation of a specific but unusual case, it would not be difficult to set forth a hundred instances in which watch-keeping officers deprived of sleep, reading for an examination, and engaged in constant exercises requiring the highest technical skill, good temper, and resolution, are compelled to attempt the performance of more work in the twenty-four hours than the human frame will stand. The vast majority of naval officers are not only temperate but abstinent. What wonder is it, therefore, that here and there a highly-strung man, eager for promotion, with every nerve quivering with the desire to do his duty, and to excel in it, should resort to wine as a helper?

What we have written about the navy applies mutatis mutandis to the army. The heads of the service are inclined to plunge from one extreme to another. Whereas formerly normal life, both in the navy and army, might be leisurely or even lazy by choice, the tendency now is to overwork the officers of both services. About the navy, at all events, we have no manner of doubt that the stupendous energy and machine-like efficiency required by the Admiralty demands qualities that are quite exceptional, and that if the exigencies of public service require the performance of all the duties now imposed on naval officers, that their number must be increased in the interests of the nation and the navy. The staff of Admiral Togo—the embodiment of efficiency—was larger than that of any European admiral afloat. Relief is required for British naval officers in the direction of more leave and more leisure. These are only obtainable by reducing the amount of work imposed on individuals. We have reason to believe that in the case of the officers of the Home Fleet with nucleus crews, the overstrain is pitiable, and in more than one case has led to tragedies that lie at the door of a Board of Admiralty that expects too much from human nature. The pick of the services have too heavy a burden for human shoulders.

—Yours, &c.,

ARNOLD WHITE.

Farnham Common, Bucks,
October 8th, 1907

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF SIR HENRY WOTTON.

By LOGAN PEARSALL SMITH. 2 vols. 8vo.
[In the press.]

THE OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY.

NICHE—NYWE. A Double Section. By W. A. CRAIGIE. Imperial 4to, 5s. The next issue (Jan. 1) will be a portion of Vol. VII., by DR. MURRAY. Already published, A—L, M—MONOPOLY, N—NYWE, O, P—POLYGENISTIC, Q and R—RESERVE.

THE WRITING OF ENGLISH.

By P. J. HARTOG, with the assistance of Mrs. A. H. LANGDON. Crown 8vo. [In the press.]

MINOR POEMS OF DRAYTON.

Chosen and Edited by CYRIL BRETT. Tudor and Stuart Library." Linen rag paper, printed with the types given to the University by DR. FELL, 1660. Small 4to, 5s. net. [Immediately.]

GREEK CLASSICS FOR ENGLISH READERS. MATTHEW ARNOLD'S MEROPE.

With the Electra of Sophocles translated by R. WHITE-LAW. Edited by J. CHURTON COLLINS. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Extra fcap. 8vo, each 1s. net, with Introductions and Notes by J. CHURTON COLLINS.

EURIPIDES' ALCESTIS.

Translated by H. KYNASTON.

SOPHOCLES' ANTIGONE.

Translated by R. WHITELAW.

AESCHYLUS' PROMETHEUS.

Translated by R. WHITELAW. [In the press.]

AESCHYLUS' AGAMEMNON.

Translated by J. CONINGTON. [In the press.]

THE OXFORD BOOK OF FRENCH VERSE,

XIIIth Century—XIXth Century.

Chosen and Edited by ST. JOHN LUCAS. Fcap. 8vo. [In the press.]

THE SOUNDS OF THE FRENCH LANGUAGE.

Their Formation, Combination, and Representation. By PAUL PASSY. Translated by D. L. SAVORY, M.A., and D. JONES, M.A. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

THE ATTIC THEATRE.

A description of the Stage and Theatre of the Athenians. By A. E. HAIGH. Third Edition, revised and in part re-written, by A. W. PICKARD-CAMBRIDGE. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

STUDIES IN THE MEDICINE OF ANCIENT INDIA.

Part I. OSTEOLOGY, or the Bones of the Human Body.

By A. F. RUDOLF HOERNLE, C.I.E. 8vo, cloth. [Shortly]

ANGLO-CHINESE COM- MERCE AND DIPLOMACY :

mainly in the Nineteenth Century. By A. J. SARGENT, M.A. 8vo. [In the press.]

LONDON :

HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press, Amen Corner, E.C.

SMITH, ELDER & Co.'s NEW BOOKS

NEW VOLUME BY ARTHUR C. BENSON.

JUST PUBLISHED. Large Post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE ALTAR FIRE.

By A. C. BENSON.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR—

The Upton Letters. 11th Impression, 7/6 net.

From a College Window. 10th Impression, 7/6 net.

Beside Still Waters. 2nd Impression, 7/6 net.

THE PIRATES OF MALABAR, and an Englishwoman in India, 200 Years Ago.

By COL. JOHN BIDDULPH, Author of "The Nineteenth and their Times" and "Stringer Lawrence. With a Frontispiece and Map. Large post 8vo, 6s. net. [Ready.]

KING EDWARD VI.: An Appreciation.

Attempted by SIR CLEMENTS R. MARKHAM, K.C.B., F.R.S., Author of "Richard III.: His Life and Character Reviewed in the Light of Recent Research." With 16 Portraits. Small demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [October 15.]

THE LIFE OF CAVOUR.

By the Hon. EDWARD CADOGAN, Author of "Makers of Modern History. With a Portrait. Large Post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [October 15.]

PROSE IDYLS OF THE WEST RIDING.

By Lady CATHERINE MILNES GASKELL, Author of "The New Cinderella," "Spring in a Shropshire Abbey." Crown 8vo, 6s. [In a few days.]

THE VOYAGE OF THE "DISCOVERY."

By Captain ROBERT F. SCOTT, C.V.O., R.N. New and Cheaper Edition, in two vols., each with Coloured Frontispiece, 12 Illustrations, and Map. Large post 8vo, gilt top, 10s. net. [Ready.]

SIR A. CONAN DOYLE, in "Through the Magic Door," now appearing in Cassell's Magazine, says:—"Written in plain sailor fashion, with no attempt at overstatement or colour, it none the less (or perhaps all the more) leaves a deep impression upon the mind."

ESSAYS SPECULATIVE & SUGGES- TIVE.

By JOHN ADDINGTON SYMONDS. New Edition, with an Introduction by HORATIO F. BROWN. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. [Ready.]

THE SCIENCE OF ETHICS.

By LESLIE STEPHEN. New and Cheaper Edition. Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [October 15.]

MR. FREDERIC W. MAITLAND, in his "Life and Letters of Leslie Stephen," says:—"Into no other book did he put so much of his straightforward, vigorous thinking. . . . A brave, veracious, and wholesome book."

SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

NEW VOLUME by STANLEY WEYMAN.

NOW READY AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS.

LAI'D UP IN LAVENDER.

By STANLEY J. WEYMAN.

HER LADYSHIP.

By KATHARINE TYNAN. [October 15.]

MY MERRY ROCKHURST.

By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE. [October 25.]

THE BROKEN ROAD.

By A. E. W. MASON. [November 12.]

THE AWAKENING OF BITTLESHAM.

By G. F. BRADBY.

Country Life says:—"One of the most amusing books about the country we have come across for a long time. Mr. Bradby tells a joyous and merry tale, and his success is pronounced."

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

THE agitation caused by the Censor's attitude in prohibiting the performance of Mr. Garnett's play, "The Breaking Point," is likely to bring about some decisive result. A strong movement against the Censorship as it exists at present is on foot, and we learn that a manifesto, containing the signature of nearly every dramatic author of repute, is likely to be issued in the course of a couple of weeks. In a forthcoming issue we shall publish, from the pen of Mr. Gilbert Murray the English interpreter of the Greek Drama, an article opening the larger issue of the liberty of the stage.

* * *

MESSRS. WILLIAMS & NORGATE have in the press a selection of lectures and addresses from the manuscripts of the late Mr. Herbert Rix, the author of "Tent and Testament," who for many years was Secretary of the Royal Society. Mr. Rix's large and liberal culture, together with the union of freedom and reverence which was so characteristic of his handling of religious and social questions, lead us to expect a most attractive volume. Mr. Rix, who was educated for the Congregational Church, was at one time the coadjutor of Mr. Allanson Picton in a "free church," and was known as a personality of unusual attractiveness in many Unitarian pulpits. His book, "The Larger Faith," obtained favourable notice as an interpretation, at once profound and popular, of modern science in the service of religion.

* * *

A TRANSLATION of Professor Metchnikoff's "Essais Optimistes" is to be published by Mr. Heinemann under the title "The Prolongation of Human Life." Professor Metchnikoff's previous volume on "The Nature of Man" was widely read, and caused some sensation both in this country and on the Continent. In his later volume he expands his earlier thesis that human life is unnaturally short and unnaturally burdened with physical and mental disabilities. Those evils he holds to be due to the unnecessary persistence of mental and physiological traits which man has inherited from his animal ancestors, and which he may overcome by adopting a rational hygiene. In a concluding section Professor Metchnikoff discusses some general problems of science and morals.

* * *

IN writing the biography of Elizabeth Gunning, Duchess of Hamilton and Argyll, Mr. Horace Bleackley has chosen a fascinating subject—one of "the three beautiful Miss Gunnings," whose popularity, it may be remembered, led Boswell into one of his strange blunders regarding Goldsmith, his rival in the affections of the great Doctor. It was during their Paris visit that Goldsmith complained that the populace spent their eyesight in gazing at the beautiful English "misses" to the neglect of his superior personal claims. Boswell, taking him in earnest, quotes it as an instance of his insane egoism. "The Beautiful Duchess" was the heroine of many romantic incidents, besides the secret marriage at midnight in a Mayfair chapel to James, Duke of Hamilton, which brought about the celebrated Douglas cause. Mr. Bleackley defends the Duchess's reputation, and cites evidence in support of his view from several interesting manuscripts to which he has had access. The book will be published by Messrs. Constable.

* * *

IT is strange that we have had to wait so long for an English translation of Luther's letters, but the want is to be supplied by a volume which Miss M. A. Currie will issue this season through Messrs. Macmillan. Luther's correspondents numbered men of all classes, from the three Electors, with whom he was in close relations, to scholars such as Erasmus and Melancthon, and artists like Albrecht Dürer. Coleridge, who was a great reader and admirer of Luther, wrote that he could "scarcely conceive a more delightful volume than might be made from Luther's letters, especially those from the Wartburg, if translated in the simple, idiomatic, hearty mother-tongue of the original."

* * *

FROM Mr. Elkin Matthews' autumn list we learn that Miss Rosalind Travers is about to issue a new volume of verse, "Thyrsis and Fausta, and other Plays and Poems." Her first volume, "The Two Arcadias," was praised by such judges as Dr. Garnett and Professor Dowden, the former contributing a preface, in which he called attention to the author's "bright and inventive fancy," her "deep earnestness and impetuous passion." Professor Dowden, in an article welcoming her as "a new poet," added that she has "a shaping power of imagination, a rare feeling for external nature, a sympathy with human life which is at once stern and tender, and a gift of utterance which is not the mere echo of a master."

* * *

A "LIFE" of the late Bishop E. H. Bickersteth is in the press, and will be published early in the season by Messrs. Longmans. Bishop Bickersteth's hymns are widely known. Some of them are to be found in nearly every modern hymnal. They are marked by a true poetic feeling, as well is a keen sense of rhythm—qualities not always present in the work of contemporary hymn-writers. The coming volume is the work of the Rev. F. K. Aglionby, who was for some time Examining Chaplain to the late Bishop.

* * *

THE issue of a cheap edition of Wilson's "Tales of the Borders" by the Walter Scott Publishing Company, in twenty-four shilling volumes, is an interesting experiment in publishing. There is a great deal of capital reading in the three hundred stories compiled by Wilson and his associates, and though possibly few will admit the claim made in a note added to the concluding volume that the work "comprises certainly the best collection of original stories extant," there is no doubt that by its publication many valuable traditional tales have been preserved. The collection was very successful on its first appearance, more than a hundred and fifty thousand copies having been sold.

* * *

A VOLUME called "A Blue Book," recently published by the Swedish writer August Strindberg, has aroused great discussion both in Scandinavia and Germany. It is dedicated to Emanuel Swedenborg, and takes the form of a series of conversations between a master and his disciple, in which Strindberg's views of religion, philosophy, patriotism, &c., are set forth with characteristic vehemence. In one section he answers those who have charged him with being a woman-hater. All the great writers who wrote on the subject, have, he says, expressed similar views to those which he has been condemned for publishing. Schopenhauer, he notes, has dealt most ably with the subject, Nietzsche is not bad, but Joséph Péladan is the master. In England Thackeray wrote "Men's Wives," but that book is not sufficiently outspoken. Balzac's portrait of Caroline he also regards as an important contribution, and if Otto Weininger had followed up the line he struck out in his earlier work he would have done great things. "I have said," Strindberg goes on, "that a child is a little criminal who cannot rule himself, but I love children all the same. I have also said that woman is what she is, but I have always loved some woman. He who calls me a woman-hater is consequently an idiot, a liar, or a miserable wretch, or all three at the same time."

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"William Pitt, Earl of Chatham." By A. von Ruville. (Heinemann, 3 vols., 30s. net.)

"The Court of Philip IV." By Major Martin Hume. (Nash, 18s. net.)

"Memorials of Thomas Davidson (The Wandering Scholar)." By William Knight. (Unwin, 7s. 6d.)

"Many Mansions." By W. S. Lilly. (Chapman & Hall, 12s. 6d. net.)

"The Breaking Point. A Censured Play." By E. Garnett. (Duckworth, 3s. 6d. net.)

"The Altar Fire." By A. C. Benson. (Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Life of Christ in Recent Research." By W. Sanday, D.D. (Frowde, 7s. 6d. net.)

"Positive Preaching and the Modern Mind." By P. T. Forsyth, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton, 7s. 6d. net.)

"Laid Up in Lavender." By Stanley J. Weyman. (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

"Sénancour (1770-1846): Sa Vie, son Œuvre, son Influence." Par Joachim Merlant. (Paris: Fischbacher, 7 fr. 50.)

"Le Blé qui lève." Roman. Par René Bazin. (Paris: Calmann Lévy, 3 fr. 50.)

"Der eigene Ton." Roman. Von Georg Reicke. (Berlin: Fleischel, M. 6.)

Reviews.

GREEK RELIGION.

THIS book is an excellent example of what our English Universities can do, for, as a whole, from the author down to the paper-maker, the printer, the photographer, and the binder, it is the work of Oxford, its University, its Museum, and its press. Mr. Farnell, as a Fellow of Exeter College, was in his earlier years associated with men like the late President of Trinity, who was both a statesman and a scholar; or Mr. W. C. Boase, who was a distinguished antiquary, whether his special field were Cornwall or Oxford, a careful historian, a brilliant talker, full of "wise saws and modern instances," a teller of anecdotes relating to older men and to a state of academic things which was even then vanishing away; or Dr. Tozer, eminent as traveller and scholar, fit to be classed with a man whose works he edited, Finlay, the historian of post-classical Greece, who yet was under no illusion as to the character of the modern Greek; or with men still active in scientific, academic, or literary labours, like Professors Ray Lankester, Ingram Bywater, Sanday, and W. M. Ramsay. These men seem to have so impressed themselves on the mind of our author that their influence may be seen in the "University Lecturer in Classical Archaeology," who has as his senior colleague Professor Percy Gardner, and as his junior the reader in anthropology, Mr. J. L. Myres. The present writer once heard Farnell distinguish between the English and the German Universities somewhat thus: The English sacrificed the tutor to the student, but the German sacrificed the learner to the teacher; the Englishman was by pre-eminence the tutor, whose function in life was to care for his man, and whose duty it was to shelter from evil and form the character in love of the good and the true; but the German ideal was the professor, the man whose function was to instruct, whose chief duty was to guard and speak the truth, not to protect in fine simplicity and noble purity his pupil. The contrast may be too crudely stated and too sharply drawn, but it is capable of easy and ample illustration. There is the obscurity of the men who are tutors in our older home universities, and the distinction of those who teach in foreign. Who, unless he were on the spot, could name the heads of Oxford Colleges, or their Fellows and Tutors, the members of the Hebdomadal Council, or even the professors of the University? And yet abroad so great is the academic name that famous men struggle for the honour of bearing it, and are known to the people as Professors. Yet at the very moment Farnell was eloquently maintaining his thesis, Robert Browning was an honorary Fellow of Balliol, which he held to be a distinction, honourable though undeserved. Still earlier John Ruskin had been a Professor in Oxford, and before him Matthew Arnold had also held a chair. If Huxley did not attain a similar honour the fault was his; and if Berlin had Mommsen, Oxford in its Regius Professorship of Modern History had in succession three of her foremost sons—Stubbs, Freeman, and Froude. Of these, two were Mommsen's equals in learning, and the other his superior in style. The most distinguished in her schools of all Oxford men, James Bryce, was for many years a Professor, and another Oxford man, illustrious as a statesman, but still more illustrious as a man of letters, John Morley, could have held office in the University had he so needed. This much is to qualify, not to disallow, Farnell's distinction. It hits a blot, though one not inherent in a system which needs broadening and not narrowing. The University ought to be as comprehensive as the nation, with room in it for every type of man or person which the nation holds. Once I heard a Cambridge friend speak of Mr. Keir Hardie as the kind of man they made there into Senior Wranglers. I do not know whether the person so named will feel flattered, but one thing is certain—that if he had found his way into either University, he would have come out another man than he is.

This book has gained from the interval which has elapsed between the issue of Vols. I. and II. and III. and

IV. The author "pleads for indulgence on the grounds that multifarious official duties have borne heavily upon him." Yet the delay is not all loss; for the new volumes are in some respects superior to the old, which came out, if we mistake not, in the very year he was in office as Proctor, and, so quickly does time move, his college has just appointed another of its Fellows to the same office of influence and power. The earlier volumes had more signs of the heavily burdened official than these; the transitions were more abrupt, piece was added to piece, the writing rather than the thinking was continuous. Whether practice has increased skill I know not; but certainly there is less discontinuity, fewer signs of interrupted labour or of a tired and worried mind, in these than in the previous volumes. We are also better able to judge both the method and the evidence he has followed. His material is more archæological than literary, though he uses archæology to illustrate literature, and literature to illustrate archæology. He gives his readers, indeed, in his notes and in his plates, the means of tracing him, of either correcting or supplementing, either qualifying or amplifying, either limiting or enlarging his judgments. He treats of the "Greek cults," not of the Greek gods; it is the active and practical religion, not the mythology, he describes; his concern is with public worship, not with "private sects and private religious speculation." This is the differentiating characteristic of the book. His predecessors followed various lines, either those marked out by Vossius in his once famous work on idolatry, or those of Alexander Ross in his dissertation on the Religions, or those of Ralph Cudworth in his "Intellectual System of the Universe." Vossius fixed on the mythology, certainly to explain the beliefs of Greece by the histories and biographies of the Old Testament. The theory lasted down to the days of Jacob Bryant, and was followed in rapid succession by various philological guessers, which all claimed to be scientific. The last of these was the Solar mythology; which has been succeeded by what we may term the vegetative, which talks as much of the corn-baby or the earth-mother, as the Solar mythology used to speak of the Sun and the Light. The vogue that belongs to the one is almost equal to the vogue which belonged to the other. But the part which Sir George Cox played to Max Müller, some one may yet play to Dr. Frazer; and we may wake some fine morning to discover that a too faithful disciple has done the work of a sworn foe, and that the vegetable has gone in search of the Solar mythology. The second theory took the line of realised or actual religion, and was great in its descriptions of paganism, or the system it so named. The third was occupied with what is here termed "private speculation," which it conceived as classical, and as either philosophical or poetical. If philosophical, a thinker like Plato was made typical, and it was, in effect, argued that his thoughts were normal, and man was better interpreted through him than through a barbarian, or any person low in culture and in civilised status. If poetical, then a poet like Æschylus, or Sophocles, or Pindar was made as typical as Plato; his system was explained, and the lower looked at through the higher stage of humanity. But the problem is in these cases literary, and the peoples that have either no literature, or one that cannot be styled classical, are either forgotten or ignored. Mr. Farnell's method is different; he does not study so much the thoughts as the acts of man; literature concerns him less than art, and even it he studies as a "human document," grouping it as archæology bids him, according to place, which also means race, and according to time, which signifies stage of culture and position in history. The "cults," therefore, admit of an anthropological treatment; literature, as interpreted by art, and art as interpreted by literature, must be alike searched for elements that look outside the special people whose "cult" is described, on the one hand, back to the lower races, and, on the other, forward to the higher civilisations, a reminiscence of the former, a prophecy of the latter. This change, then, in the method of the study of religions is significant in Mr. Farnell's book.

The "cults" which Mr. Farnell here discusses are mainly Chthonian, or, at least, non-Olympian. The one typical Hellenic Deity, whose origin was probably "Aryan," and whose "cult" is here described, is Apollo. The worships are certainly interesting, and raise many questions which are here rather carefully avoided than considered, in comparative provincial or local religion. Why were the Olympians excluded from the circle of the under-world Gods? Why is it that the worship of Zeus represents the highest achievement of the Hellenic spirit in religious speculation, "and that special consideration must be given to it if we would trace the gradual evolution of ideas that made for Monotheism?" Yet why is it that so characteristic a Hellenic belief as that in immortality was evolved mainly in connection with the Chthonian deities and that the mysteries were largely occupied with the worship of the same deities? These are questions Mr. Farnell does not here profess to answer, but they will be asked of him and his book by every student of comparative religion. Yet though such questions as these will be asked in vain, the student of religion will find here much surprising and unsuspected light thrown upon obscure passages and dark sayings in Homer, in Hesiod, in Pindar, and other poets, both dramatic and lyric, and in the most typical of Greek thinkers. No one who wants to know what the average Greek man and woman thought of the gods they worshipped can be indifferent to this book, or can read it without finding it useful. It may to the uninitiated feel tiresome, over-subtle, hair-splitting, and so forth; but to the initiated its most arid pages will be luminous. If one wants to know the meaning of terms like θεομορφία; the relation of human sacrifices to the idea of sacrifice in general, or the prevalence of the custom in Greece; the significance of Demeter, and her relation to the Earth and its Corn on the one hand, and to Kore or Persephone on the other; the "cult" of the Great Mother, and its relation to the idea and the worship of the Virgin in mediæval and modern Europe; or the meaning men attached to the God of the Sea, the significance of Poseidon for those who worshipped him, or the way in which the wanderings, the epithets, the social and political functions of a god may speak of the people who do him service; or to know what Apollo was, and why those who did him honour were termed Hyperboreans—he will, if he is wise, consult this book; and he will find that he does not consult it in vain. We cordially congratulate Mr. Farnell on the book he has written; on the use he has made of archæology; of writers who are also excavators, like Dr. Evans; and the way he has made art interpret letters, and letters explain art.

* "The Cults of the Greek States." By Lewis Richard Farnell, D.Litt., M.A., F.A.S., Fellow and Tutor of Exeter College, University Lecturer in Classical Archaeology, Corresponding Member of the Imperial German Archaeological Institute. Vols. III. and IV. Oxford, at the Clarendon Press.

A. M. FAIRBAIRN.

PAINTER, POET, AND SOCIALIST.*

THIS autobiography, despite occasional errors of fact and some carelessness in construction, possesses a vital human interest. Mr. Walter Crane has lived a strenuous and many-sided life. As a painter and designer, he has earned fame in this country, and possibly a little more fame abroad. As a poet, he cultivated the Italian sonnet, and the few specimens of this craft that are reproduced in the volume before us show that he attained a respectable proficiency. As a Socialist, he was the friend and disciple of William Morris. We are not sure whether the Socialistic phase, which is the last to be indicated in the title to this article, should not have been the first. There is a deal of Socialism in this book of an artist's personal reminiscences. He took an active part in the movements of the eighties, of which Morris was the leader. He believed, and still believes, that the unhealthy conditions of modern art are due to the "competitive and wasteful struggle for existence under capitalism," and that the only panacea for the evil lies in the growth of a new social ideal. This, it will be remembered, was Morris's teaching. Morris insisted on the relationship between art and life. Art as a mighty force in the regeneration of human life—a force that was to be set in motion by Socialism—was one of the principal goals to which he directed his active Socialist propaganda.

Mr. Crane retells the story of the Socialist demonstrations of 1885-7, in which this propaganda was embodied, with considerable eloquence and, as becomes a good disciple, with a freely expressed bias in favour of its promoters. Twenty years have made no difference to the strength of his feelings and convictions, and a distinctly combative tone impregnates this portion of the book. One might almost say that the entire autobiography, after the account of an uneventful childhood, is combative as autobiographies go: for when Mr. Crane is not rending the authorities who put policemen in Trafalgar Square and Mr. Burns and others in prison, he is on the track of the seceders from the "painters' movement" against the Royal Academy, and, as a final exercise, so to speak, crosses swords on a purely personal matter with a certain living art critic. Such robust and, in some instances, provocative plain-speaking may not indicate a model of literary or other discretion, but it shows at any rate a personality of the vigorous sort that is none too common. The son of a painter, Mr. Crane was born in Liverpool on August 15th, 1845, and the first twelve years of his life were spent at Torquay, whither his family removed shortly after his birth. Coming to London in 1857, he was apprenticed to W. J. Linton, the famous engraver and the husband of Mrs. Lynn Linton, for the purpose of learning to draw upon the wood. During this period, as Mr. Crane is careful to record, he was not a politician, his thoughts being mostly concentrated on the study of art, illustrative and other, and Ruskin's writings; but he was interested in the heroic figure of Garibaldi, and, when the patriot came to England, shared in the enthusiasm that greeted him. In 1862, after his apprenticeship had ended, he was employed by J. R. Wise to illustrate a work on "The New Forest," and about 1865 he began to design for Mr. Evans the children's picture-books which, published by Messrs. Routledge, are now so closely associated with his art. About this time also, he tells us, a study of Mill, Darwin, Herbert Spencer, and the Positivists swayed his mind in the direction of Free Thought.

He relates his conversion to Socialism very simply:—

"A little pamphlet entitled 'Art and Socialism,' issued as one of the 'Leek Reprints'—really a reprint of one of Morris's addresses—had a great effect upon my mind, and led me into a correspondence with Morris on the subject, in which I stated all the objections or difficulties which occurred to me against Socialism, as I then understood it, and he very kindly wrote fully in reply. The result was that the difficulties disappeared, and from the verge of pessimism as regards human progress, I accepted the Socialist position, which became a universal solvent in my mind. It was the question which swallowed all other questions—'Like Aaron's rod,' as Morris said at the time."

In 1876 Sir Coutts Lindsay projected the Grosvenor Gallery, and for several years afterwards Mr. Crane contributed thereto. Meanwhile, he was keeping his book illustration going, but not apparently with sufficient assiduity to defy competition—judging by the Kate Greenaway incident related on p. 180. A little later his activity extended to theatrical circles. He was consulted by Mr. W. S. Gilbert about the costumes and scenery for "Patience," and by Mr. D'Oyley Carte about the decoration and planning of the new Savoy Theatre. Occasional Socialistic cartoons were also among his output at this time. In 1886 the scheme for a big national art exhibition was mooted, carrying with it the mending or ending of the Royal Academy. As everybody knows, this attempt proved abortive so far as the painters were concerned; it was discovered, when the question was put to the test, that certain prominent artists "were not willing to forego their own chances of election to the privileged body they had made a show of opposing." But from the ashes of this effort arose the Arts and Crafts Exhibition Society, of whose progress since Mr. Crane permits himself to speak with presidential and perfectly justifiable pride.

We have no space to deal with Mr. Crane's experiences as a teacher of design at Manchester and South Kensington, as a Socialist orator in America, or as the bright, if contentious, spirit in the several other atmospheres of which this book tells us. There are things in it which it would be well to correct before future editions; an amazingly wrong explanation of the famous Sandys caricature of Millais's "Sir Isumbras" occurs on p. 38; several names are misspelt; one or two punning and rather silly efforts at "lightness" of style are allowed to impair the dignity of the work; and the prose of the narrative is sometimes decidedly slipshod. But, in spite of these blemishes, it is one of the most delightful books of artists' memories that we remember, and, in its more serious aspects, a helpful book. The illustrations from Mr. Crane's own pictures and studies are ample and interesting.

* "An Artist's Reminiscences." By Walter Crane. Methuen & Co. 18s. net.

A Selection from

HODDER & STOUGHTON'S

Autumn
Announcements.

THEOLOGICAL AND RELIGIOUS.

THE EXPOSITOR'S GREEK

TESTAMENT. Vol. IV. Edited by the Rev. W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, M.A., LL.D. Contents:—I. and II. THESSALONIANS. By Rev. James Moffatt, D.D.—I. and II. TIMOTHY and TITUS. By Rev. Prof. Newport, J. D. White, D.D.—HEBREWS. By Rev. Principal Marcus Dods, D.D.—JAMES. By Rev. W. O. E. Oesterley, M.A., B.D.—I. PETER. By Rev. J. H. A. Hart, M.A.—II. PETER. By Rev. R. H. Strachan, M.A.—JOHN. By Rev. David Smith, M.A.—JUDE. By Rev. J. B. Mayor, Litt.D.—REVELATION. By Rev. James Moffatt, D.D. Complete in 4 volumes. Price to Subscribers, £3 net the Set. Single volumes, 28s. For Contents of Vols. I., II., III., see Special Prospectus.

JERUSALEM. The Topography, Economics, and History, from the Earliest Times to 70 A.D. By the Rev. Prof. GEORGE ADAM SMITH, D.D., LL.D. In 2 vols., with Illustrations. 24s. net.

PAULINE CITIES. By Prof. Sir W. M. RAMSAY, D.C.L., Litt.D., D.D. With Maps and Illustrations. 12s.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF NEW TESTAMENT HISTORY OF RELIGIOUS PRINCIPLES. By the Rev. Principal A. M. FAIRBAIRN, M.A., D.D., LL.D. 12s.

STUDIES IN THE INNER LIFE OF JESUS. By the Rev. Principal A. E. GARVIE, D.D. 7s. 6d. net.

EXPOSITIONS OF HOLY SCRIPTURE. By the Rev. ALEXANDER MACLAREN, D.D., D.Litt. Third Series. 6 vols. 1. ACTS, Vol. II. 2. ST. JOHN, Vol. I. 3. ST. JOHN, Vol. II. 4. ST. JOHN, Vol. III. 5. II. KINGS, CHRONICLES, EZRA, NEEHEMIAH, ESTHER, JOB. 6. PROVERBS and ECCLESIASTES. 24s. net the Series. Separate Volumes, 7s. 6d. Prospectus on application.

THE ANALYSED BIBLE. By the Rev. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN, D.D. Vol. I. GENESIS to ESTHER. Vol. II. JOB to MALACHI. Vol. III. THE NEW TESTAMENT. 3s. 6d. each.

CHRIST'S SERVICE OF LOVE. By the Rev. Prof. HUGH BLACK, M.A. 6s.

THE VIRGIN BIRTH OF CHRIST. By the Rev. Prof. JAMES ORR, M.A., D.D. 6s.

POSITIVE PREACHING AND MODERN MIND. By the Rev. Principal P. T. FORSYTH, D.D. 7s. 6d. net.

THE LIFE OF CHRIST ACCORDING TO ST. MARK. By the Rev. Prof. W. H. BENNETT, M.A., D.D., D.Litt. 6s.

THE CHURCH, THE CHURCHES, AND THE SACRAMENTS. By the Rev. J. AGAR BEET, D.D. 2s.

STUDIES IN THE PARABLES, AND OTHER SERMONS. By the Rev. Prof. JOHN LAIDLAW, D.D. With Memoir by the Rev. Prof. H. R. Mackintosh, D.Phil. With Portrait. 6s.

GOD'S MESSAGE TO THE HUMAN SOUL. By the Rev. JOHN WATSON, D.D. 5s. net.

THE STUDENT'S OLD TESTAMENT. Vol. IV. ISRAEL'S LAWS AND LEGAL PRECEDENTS. By Prof. CHARLES FOSTER KENT, Ph.D. Complete in 6 vols. 12s. net each. Prospectus on application.

THE INCARNATION AND RECENT CRITICISM. By R. J. COOKE, D.D. 6s.

SCIENTIFIC CONFIRMATIONS OF OLD TESTAMENT HISTORY. By Prof. G. F. WRIGHT, D.D., LL.D. 6s.

BELLES LETTRES, BIOGRAPHY, &c.

STORIES FROM THE ARABIAN

NIGHTS. Illustrated with 50 Plates in Colour by EDMUND DULAC. The Stories Retold by LAURENCE HOUSMAN. Edition de Luxe (limited to 350 Copies), £2 2s. net. Popular Edition, 15s. net. Special Prospectus on application.

PETER PAN IN KENSINGTON

GARDENS. By J. M. BARRIE. New Presentation Edition. With 50 Plates in Colour by ARTHUR RACKHAM. Bound in rough Persian, boxed, 25s. net. Popular Edition, 15s. net.

THE BRONTES: Life and Letters.

By CLEMENT SHORTER. Two vols. 24s. net.

IMMORTAL MEMORIES.

By CLEMENT SHORTER. 6s. net.

IBSEN.

By Edmund Gosse. A New Volume of "Literary Lives." Edited by W. ROBERTSON NICOLL. Illustrated, 3s. 6d.

THE TRIUMPH OF LIFE.

By WILLIAM BARRY, D.D. 7s. 6d. net.

THE LIFE OF THOMAS J. BARNARD.

Illustrated. 12s.

THE LIFE OF GEORGE MATHE-

SON, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E. By the Rev. D. MACMILLAN, D.D. 7s. 6d.

THE SUPERINTENDENT.

The Life of Dr. Robertson of Canada. By RALPH CONNOR. 6s.

THE SCOT OF THE EIGHTEENTH

CENTURY: his Religion and his Life. By the Rev. JOHN WATSON, D.D. 7s. 6d. net.

THE AWAKENING OF CHINA.

By W. A. P. MARTIN, D.D., LL.D. Illustrated, 16s. net. Special Prospectus on application.

THE COLLECTED POEMS OF

DORA SIGERSON SHORTER. With an Introduction by George Meredith. 6s. net.

ENGLISH HUMORISTS OF TO-

DAY. By J. A. HAMMERTON. Illustrated. 3s. 6d.

DAYS OFF.

By Henry Van Dyke, D.D., LL.D. 6s.

THOMAS ALVA EDISON: Sixty

Years of an Inventor's Life. By FRANCIS ARTHUR JONES. 6s. net.

THROUGH PERSIA IN A MOTOR-

CAR. By CLAUDE ANET. Illustrated, 16s. net. Special Prospectus on application.

BY ITALIAN SEAS.

By Ernest C. FEIXOTTO. Illustrated. 12s. net. Special Prospectus on application.

FLATS, URBAN HOUSES, AND

COTTAGE HOMES. Edited by W. SHAW SPARROW. A Companion Volume to "The British Home of To-day," and "The Modern Home." Illustrated with 24 pages in Colour, and 86 pages of Black-and-White Illustrations. Art Wrapper, 5s. net; cloth, 7s. 6d. net. Limited Edition (25 copies), 21s. net. Special Prospectus on application.

FICTION.

CARETTE OF SARK. By JOHN OXENHAM. Illustrated. 6s.

THE MESSENGER. By FRANK-FORT MOORE. 6s.

QUICKSANDS. By J. A. STEUART. 6s.

THE TRAMPLED CROSS By JOSEPH HOCKING. Illustrated in Colours. 3s. 6d.

A SHEPHERD OF KENSINGTON. By MARGARET BAILLIE-SAUNDERS. 6s.

ST. GWYNIFER. By SILAS K. HOCKING. Illustrated in Colour. 3s. 6d.

LOVE-IN-A-MIST. By MADAME ALBANESI. 5s.

ROSE OF BLENHEIM. By MORICE GERARD. Coloured Frontispiece. 6s.

THE HOUSE OF LYNCH. By LEONARD MERRICK. 6s.

BROKEN OFF. By MRS. BAILLIE REYNOLDS. Illustrated. 6s.

CAPTAIN JUNE. By ALICE HEGAN RICE. Illustrated. 3s. 6d.

THE JESTER'S WINDOW. By KEBLE HOWARD. 5s.

THOU FOOL. By J. J. BELL. 6s.

GOSSIP CORNER. By WALTER RAYMOND. Illustrated. 6s.

A PROPHET IN BABYLON. By W. J. DAWSON. 6s.

THE DAUGHTER OF ANDERSON CROW. By GEORGE B. MCCUTCHEON. Illustrated. 6s.

COMRADES. By MAXIM GORKY. 6s.

ARIZONA NIGHTS. By STEWART EDWARD WHITE. 6s.

THE CHATEAU BY THE LAKE. By AMY LE FEUVRE. 6s.

WHERE THE WIND SITS. By the Author of "Honor's Patchwork." 6s.

THE TRACKS WE TREAD. By G. B. LANCASTER. 6s.

NAPOLEONIC SCRAPS.*

THERE are two ways of writing history. Either you may delve deep below the surface of things into soil that has not been worked by previous investigators; and by bringing to the surface new materials, even new fossils, you may perceptibly add to the wealth of the mind's museum. Or there is the other method, of raking over the surface and giving new form to what has been already used and perhaps discarded. The latter method may lead to the compilation of a readable book; but to the delver alone can we render homage. With all the goodwill in the world to the Norwegian gentleman who has sought to tell once more the story of Napoleon, we cannot class him among the delvers. He partly disarms criticism by assuring us that his intention was at the outset to study the history of the reaction which spread over Europe after Waterloo, but that he found himself unable to understand that period without constantly recurring to the Napoleonic times; and in these subsidiary studies he evidently fell under the spell of the Great Emperor; for he "flung everything else aside and fastened on Napoleon."

It is regrettable that he did not set himself the somewhat arduous task of mastering at least the most important parts of the diplomatic and documentary materials which are so essential to any adequate knowledge of the hidden springs of action of that period. The entire absence of foot-notes and the presence of serious defects in the present work lead us reluctantly to the conclusion that Mr. Kielland has relied almost entirely on impressions gained from the memoir-writers of that imaginative age. The result is a narrative that runs freshly and is marked by a naïve egoism that has its charm; as when, à propos of Napoleon's alleged inability to laugh a good laugh, Mr. Kielland tells us that he has never been in the presence of a great man with the exception of Björnson—"How he can laugh! His laughter has a full, resounding ring, as if it came from the depths of his heart. There are few things so pleasant as to hear Björnson laugh." It is, however, scarcely correct to accuse the Emperor of inability to laugh. Emperors very rarely do give vent to their feelings; and Napoleon, while keeping some check on all display of familiarity, certainly had moods of gaiety that charmed everyone.

A note of exaggeration often characterises these pages, as when Mr. Kielland says (p. 51)—"He (Napoleon) had always the same marble coldness, with his lips firmly compressed, ready to issue the word of command, or to frighten men to death with a voice that had no equal." Or again, when he says that the Emperor ate so quickly as to rise from table before the soup was finished at the lower end of it. So, too, his reference (p. 99) to the Emperor "flinging himself into his boiling bath" is not one that carries conviction with it. Still less is the assertion that in 1805-6 the German ladies "could not withstand the handsome cavaliers from Paris that swept in like a hurricane from the field, laughing and amorous." This is in the vein of Marbot; but if Mr. Kielland consults German memoirs, he will find that the conquerors were left, as a rule, severely alone. Amorous conquests were frequent at Warsaw, but not in any German town. Even at Cassel, under Jerome's luxurious régime, a liaison with a French officer seemed scandalous. But when the author gets hold of an idea he runs it so hard that we find the following passage anent the dancing powers of the French soldiery quartered on German towns—"No one could resist the gallants, speaking the fine language of the ruling power, with such busy hands and so sure a grip of the figure, dancing and leaping as if they had springs in their legs." Why, one asks, did Germany rise against the French in 1813?

Mr. Kielland shrewdly sees the magnitude of Napoleon's error respecting Spain. He well points out that the Emperor could not realise that "there is a patriotism beyond the range of reason," and that hence Spain, on which he threw himself in 1808, "was a fatal enigma to him." Herein Mr. Kielland shows better insight and sounder historical knowledge than Mr. Oscar Browning who, in his introduction to this volume, hazards the curious statement that "Spain was a dependency of France, which it was absolutely necessary to preserve in a condition of tolerable government and of loyalty to the French alliance." Granted that Spain was an ally of France, was it statesman-like to subject that ally to the overbearing and perfidious treatment which aroused inextinguishable hatred in the Spanish nation? But, as this introduction shows, Mr. Oscar Browning will not allow that Napoleon could do wrong. Concerning his invasion of Russia in 1812, he says that the cause of that rupture "has not yet been completely elucidated"—a statement which, in view of the researches of M. Vandal and others, is surprising. Mr. Kielland, on the other hand, sees that Napoleon was often led astray by his profound egotism, as appeared when he left his army in Egypt and made off for France. Other cases would afford even better instances of this quality; for to go straightway to France in the late summer of 1799 was, perhaps, a patriotic duty if all the circumstances of that time are considered.

It is on such questions that Mr. Kielland's narrative is wholly inadequate. He admits that he does not understand the reason why Bonaparte went to Egypt at all, though the motives of that expedition are quite explicable by reference to the general's letters and conversations. Further, he holds the antiquated view that England was throughout persistently hostile to Bonaparte, and was determined "never to treat with Napoleon under any circumstances." He is here alluding to the events of the years 1800-1801, in the latter of which England did conduct negotiations for peace, and concluded it on terms unfavourable to herself. The statement just quoted and that which comes on page 55—"During these years of comparative peace the First Consul was constantly occupied with plans against England, with which he was always at war"—seem to show that Mr. Kielland, in his desire to make out a strong case against England, has completely overlooked the Peace of Amiens. We also read that "every time that a country was beaten England came to it with fresh money and fresh proposals for a coalition." This is what comes of undertaking to write history from memoirs and newspaper gossip, with little or no regard to the motives which are now known to have influenced the conduct of governments. Similarly, at the close of Chapter IV., in touching on the causes of the war with Russia in 1812, the author seems to attribute it mainly to the fact that Napoleon was a parvenu among monarchs, and that Alexander I. "played him false," whatever that may mean. There is no reference to the weighty causes that influenced Russian policy, only a bare mention of the Continental system, and none at all of the Polish question.

As a collection of anecdotes the book is not without its value; and here and there Mr. Kielland shows a shrewd insight into the defects of his hero's character; but the references to Napoleon's chiefs, both military and diplomatic, are too depreciatory. Maret, Duc de Bassano, was something more than a short-sighted toady; and Talleyrand was not always icily false. As Mr. Joseph McCabe, the translator of this book, has shown in his "Talleyrand," that statesman was imbued with a keen sense of the real needs of France. We could wish that he had been allowed to add notes correcting some of the one-sided allusions to the Prince de Benevento. Mr. Kielland's style is fresh and lit up with quaint touches; but it sometimes drops sheer down to the ludicrous. For instance, after describing Bonaparte's care of his skin, by lying for hours in impossibly hot water, and his dressing in "narrow white trousers, of the finest material and spotlessly clean," Mr. Kielland descants on his amiable habit of running races with Josephine and the other young women in the garden at Malmaison, and winds up thus: "But he did not like anyone to beat him in the race; and he was angry when he fell down and got grass-spots on his white hose." Mr. Kielland, like the wearers of tight white breeches, should remember that there is only a step from the sublime to the ridiculous.

* "Napoleon's Men and Methods." By Alexander L. Kielland. Translated by Joseph McCabe. A. Owen & Co. 10s. net.

J. M. DENT and CO.Early Autumn Books.

THE OLD VENETIAN PALACES AND OLD VENETIAN FOLK. By THOMAS OKEY. With 50 Coloured and many Black and White Illustrations by TREVOR HADDON, R.B.A. Also Reproductions from Ruskin's "Stones of Venice" and "The Seven Lamps of Architecture," &c. Square medium 8vo, £1 1s. net.

FLOWER GROUPING in ENGLISH, SCOTCH AND IRISH GARDENS. Text by ROSE KINGSLEY, the Hon. EMILY LAWLESS, WALTER P. WRIGHT, and others. With Notes and between 50 and 60 Illustrations in Colour by MARGARET WATERFIELD. Sq. crown 4to. £1 1s. net.
A companion volume to "GARDEN COLOUR," now in its Fourth Edition.

THE OLD SILVER SACRAMENTAL VESSELS OF FOREIGN PROTESTANT CHURCHES in ENGLAND. By E. ALFRED JONES. With 22 Reproductions in Photogravure and Half-tone, royal 4to. One guinea net.

OLD AND NEW JAPAN. By CLIVE HOLLAND. With 50 Coloured Illustrations by MONTAGUE SMYTH. Large fcap. 4to, 16s. net.

INGOLDSBY LEGENDS. With about 24 Coloured Illustrations mounted, 12 printed on tinted backgrounds, and about 60 in Black and White. By ARTHUR RACKHAM, A.R.W.S. 15s. net.
Limited Large-Paper Edition bound in vellum, 500 copies, each signed by the artist, £2 2s. net.

PALGRAVE'S GOLDEN TREASURY. With 25 Coloured Illustrations and numerous Decorations by R. ANNING BELL. Cloth, 10s. 6d. net. Bound in watered silk, 12s. 6d. net. Also an Edition de Luxe, with Coloured Illustrations mounted on tinted paper, bound in full vellum, 21s. net.

JAMES FRANCIS EDWARD: the Old Chevalier. By MARTIN HAILE, Author of "Mary of Modena, Queen of James II." With Illustrations in Photogravure, 16s. net.

VASARI ON TECHNIQUE. Translated into English for the first time by L. S. MACLEHOSE. The Translation Revised and an Introduction added by Professor BALDWIN BROWN. With Coloured and other Illustrations, square demy 8vo, 15s. net.

SIR GEORGE GREY. By G. C. HENDERSON, M.A., Professor of History in the Adelaide University. With many Illustrations and Maps, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

ST. CATHERINE OF SIENA. A Study in Italian Religion, Literature, and History of the XIV. Century. By EDMUND G. GARDNER. With an Appendix containing some hitherto unpublished Letters of St. Catherine, and Illustrations reproduced in Photogravure. Square demy 8vo, 16s. net.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN. By HENRY BRYAN BINNS. With Portraits and other Illustrations, crown 8vo, cloth, 4s. 6d. net. (New Volume in the "Temple Biographies.")

CITIES OF ITALY. By ARTHUR SYMONS. A Collection of Essays dealing with Rome, the Improvement of Rome, Venice, the Waters of Venice, Naples, Ravenna, Pisa, Siena, Verona, Bologna, Bergamo, Lorenzo Lotto, Brescia, and Roumanino; and "On a Rembrandt in Milan." Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

THE QUAIN COMEDY OF LOVE WOOING AND MATING. Selected and arranged by DUNCAN and AUGUST McDUGALL, and containing many Poems not to be found in any other Anthology. 3s. 6d. net.

ROMANTIC ESSEX. By REGINALD A. BECKETT. A New Edition, with Frontispiece in Half-tone, and Map. Crown 8vo, 2s. net.

ENGLISH IDYLLS. Each with 24 Coloured Illustrations by C. E. BROCK. Cloth, fcap. 8vo, 5s. net. Also in vellum binding, 8s. 6d. net.

New volumes:

PRIDE AND PREJUDICE. NORTHANGER ABBEY.

DICKENS' CHRISTMAS BOOKS. Each with 8 Coloured and some Line Illustrations by CHARLES E. BROCK. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net. Also in vellum, 5s. net.

New volumes:

THE BATTLE OF LIFE. THE HAUNTED MAN. AND MANY OTHER WORKS.

Also additions to the following Series:—

The Temple Classics. The Temple Molière.
The Temple Dickens. The Temple Primers.
Les Classiques Français.
The Temple Greek and Latin Classics.
Everyman's Library.

Please write for a Full List of Dent's Autumn Publications, with Prospectuses, post-free from

J. M. DENT & CO., 29, Bedford Street, London, W.C.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.

READY OCTOBER 16th.

THE LETTERS OF QUEEN VICTORIA.

A SELECTION FROM HER MAJESTY'S CORRESPONDENCE, 1837-1861.

PUBLISHED BY AUTHORITY OF HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

Edited by ARTHUR CHRISTOPHER BENSON and VISCOUNT ESHER, G.C.V.O.

With numerous Photogravures, medium 8vo, 3 vols. £3 3s. net.

The period covered by these volumes is a memorable one in the history both of Europe and England, and includes—The Queen's Marriage—The Adoption of Free Trade—The Repeal Agitation—Chartism—The Revolutionary Movement of '48—The Crimean War—The Indian Mutiny, &c.

OVER-SEA BRITAIN.

A Descriptive Record of the Geography, the Historical, Ethnological, and Political Development and the Economic Resources of the Empire. THE NEARER EMPIRE.—The Mediterranean, British Africa, and British America. By E. F. KNIGHT, Author of "Where Three Empires Meet." "Small Boat Sailing," &c. With 9 Coloured Maps, crown 8vo, 6s. net.

INDIAN JOTTINGS.

From Ten Years' Experience in and around Poona City. By the Rev. E. F. ELWIN, of the Society of St. John the Evangelist. With Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[Ready next week.]

A SOLDIER OF THE LEGION.

An Englishman's Adventures under the French Flag in Algeria and Tonquin. By GEORGE MANINGTON. Edited by WILLIAM C. SLATER and ARTHUR J. SARL. With Maps and Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[Ready next week.]

HISTORY OF VENICE.

Its Individual Growth from the Earliest Beginnings to the Fall of the Republic. By POMPEO MOLMENTI. Translated by HORATIO F. BROWN, Author of "Life on the Lagoons," &c., &c. 3 parts (2 vols. each), demy 8vo, 21s. net each part.

Part I.—VENICE IN THE MIDDLE AGES.

[Just out.]

Part II.—VENICE IN THE GOLDEN AGE.

[Now ready.]

Part III.—THE DECADENCE OF VENICE.

VIRGIL'S MESSIANIC ECLOGUE.

Its Meaning, Occasion, and Sources. Three Studies by the Rev. JOSEPH B. MAYOR, Litt.D., W. WARDE FOWLER, and Professor R. S. CONWAY, Litt.D. With the Text of the Eclogue, and a Verse Translation by R. S. CONWAY. Post 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

[Ready next week.]

TWO NEW 6s. NOVELS.

[Ready next week.]

ANCESTORS.

GERTRUDE ATHERTON.

TOWARD THE DAWN.

HALLIWELL SUTCLIFFE.

REDCOAT CAPTAIN.

A Story of "That Country." By ALFRED OLLIVANT, Author of "Owd Bob," "Danny," &c. With Illustrations by W. GRAHAM ROBERTSON. Square demy 8vo, 6s.

Readers of "Owd Bob" and "Danny" will recognise that Mr. Ollivant stands in a class by himself. The originality of the subjects he chooses and of his method of treating them are all his own, and this book is an excursion in a region which has never been touched before.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

THE OUTLOOK FOR SMALL HOLDINGS.*

THIS book represents the results of three years of careful research, carried out in all parts of the country by a practical farmer at the request of the Co-operative Small Holdings Association. That society is to be congratulated on the considerable public service it has done in causing such a book to be written and published. Miss Jebb is a careful investigator, with a great sense of responsibility and an intimate knowledge of her subject. Nobody could pretend to think that she had been called in to write up a partisan case, nor can anybody complain that she writes on the country with the innocent zeal of the town. Her book, which is judicial, temperate, candid, and written in a style so simple as to be almost bare, is a dispassionate and critical survey of all the facts. Miss Jebb gives her own conclusions, and these, of course, will not be accepted by everybody, but all parties have agreed in recognising the importance and the impartiality of her investigations.

The result of these investigations is certainly highly encouraging for those who think that by a determined and incisive policy the State may arrest the euthanasia of the country. For what are the arguments of those who throw cold water on these hopes? One important argument is that, given the fiscal circumstances of England, small holdings can only succeed in a few places, and that the reason why there are so few small holdings is that the special conditions which are necessary to their success are very rarely to be found. By this kind of argument Mr. Balfour dismisses the whole historical setting of the subject. He blots out the story of the enclosures and the series of measures by which a powerful class absorbed the villages, just as he puts out of sight all the strong motives that arrest and divert at the moment the play of economic forces in the use and development of the land. But we need not follow him into these very important and significant aspects of the question, for if we confine ourselves to Miss Jebb's survey of the actual state of things, we see at once that everything depends upon the content of the formula "where the conditions are suitable." Everybody agrees that small holdings will not become the only type of farming in England. But where people often differ is in their view of what are the conditions that are necessary, and where those conditions exist or can be provided. It is here that Miss Jebb's book is particularly encouraging, for she shows that the conditions of success do not belong to some eccentricity of soil or situation, but that they are conditions which are already satisfied in many parts of the country, and conditions which elsewhere it is often possible to create. For the great truth which has to be remembered is that there are many conditions under which small holdings prosper, and that it is essential to have not all but one of those conditions. Thus, small holdings may succeed in one place because of the special fertility of the soil; in another because of the advantages of the climate; in a third because good markets are near; in a fourth because there is piece work to be got in the neighbourhood; in a fifth because there are common rights which enable the small holder to eke out a living. Calstock, in Cornwall, has not a fertile soil except in the hollow of the valleys, but it is sheltered from the winds and frost, and thus the small holders are able to grow the earliest out-of-door fruit in the English market. In the fen district of Lincolnshire the soil is specially suitable for early potatoes. The common rights in the New Forest enable some thousands of small holders to live on holdings of from three to fourteen acres which otherwise would not support them. At Nordelph, in Norfolk, there is a good deal of piece work to be had on the large farms round, and at Winterslow there is work in the woods. There is one case noted by Miss Jebb, the small holdings established by the Norfolk Association, where none of the conditions seem to be present, and yet there have been no apparent failures in the seven years since the experiment began.

Now there are two important morals to be drawn from Miss Jebb's careful analysis of the actual working of small holdings—those that are natural survivals, or those founded by philanthropic companies, or by commercial land companies, or by private enterprise. Many of the conditions of success can be created and organised. This is true, for example, of common rights. Mr. Harcourt's measure provides for the acquisition of common grazing lands for the use of small holders. Cobbett wrote of the waste lands which were then disappearing so fast in 1832: "The cows, pigs, geese, poultry, gardens, bees, and fuel that arise from those wastes far exceed even in the capacity of sustaining people, similar breadths of ground, distributed into those large farms in the poorer parts of Northumberland." It is true also of subsidiary employment. If all considerations of agriculture were put on one side, the case for public afforestation in England and Scotland is overwhelming. Otherwise we shall be threatened sooner or later with a timber famine. And the development of forests—not forests, of course, for growing red deer, but forests for growing timber—will supply just the kind of subsidiary employment that has made small holdings successful near the Forest of Wyre, or at Verwood, or in Cornwall. It is true also of the accessibility of markets. If many an English farmer finds that he is much further from London than his Continental rival, the reason is that in the case of the Continental farmer distance is annihilated by co-operation. That was the moral of the recent report on railway rates. By co-operation an industry can do two things. It can bargain effectively with the railway company, and it can make it worth while for the railway company to carry its produce. Here then is another important condition of success which depends not on the caprice of the climate but on the determination and the power of man and society. Miss Jebb's admirable book shows clearly enough that the policy of pushing small holdings is not a sort of artificial respiration administered to a struggling and desperate form of culture. It is a policy full of hope and permanent promise.

BRITISH WRITERS ON CLASSIC LANDS.*

THE Honble. A. S. G. Canning is one of those writers whose ceaseless booklets fly about us like gnats in summer—a tickling annoyance. With what object he writes, and what public he is addressing in the present volume, for instance, we cannot so much as guess. This we know, that to take such a work as the present seriously would be as derogatory to the intelligence of a reviewer as its production is derogatory to the intelligence of its author. How such twaddle could be deliberately given to the world passes our comprehension; it is certainly most unfair to impose it on the book market in all the dignity of an attractive title to which it has scarcely any relation. The first passages cited are the two well-known descriptions of Rome and Athens in "Paradise Regained," with a running comment derived principally from Lemprière's Classical Dictionary, in which we are gravely informed that "Plato was a celebrated philosopher at Athens," "the Lyceum a pleasant and salubrious spot where Aristotle taught philosophy." This and the like lead us to a digression on Pope's and Lord Derby's translations of the Iliad, dragged in without the smallest reference to the subject of the volume. Shakespeare's "Troilus and Cressida" comes next, with some account of "Timon of Athens" and "Julius Cæsar" which are generally discussed, pretty much in the way in which a Board School teacher would drill his class for the Oxford and Cambridge Locals. It is possible that Mr. Canning may be aspiring to enlighten candidates for those examinations. Byron's "Childe Harold" is next discussed after the same fashion. The book then simply goes to pieces in a labyrinthine medley in which Gibbon, Sir Walter Scott, Bulwer Lytton, and Kingslake jostle each other in most admired disorder, till Macaulay's "Lays" are reached. Thackeray is then lugged in, presumably on account of his anti-classical proclivities, which are duly enlarged on, and the book winds up with the influence of the classics on Dickens, as evidenced by his "Pictures from Italy" and his account of Dr. Blimber's School. Such is "British Writers on Classic Lands."

* "The Small Holdings of England." A survey of various existing systems. By L. Jebb. 10s. 6d. net.

* "British Writers on Classic Lands. A Literary Sketch." By the Hon. Albert S. G. Canning. T. Fisher Unwin.

DUCKWORTH & CO.

By Robert Elliott.

"ACT OF GOD."The Most Powerful Sea Tale that has been Published for Years Past.PUNCH says:—"One of the most remarkable books it has been my good fortune to read for many a year. A fine and powerful piece of work."

DION CLAYTON CALTHROPS Romantic Novel

THE DANCE OF LOVE.

With a Frontispiece and Designed Cover, crown 8vo 6s.

CHARLES D. STEWART'S

Humorous Tale of Life on an American River Steamer.

PARTNERS OF PROVIDENCE.

With over 100 Illustrations, crown 8vo 6s.

COLLECTED ESSAYS.By Sir LESLIE STEPHEN, K.C.B., With Introductory Essays by the Right Hon. JAMES BRYCE and HERBERT PAUL. Library Edition. In ten volumes.
Limited to 250 sets. Cloth extra, gilt tops, large crown 8vo, £3 net the set. (Published in conjunction with Messrs.
Smith, Elder & Co.)

STOPFORD BROOKE'S NEW BOOK.

THE SEA-CHARM OF VENICE.By the Rev. STOPFORD A. BROOKE. Fcap.
8vo, 2s. 6d. net. Uniform with "The Roadmender."ROMAN SCULPTURE FROM AUGUSTUS TO CONSTANTINE.By Mrs. S. ARTHUR STRONG, LL.D. With 130 Plates, pott 4to, 10s. net."Mrs. Strong has never ceased to claim serious aesthetic consideration for the works of Roman artists, and is admirably equipped for the task which she has here undertaken. A word of special praise is due for the excellent selection of illustrations, which leave no phase of Roman sculpture unrepresented, and include several unfamiliar subjects."From the Spectator, July 13th.THE BREAKING POINT.A CENSURED PLAY. By EDWARD GARNETT.
With Preface and a Letter to the Censor. Crown 8vo.
3s. 6d. net.LYRICAL BALLADS BY WILLIAM WORDS-WORTH AND S. T. COLERIDGE, 1798.Edited, with certain Poems of 1798 and an Introduction and Notes, by THOMAS HUTCHINSON, of Trinity College, Dublin, &c. Second Edition, Revised. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d.
net.Professor ROBERTS'S New Book of Animal Life.THE HAUNTERS OF THE SILENCES.By CHARLES G. D. ROBERTS, Author of "The Kindred of the Wild," "Red Fox," &c. With 50 Illustrations
(several in Colour) and many Decorations by CHARLES LIVINGSTON BULL. Large crown 8vo. 6s. net.READY SHORTLY.*THE CHRIST FACE IN ART.By the Rev. J. BURNS. With upwards of 60 Illustrations in Tint. Cloth extra, gilt, crown 8vo, 6s.

London: DUCKWORTH & Co., 3, Henrietta St., Covent Garden, W.C.

Mr. Heinemann's New Books

COMPLETION OF A GREAT WORK.

Mr. HEINEMANN has much pleasure in announcing the completion by the publication next week of the 6th and 8th Volumes, ofThe WORLD'S HISTORY

A SURVEY OF MAN'S RECORD.

Edited by Dr. H. F. HELMOLT. With an Introductory Essay by the Rt. Hon. JAMES BRYCE, D.C.L., LL.D., F.R.S.Eight royal 8vo volumes, with many Maps, Coloured Plates, and Black-and-White Illustrations, cloth, 15s. net; half-morocco, 21s.
net each.*

THE WORLD'S GREATEST ACTRESS.

MY DOUBLE LIFE:

MEMOIRS OF SARAH BERNHARDT

With many Illustrations in Colour and Black-and-White.

1 vol., demy 8vo, 15s. net.* [Next week.]

CATHEDRAL CITIES OF FRANCEBy Herbert Marshall, R.W.S. and Hester Marshall.With 60 Reproductions of Water-Colour Drawings by HERBERT
MARSHALL, R.W.S. 1 vol., demy 8vo, 16s. net.

Also an EDITION DE LUXE, limited to 100 copies, 42s. net.*

VOL. II. (1815-1819) of

THE MEMOIRS OF

THE COMTESSE DE BOIGNEEdited from the Original Manuscript by Charles Nicoulaud.

With Portrait, 1 vol., 10s. net*

Uniform with the above, 10s. net.

Vol. I. (1781-1814) is already published, and Vol. III. is in the press

THE LAST DAYS OF MARIE
ANTOINETTEBy G. Lenotre, Author of "The Flight of Marie Antoinette."
Illustrated, 1 vol., demy 8vo, 10s. net.WILLIAM PITT,

EARL OF CHATHAM.

By Dr. Albert von Ruville. With an Introduction by Professor HUGH E. EGERTON. With 16 Portraits, 3 vols., demy 8vo, 30s. net.*"A book that is invaluable to students. Dr. von Ruville has carried out his scheme in the most admirable way."

—DAILY CHRONICLE.

THE BEST BOOK FOR CHILDREN.

THE CHILDREN AND THE PICTURES.By Lady Tennant.With 16 Plates in Colour and numerous Black-and-White Illustrations. 1 vol., 6s.*

[Next Week.]

 Lady Tennant tells how the men, women, and children represented in the great Tennant collection of pictures become reanimated and converse with the children of the house.PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF HENRY IRVINGBy Bram Stoker.

Illustrated, New and Cheaper Edition, 1 vol., 6s. net.*

THE PLAYS OF W.E. HENLEY & R.L. STEVENSONNew and Cheaper Edition, buckram, uniform with R. L.
Stevenson's Novels, 1 vol., 6s.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE SHUTTLE.By Mrs. Hodgson Burnett, Author of "Little Lord Fauntleroy."THE WEAVERS.By Sir Gilbert Parker.THE PROGRESS OF HUGH RENDAL.By Lionel Portman.EVE NORRIS. By Claire de Pratz.*Prospectus of these Works on Application.
Mr. Heinemann's Illustrated Autumn Announcement
List post-free.

London: WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

THE NOVEL OF THE WEEK.*

IT says a good deal for Mr. Maurice Hewlett's indisputable cleverness and versatility that he has succeeded comparatively well in this elaborately artificial picture of the Radicals' struggle for Reform in the tumultuous days of 1809. Mr. Maurice Hewlett, though he has skilfully concealed the fact from the respectable folk whom his works allure, is really a decadent of the decadents. Everything he touches is already a little past the stage of ripeness, melting into that lusciousness of feeling which, in art and literature, hastens to the dissolution of the Silver Age. His "Forest Lovers," which an innocent public acclaimed as "fresh in feeling," was in reality a fin-de-siècle reading, thrice seven times removed from life, of the old Celtic romances that inspired Malory. The feeling of Mr. Charles Conder's and Aubrey Beardsley's drawings mingled in his pages to animate his clever artificial tapestries with figures of knights and ladies who, indeed, were more unreal even than the shepherds and shepherdesses of Pope and the eighteenth century school. But the convention was cleverly handled, and the meadow-sweet scent of decadent emotion most real; and it is well known that the sweetness of honey disguises admirably any skilful adulteration.

To prove our point, if it be needed, we may simply contrast Mr. Hewlett's best work, "The Fool Errant," with his worst, "Richard Yea and Nay." The former dealt admirably with one of the most decadent periods in Italian history; the latter caricatured in a forcible-feeble manner the most dauntless and virile of English Kings. It is, indeed, unfortunate for art that Mr. Hewlett the artist should have been kept in check by the demands and the limitations of our intensely respectable British conventions, for though he has worked cleverly, skilfully, and perseveringly within these limits, if he had been left absolutely free to please himself, he might—we say might—have replaced his fancy pictures of past life by a series of contemporary pictures exceedingly mordant and illuminating. Let us congratulate ourselves that Mr. Maurice Hewlett has effected a prudent compromise between two conflicting interests in human nature, and that, if he has in the finer sense been thrown away as an artist, he has at least helped to instruct his public, and so has avenged his talent.

The situation that Mr. Hewlett has elected to treat is Meredithian, reminds us not a little of "Beauchamp's Career," and "The Tragic Comedians." Privilege in the person of the proud and beautiful girl, Miss Hermia Mary Chambre, and aristocratic lineage in the shape of the old Countess of Morfa, and Caryll House, one of the noblest English families, have to bend the knee before young David Vernour, butcher and Radical. The heroic butcher, when the story opens, has been thrown into prison for chastising two tipsy gentlemen, Lord Morfa and Lord Edlogan, who, for a drunken wager, have staked his horse. Young Vernour's case is taken up by the Mob, and by the Radicals, Cobbett, Burdett, Hunt, Lord Sandgate, and Colonel Wardle; and Miss Chambre, who has witnessed the severe drubbing administered to her kinsmen by Vernour, conceives that it rests with her to restore the honour of her house by going solemnly and humbly to him and begging his pardon. Here is a situation which, so to say, has been bequeathed by our great novelist to the younger generation, and it is most interesting to see how our author's ingenious fancy has been smitten by Meredith's powerful air and carriage. Let us say at once that we hold our author is most happily justified by the result of his assimilation of the Meredithian tradition. His own flavour is so intensely personal, his own style so deliberately and cunningly mannered, that he can well afford to come under the influence of another spirit. And in point of writing, and of conceiving picturesque visions and stamping them upon his readers' minds, Mr. Hewlett has never done better than in "The Stooping Lady." The atmosphere of the period is rendered by a series of deftly wrought scenes, most admirably written. Even when the characters' talk is transparently unreal, it is always effective, clever, and amusing. We do not for a moment believe in the reality of Miss Chambre's feeling for the heroic butcher; we do not for a moment believe in the butcher himself, yet the odd thing is that the illusion of the whole brilliant presentment does not suffer thereby. We perceive that it is not in the matter of the analysis of motive, of the building-up of character, of naturalness of language or of manners that Mr. Hewlett's art makes its appeal. He is really a landscape and figure painter doing for us by language much what Boucher and Watteau did by paint, or, to put it more clearly, his compositions exact the sacrifice of truth to life to charm of style. Artificiality is the very soul of his art, and in "The Stooping Lady" he has assimilated just as much of Meredith's manner of drawing as will invigorate his own conception of aristocratic life. At times he is absolutely himself, in the portions of the narrative, that is, where his faculty of conjuring up dainty and somewhat provocative images of the eternal feminine gives the rein to his imagination. The heroine, Miss Chambre, receives, every day, for nine months, a bunch of white violets from the Unknown Lover, and it is interesting to note how well the author has saturated his clever picture of the "aristocratic bloods" of a brutal age with the sensuous suggestiveness of fin-de-siècle self-consciousness. Let the reader compare these two passages, the first pure Hewlett, the second of a stronger stock:—

Now that she had given herself; was, as she verily believed, handfasted to him? For was she not? Her flowers had lain in her bosom all night, and night after night; her flowers and all that they signified to her, which was more than any mere flowers could ever signify. They had been free of her lips, her tears, her breast, and her side; and not without disgrace, only as a maid undone could she now stand before the world; as one who had suffered love and repaid love with love, and was now forsaken—like Psyche, like Psyche who had also loved and been loved in the dark. . . . What must happen to her then—to her, the free, the proudly confident, the clear speaker of truth and well-spring of honour? How could she appear as wife, who had a secret lover? How could she give to a husband, a man, that right which the god in flower-shape had had of her and still chose to claim? She must remain unmarried, could not dare to marry. It would be mortal sin. Maids before now have had strange lovers: Oreithya was mated to the North Wind, and one had a river to husband, and one a swan—it had remained for her, Hermia Mary, to discern the overshadowing which all women love and dread in the woody scent of wet flowers. . . .

Now for the other passage, with its other spirit:—

" . . . Ah!" said Rodono, "I daresay. What else? Anything new? Where's your row, Cassonby?"

"Charing Cross—over the butcher's carcass." That pricked him.

"What do you mean—carcass? They've not—?"

Mr. Cassonby tossed his whiskered face. "Good Lord, no. Otherwise. They're ready to break up the pillory. She's there, you know."

"She?" What eyes Rodono had! Cold steel! Mr. Cassonby knew better than to quote the ballads of which he had a stock.

"Miss Chambre's there," he said. "Facing 'em all. They treat her like a queen."

Tom Rodono was certainly in Queer Street, as Mr. Cassonby informed the next man he met. "I was telling him a devilish good story—putting it devilish well, too—for I was moved, sir, dammy, I was moved—and off he goes as if shot from a gun. I saw the lady come—she'd been there three-quarters of an hour. Came with Bob Ranald—on the arm of Bob—and a veiled friend. Bob clears the road as he'd clear decks. 'Way there, my lads, way there,' says Bob, humouring the fellows—you know Bob! So she comes up through a lane of them as if she was at a drawing-room—and stands underneath the stage, and faces 'em all. And Bob—little Bob—he keeps a clear space for her—marches up and down, true quarterdeck fashion. Oh, it was rare! They cry three cheers for 'Lady Vernour,' if you please. Lady Vernour! They marry her and raise her to the peerage all in a breath—that's what we're coming to with our blessed Reform. The mob'll make peers when they've unmade a few. You'll see. . . . Lady Vernour! . . . Up comes old Cobbett on horseback—they give him room enough—and rope enough, hey? He was haranguing when I left. But she was rare—never flinched, never blinked—just did what she had to do—and stuck to it, sir—kept on with it."

MR. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD has written a moving introduction to "The Revolution in the Baltic Provinces of Russia," being a brief account of the Scottish Social Democratic Workers' Party by "an active member," revised and prepared for publication by Mr. E. O. F. Ames. (Independent Labour Party Socialist Library, 1s. 6d. net.) This story of almost incredible persecution, is a significant commentary on the recent agreement with Russia, and one may gather from its pages the welcome Persia's new-born spirit of independence is likely to receive from the House of Romanoff.

* "The Stooping Lady." By Maurice Hewlett. Macmillan & Co. 6s.

AUTUMN PUBLICATIONS of THE DE LA MORE PRESS

1907.

New Volumes in the SMALLER CLASSICS SERIES.

32mo (3 in. by 4½ in.). Cloth gilt 6d. net; leather gilt 1s. net.

8. THE MYSTICS: Seventeenth Century.

By ALICE MEYNELL.

9. COMUS: A Mask. By JOHN MILTON

10. THE SHORTER POEMS OF JOHN KEATS.

DE LA MORE BOOKLETS.

Size, Pott 8vo, 3½ in. by 6 in.

Price 6d. net each in art wrappers; three in a box for 1s. 6d. net, or six in a box for 3s. net. Also bound cloth 1s. net; in moreen, 1s. 6d. net; or in full lambskin, extra gilt and gilt edges, 2s. 6d. net.

The "De La More" Booklets have won their way into general favour as substitutes for the useless and ephemeral Christmas and Birthday card. They are beautifully printed at the De La More Press on very fine paper specially made for them, and are bound very carefully, and in an artistic manner.

New Volumes:—

22. SHELLEY'S SENSITIVE PLANT.

23. BROWNING'S SAUL.

24. MILTON'S IL PENSEROSO, L'ALLEGRO, and ARCADES.

"The 'De La More' Booklets are a happy idea. They consist of classical masterpieces in paper covers, such as Shelley's 'Adonais,' 'Eve of St. Agnes,' and Milton's 'Hymn on the Morning of Christ's Nativity.' If the De La More Press can make such masterpieces into common presents they will be doing a great service."—Athenæum.

"Several charming booklets have reached me from the De La More and more Press!"—BARON DE B— W—, in Punch.

NATIONAL WIT & HUMOUR SERIES.

32mo, cloth, 1s. 6d. each net.

New Volume:—

5. WIT AND HUMOUR OF THE PHYSICIAN: A Collection from Various Sources, classified under appropriate subject headings.

QUIET HOUR SERIES.

32mo, 1s. net each

Daintily bound in white leatherette with gilt lettering, and especially suitable for presents.

New Volumes:—

3. A YEAR OF BLESSING.

Quotations for every day of the year, by ROSE PORTER.

6. BOOK OF FAMILY PRAYER.

By LYMAN P. POWELL. With an Introduction by the Right

Rev. O. W. WHITAKER, D.D., LL.D., Bishop of Pennsylvania.

THE HISTORY OF THE ROYAL SCOTS GREYS

By EDWARD ALMACK, F.S.A. Small folio (8½ in. by 11½ in.).

Limited to 400 copies—350 on hand-made paper at £2 12s. 6d. net, and 50 on Japanese vellum at 5 Guineas net.

"The History of the Royal Scots Greys," by Mr. Edward Almack, F.S.A., was undertaken at the invitation of the Colonel commanding and the Officers. This famous regiment, whose motto is "Second to None," has, throughout its long period of existence since its formation in 1678, always been as good as its motto.

Lieut.-General Thomas Dallyell was the first Colonel and Lord Charles Murray first Lieut.-Colonel of the regiment. First called the Royal Regiment of Scots Dragoons, it was afterwards known as the Second Royal North British Dragoons. It received its present title in 1877.

The most careful research among original records has been employed in the compilation of this volume. It includes the name of every officer who has served in the corps, and much other biographical information.

Special attention has been given to the illustrations. These include facsimiles of famous documents commemorating important events in the History of the Regiment, reproduced from records in the possession of the mess, or preserved in public and private archives. There are several coloured plates illustrating the uniform in successive periods, all reproduced from authentic contemporary resources.

THE DE LA MORE PRESS FOLIOS.

Limited to 320 copies on hand-made paper, and 5 copies on real vellum, the latter with hand-illuminated initials, for sale in England. Size 12 by 8½ inches.

THE PERCY FOLIO OF OLD ENGLISH BALLADS AND ROMANCES. Vol. III.

Edited by Professor I. GOLLANCZ, Litt. D. To be published in 4 Vols £4 4s. net. Now Ready.

The famous Manuscript (long kept from view, but now the property of the nation) from which Bishop Percy "modernised" and spoilt so many of the poems included in his epoch-making "Reliques of English Poetry."

ON A PINCUSHION and other Fairy Tales.

By MARY DE MORGAN. With illustrations by WILLIAM DE MORGAN author of "Joseph Vance" and "Alice-for-Short." Crown 8vo, cloth 3s. 6d. net.

LETTERS FROM PUSSYCATVILLE.

By S. LOUISE PATTESON. Author of "Pussy Meow: the Autobiography of a Cat." Illustrations from photographs by the author. 3s. 6d.

THE IMMORTALITY OF ANIMALS and the Relation of Man as Guardian, from a Biblical and Philosophical Hypothesis. By E. D. BUCKNER, M.D. 5s. net.

ALEXANDER MORING, LTD., THE DE LA MORE PRESS, 32, George Street, Hanover Square, London, W.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

LIFE AND LETTERS OF SIR RICHARD JEBB. By his wife, CAROLINE JEBB. With a Chapter on SIR RICHARD JEBB as Scholar and Critic, by DR. A. W. VERRALL.

Demy 8vo
Frontispiece
10s net

In the latter half of his life Sir Richard Jebb kept a series of scrap-books, in which he pasted matter of any kind that he wished to preserve. This mass of material has readily afforded evidence of the interests and occupations of a full and busy life, and family letters which have been placed at Lady Jebb's disposal give the story of her husband's earlier years.

ESSAYS AND ADDRESSES. By SIR RICHARD JEBB, late Regius Professor of Greek in the University of Cambridge.

Demy 8vo
10s 6d net

"The lectures are of great interest to everyone who is thinking about the educational future of the country. They are the utterances of a master in education, able and willing to speak so as to be understood by those who are not masters. Whatever view a man leans to in these difficult questions, he will lose nothing by weighing carefully Jebb's temperate pleas for a truly liberal and humane ideal in our higher education."—Times.

THE CRUSADERS IN THE EAST. A Brief History of the Wars of Islam with the Latins in Syria during the Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries. By W. B. STEVENSON, M.A.

Demy 8vo
2 maps
7s 6d net

This book is a history of the political relations between the states which the Crusaders founded and those Moslem states with which they waged war. In the treatment of the subject the Eastern point of view has been emphasised, and the main thread of the narrative is drawn as far as possible from the history of the Moslem states.

STUDIES OF POLITICAL THOUGHT FROM GERSON TO GROTIUS, 1414-1625. By JOHN NEVILLE FIGGIS, M.A., Rector of Marnhull.

Crown 8vo
3s 6d net

"Students of political thought—and, indeed, all who enjoy good writing and good sense—will welcome Mr. Figgis's new book. . . . (It) should be widely read, in spite of its somewhat abstruse subject, for its study will lead to clearer thinking on the grounds of political and moral action. . . . We leave Mr. Figgis with cordial thanks for a book which is at once serious and entertaining."—Athenæum.

A BOOK OF GREEK VERSE. By WALTER HEADLAM, Litt.D., Fellow of King's College.

Crown 8vo
Ready shortly

It is the author's hope that this volume may please those who care for poetry, whether they know Greek or not, and at the same time help to give a truer notion of what Greek poetry was like. The specimens translated range from the 7th century B.C. (its earliest surviving lyric) to its latest utterance in the 6th century A.D., and with only one or two exceptions have been chosen solely for their merit, in some kind, as poetry. Interspersed are a few translations into Greek verse.

MATTHEW PRIOR: DIALOGUES OF THE DEAD and other Works in Prose and Verse. Edited by A. R. WALLER, M.A.

Crown 8vo
4s 6d net

"More than half is made up of writings that have never been printed before. These include a number of songs, personal addresses, ballads, translations, and other poems preserved among the Marquis of Bath's Prior papers at Longleat, and—most interesting of all—the prose 'Dialogues of the Dead.'"—Nation.

"Mr. Waller has had the satisfaction of giving to the world one of those discoveries which are among the most desirable prizes of the literary life."—Spectator.

GEORGE GASCOIGNE: THE POSIES. Edited by JOHN W. CUNLIFFE, M.A., D.Litt., Professor of English in the University of Wisconsin, U.S.A.

Crown 8vo
4s 6d net

This, the first of two volumes in which the complete works of George Gascoigne will be issued, contains, besides "The Posies," the addresses "To the Reverende Divines unto whom these Posies shall happen to be presented," "To all young Gentlemen," and "To the Readers Generally"; and, in addition, the essay entitled, "Certayne notes of instruction concerning the making of verse."

CLUB LAW: A Comedy acted in Clare Hall, Cambridge, about 1599-1600. Now printed for the first time from a MS. in the Library of St. John's College, Cambridge. With an introduction and notes by G. C. MOORE SMITH, Litt.D.

Fcap 4to
6s net

'Club Law' owed its origin to a long-standing feud between the University and the town of Cambridge. According to Fuller ('History of the University of Cambridge, 1655'), the play, which he describes as 'merry (but abusive),' was intended by the young scholars as a piece of revenge on the townsmen, individual members of the Corporation of the day being personated to the life, with their characteristic gestures and expressions.

Cambridge University Press Warehouse

London, Fetter Lane: C. F. Clay, Manager

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

M. LENOTRE has by this time written quite a shelf full of books about the French Revolution. All give evidence of his profound knowledge of the immense literature dealing with that extraordinary period when tragedy and comedy were so strangely mingled, and they are further remarkable for the number of unpublished documents which M. Lenotre has unearthed. "The Last Days of Marie Antoinette," the second of M. Lenotre's series, has just been translated into English by Mrs. Rudolph Stowell (Heinemann. 10s. net.). M. Lenotre describes it as "a recapitulation, an almost daily record of the life led by the prisoner in Les Feuillants, the Temple, and the Conciergerie; a collection of notes whose chief merit is their absolute authenticity." We are not sure that the method of forming a connected narrative from the relations of eye-witnesses is not, after all, the best way of writing history. Only it requires a writer with M. Lenotre's immense knowledge and artistic power of grouping the various narratives to make a book in which this method is adopted at all readable. It is certainly that in M. Lenotre's hands, and his volume combines the accuracy of German research with the picturesqueness usually credited to his fellow-countrymen.

* * *

A CHARMING little volume is "Miniatures Ancient and Modern," which Mr. Cyril Davenport has written for Messrs. Methuen's series of "Little Books on Art" (2s. 6d. net). After an introduction on Greek, Roman, and Egyptian miniatures, in which he traces the origins of the art, Mr. Davenport turns to the Tudor period in England when Holbein, "one of the greatest portrait painters the world has known," became the pioneer of a series of miniature portrait painters who have made this country the chief home of such beautiful little pictures. Holbein's successor, Hilliard, wrote a treatise on painting which gives us many delightful glimpses of his sitters. "The ignorant or baser sort," he says, "will not only be bold precisely to say, but vehemently swear that it is thus or so, and swear and swear so contrarily that this book would not contain the ridiculous absurd speeches which I have heard upon such occasions." In the seventeenth century the chief English miniaturist was Samuel Cooper, who painted the portrait of Oliver Cromwell now in the Montagu House collection. He was succeeded by the best known of all English miniature painters, Richard Cosway, around whom so many anecdotes have gathered, and who was so much admired by Hazlitt. In a chapter on Foreign Miniatures, Mr. Davenport discusses the work of Boucher, Charlier, and Isabey, and the other artists whose dainty portraits have made us familiar with the features of so many of the great ladies of the pre-Revolutionary period. The volume contains much technical information, as well as a number of hints useful to collectors.

* * *

No man living believes that he is without a sense of humour, and to charge anyone with the want of it is one of the surest methods of offence. The American critic who, in a review of contemporary English literature, bemoaned the utter absence of the humorist, has at least the merit of calling forth Mr. J. A. Hamerton's "English Humorists of To-day" (Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d. net.). It contains selected pieces from the works of sixteen contemporary writers, together with short biographies and estimates of their positions in humorous literature. Some of the writers chosen, such as Mr. Richard Whiteing and Mr. H. G. Wells, seem rather out of place in such a collection. Mr. Hamerton says that those who do not regard Mr. Wells as essentially a humorist "are lacking in knowledge of the man," and argues that "a keen sense of humour is essential in the equipment of one who deals in speculative science." This view, we confess, strikes us as itself distinctly humorous. The selections are well chosen, and Mr. Hamerton's introductions are brief and impartial, and there are also portraits by famous caricaturists of the sixteen writers represented in the volume. Mr. Hamerton's plan was a good one and he has carried it out well.

* * *

DEDICATED to "the memory of the noble martyrs who have fallen in the struggle for Russian freedom." Dr.

Angelo Rappoport's "The Curse of the Romanovs" (Chatto & Windus. 16s. net.) gives a powerful picture of one of the most lurid tragedies in Russian history. Choosing the careers of Paul I. and Alexander I. as two typical examples of the fate of the Romanovs he maintains the view that the members of the present Russian dynasty "either remain faithful to the spirit of Autocracy, and assassination stares them in the face, or they inaugurate an era of liberalism, but finding that they thus undermine their own existence, they turn reactionaries and lose their mental balance, as in the case of Alexander." "This," he says, "is the Curse of the Romanovs." The character of Paul I., whom Dr. Rappoport calls "a modern Caligula," is painted in the darkest colours. Alarm and suspicion were his most characteristic traits and his fright at the excesses of the French Revolution, as well as his jealousy of Napoleon's successes drove him into a fury of despotism that even his own courtiers determined to end. Alexander I., though better intentioned, was weak and superstitious, and his more amiable character brought little luck either to himself or to the Empire over which he ruled. Dr. Rappoport is firmly convinced that there is no hope of reform in Russia while the Romanovs are on the throne. His final conclusion is that "there is a certain sense of mockery, of contradiction and incongruity in all liberal attempts emanating from Autocracy. And, indeed, all constitutional attempts in Russia, from the times of Michael Romanov to those of Nicholas II., have ended in failure. There are only two alternatives for the future of Russia: the disappearance of the house of Romanov-Soltykov-Holstein-Gottorp as a reigning family, or the continuation of a rule of slavery. I confess that I hope fate will decide in favour of the first alternative."

* * *

FROM Messrs. Chatto and Windus comes a reprint in their charming "King's Classics" series (2s. 6d. net.) of Horace Walpole's famous "Castle of Otranto," with an introduction by Miss Caroline Spurgeon. It is doubtful whether the book will find many readers to-day, yet few books ever met with a greater or more immediate success. It was praised by Scott, Gray, Byron, and Macaulay, and its publication marked an epoch in the history of the English novel. From it is to be traced the "School of Terror," and all the paraphernalia of subterranean passages, hidden dungeons, and ghostly apparitions, to which Clara Reeve, Maturin, Mrs. Radcliffe, Beckford, and Monk Lewis contributed so industriously. Indeed, in some sense Walpole was the originator of romantic fiction, and of a sort of pseudo-Gothic influence in our late eighteenth century literature. It is difficult, however, to understand how so dull and lifeless a piece of work produced such results. As we read to-day of the groaning portrait and the "three drops of blood falling from the nose of Alphonso's statue," we can only wonder what there was in it to make Gray and his fellow dons at Cambridge "cry a little" and be "afraid to go to bed o' nights."

* * *

THE chief feature of the new edition of "The Moral Ideal," by Julia Wedgwood (Kegan Paul. 10s. 6d. net.) is the addition of a new chapter on Egypt, but the remainder of the book has been revised and much fresh material incorporated. It consists of a number of studies towards "a history of human aspiration" under such titles as "India and the Primal Unity," "Persia and the Religion of Conflict," "Greece and the Harmony of Opposites," "Rome and the Reign of Law," "The Problem of Evil," &c., all inspired by the belief that "a partial and incomplete revelation of what men have sought to be tells more of their true nature than does the most exhaustive record possible of what they have accomplished." In the new chapter on Egypt the author tries to prove that Egypt was the only nation, in the full sense of the word, to be found in the early world, and that its moral standard comes nearer to the ideal of modern Christianity than that of any other people so far separated from us in time. She certainly adduces a large amount of evidence in support of both these propositions. The book is scholarly and thoughtful, though some of the author's views, such as those on the symbolism of the Nile, or the belief that the Divine Mother and the spirit of the Cross are adumbrated by Virgil, are highly fanciful.

NAPOLEON

AND THE INVASION OF ENGLAND: THE STORY OF THE GREAT TERROR, 1797-1805.

By H. F. B. WHEELER and A. M. BROADLEY. With 114 Full-page Illustrations, including 8 in Colour, reproduced from a unique collection of contemporary Caricatures, Broadsides, Songs, &c., 2 vols. demy 8vo, 32s. net.

"Messrs. Wheeler and Broadley must be congratulated upon the production of a book which has the rare merit of interesting the general reader and providing the historical student with fresh material..... This is a book which ought to find a place in every library, and in giving it to the world the authors have discharged an act of patriotism."—DAILY MAIL.

II.

BEAUTY AND THE BEAST.

The complete Fairy Story. Translated from the French by ERNEST DOWSON. With 4 Full-page Illustrations in Colour by CHARLES CONDOR. Crown 4to, 10s. 6d. net.

[Now Ready.]

This Edition is limited to 300 copies, 260 of which are for sale in England and America.

III.

THE TRUE STORY OF MY LIFE.

By ALICE M. DIEHL, Novelist, Writer, and Musician. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"This book..... has the intimate touch, introspective and revealing, which autobiography, if it is to be worth anything, should have—personal light, as well as glimpses of other interesting people..... Mrs. Diehl's pages have reality, a living throb, and so are indeed autobiography."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

IV.

TWO DIANAS IN SOMALILAND

The Record of a Shooting Trip. By AGNES HERBERT, With 24 illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

Since the appearance of that brilliant work, "A GIRL IN THE CARPATHIANS," there has been no book of travels which has so revealed the fascinating personality of the writer as "THE TWO DIANAS."

"The adventures of Miss Herbert and her cousin Cicely will keep any sportsman from gaping in his St. James's Street club..... The book is written in the raciest way."—TRIBUNE.

V.

BIG GAME SHOOTING ON THE EQUATOR . .

By Captain F. A. DICKINSON. With an Introduction by Sir CHARLES NORTON ELIOT, K.C.M.G.—Demy 8vo, 77 illustrations, 12s. 6d. net.

[Just out.]

East Africa is a paradise for big game shooters, and this volume will tell sportsmen not only what has been but what may still be done. The author tells amusingly how the amazing stories he heard of the amount of game to be seen from the comfortable carriages of the Uganda Railway proved, by his later experience, to be more than true. For almost one hundred miles the passenger may observe the extraordinary spectacle of large and beautiful animals, rarely seen outside the Zoological Gardens, feeding freely and without fear close to the railroad tracks.

VI.

DALMATIA: The Borderland 'twixt East & West.

By MAUDE M. HOLBACH. With upwards of 50 Illustrations from Original Photographs by OTTO HOLBACH, and a Map, crown 8vo, 5s. net.

VII.

CONCLUSIONS OF AN EVERYDAY WOMAN . .

By HILDEGARDE GORDON BROWN. Crown 8vo, 6s.

New Six-Shilling Novels

THE SON OF THE BONDWOMAN

A Novel. By EMILIA PARDO BAZAN. Translated from the Spanish by ETHEL H. HEARN.

PAINTED SHADOWS

By RICHARD LE GALLIENNE.

THE LOVE OF HIS LIFE

By HARRY BENTLEY.

THE STRONGEST PLUME

By HUGH DE SELINCOURT, Author of "A Boy's Marriage."

NOW READY. 2s. 6d. net. The OCTOBER Issue of

THE ALBANY REVIEW.

EDITED BY CHARLES RODEN BUXTON.

CONTENTS.—Current Events; The Work of Universal Suffrage in Austria—Professor JOSEF REDLICH; The International Socialist Congress—R. C. K. ENSOR; Some Unpublished Letters of Lafcadio Hearn—Edited by OSMAN EDWARDS; Our Present Vocabulary—LADY BELL (Mrs. HUGH BELL); The State as Over-Parent—G. F. McCLEARY, M.D.; Mr. Henry Arthur Jones's "Hypocrites"—E. A. BAUGHAN; The Future of Trade Unions—G. R. S. TAYLOR; E. L. Godkin—Professor A. V. DICEY; The Politics of a Biologist—Hon. BERTRAND RUSSELL; The Churches and Modern Thought—ALFRED W. BENN; From Gerson to Grotius—G. P. GOOCH, M.P.; In Prison—MAXIM GORKI.

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, VIGO STREET, W.

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD'S

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Most Important Book of Travel of the Year

FROM THE NIGER TO THE NILE.

By BOYD ALEXANDER, Lieutenant Rifle Brigade. 2 vols., large medium 8vo, with about 250 Illustrations and Maps. 36s. net.

Magnificent New Art Volume.

A GALLERY OF PORTRAITS.

By HELLEU. Containing 24 exquisite reproductions of the famous French etcher's portraits of fair women. With an Introduction by FREDERICK WEDMORE. Crown folio, 25s. net.

Two Interesting Books of Travel and Trade.

MEXICO OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY.

By PERCY F. MARTIN, F.R.G.S., Author of "Through Five Republics of South America." 2 vols., demy 8vo, with Illustrations and Map, 30s. net.

RAILWAY ENTERPRISE IN CHINA: An

Account of its Origin and Development. By PERCY HORACE KENT. Demy 8vo, with Maps, 12s. 6d. net.

The Latest Book on Persia.

ACROSS PERSIA. By E. CRAWSHAY WILLIAMS.

Demy 8vo, with Illustrations and Maps, 12s. 6d. net.

A Lurid Picture of Modern Russia.

OUT OF CHAOS: a Personal Story of the Revolution in Russia. By Prince MICHAEL TRUBETSKOI.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

New Edition.

TURKEY IN EUROPE. By SIR CHARLES ELIOT.

K.C.M.G. ("Odyssey"). A New Edition with an Additional Chapter on Events from 1869 to the Present Day. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

An English Version of "Mes Origines."

MEMOIRS OF MISTRAL. Rendered into English by CONSTANCE MAUD, Author of "An English Girl in Paris," &c. Demy 8vo, with Illustrations, 12s. 6d. net.

THE MYSTERY OF MARIA STELLA, LADY

NEWBOROUGH. By SIR RALPH PAYNE GALLWEY, Bart. Demy 8vo, with over 20 Illustrations and a Photogravure Frontispiece, 7s. 6d. net.

THE GROWTH OF MODERN NATIONS: a

History of the Particularist Form of Society. Translated from the French of HENRI DE TOURVILLE by M. G. LOCH. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

MODERN STUDIES. By OLIVER ELTON, M.A.,

Professor of English Literature in the University of Liverpool. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

A Well-known Authority on a Fascinating Hobby.

MY ROCK GARDEN. By REGINALD FARRER,

Author of "The Sundered Streams," &c. Large crown 8vo, with Illustrations, 7s. 6d. net.

THE LIFE OF THE SALMON. With reference more especially to the Fish in Scotland. By W. L. CALDERWOOD, F.R.S.E., Inspector of Salmon Fisheries for Scotland. Illustrated, 7s. 6d. net.

Another Jolly Book of Verse by the Author of "Ruthless Rhymes for Heartless Homes."

FAMILIAR FACES. By HARRY GRAHAM. Medium

8vo, with 16 Illustrations by GEORGE MORROW, 3s. 6d. net.

A Charming Book for Boys and Girls.

THE GOLDEN PORCH: a Book of Greek Fairy

Tales. By W. M. L. HUTCHINSON, formerly Fellow of Newnham College, Cambridge. With Full-page Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 5s.

NEW 6/- NOVELS.

HIS FIRST LEAVE. By L. ALLEN HARKER.

Author of "Concerning Paul and Flametta," &c.

THE DESERT VENTURE. By FRANK SAVILE,

A thrilling tale, after the Merriman manner, showing how an enterprising European tried to carve out a new little empire for himself in the heart of Africa.

THE ELECTION OF ISABEL. By RONALD

MACDONALD, Author of "A Human Trinity," &c. A perfectly charming lady, who is infatuated with the "Feminist Movement," makes a marriage of convenience, and opposes her husband at an election. The volume abounds in humorous situations.

London: EDWARD ARNOLD, 41 & 43, Maddox St., Bond St., W.

The Week in the City.

THE commercial and financial situation is still interesting and obscure. The talk of a recession in trade is universal in Europe as well as in Canada and the United States. But I doubt if there has been much actual falling off in the volume of trade except in the Eastern States of America. Discount rates to London have hardened in response to the heavy exports of gold to Egypt. But the Bank Reserve is five to six millions better than at this time last year, and unless the unexpected happens, the best banking opinion in the City does not anticipate anything like such a severe spell of stringency as we had last autumn and winter. We shall probably see, however, a rather formidable crop of failures, a necessary and inevitable sequel to the frantic outburst of speculation which lifted so many speculative shares, lands, and metals to quite fanciful prices. What has happened, I take it, is what has so often happened before. People of sanguine temperament and hasty judgment, with an unlucky turn for speculative enterprise, connected the rise in prices with prosperity. They forget that if all prices rise nobody is a pin the better. They forget that increased turnovers in business and increased traffic returns would inevitably be followed by increased working expenses. They strained all their resources to share in this fictitious prosperity, and borrowed in the vain hope of greatly enlarging their fortunes. In many places—notably, I think, in Egypt, Germany, and Canada—the bankers shared in the general delusion, and were far too obliging in affording credit facilities. This inflation of credit accentuated the scarcity of floating capital caused by the wars in Africa and Asia. Hence a very severe spell of dear money, which began to pinch the vast army of holders for a rise. So liquidation began early this year, and has been going on ever since. This week Amsterdam has been selling out a lot of rubbish, and it is understood that several Dutch concerns are tottering. A wealthy jobber, too, in our own mining market is said to have been cutting his losses to an extent which has brought some of the speculative favourites down with a run. Another disagreeable feature has been another collapse of Underground Electric notes, which fell six points on Wednesday on comparatively small sales. The strength of Consols has been a feature; but I doubt if it will be maintained, unless indeed Mr. Asquith can curb the extravagance of the War Office and Admiralty, and so still further augment the Sinking Fund.

PRICES OF COMMODITIES.

The Board of Trade Returns for September showed another great rise in exports; but the imports were no larger than last year, even in values, which means a drop, because the index number is still considerably higher than in September, 1906. The manufacturing activity is prodigious, but either orders are falling off or traders are buying as little raw material as possible in view of the tendency of prices to decline. The most satisfactory feature of the last week or two has been the decline of coal prices, which it is hoped may continue. Dear coal would have been a most serious embarrassment to industry, besides causing grievous suffering to the poor in the winter months. Cotton is rather cheaper, but wool has spurted up both at the London and Melbourne sales. Flour, unfortunately, is much dearer than last year. Though the stocks of wheat are large, the world's crop is thought to be deficient, chiefly owing to the unsatisfactory harvests in Canada, India, and South-Eastern Europe. Russia is said to be the brightest spot. The Japanese rice crop is also well above the average, though I see that six weeks ago the price of rice in Tokio again rose above all previous records.

THE AMERICAN BANKERS.

The bankers of the United States held their annual meeting or "convention" at Atlantic City in the last week of September, and the newspapers brought by the last American mails are full of their formal discussions and informal gossip. The latter, as usual, is the most interesting. In the words of a journalist who hunted them down: If twenty-five hundred bankers leave home for a week's convention at the moment when the outflow of currency to the crop-moving centres of the West is reaching inconvenient proportions, they are sure to be taken up with the problems of the money market and the uncertainties of the future. He says that the strollers and loungers talked of nothing for a week but the various phases of the financial outlook.

"Every discussion about the condition of corn in Iowa, the yield of cotton at the South, and the chance of a third term for Roosevelt has usually ended up with the blunt inquiry by some backwoods delegate: 'Well, what is the country up against? Is it a case of more good times, or is the set-back of Wall Street only the forerunner of a depression that business interests generally are bound to feel?'"

There was some pessimism, but it was not general. The country banker who thanked God that there was only one Harriman and one Rogers among eighty millions of Americans soon forgot his strong feelings and assured his friends that the country itself was as sound as a rock, and would recover from the disturbing effects of the grafting disclosures. A Southern delegate who attributed much mischief to the easy complacency with which modern Americans are wont to describe as "high finance" acts which their grandfathers would have rudely dubbed "grand larceny," spoke optimistically of the wealth that a great cotton crop would bring to his section. I notice, however, that a well-informed correspondent of the "New York Evening Post" speaks of "a consensus of opinion" among the bankers, among whom the West and South were strongly represented, "that it is reasonable to expect a moderate recession in business owing to the continued pressure for money, and the sensitiveness of capital that is usually seen just before a Presidential year; that the country's $379,000,000 loan expansion at the national banks reflects a condition which makes it imperatively necessary for the lending institutions to keep themselves liquid, avoiding investments in such long-term litigations as might force them to share as 'special partners' in enterprises that would be peculiarly exposed to the vicissitudes of a trade reaction."

LUCELLUM.

THE STUDY OF LABYRINTHS.*

In the study of the stages of development by which man has become differentiated from the beasts of the field, it is curious that more attention has not been given to the organs of special sense. The eye, the ear, the nose, and so on, one would expect to bear special relation on the one hand to the habits of life of the possessor, and on the other to its psychic equipment. Dr. Gray, in his book on "The Labyrinth of Animals," has furnished materials for part of such a study. In the first volume of his book now before us, he describes and gives stereoscopic photographs of the labyrinths or inner ears of some thirty of the highest animals. In a succeeding volume he intends to deal in similar fashion with the other mammals, and with birds and reptiles. Dr. Gray does not himself enter into the questions of evolutionary relations which his facts naturally suggest, but nevertheless some interesting points stand out. Thus the marked difference in shape between the labyrinths of the two great families of marine carnivora, of which the seal and the sea-lion may be taken as examples, would point to ancestry long distinct. In fact, the labyrinth of the sea-lion more closely resembles that of the racoon than that of the seal, commonly reputed to be its own near kinsman. It would seem, therefore, as if the sea-lion were an off-shoot from the line of terrestrial carnivora at a much later period than the seal. It has always been a puzzle to anatomists why two organs with such different functions as hearing and balance should be so intimately associated as are the cochlea and the semi-circular canals. Indeed, in spite of their being the object of more experiment than perhaps any other part of the body, it is not yet established in what way the semi-circular canals aid in maintaining equilibrium, or whether they may not have some other and quite different function. It is of interest that Dr. Gray shows a fairly steady relative variation between the degree of development of the canals in various animals and their habits of life. Thus, the gazelle and other animals of graceful and refined movements show highly developed systems of semi-circular canals, while clumsy creatures such as the sloth show relatively poor development.

Dr. Gray's photographs of the actual specimens are above praise.

* "The Labyrinth of Animals." By Albert A. Gray, M.D. Vol. I. London: J. and A. Churchill. 21s. net.

Restful nights
and wakeful days when you use

Plasmon Cocoa.

CONTAINS NEARLY 70%
NOURISHMENT.

START USING NOW.

BORD'S PIANOS

Illustrated
Lists of the
"BORD"

Pianos will be sent free, showing prices and rates of hire of the various Models, on the THREE YEARS' SYSTEM, from 15s. per month. Second-hand, from 10s. 6d. per month.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

The "BECHSTEIN" Pianos may also be had on the same system, at advantageous prices and terms.

LIBERAL DISCOUNT FOR CASH.

CHAS. STILES & CO.,

74 and 76, Southampton Row, London, W.C.
PIANOS EXCHANGED.

Suction Gas Power.

80% REDUCTION
OF YOUR GAS ENGINE
GAS BILL.

TANGYES Ltd., Birmingham.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

Nervous Disorders

A deficiency of the phosphates causes a lowering of nervous tone, indicated by exhaustion, restlessness, headache or insomnia.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate (Non-Alcoholic)

supplies the nerve cells with health-giving life force, restores strength and induces restful sleep without the use of dangerous drugs.

An Ideal Tonic in Nervous Diseases

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 152 Old Street, London, E. C.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

Rowntree's
ELECT COCOA

"first thing in the morning—for energy"

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY'S HOTEL (Temperance), GREAT RUSSELL STREET.

Passenger Lift. Electric Light in all Rooms. Bath-rooms on every floor. Spacious Dining Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms, heated throughout. All Floors Fire-proof. Perfect Sanitation. Night Porter. Telephone. BEDROOMS, including attendance, from 3/6 to 6/0. Full Tariff and Testimonials post free on application.
Telegraphic Address—"Thackeray, London."

WINTER NEAR OXFORD! SUNNINGWELL HALL,
Boars Hill (established as "Boars Hill Hydro"). Perfect climate, dry and sunny, yet bracing. House well warmed and ventilated. An ideal Winter residence. Golf, &c., billiards, concerts, lectures debates. Ordinary and Vegetarian cuisine. Public and private rooms. Omnibus service to Oxford. Inclusive terms from £2 2s. weekly. 7/- daily, upwards. Illustrated booklet free.

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE
Have the I Illustrated, Wide Margin, Interleaved, Teachers', Interlinear, Revised, and other Editions.
Selection of B Oxford and Prayer Books from 6d. to £10. S
53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C. Telephone Central 329

A. LIONEL ISAACS, 5, Pall Mall, S.W. (CARLTON HOTEL BUILDING).

Choice Books.
Rare Autographs and MSS.
Pictures and Prints.

CATALOGUES ISSUED.

TELEPHONE: 1784 CENTRAL.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.
(And at READING.)

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

MR. R. B. HALDANE AND
"PUBLIC OPINION."

THE Right Hon. R. B. Haldane, M.P., Secretary for War, has addressed the following letter to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION:—

WAR OFFICE, 1st October, 1907.

Dear Mr. Parker,

I think that in the new form of "Public Opinion" under your editorship, you do well to make prominent what is concrete and living in the shape of the opinions maturely formed of men who are trying to do the work of the nation and of journalists the standard of whose criticism is high. What interests people is that which is expressed in a concrete form and has in it the touch of humanity. The views of strenuous spirits and the criticisms of really competent critics given in their own words comply with this condition. Your paper will succeed if it can only keep up to this standard, and I think you have brought it on to the right lines.

Yours faithfully,

R. B. HALDANE.

Percy L. Parker, Esq.,

Office of "Public Opinion,"

Temple House, Tallis Street, E.C.

PUBLIC OPINION.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF CURRENT THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY.

TWO PENCE WEEKLY.

Post free to any part of the World, 13/- Yearly, or 10/10 for the United Kingdom.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc.
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge.

Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road.

Miss Tye.

Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE.

E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL.

H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL.

First Hotel.

CHINGFORD, ESSEX.

ROYAL FOREST HOTEL.

Mr. John Brill.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL.

Tel.: 0199.

Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL.

S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE.

Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL.

Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL.

J. T. Weaver.

MALDON.

TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill.

C. Simons, Manager.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MANCHESTER.

THE PRINCES CAFE.

Oxford Street.

THE DEANS GATE HOTEL.

Deansgate.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES.

And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street.

Moderate.

Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL.

A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence.

Tel.: 6.

Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL.

Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell, Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, READING.

Principal: W. M. CHILDS, M.A.

An Illustrated Prospectus giving full particulars of the Courses of Study in Letters and Science, Agriculture and Horticulture, Fine Art, Music and Commerce may be obtained post free on application to the Registrar.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery. Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

AUTUMN TERM OPENED ON SEPTEMBER 19TH.

For full particulars of Scholarships, and for copies of the School Prospectus, apply to the Head Master.

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

Boys from this PUBLIC SCHOOL have done well at the Universities.

The School stands in its own grounds of about 45 acres, high above the town and the Thames Valley.

For Honours List, Prospectus, particulars of Scholarships, and other information, apply to the Headmaster, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School.

HASLEMERE, SURREY.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD SCHOOL for GIRLS. Sandy soil; nine acres of ground; nearly 600 ft. above sea level.

Principals: Miss AMY KEMP, Camb. Certif. for Theory and Practice of Teaching (St. George's Training College, Edinburgh); Diploma for the Teaching of German (Berlin); and Miss HELEN T. NEILD, M.A. (Vict.), Classical Tripos (Camb.), Certificated Student of Girton College; 11 years at the Mount School, York.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS AT END OF EVERY TERM.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C. Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

MISCELLANEOUS.

CURIO BARGAINS.—All those desirous of securing Curios and Antiques at bargain prices, should visit the London Opinion Curio Club, 107, Regent Street, London, W. Terms of membership on application to the Secretary, 107, Regent Street, W.

LECTURES.

Lectures on Art and Architecture

FOR EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS AND SCHOOLS,

By ERNEST RADFORD, LL.M., CANTAB., formerly Secretary of the Arts and Crafts Exhibition Society.

Mr. Radford has recently Lectured for the Education Department of the London County Council.

For terms and particulars of Courses and Single Lectures kindly apply to the Lecturer, 1 Portland Villas, Hampstead Heath, N.W.

CARTOONS by "F. C. G."

(Sir F. Carruthers Gould.)

Short Stories.

Interviews with Public Men.

Literary Articles.

Problems and Prizes.

Book Reviews.

Nature and Science.

Survey of the Week.

Dress, Pastimes, &c., &c.

Are some of the Features every Week in

THE

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER,

Weekly Edition "Westminster Gazette,"

Price One Penny, of Newsagents and Bookstalls, or delivered with the early morning mails on Saturday, post free from the publisher, 1½d. a week.

Offices: TUDOR STREET, LONDON, E.C.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. By Post, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION, INCLUDING POSTAGE,

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

Telephone No: Gerrard 4035.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.	Narrow Column. ½ PAGE
Back Page, or Page facing matter ... }	£10 0 0	£5 10 0	£3 0 0	£3 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 10 0	2 10 0	3 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:

13 Insertions ...	8d. per line.
52 ,, ...	6d. ,,

WILLIAMS & NORGATE'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

READY OCTOBER 17.—Large Crown 8vo, cloth 6s.

THE SOUL OF PROGRESS.

by the Right Rev. J. EDWARD MERCER, D.D., Bishop of Tasmania.
Being the Moorhouse Lectures for 1907. The First Series delivered under this Lectureship

JUST READY.—320 pp., large crown 8vo, 6s.

NEW THEOLOGICAL SERMONS.

By Rev. R. J. CAMPBELL, M.A., City Temple, London.

"This volume is the work of a man who has the faith of an optimist in the highest sense, and strives to lead his readers upwards and onwards, not by denunciation, but by setting before them the beauty of holiness and by stimulating the will with the spirit of hopefulness, and trust in the sympathy of the Father-God and of Christ."—Birmingham Post.

ALMOST READY.—Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

CHURCH HISTORY.

By HANS von SCHUBERT.

Translated from the Third German Edition by MAURICE A. CANNEY, M.A.

By special arrangement with the Author, an additional Chapter will be added on "Religious Movements in England in the Nineteenth Century," by MISS ALICE GARDNER, Lecturer and Associate of Newnham College, Cambridge. Being the new volume in the Theological Translation Library, prospectus and List of Volumes in the Series post-free.

READY.—Med. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

MYSTERY OF NEWMAN.

By HENRI BREMOND.

READY.—Maps and 62 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 8s. 6d. net.

TENT AND TESTAMENT.

By H. RIX, B.A., Late Secretary Royal Society of London.

"Nothing so interesting has been written on Palestine as it was in the time of Christ and as it is in the present day."—Daily Mail.

FOURTH LARGE IMPRESSION.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net; 2s. 9d. post free.

LIFE AND MATTER.

By Sir OLIVER LODGE.

CROWN THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY NEW VOLUMES.

JUST READY.—Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s.

THE HISTORICAL EVIDENCE for the RESURRECTION of JESUS CHRIST.

By KIRSOPP LAKE, M.A. (Oxon.), Professor of N. T. Exegesis in University of Leiden.

Harnack's New Test Studies.

VOL. I. READY.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

LUKE, the PHYSICIAN.

By ADOLF HARNACK, D.D.

VOL. II.—In Active Preparation:

THE SAYINGS OF JESUS.

ALMOST READY.—Crown 8vo, cloth 5s.

THE APOLOGETIC OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

By Rev. E. F. SCOTT, M.A., of Prestwich, author of "The Fourth Gospel, its Purpose and Theology."

AT PRESS.—1 vol., demy 8vo, cloth.

NATIONAL IDEALISM AND A STATE CHURCH.

By STANTON COIT, Ph.D.

WORKS BY HERBERT SPENCER.

In two volumes; Demy 8vo, Buckram; Gilt Tops, with a number of Illustrations, some in Photogravure, 28s. net. 29s. post free.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

A System of Synthetic Philosophy.

	s. d.
FIRST PRINCIPLES. Thoroughly Revised. Popular re-issue now ready	7 6
PRINCIPLES OF BIOLOGY. 2 vols. (Revised and Enlarged)	36 0
PRINCIPLES OF PSYCHOLOGY. 2 vols.	36 0
PRINCIPLES OF SOCIOLOGY. Vol. I.	21 0
Ditto Vol. II.	18 0
Ditto Vol. III.	16 0
PRINCIPLES OF ETHICS. Vol. I.	15 0
Ditto Vol. II.	12 6
JUSTICE. (Separately)	6 0

JUST READY.—Uniform with New Edition of "First Principles."

THE DATA OF ETHICS.

Entirely re-set. Cloth, 3s. net.

OTHER WORKS.

	s. d.
THE STUDY OF SOCIOLOGY	10 6
EDUCATION. Entirely Reset	2 6
ESSAYS. 3 Vols.	30s. (or each Vol. 10s.)
FACTS AND COMMENTS	6 0
VARIOUS FRAGMENTS. Enlarged Edition	6 0
SOCIAL STATICS AND MAN v. STATE	10 0
MAN v. STATE (Separately)	1 0
AGAINST THE METRIC SYSTEM. Third Edition, with Additions	0 3

DESCRIPTIVE SOCIOLOGY.

Compiled and Abstracted by Dr. DUNCAN, Dr. SCHEPPIG, and Mr. COLLIER. Folio, boards.
1. ENGLISH, 18s. 2. ANCIENT AMERICAN RACES, 16s. 3. LOWEST RACES, NEGROES, POLYNESIANS, 18s. 4. AFRICAN RACES, 16s. 5. ASIATIC RACES, 18s. 6. AMERICAN RACES, 18s. 7. HEBREWS AND PHENICIANS, 21s. 8. FRENCH, 30s.

A Complete List of Works, with Contents, post-free upon application.

NEW VOLUME JUST COMMENCING.

OCTOBER NUMBER ready, 2s. 6d. net; 2s. 9d. post-free.

THE HIBBERT JOURNAL.

Subscriptions, commencing with any issue, 10s. per year, post-free

CHIEF CONTENTS:

NATURALISM AND HUMANISM	By Prof. F. J. E. WOODBRIDGE
THE UNIVERSE AS PHILOSOPHER	By L. P. JACKS
ARE WE PARTS OF NATURE?	By Prof. ROBERT MACKINTOSH
PROGRESS AND REALITY	By G. F. BARBOUR
ACTION AND REACTION OF CHRISTIANITY AND HINDUISM IN INDIA	By the Rev. N. MACNICOL
THE GOSPEL OF KRISHNA AND OF CHRIST	By MAUD JOYNT
ON CERTAIN ALLEGED DEFECTS IN CHRISTIAN MORALITY	By the Rev. DAVID PURVES, D.D.
THE "DEFENCE" OF THE FOURTH GOSPEL	By Prof. JAMES SETH
TRUST FAITH, BELIEF, CREED	By Prof. B. W. BACON
"DIRECTIVITY"	By Prof. HENRY GOODWIN SMITH
WHAT AND WHERE IS THE SOUL?	By Prof. G. HENSLAW
WAS JOHN CALVIN A REFORMER OR A REACTIONARY?	By HUGH MACCOLL
DISCUSSIONS, REVIEWS, BIBLIOGRAPHY OF RECENT LITERATURE.	By Prof. T. C. HALL

Complete List of Announcements, Giving the Scope of Each Volume, Post Free upon Application.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE SPEAKER PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1907.

READY.—Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

NATURALISM and RELIGION.

By RUDOLF OTTO, D.D. (of Gottingen).
Translated by Prof. J. ARTHUR THOMSON.

"Of the numerous works recently published dealing with the relations of scientific and religious thought, Dr. Otto's 'Naturalism and Religion,' is quite easily best."—British Weekly.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net.

THE COMING CHURCH.

By Rev. Dr. JOHN HUNTER.

The Nation

Vol. II., No. 3.]

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1907.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1d.]

CONTENTS.

PAGE	PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK ... 69	Is it Plagiarism? By "Puz- zled" ... 84
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—	"Insurance v. Trial by Jury." By the writer of the article. ... 84
Railway Mismanagers... .. 72	"Socialism in Liberalism," By E. O. Post ... 85
Towards Federation 73	"The Cant of Militarism," By George F. Shee ... 85
England and Germany 74	THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 86
The Social Mission of the Church 75	Books to be Read 86
LIFE AND LETTERS:—	REVIEWS:—
The House of Silence. By ... 77	The American Revolution ... 87
John Galsworthy 78	Drama at the Court Theatre ... 88
Nature's Sacraments 78	Religions of the East... .. 88
Wayfarers. By A. R. 79	The Case for Women's Suff- rage 89
An Artist's Politics 80	The Statecraft of Henry VIII. By Professor A. F. Pollard ... 90
MUSIC:—	The Congo Horror 92
The Leeds Musical Festival ... 81	Ireland in the Nineteenth Century 94
POETRY:—	The Compensation Act 94
In the Cool of the Evening. By Alfred Noyes 81	The Novel of the Week 96
OPEN QUESTIONS:—	Siena and her Artists... .. 96
Is Socialism Plunder? By J. A. H. 82	Books in Brief 98
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—	THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 100
A Remarkable Little Book. By "Historicus" 83

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE reply of the Railway Association this week to Mr. Bell shuts the door against the easiest mode of settlement. That the Association may not be technically competent to act for the companies in such a matter may be true, but it is difficult to believe that they could not have got or taken such a power if it had seemed desirable to them. Their actual policy in this quarrel is conducted by the Association, as Mr. Bell, in his speech on Wednesday points out, not by the companies in their separate capacity; and in any case the early informal approaches could have best been entered in this way. But if it be true, as the Association declares, that all its members find nothing to consider in Mr. Bell's proposal, this question of form may be allowed to lapse. The companies refuse discussion or conciliation at the present stage. This action is stiffening the attitude of the men. It seems certain that the ballot which is now in course will give a solid mandate for a strike, and that if a strike takes place, the full support of the organised labour forces will be given to the men. The Political Committee of the Trade Union Congress has formally expressed its intention to confer, early in November, with the Federation of Trade Unions and the Labour Party in order to make such support as effective as possible.

* * *

MEANWHILE active preparations for the conflict are being made by the two parties. Mr. Bell is producing a powerful effect upon public opinion by the disclosure of two documents. One is a letter sent from the district superintendent's office of the Great Central at Doncaster to an inspector on that line which suspends him from his inspectorship on the ground that, "as a member of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, you cease to be a free agent." The other document is still more damaging. It purports to be written by a locomotive superintendent to a driver, calls him to book for failing to increase the pace of his engine, and appears to indicate a systematic endeavour to speed up trains by bringing pressure to bear on drivers. Mr. Bell professes to have in his possession other letters of a similar character. On their part the railway companies are taking practical steps to strengthen their position by educating lower grades of their employees to undertake responsible posts at short notice. The Midland Railway has set up near Derby a blackleg camp, collecting there a reserve force of men designed to take the place of strikers. The question how far skilled reliable men can be got for such a purpose is hotly discussed. In this connection a recent report of Major Pringle to the Board of Trade is of interest. It is there pointed out that the good state of trade has made it difficult to obtain men for the existing needs of railway traffic, so as to enable the railways to reduce the excessive hours of labour worked in certain grades.

* * *

EARLY last Tuesday morning a Bristol express train ran past two sets of danger signals, and, entering at about sixty miles an hour a curve which is supposed to be taken at ten miles, broke from the rails and was wrecked, causing a loss of eighteen lives and serious injury to many other passengers. The inquiry, in which Mr. Lloyd George himself took the leading part, leaves the causes of the accident inexplicable, the driver, a man named Martin, and the fireman both being killed. Evidence shows that Martin appears to have been a sober man, in sound health, and to have had ample rest before entering his post; nor is any explanation of his disregard of the signals or of his excessive pace available. The vacuum brake appears to have been applied, but too late to do more than slightly check the pace when the train left the line. The public disquietude at this accident is not lessened by the fact, pointed out by Mr. Lloyd George at Manchester, that this is one of a series of recent train smashes where competent and capable engine-drivers have on clear nights rushed their trains past signals to destruction.

* * *

THE campaign carried on by the Moderate majority of the London County Council against the Works Department of that body has been marked by an incident which will hardly commend itself even to many of the bitterest opponents of municipal trading. Under the Progressives the Works Department had prepared estimates for building the great sewer the progress of which for a time was feared to endanger the safety of St. Paul's Cathedral. When the Moderates were returned last March they at once decided to submit the work to outside firms for tenders, and, in order to make the result doubly sure, they first made public the estimate sent in by their own Works Department. Nor is this the worst feature of the business. The successful contractor undertakes to complete the work at less expense than the Works Department allowed for, but, as Mr. Henry Ward and Mr. McKinnon Wood both pointed out, the Works Department has no object in tendering the lowest price, and as a general rule it has carried out previous undertakings at about 20 per cent. less than the cost allowed for.

* * *

DURING the past week the autumnal meetings of the Congregational Union have been held at Blackpool. We deal elsewhere with the timely address from the chair by Mr. J. Compton Rickett, M.P. Not less timely were the protests of Dr. Horton and the Rev. J. H. Jowett against the demoralisation of the ministry by the Press. The continual paragraphing of popular preachers is not only bad for them personally, but does great damage to the Church by fostering among the younger and less known men a lust for publicity fatal to good work. For the rest we are glad to see that Principal Forsyth's resolution on the railway crisis was (in response to cries of "Back up the men!") so amended as to throw the responsibility for the present situation on the directors.

* * *

THE Congress of the French Radicals and Socialist-Radicals, which closed at Nancy on Sunday, leaves the relation of these parties to Socialism equivocal and unsettled. The more official and ministerial elements certainly wished, in obedience to the Press campaign led by the "Matin" and the "Temps," to declare unrelenting war on Socialism, ostensibly because of its anti-militarist tendencies, really in obedience to the middle-class reaction. But the drastic boycotting resolution proposed by M. Bonnet was defeated. In its place stands a formula which proclaims a boycott at the polls of individual Socialists who uphold anti-militarism, while calling for a continued co-operation with the Socialist Party in the Chamber. No one is quite sure what this means. It certainly ostracises M. Hervé and his extremists, but does it make war on M. Jaurès and the main body? We can only note that M. Buisson, who drafted the resolution, declares that at a second ballot he would certainly vote for M. Jaurès. The "Temps" and the "Débats" are annoyed, while M. Jaurès, in "l'Humanité," adopts a much more friendly tone towards Radicalism than he has used for many months past, and assumes that it still has a future. The explanation is that the Congress developed some elements of opposition to the Government, called for a more resolute prosecution of such reforms as the Income-tax Bill, and censured the Conservatism of the Senate. The final declaration of the Congress proclaimed "its horror of war, its pacific intentions, its attachment to the principle of obligatory arbitration," went on to affirm the solidarity of the Left "bloc," and wound up by declaring that "we cannot repudiate the Socialist spirit." However far the Radicals may be from M. Hervé, only a shade of theory separates them from M. Jaurès. For, after all, M. Jaurès has steadily combated M. Hervé, who has been beaten at two Socialist Congresses, and is mercilessly ridiculed in this week's "l'Humanité."

* * *

THE Germans are much less adroit than the French in their handling of extremists. The French are clever enough to make the most of M. Hervé. His follies are everywhere quoted; he is interviewed in the "Matin"; he is advertised in the hope that the public will confuse him with M. Jaurès, and imagine that he is typical of Socialism. The Germans, on the other hand, try to suppress their Hervé, and succeed in making a martyr of him. Dr. Liebknecht, a son of the great Socialist leader, has been condemned at Frankfurt to eighteen months' imprisonment in a fortress for publishing a brochure on anti-militarism. Some of the German Liberal papers have protested against the injustice of this sentence, for the pamphlet was certainly not treasonable, and many have pointed out the absurdity of imprisoning a man on whose honour, as the Court frankly admitted, there is no stain. The absurdity becomes farce when we remember that, though the book is suppressed, the fact that it had to be read in extenso at the trial has enabled "Vorwärts" to reproduce it triumphantly from beginning to end.

* * *

THE work of the second Hague closes to-day, with the formal signature of the conventions which embody its labours. Some progress was reported at theenary sitting on Wednesday. The American proposal to prohibit the use of force in the collection of contractual debts until resort has been had to arbitration, was accepted by all the great, and most of the lesser Powers. The report on obligatory arbitration, which has called forth the emphatic dissent of Germany, was adopted, America and Japan refraining from voting. The abortive scheme for the constitution of a Permanent Court of Arbitration was solemnly adopted, though the failure to agree on a method of appointing the judges robs it of practical value. The feature of the sitting was a warm tribute paid by Baron Marshall von Bieberstein to M. Bourgeois.

* * *

THE enthusiastic and even theatrical demonstrations of Russian sympathy for Bulgaria, which occurred during the recent visit of the Grand Duke Vladimir to the battlefields and monuments of the Russo-Turkish War, have been followed by the publication in Vienna of an alleged military convention between Russia and Bulgaria. Its general sense is to make the Bulgarian army the advance-guard of a Russia force in any future war with Turkey. This news has, of course, been semi-officially denied, but a leading article in Wednesday's "Temps" pointed out how intrinsically probable it is, and concluded that if the Viennese agency "sinned by excess of imagination, its intuition was both sound and timely." The fact is, we believe, that, as the "Temps" puts it, Russia means to use her freedom from embarrassments in the Far and Middle East, to pursue an "active" though not necessarily a militant policy in the Near East. If the Macedonian question can be solved without war, she will be well satisfied, but if war is inevitable, she will act in concert with Bulgaria. We refuse for our part to believe that war is inevitable or even probable, if the concert will act with energy and unanimity in imposing an executive European control in Macedonia.

* * *

A BILL was this week introduced into the Indian Legislative Council which makes permanent and universal the temporary Coercion Act, which hitherto applied only to Eastern Bengal and the Punjab. "The Prevention of Seditious Meetings Act" will enable the Government to "proclaim" any area in India, and therein to suppress the right of public meeting. A public meeting is defined as any gathering of twenty persons, even if it meets in a private place and is confined to ticket-holders. In a proclaimed area meetings can be held only by express permission; disobedience is punishable by fine and imprisonment. It is difficult to see how a gathering of selected persons in a private house could "promote disturbance of public tranquillity." Mr. Morley, on assuming office, defined our rule in India as autocracy tempered by free speech. Two years have sufficed to make that definition obsolete.

* * *

MR. TAFT'S opening address to the Philippine Assembly at Manila is a frank acknowledgment of American inability to fulfil the liberative mission upon which she entered when she purchased the Islands from Spain. Entering the country first as friends and allies of a rebellion against Spain, they soon found themselves engaged in a devastating war which lingered on for years in the remote Islands. Pledged to give independence to the Filipinos, they have postponed the fulfilment of that pledge, committing themselves meanwhile to improvising a machinery of local self-government on American lines, which, if we may trust the testimony of most disinterested observers, has proved a disastrous failure. Now Mr. Taft declares that the Filipinos must wait at least a generation for their freedom, denying at the same time that the United States has any intention of abandoning its mission. This speech will be received with a good deal of disquietude among many sections of Americans, who have a great and growing distaste for this perilous experiment of colonial rule in the Pacific seas.

IN the presence of the water-colour drawings of Mr. William Callow, which are now on view at the Leicester Galleries, one takes off one's hat to the spirit of a past art. Sixty-six water-colours have been got together; they represent the output of about as many years, for Mr. Callow, who is still with us, was born in 1812, became a full member of the R. W. S. in 1848, and only ceased to paint three years ago. Thus the father of the Old Water Colour Society, as he has affectionately been styled, has practically worked side by side with every one of the famous artists who made the art-history of the nineteenth century—with Turner and Copley Fielding, David Cox and De Wint, Prout and Roberts, to mention a few. Curiously enough, while he has seen so many changes in fashion, has witnessed such an upheaval as the pre-Raphaelite movement, his own practice has undergone but little modification from start to finish. The examples shown are wonderfully uniform. Scrupulous devotion to pure washes of colour, and a touch broad without being splotchy, are the principal permanent characteristics of his technique; for subjects he has been both to land and sea, but more especially to those places where there was architecture; he loved palatial buildings, old-world streets, and market-places, as well as he painted them. The pictorial record here unfolded should interest and touch every sympathiser with water-colour art.

* * *

THE Exhibition of the Royal Institute of Oil-Painters, the first of the larger autumn art shows, opened this week. It is gratifying to note both that the entire Exhibition is very much better in quality than that of last year, and that part, at any rate, of this result is due to the vigorous support of honorary members. Among the latter Sir George Reid and Sir James Guthrie contribute admirable portraits; Mr. Sargent sends one of the most striking of last year's landscapes in "The Mountains of Moab"; and Sir Ernest Waterlow is responsible for a typical picture on the Seine at Marne. Landscape must be adjudged the most notable section of the output by the rank and file. Mr. George Wetherbee's "The Blue Pool" is a noteworthy example of this painter's poetic art, a work refined in its sentiment and scholarly in its technique; and landscape is treated justly and variously by Messrs. Frank Walton, Guy Broun-Morison, Montague Smythe, J. S. Hill, Elmer Schofield, and others. The finer spirits in the modern art world are perhaps not as palpable at the Institute as they might be. Journeyman painting still occupies a deal of space. Much of the excellence displayed is purely perfunctory, and the trouble is that, the larger the canvas, the more difficult is it to discover an inspired passage, a proof that the thing was felt as well as seen. Yet there is bright promise in the work of Mr. Charles Sims, an artist of rare, if incomplete, ability, while that curiously exotic re-vivifier of the primitives, Mr. Cayley Robinson, sends two pictures that awaken thoughts of a decorative art nobler than that to which the world has grown accustomed.

* * *

IN opening her season at the Kingsway Theatre with Mr. Anthony P. Wharton's "Irene Wycherley," Miss Lena Ashwell has proved her courage. The play can scarcely be a commercial success; it might easily have aroused intense antagonism; and the author himself was quite unknown to fame. Most managers would have rejected the play for one or all of these reasons, and Mr. Wharton might still be unknown. As it is, he has shown himself to be a dramatist of whom we shall expect great things. The theme of his "Irene Wycherley" is old enough in all conscience—the brutality of marriage when one of the two is a brute, and the futility of sacrifice in such conditions. The treatment, however, is new. Mr. Wharton, probably by native instinct, has conducted his play with rare skill. His dialogue is natural and yet effective; it is witty and yet not strained. The characters are well defined if their psychology does not cut very deep. The weakness of the play is that each act is separate in interest, and we do not know much more of Irene herself at the end of the drama than we did at the beginning. The horror of Wycherley's delirious breakdown is overdone and is not in keeping with the rest of the play. These scenes appear to have been written for horror's sake, but even so they display remarkable dramatic grip. If Mr. Wharton can think about life and deal organically with its problems, he should be the dramatist for whom we have waited so long.

* * *

IN his preface to "The Devil's Disciple," Mr. Bernard Shaw has told us what we ought to think of his play, but it must be confessed that on the stage much of it is dull. After all, the central idea of the play, that a "genuinely religious" man, who fights against the cruelty and hate which spring from dead religions, must become a disciple of the devil in the eyes of the world, as Shelley himself was, cannot be adequately treated in the method of Mr. Shaw's play. The irony is mechanical, and consists of turning well-known theatrical situations upside down. Mr. Shaw has even carried this method of surprise—which Sarcey considered to be the chief factor of drama—to the point of purposely misleading his audience as to the motives of the Rev. Anthony Anderson's sudden disappearance. As a piece of "Diabolonian Ethics" the play is poor and crude, but the trial scene is a masterpiece of fantastic comedy, and the character of General Burgoyne a veritable creation. Mr. Shaw was not much assisted by his players, with the exception of Mr. Granville Barker as General Burgoyne. It is evident that the general style of acting which told in the small Court Theatre must be broadened for the Savoy.

* * *

THE publication of a selection from Queen Victoria's letters on Wednesday, and Lord Rosebery's speech at Leith on Saturday, when Mr. J. S. Rhind's imposing statue of the late Queen was unveiled, have focussed attention upon Queen Victoria's splendid statesmanship and unrivalled tact as the ruler of a democratic country. The letters now printed are historical documents of the highest value, but their chief interest consists in their frank revelation of Queen Victoria's character. We already knew from the memoirs of the great statesmen of her reign how seriously she regarded her responsibilities as ruler, and the close attention she always gave to the political and social questions of her time. Her domestic life, too, with its example of quiet simplicity, has frequently been held up to the admiration of her subjects. Both these aspects of her life gain vividness from the letters. Again, the story of her reliance upon the sagacious counsel of her uncle King Leopold, and that of her long-continued struggle with Lord Palmerston, though not new, are now told in detail for the first time in the volumes edited by Mr. Benson and Viscount Esher. We hope to deal with the book fully in our review columns in an early issue.

* * *

THIS week marks a new conquest of space. On Thursday the first Press messages were flashed across the Atlantic between Ireland and Cape Breton by wireless Marconi telegraphy. In a short time it is expected that this method will be available for ordinary private messages. The Irish station stands on a headland four miles from Clifden, in Connemara, where Signor Marconi has established his large installation. The signals, it is stated, are sent and received simultaneously, and are read with great distinctness. A speed of about thirty words per minute has at present been attained.

Politics and Affairs.

RAILWAY MISMANAGERS.

THE blank refusal of the railway managers to enter the path of conciliation proposed by their employees renders a strike almost inevitable. Their answer, that there is nothing to discuss, and if there were, the Association is not competent to discuss it, embodies a spirit of arrogant autocracy once extremely common, but now rare in the relations of capital and labour among the more organised trades of this country. The ballot-papers which are coming in from the branches of the Amalgamated Society make it pretty certain that a solid vote in favour of a strike will be cast by the hundred thousand members of the Union. If they come out, they will certainly be joined by a large number of the younger men of the Locomotive Union. While the decision will be reached in about a fortnight, Mr. Bell will, of course, exercise his discretion as to the time for action. Several considerations will, doubtless, weigh with the men's executive; by waiting they may gather in non-unionists, but may damp down the fighting spirit of their members; by striking at the time most embarrassing to the railways they may offend the public, and lose some of its support. On the whole, it seems likely that Mr. Bell will bide his time, so as to strike with the maximum effect. Meantime, the anxiety of the general mind will be growing ever tenser as the catastrophe becomes more imminent. For the situation, should a strike take place, will involve a terrible amount of suffering, the stagnation of traffic over large parts of the country, and, if it continue, the starvation of our city populations. It is true that, unless the locomotive men decide to throw in their lot en bloc with the Associated Society, a large portion of the passenger trains may still run; but the mineral traffic, and most of the other goods traffic, will be brought to a standstill, and London and other large cities will speedily find their supplies of food and fuel running short.

The pretence that the strikers can be replaced by competent substitutes is not likely to assuage the anxiety of a public which has before its mind the terrible object lesson of this Shrewsbury catastrophe. The companies dare not put in the chief signal-boxes of their lines ill-trained clerks and porters or picked-up blacklegs to take the place of their experienced employees, staking the lives of their passengers against their pride and obstinacy.

Upon whom does the responsibility for this terrible menace rest, and what means have the public for averting it? To the former of these questions we think public opinion is prepared with a tolerably clear answer. In refusing even to consider a basis of discussion for grievances, the railway directors have put themselves out of court. If the employees have a right collectively to bargain as to the terms of their employment, they must be permitted to employ skilled agents for this purpose, whom the managers must consent to recognise. Peaceful settlement of differences can only come this way. If, as the directors contend, recognition will strengthen Unionism, and stronger Unions will press for a rise of wages, and other conditions disastrous to the interests of the shareholders, this is a contention which has been met and overcome in other organised industries. "But," say the railways, "other industries can raise prices to recoup themselves for rising expenses; we cannot;" and they point to their accounts of recent years, which show working expenses encroaching ever more largely upon gross earnings, and net earnings and dividends exhibiting a marked decline. Now we are certainly not disposed to overlook the serious condition in which thousands of shareholders find themselves, with shrinking capital values, and falling dividends. Lord Allerton, chairman of the Great Northern Railway, has certainly good grounds for his recent declaration that "English railways are at the present time in a more difficult position than they had ever found themselves in since they were built." But we must remind our readers that this position cannot be imputed to the high wages and unreasonable demands of railway employees. Large masses of railway workers are worked for longer hours at lower rates of pay than appertain in any great skilled trade in the country. The railway wage-bill has undoubtedly risen, but managers in flaunting this fact before their shareholders and the public, are seeking to avoid close scrutiny into the real causes of the financial trouble, viz., inefficient management. The loose and utterly unscientific bookkeeping which still prevails in our railways precludes the managers from knowing the actual earning power of the trains they run, or from answering many of the elementary questions involved in railway accountancy. And what is more, these very managers, whose high-handed refusal to meet the men is bringing on the present railway crisis, are also engaged in placing every possible impediment in the way of the Select Committee which is seeking at the present time to place railway accountancy upon a sound systematic basis. Although some reforms have been effected in the last few years, the waste of hauling power both in passenger and goods traffic still remains so enormous as to swallow up all the increased values which should accrue from the normal and well-nigh automatic increase in traffic afforded by a growing population, with their growing needs of transport. In other words, the contention of the managers that they will not meet the men, because they cannot afford to concede any of their demands for higher wages and shorter hours, is utterly invalid. Let them bring up the standard of management even to the level of the North-Eastern, and they will have ample funds to compromise with the demands of the Unions without any reduction of dividends. Their arbitrary attitude is designed to conceal the large margin of their inefficiency, the main cause of the weak finances of our railways. Let the thousands of shareholders who are anxiously awaiting the issue of this struggle, refuse to permit themselves to be "fooled" by idle talk about encroachments of labour, and look to the quality of the management of their capital, checking the extravagant borrowing which takes place whenever money can be had cheaply, and insisting upon the adoption of scientific methods of railway economy.

Meanwhile the more urgent question waits. What can be done now to stay this disastrous strife? Neither party is likely to apply to the Board of Trade for formal conciliation, the railway managers because "there is nothing to discuss," the Amalgamated Society because, when they appealed once before in 1897, they met with an official rebuff. As the emergency approaches the request for Government interference, already plainly voiced, will swell into an irresistible demand. Government, it will be said, must force the parties to conciliation. Can Government do this? Its technical powers under the Conciliation Act of 1906 are very limited, though somewhat wider than is commonly supposed. In addition to the right of instituting an inquiry and of offering friendly mediation, it possesses a larger power, which we believe has not hitherto been exercised, and which is indicated in the following clause of the Act:—

"If it appears to the Board of Trade that in any district or trade adequate means do not exist for having disputes submitted to a conciliation board for the district or trade, they may appoint any person or persons to inquire into the conditions of the district or trade, and to confer with employers and employed, and if the Board of Trade thinks fit, with any local authority or body, as to the expediency of establishing a conciliation board for the district or trade."

This power duly exercised would, it appears, enable Mr. Lloyd George to summon the two parties to appear before a Conciliation Board thus instituted at the sole initiative of the Board of Trade. Were such an invitation issued at a time when the public were suffering the actual pains and penalties of war, we are disposed to think that the railway directors dare not refuse. Were they still to prove obdurate, the sufferings of the people would oblige the Prime Minister to summon Parliament and to submit a measure of Compulsory Arbitration, limited perhaps in scope, but immediately applicable to the current emergency. Unpopular as we know the idea of such State compulsion is among employers and employed, it appears to be the only adequate remedy short of nationalisation of the railways. When in America six years ago the coal and railway barons of Pennsylvania refused to arbitrate their quarrel with the anthracite miners, and whole populations were perishing with cold, President Roosevelt plainly told the employers that unless they gave way he would march troops into the mining district and work the coal. This spirit, though not this exact method, we shall look to find in Mr. George should the emergency require it. We do not, however, anticipate the necessity of any measure so extreme. The attitude of the railway managers, who have in this matter imposed their authority upon directors and shareholders alike, is one of foolish defiance, injurious alike to capital, labour, and the public, and one which ultimately they will find themselves unable to maintain.

TOWARDS FEDERATION.

THE re-settlement of South Africa advances step by step. In the Transvaal the people of the country have come to their own. The white majority rules, the Chinese are departing as the contracts run out, and the Semite is no longer disposer of all. The South African majority, compact of Briton and Boer, holds the representative assembly, and through the obliging behaviour of two Progressives who have retired from the Legislative Council, General Botha now commands a majority in the Second Chamber as well. This alleged check on popular representation has indeed turned out singularly hollow and ineffective. The main objects for which the war was fought—the domination of the financier, the elimination of the white workman, the expropriation of the Boer, the establishment of servile labour—have one and all been frustrated by the gift of self-government. Not only so, but something positive has been gained. Briton and Boer, who supposed themselves to be enemies, have found out the truth that some few of us preached before ever the war begun. They have discovered that their interests, far from being opposed, are in the main identical: that they have been the object of common attack by the financier with his mechanism of a servile Press, his retinue of Asiatic serfs, his apparatus of music-hall patriotism. They have learned that the white men who would live freely and have scope for life and labour in a new country must allow no petty bitternesses of the past to divide them when confronted with the sinister forces which modern capital has at its disposal. The lesson has not been learnt in vain, and the South Africa of the future, grave as are the problems before it, will at least be the home of a united white race—a race which will be, in the true sense, South African, born and bred in the country, making its home there, and not visiting it to make money and retire.

This race is, and doubtless will be, predominantly Boer in blood. And there will, of course, be those who will seek to frighten us with tales of Boer predominance, should the elections in the Orange Colony and Cape Colony go as is expected. Indeed, it will be but a fresh instance of the irony of politics—which in this case is but another name for the short-sightedness of some politicians—if within six years of the peace of Vereeniging, the crushed enemy should hold the reins in three out of the four self-governing colonies of South Africa. But the vanquished are winning for two reasons; first that they never were vanquished, since their spirit was unbroken; and second, that they ought never to have been attacked at all, and that those who attacked them have now found this out. The Boers as Boers could not hold either the Transvaal or Cape Colony. They hold them as South African whites, as the nucleus of the patriotic party, to which all sensible men of English and Scottish birth, who are making a home in South Africa, are now rapidly learning to attach themselves. In 1899 a great many of these men were grossly misled. In the years that followed from the first establishment of Milner government at Pretoria to the passing of the Chinese Labour Ordinance, their eyes were opened.

In the probable predominance of the South African party there is, then, nothing to fear on behalf of the Empire. We are far from saying that the work of the war can be undone or that South Africa can ever now become what Canada and Australia are to the Mother Country. Not merely now, but generations hence, in any case of strain between England and South Africa there are bitter memories to which men who seek to divide and estrange will find it easy to appeal. If the memory of Majuba could lash England to fury in 1899, if Slaughter's Nek was remembered by the Dutch seventy-four years after the event, is it likely that the graver events of 1899-1902 will so die out as to be incapable of revival? But here is a permanent source of danger opened up once for all when the conduct of affairs was committed to those who knew neither justice nor freedom. We cannot close it up again. All that we can do is to prevent the opening of fresh sources of trouble, and with the best intentions in the world we shall not always find this easy. We have, however, given back internal freedom to the conquered Republics. The Transvaal flag combines the Vierkleur and the Union Jack. The close of the year is likely to see Botha, Delarey, and De Wet all Ministers of the Crown. We can further that Federation which would have rendered the last war impossible, and constitutes now the immediate step to be taken in the growth of the new South African nation. For South Africa is to be a nation precisely as Sir Wilfred Laurier has told us that Canada is a nation. The greater and more united it is as a nation the more likely its people will be to acquiesce in that free union into which, after the disturbances of Mr. Chamberlain's rule, the white portion of the Empire is once more settling down. This union cannot rest on sentiment alone, and in South Africa sentiment would not support it. Still less can it rest on force, and nowhere has force more conspicuously failed than in South Africa. It rests for the present—and will rest till circumstances greatly change or till some new strain of feeling is put upon it—on mutual interest, on the advantages of mutual protection, and on the facilities for a wider life afforded by a common citizenship. No one, after the rashness that has been, can prophesy smooth things as to the permanent future in South Africa. It is enough that the present trend is towards the union of the white races, the control of the de-nationalised financier, and consequently friendly relations with the Empire.

One grave problem remains which will come up in connection with Federation. The old phrase: "Equal rights for all white men south of the Zambesi" is in process of being justified—in strange ways, unexpected to the phrase-maker, as is the wont of phrases. What of those who are not white—the Kaffir, the Hottentot, and the crowd of half-castes, Malays, and others who in South African phrase are distinguished from full-blooded natives as "coloured" people? These people are as much British subjects as the white man. One theory of the war was that it was undertaken in their special interest, though it is probable that their last state is at best no improvement on their first. The circumstances of the Natal rebellion—stoutly defended, of course, by the Press and the official world at the time—are not calculated to reassure us as to the future. It seems to us that it should be the prime object of British statesmanship in the coming negotiations for Federation to urge on the Colonial Governments a generous and statesman-like basis for the solution of this standing problem. In establishing the two new Colonial Governments our hands were tied by the Vereeniging terms. We have bound ourselves not to insist on the enfranchisement of the natives or the coloured peoples before the question of self-government should be settled. In the discussions on Federation we encounter no such obstacle. Nor have we to do more than rely on the experience of Cape Colony, where the franchise, though in practice restricted to a small fraction of natives, has nevertheless enabled them before now to hold the balance at a General Election. The object of our statesmanship should be to throw our weight into the scale with the best men of Cape Colony, and we are sure with many in the other three Colonies, to induce them to admit the natives to such a share in the representation as will secure a fair consideration for their interests, and will allow them to speak for themselves, instead of being eternally spoken for by self-constituted patrons. It is a sad reflection that in speaking for justice to uncivilised races, we as a nation have lost much of our old authority. In South Africa in particular, "justice" and "humanity" are terms which an audience will hardly listen to from English lips. But there is another side to the case. South Africans are well aware that in all that they suffered there was a large party in England that suffered with them, and endured much contumely in the championship of their cause. This part of England at least they will not accuse of cant and insincerity, and it is precisely this part of England which is in earnest in asking them for freedom, political as well as economic, for the native race.

ENGLAND AND GERMANY.

THERE comes always in the slow process by which nations are reconciled and feuds appeased an anxious moment before success is quite assured, when the enemies of concord redouble their provocations and obscure the motives of both parties in careful webs of rancour and suspicion. We are nearing such a moment in our relationship with Germany, and the school which has shouted Delenda est Carthago ever since the passage of the Navy Act of 1900 is aware how critical this period is for the success of its campaign. Next month the Kaiser, accompanied, we hope, by Prince Bülow, will visit King Edward in England, and much will turn upon the mood in which the country receives him. It was possible to doubt whether the last visit which the King paid to the German Court was much more than an act of personal courtesy, though the warm words of the Kaiser's toast and the geniality of the German people created an impression of confidence and cordiality. The Kaiser's visit, on the other hand—since the programme includes a Guildhall banquet and a procession through the streets of London—will frankly challenge a political interpretation. If, by such methods as the "Times" employed last week, the opponents of a reconciliation can chill the emotional atmosphere and impose a studied caution and reserve, the visit may do more harm than good: expose the well-meant efforts of Prince Bülow to an ill-mannered rebuff and send our visitors home convinced that the governing classes in England will listen to no advances and forget no grievances.

The task of creating suspicion by an analysis of the motives which have caused Prince Bülow to promote this reconciliation puts no strain upon the resources of an adroit controversialist. For it is fair to assume that no German statesman trained in the Bismarckian tradition will allow himself to be dominated by the larger considerations of humanity which ought to govern European polity. We need ascribe to Prince Bülow neither an abstract concern for peace nor a disinterested regard for England. A political realist dreads defeat rather than war, and courts the nation whose enmity may be dangerous rather than the nation whose temperament is naturally congenial to him. We need not question the diagnosis of the "Times" when it ascribes the recent inclinations of Prince Bülow partly to the proved solidity of our entente cordiale with France, partly to our Agreement with Russia, and partly to the discovery that German naval preparations cannot proceed as swiftly as the more sanguine members of the Flotten-Verein had hoped. German policy has recognised that changed conditions demand a fresh orientation. It accepts the omens and modifies its methods and its attitude with a cold self-command and an indifference to all emotional considerations. We cannot, of course, be certain that the change is permanent, for German policy is consistent only in its opportunism. But to demand a change of heart, and call, as the "Times" does, for a "sincere repentance" is as foolish as it is insolent. Hatred and love have no place among the mechanical levers of interest which govern German policy, nor could any responsible person seek to arrange a "union of hearts" between the England of Gladstone and the Germany of Bismarck. The question is rather whether we ought to recognise the change of front in Berlin, adjust our interests and our rivalries, and seek to give durable validity to the calculation which for the moment prefers our friendship to our enmity. If we hold aloof—refuse to forget the past, push to an extreme the advantages we have won by "penning Germany in," and rely on the overwhelming power of our fleet—the feud will be permanent, the humaner purposes of European statecraft will be wrecked by the prevailing distrust, and in the end the only solution, the only path to equilibrium and repose, may lie through an "inevitable" war. If, on the other hand, we meet Germany in a neighbourly and conciliatory spirit, she may come to realise that she can gain her legitimate ends without staking everything on a risky attempt to break our naval supremacy. The détente which Prince Bülow desires would be a period of experiment. It lies with us to make it so mutually advantageous, so necessary to the peace and progress of the world, that its natural consummation would be a reduction of naval armaments.

In the history of our relations with Germany it was undoubtedly the determination expressed in the Navy Act of 1900 to create a German fleet "of such strength that even for the mightiest naval Power a war with her would involve such risks as to jeopardise its own supremacy" which made a turning-point. The early phases of the Boer War found Mr. Chamberlain advocating a Pan-Teutonic Alliance, the "Daily Mail" welcoming the Kaiser as "our friend in need," and the two Governments concluding an entente which was to form a basis for joint action in the Far East. It was the growth of the German Navy which caused the "Times," the "Spectator," and the "National Review" to make the sudden discovery that Germany is the enemy. The notion that our naval position was being seriously challenged became with them a fixed idea—and no doubt there are Germans who do believe that superior efficiency on their side might balance numbers on ours, while a sudden attack would not allow us to mobilise at once at the point of danger more than a fraction of our scattered fleets. It is a madman's calculation, but it serves to lend a show of plausibility to those who argue to-day that Prince Bülow's amiability can only disguise a plan for gaining time until his fleet is ready. It is useless to speculate about the secret motives which may underlie the intention of the German Government to be strong at sea as well as on land. The motive may be genuinely defensive—and even if it were aggressive, there are, after all, other naval Powers in the world who might be attacked with more hope of profit and success than ourselves. It is a naïve egoism which assumes that every ship built abroad is armed against England. But while we cannot pretend to gauge the secret plans of the German Government, we can follow the arguments by which the growth of the fleet are recommended to the German taxpayer. It is described as an insurance for the growing mercantile marine. So long as we maintain the traditional right of capturing private property at sea in time of war, so long will these preparations be legitimate and even necessary. Our defence of that traditional and respectable method of barbarism at the present Hague Conference has placed in the hands of the German Navy League an argument which it will not be slow to use. If we had had the statesmanship to renounce that right, it is probable that the Flotten-Verein would have experienced a sudden decline in its membership. It is the knowledge that our Navy might suddenly seize and appropriate the costly liners, the numerous "tramps" which they have built of late years, that compels German merchants to support the heavy taxation which is creating a defensive navy. What they support as a weapon of defence others may use as a weapon of attack. But if the navy had to be advocated frankly as an aggressive arm it is fairly certain that the Reichstag would not sanction a large expenditure. Our determination to maintain this tremendous threat against peaceful commerce is robbing us of the support which every sane element in Germany would otherwise give to a policy of peace and disarmament. It exposes us to a not unnatural distrust, and even the Socialists looked on our proposal for a reduction of armaments as a snare. It is doubtful whether even from the naval standpoint we have gained. For Germany has replied to our defence of one method of barbarism by setting up a claim to employ another. If we use our naval strength to capture her commerce, she will use her naval weakness as an excuse for adopting the inhuman but inexpensive method of the floating mine.

The conclusion from any fair survey of German policy and German ship-building is, we think, that it is entirely gratuitous to assume that any aggressive intention underlies the determination to have a strong navy. If we wish to succeed in our advocacy of reduced armaments, we can judge of our chances of success only after we have essayed the task of establishing normal and friendly relations with Germany. The will on her side is present. The condition which Sir Edward Grey most properly laid down—an improvement in Franco-German relations—is also present. Our friendship with France is happily so firm and so popular that an approach to Germany may be made without the risk of misunderstanding. For it is only with a Liberal Power that we could maintain a relationship so cordial and so intimate as that which binds us to France. A reconciliation with Germany, like our Agreement with Russia, would belong to the realm rather of business than of sentiment. That such a reconciliation is necessary and desirable most Englishmen realise. We for our part would go further and urge that it can be postponed only at the cost of compromising many of the purposes which are essential to a Liberal policy alike at home and abroad.

THE SOCIAL MISSION OF THE CHURCH.

It was natural and appropriate that Mr. J. Compton Rickett, as a layman and a member of the House of Commons, should select the social mission of the Church as the subject of his presidential address to the representatives of the Congregational Union assembled this week at Blackpool. It is at once a very large and a very complicated subject, and it says much for the vitality and courage of the various Christian communities of Western Europe and America that they are becoming less and less afraid to tackle it. It is now sixteen years since we had a long and elaborate encyclical from the Roman Church on the condition of the working classes, in which many most admirable sentiments were propounded. Other churches had spoken before that period, but since the question became a living one to the most conservative communion in Christendom, it has grown in importance year by year, and is destined in the future to occupy an even more prominent place. An old conception of the Church which has not yet died out is that it has nothing to do with the affairs of this world; its one supreme mission is to prepare the earthly pilgrim for eternity. It was regarded as compromising to religion to mix it up with the secular interests of life: it should be kept within the individual conscience and the four walls of the church. As long as the conviction prevailed that the individual was absolutely independent of external circumstances—that he was supreme master of his own fate, that outward conditions had nothing to do with the essential shaping of his life—it was possible to make out a case for this conception of the proper function of the Church. But the atomistic scheme of things out of which these ideas arose has been superseded by the organic conception which looks upon man no longer as an isolated unit but as a vital member of a great inter-dependent whole. From this point of view a man's character is a product of social conditions as well as of his own will, and you cannot in the old phrase "prepare him for eternity" unless you consider his surroundings as well as himself.

Apart from these considerations, it must also be pointed out that the Christian Church in all ages of its history has considered itself as the bearer of a social mission. The New Testament contains abundant evidences of this, and many traces of it are to be found among the early Christian apologists, who are never tired of pointing out to the Roman Emperors that the Christians are men of good works. They succour the needy; they rescue the orphan from him who would do him violence; they do not turn away their countenance from the widow; they provide for the needs of the imprisoned and oppressed. Even if we admit that the statements made by post-apostolic writers are over-coloured, the fact remains that the work of social amelioration was looked upon as an essential part of the Christian ideal of life. This ideal the Church has always retained, and we find many traces of its existence in the darkest periods of ecclesiastical history. To minister not merely to the mental but also to the physical miseries of humanity has always been regarded by all classes of believers amid all their other differences as a supremely Christian duty. The social mission of the Church is therefore as old as Christianity itself.

What has happened in recent years is that the Church's conception of its social duty has taken a new and deeper import. It remains for us to consider what this deeper import is. The Church of to-day has at last opened its eyes to the fact that its task is only half fulfilled as long as it confines itself to the alleviation of actual misery and distress. It has been engaged in this beneficent work for the last eighteen centuries, but the woes of humanity are still a dark and intolerable blot on modern life. The greatest benefactor of the race is not the man who builds hospitals for the broken and the suffering, admirable as such work unquestionably is: it is the man who removes the conditions by which suffering is produced. The man who points out to us how diseases may be prevented is much greater than the man whose attention is confined to dealing with the diseases which exist. This is a lesson which the Church is at last becoming aware of and is slowly taking to heart. The Christian conscience is becoming alive to the truth that it must probe deeper into the causes of social misery if it would secure any satisfactory and permanent results. We shall never abolish drunkenness by confining ourselves to attempts to cure the individual drunkard; we must go deeper and remove the conditions which produce the habit of intemperance. We shall not cure crime by the charitable efforts of discharged prisoners' aid societies; we must first of all examine into the conditions which produce the criminal classes. We shall not uproot insanity by the most admirable treatment of the insane in magnificently appointed asylums. We must get at the causes of insanity by an inquiry into the individual and social conditions out of which mental instability takes its rise. We shall not diminish pauperism by relieving the beggar in the street or offering him the workhouse; we must ask ourselves what are the reasons which have led the man to be a beggar at all. Unemployment, sweating, excessive hours of labour, and a whole host of the industrial evils which arise out of our existing economic system can only be effectively dealt with when we have got at the bottom of the conditions which create them. To examine into the circumstances which are producing the crime, the drunkenness, the insanity, the pauperism, which deface our social life is the great task which a deeper knowledge of social conditions has now imposed upon the church. The older task of alleviating existing evils must not on this account be neglected or pursued with less eagerness than before. But a fresh estimate must be formed of its value; it must always be kept in mind that it is a palliative and not a cure.

Even when men are agreed upon causes, they are often at variance as to remedies. It is here that the church, if it is wise, must walk with wary feet. Remedies often involve the element of legislative action, and legislative action draws us into the vortex of party politics. In matters of social legislation cases sometimes arise in which the moral issues are so clearly defined that the Church is obliged to take a side. But where this does not arise it is wiser for a church not to commit itself to any hard and fast scheme of legislative change. It is well inside the functions of a church to point out our social diseases and the conditions from which they arise with all the fervour of the Christian pulpit. But the remedies to be applied to these evils must in the main be devised by practical statesmen whose business it is to work the legislative machine. The social task of the church is not to usurp the office of the politician but to educate the social conscience of the electorate. Its mission at the present moment is to deepen in the mind of the average man the sense of social responsibility. The appeal of the future must be made, not only to man as an individual, but to man as a member of the family, a citizen of the State, and internationally a citizen of the world. The social mission of the Church at bottom consists in developing the social conscience of the individual. This is a vast and fruitful field lying open to preachers of all denominations.

Life and Letters.

THE HOUSE OF SILENCE.

WITHIN the circle of the high grey wall is silence.

Under a square of sky cut by high grey buildings, nothing is seen of Nature but the prisoners themselves, the men who guard the prisoners, and a cat who eats the prison mice.

This House of perfect silence is in perfect order, as though God himself had been at work—no dirt, no hurry, no lingering, no laughter. It is all like a well-oiled engine that goes—it knows not why. And each human thing that moves within this circle goes, day after day, year after year—as he has been set to go. The sun rises and the sun goes down—so says tradition in the House of Silence.

In yellow clothing marked with arrows, the inhabitants are working. Each, when he came in here, was measured, weighed, and sounded; and, according to the entries made against his number, he received his silent task, and the proper quantity of food to keep his body able to fulfill it. He resumes this silent task each day, and if his work be sedentary, paces for an hour the speckless gravel yard, from a number painted on a wall to a number painted on a wall. Every morning, and on Sundays twice, he marches in silence to the chapel, and in the voice that he has nearly lost, praises the silent God of prisoners; this is his debauch of speech. Then, on his avid ears the words of the preacher fall; and motionless, row on row, he sits, in the sensual pleasure of this sound; and the words are void of sense, for the music of speech has drugged his hearing.

Before he was admitted to this House of Silence he had endured his six months' utter solitude, and now, in the small, white-washed space, with a black floor whence he has cleaned all dirt, he spends but fourteen hours out of the twenty-four alone, except on Sundays, when he spends twenty-one, because it is God's day. He spends them, walking up and down, muttering to himself, listening for sound, with his eyes on the little peephole in the door through which he can be seen but cannot see. Above his mug and plate of shining tin, his brush with stiff black bristles, and a piece of soap, a little pyramid of godly books is raised in perfect order; no sound, or scent, no living thing, no spider even, only his sense of humour comes between him and his God. But nothing whatever comes between him and his walking up and down, his listening for sound, his lying with his face pressed to the floor; till darkness falls, that he may stare at it, and beg for Sleep, the only friend of prisoners, to touch him with her wings. And so, from day to day, from week to week, and year to year, according to the number of the years set opposite the name that once was his.

The workshops of the House of Silence hear no sound but that of work; the men in yellow, with arrows marked upon them, are busy with a fearful zest. Their hands and feet and eyes move all the time; their lips are still. And on these lips, from mouth to mouth, is seen no smile—so perfect is the order.

And all their faces have one look, as though they said: We care for nothing—nothing; we hope for nothing—nothing; we work like this for fear of horror! Their quick dull stare fastens on him who comes to watch their silence; and all their eyes, curious, resentful, furtive, have in the depths of them the same defiant meaning, as though they saw in him the world out of which they have been thrown, the millions of the free, the millions not alone all day and every day, the millions who can talk. As though they saw Society, which bred them, nurtured them, and forced their steps to that exactly fitting point of physical or mental stress, out of which they found no way but the crime rewarded with these years of silence. As though they heard in the footsteps and the muttered questions of their casual visitor this whole pronouncement of man's justice:

"You were dangerous! Your souls, born undersized, were dwarfed by Life to the commission point of crime. For our protection, therefore, we have placed you under lock and key. There you shall work—seeing, hearing, feeling nothing, without responsibility, without initiative, bereft of human contact with your kind. We shall see that you are clean, and have enough to eat; we shall inspect and weigh your bodies, and clothe them with sufficient clothes by day and night; divine service you shall have; your work shall be apportioned to your strength. Corporal punishment we shall very seldom use. Lest you should give us trouble, and contaminate each other, you shall be silent, and, as far as possible, alone. You sinned against Society; your minds were bad; it were better if in our process you should lose those minds! For some reason which we cannot tell, you had but little social instinct at the start, that little social instinct soon decayed. Therefore, through bitter brooding and eternal silence, through horror of your lonely cells, and certainty that you are lost—no good, no mortal good to man or thing—you shall emerge cleansed of all social instinct. We are humane and scientific, we have outgrown the barbarous theories of old-fashioned law. We act for our protection and your good. We believe in reformation. We are not torturers. Through loneliness and silence we will destroy your minds, that we may form fresh minds within the bodies of which we take such care. In silence and in solitude is no real suffering—so we believe, for we ourselves have never passed one single silent day, one single day alone!"

This, by the expression of their eyes, is what the men in yellow seem to hear, and this, by the expression of their eyes, is what they seem to answer:

"Guv'nor! You tell me I did wrong to get in here, brought up like I was—born in the purple—Brick-street, 'Ammersmith. My father was never up against the police; epileptic fits it was that he went in for—I oughtn't to have had him for a father; I oughtn't to have had a mother that liked her drop o' trouble, leavin' me what you might call violent from a child. That's where the little difficulty was, you see. The bloke that came about my girl knows that, seein' he laid two years upon his back after I'd done with 'im. That set 'em on reformin' me. To do the business proper, Guv'nor, they give me six months solitary to start upon. All them six months I asks meself: 'If I were out again, an' he come hangin' round my girl—what would I do?' And I answers: 'Hit 'im like I done!' You tell me I oughtn't to bein' thinkin' that; Guv'nor, I 'adn't nothin' else to think upon. Only that, an' what was goin' on outside, with me there buried up alive. You tell me that ther' solitude ought to ha' done a lot for me, an' so it did. I 'aint never been the same man since. When I come out I made a big mistake to have that sentence up against me, in the earnin' of me livin' honest, like as though I'd never been in prison. I oughtn't to ha' been a carpenter I guess, or anythin' where people has to trust yer, not likin' them about their houses 'as has been in quod; I ought to ha' had a trade that didn't need no dealings with my fellow-creatures. You tell me what I wanted was to love me neighbour. Guv'nor, after I come out, I got regular wasted on that job. When you get wasted, Guv'nor, you take to drink, your stomach feels a funny shiverin'; what it wants is warmth, a bit of fire—so, when you gets a sixpence you lays it out in warmth. That's wrong, you say. But, lucky Guv'nor, drink puts heart into a man as has to get his livin' out of lovin' of his neighbour. . . . Soon after that I got another little lot, with six months solitude again, to put me straight. When you eat your heart for want o' somethin' else to do, when your mind rots for the need of ever such a little bit to chew on, when you feel all day and every day like a poor dumb varmint of a caged-up rat—like as not you hit a warder, Guv'nor. When you hit a warder, it's the cat. This time I ought to ha' come out p'raps a different man—an' so I did. I ought to ha' had a different mind, bein' chastened and taught the love o' God; but, seein', Guv'nor, that when I come to think it over, which was all day and every day, I couldn't really find out what I done which in my case any other man would ha' stopped short o' doin'—bein', not any other man, but me—I come out that time meanin' to go upon my own. And on my own I went, and ever since I've been—an out-an'-outer, as you can see with lookin' at me now. An' if you ask me what I think of all o' you outside, I can't reply, seein' I'm not allowed to speak. . . ."

This is the answer that they seem to make; their lips move, but no sound comes.

The warder watches those moving lips; his eyes, the eyes of a keeper of wild beasts, are saying: "Pass on, sir, please, and don't excite the convicts—you have seen all there is to see!"

And so the visitor goes out into the prison yard.

On to the old grey buildings, a new grey block is being built; it runs up high already towards the square of sky; and on the pale scaffolding are prisoners cementing-in the stones. A hundred feet up, they move with silent zest, helping to make the little white-washed spaces safe, to hold—themselves; helping to make thick the walls, that they may hear nothing, and their own moaning may be smothered; helping to join stone to stone, and fill the cracks between, that no creature, however small, may come to share their solitude; helping to make the window spaces high above their reach, that from them they shall look at—nothing; helping to hide themselves away out of the minds of all who have not sinned against man's justice; for, to forget them in their silence and their solitude is good for man, and to remember them, unpleasant. The sky is grey above them, they are grey against the sky; no sound comes down but the smothered tapping of their tools.

The visitor goes out towards the prison gate; and, meeting him, there come three convicts marching in. The tallest marches in the centre, an old man with active step, and grey bristles on his weather-darkened face. His eyes are fixed upon the visitor, a light darts into them; he bares his yellow teeth and smiles. His lips move, and out of them come words. So, when skies have been dark all day, the sun gleams through, to prove the beauty of the Earthly Scheme. These words—the precious evidence of purifying solitude, the only words that have been spoken in the House of Silence, come faintly on the prison air: "Ye ———!"

JOHN GALSWORTHY.

NATURE'S SACRAMENTS.

THE life of words is like in some ways to the life of men; the soul changes within them, though the form remains the same. Yet while language is still living, it may regain something of its old power beneath the poet's healing fingers, and now and again a master of words will recall to life for us some dying form of speech. Some writer of power is needed, surely, to win us back the older and wider use of the word sacrament, as a spiritual symbol, the revelation of the unseen through the visible, the unfolding of the unknown through the known. Far down into the Middle Ages men used the word in this wider sense, which had led the early Fathers to employ it as a rendering of the mysteries of pagan Greece. Doubtless, too, with this wider use went the more frequent thought of sacraments as widespread throughout life. To the mystics the whole earth abounded in spiritual teaching; nature was full of sacraments that brought a message of things unseen.

The story is told of the old Calabrian Abbot, Joachim da Fiore, that as he was saying vespers in some little church among the mountains, the glory of the setting sun caught his eye through the open door of the nave. Suddenly realising how much more beautiful was the great temple of the sunlit sky than the painted walls of his little building of stone, he led his congregation out into the open air, and with nature's ritual around them they went on praying, gazing upon the great picture of that evening landscape and the wonder of the sunset above. Though he was the adopted father of many admirable heretics, and for long a suspect himself, Blessed Joachim did not offend thus more than once, so far as we know, against the laws of ritual. But many another saint must have been tempted to do as he did. It is, indeed, easy for us to understand how in the old days every high place had its altar, and how again and again in later times solitude upon a mountain has seemed to give the most congenial atmosphere for prayer. Unconsciously, and quite apart from our beliefs, we instinctively turn in physical weariness, and often in other troubles, to the calm rest of nature. However much at times we may ponder her sterner side and search in vain to explain to ourselves the mysteries of death and pain with which she confronts us constantly, it is not these things of which she speaks to man, when he goes to her sad and weary, like a tired child to his nurse. A feeling of quietness, beneath which lies strength, the dim apprehension of law, inexplicable indeed, but majestic and even beautiful, and above all that indefinable sense of peace which comes to us sometimes when we are in the presence of that which is immeasurably greater than ourselves, all this does Nature bring to us when we go to her alone with our troubles. The old stoics must have sometimes felt this, though to the Roman mind at least wild nature did not usually possess the attractive power it has for us. One cannot but feel that when Marcus Aurelius cries to the Universe "that which is harmonious to thee, is to me too," he is conscious of something of this feeling, in which our petty cares and troubles sink into nothingness amid the waters of the great ocean of universal life; though he arrived at the sense of this rather by inward meditation than by the contemplation of Nature without him. And whatever the philosophers may have felt, one has no doubt of the poets. Propertius, alone in the Umbrian highlands by the sources of the Tiber, and Catullus, listening to the ripple of the waves of Garda, were able for a moment to rise above the pain and fire of passion into a calmer air; yet the Roman poets have no such sense of the overwhelming majesty and order of nature as came to the Hebrew Psalmists.

The Roman had still in dim recesses of his consciousness the feelings of an earlier age, for which every wild wood was peopled with mysterious powers; nature was full of unknown agencies whose workings man could but dimly perceive, and the ancient rites of his religion were the charms by which he held at bay the strange potencies of evil that surrounded him. The Hebrew poet looked on nature even in her sterner aspects with the eyes of faith; hailstorm and thunder, and the very sea his people thought of with such dread, brought revelations to him of the Divine power controlling all; and because of this sense of unity, the mystery and wonder of the starry sky seemed to his inward ear vocal with harmonies. In some ways there has come to us in the last two centuries fuller knowledge of that reign of law which formed a part of the religious consciousness of the poets of ancient Israel. Science speaks to us of the insignificance of man beside the illimitable greatness of the universe of which he is ever striving to gain some knowledge, and trains us to revere the majesty of laws which we can only imperfectly apprehend. Yet it is well known how sadly one great leader of modern science regretted that in his old age he was no longer able to know the feeling of the beauty and majesty of the Alpine landscape which had so often helped him in the past, because, as it seemed to him, the habit of scientific analysis had taken from him that simpler sense of the earlier years, the direct consciousness of a beauty he could not explain. So true it is that the child's eyes and the childlike spirit only find the entrance into the kingdom of Heaven, which is hid to the wise. One must not suppose, indeed, that the closing of this one door into the unseen means that others, too, are shut, or else the lot of the city-dweller would be even worse than it is. Dr. Johnson, kindest and best of townsmen, though he said that to see one green field was to see all green fields, was yet keenly sensitive to many of the lesser sacraments of man's social life; and those who read his prayers and meditations know that the invisible realities were to him no subject of intellectual belief, but the atmosphere of his inmost thought. Yet it is surely a thing to be regretted that the habit of scientific research and the ordinary course of town life do too often so mould our faculties as to impede that vision which the contemplation of Nature still brings to the simple heart. The student's loss has its compensations, and may even involve in it an element of the noblest sacrifice; but this cannot be said of the man whose whole life is wrapped up in the making of money and in the pleasures and concerns of conventional urban society. Such men are robbing not only themselves and their families of the things which make life worth living, but a far wider circle; for they are helping to keep in being a civilisation which deprives thousands of city children of ever knowing what the sacraments of nature mean. The majority of Londoners have never seen the sun rise, save over smoking chimneys; they have never been able to watch the full moon sailing across the clear blue of a cloudless night; never known a day filled with the joyous exhilaration of sunlight only dimmed by the mist of the vanishing dew. Still less do such town-dwellers understand of the lonely silence of the night in the open country, in which men may feel themselves back again amid the childhood of the race. True, the amber haze of day in London and the flicker of the gas lamps in the streets at night have a beauty of their own; but it is dearly bought if the price must be, at least for the greater part of our poorer men and women, and for almost all the children, so heavy a one as this. The civilisation which shuts out from its gaze the vision of the stars may well grow blind to greater mysteries; if men will not listen to the music of the spheres, how should they hear the angels' song?

WAYFARERS.

"It's fotty year, sin'; it wor a six-'oss farm, and ah mew twenty-three aäcres mysen." We stood on one of the finest of Yorkshire moors in this finest of all Septembers. Miles of purple heather rolled away to the north, whilst the golden grain gave way to russet bracken and dark pine as we turned to the sunset. The speaker was short and bent; he had been strong and lusty once, and his sturdy spirit contrasted with the weak limbs of to-day as the sickle of his prime must have contrasted with the rickety, out-of-place perambulator which he had wheeled on to the moor for a feeble load of bracken or heather.

The modern binder was not for him, nor the new-fangled motor for his loved moors. But his heart went out to us wayfarers, who had taken five hours over the last three miles by reason of the purple glories of the autumn; and were now awaiting the chance of a trace-horse to give our caravan a pull to the top of the bank, where we were to spend the night. We watched a cart come slowly up with its load, and our companion hailed the driver: "Hast tha gitten soommat wick i't cart?" "Noa, summat deead." And in a few minutes he unyoked and pulled us up the last lap.

There is no getting even with these dalesmen in respect of hospitality. Cautious and a little stand-offish they may be—but what matter, if the heart be right? Their kindness was unbounded. The first night we were out with the van, a dalesman let us pitch where we wanted, let the horse run in his field, and lent another to pull up a hill. What did we owe him? Nothing, but if we cared to give his son, who drove the trace-horse, a trifle, why, we might. An hour later, another trace-horse was necessary. The corpulent farmer mounted his pony, rode to the far fields for his horse and man, and headed the cavalcade until we reached the summit. What did we owe him? Nothing, but if we cared to give the deaf-and-dumb lad who drove the horse a trifle, why, we might. That night another farmer lent his field and stabled the horse. What did we owe him? We knew the answer before we put the question. The only variant was that the lad was a nephew staying in the house. Our friends (sic) say that this kindly hospitality has its parentage in fear of consequences if predatory gypsies are ill-treated; but this is no less a libel on gypsies than on the dalesmen of the North Riding.

The wayfarer, with his caravan, looks down upon the house-dweller who regards a holiday as a recreation: the wayfaring life is life itself. And many a bypath was trodden and many a hill difficulty climbed before the right caravan was reached. We talked of hiring, and we talked of buying: we went to neighbouring fairs and took the advice of the showmen. They knew of nothing to suit us, recognising that theirs were either too small or too heavy; one man assured us in the intervals of inviting an unwilling public to try three shies for a penny, that he had a pal with a cheap van for sale, but we should have to take the switchback with it. So we resolved to build. The Hausfrau found the builder, became herself the architect and clerk of works, and the mere man acquiesced in wise silence. In four short weeks the caravan was a reality, with its kitchen and cabin, corner-cupboard and wardrobe, stove and larder, tables and beds. The van was christened "The Rambler," in spite of Boswell's criticism of the name, which he maintains is certainly "not suited to a series of grave and moral discourses; which the Italians have literally, but ludicrously, translated by Il Vagabondo; and which has been lately assumed as the denomination of a vehicle of licentious tales."

The horse was "Doctor Johnson," and he looked the part as he entered the shafts. His intelligence was only equalled by his affection for a dish of tea, that "elegant and popular beverage."

So, for six weeks, the Hausfrau and her three belongings—husband and children—forsook the crowded life of the city for the true wayfaring life, where Nature provides an immortal garland to be run for. And the van bore us bravely over moor and dale, now through trackless heaths, now up and down impossible hills whose names mark our triumphs: Ramsdale Beck, Ruswarp Bank, Limber Hill, Hartoft End. We conquered them all in spite of the dismay caused by a small boy whom we consulted about the road ahead: "Yer've big banks to clim, bah goom?"

Leaving "Dr. Johnson" and the "Rambler" one day, a long tramp over the moor brought us to Lilla Howe. As we sat there speculating about Lilla and the cross on the cairn, the North Riding lay at our feet, full of memorials of the past. Everywhere are tumuli, remnants of paynim days. To the east stand the Abbey ruins, with memories of Abbess Hilda of Streaneshalch; and over there rises the Yorkshire Derwent to flow a few miles to Hackness, where Hilda had founded another monastery in the year of her death. Every schoolboy knows that it was Hilda who drove the snakes over the Whitby cliffs, snakes which he picks up to-day as ammonites: every schoolboy does not know that the legend still runs in the Riding that no snakes live in Hackness parish, so far and so long does Hilda's rule extend.

To Whitby Reinfrid had come with missionary zeal from far-away Evesham; and in Hackness Death had felled him.

Beyond that ridge to the south is Lastingham, calm and snug in its heather hollow, where Stephen, one of Reinfrid's co-workers, tried to revive the traditions that Cedd and Chad had founded. It is the place that Bede tells of, "among craggy and distant mountains, which looked more like lurking-places for robbers and retreats for wild beasts than habitations for men." Thither came Cedd to cleanse the place by prayer and fasting, and here the man of God fasted day after day till the evening, "and then took no other sustenance than a little bread, one hen's egg, and a little milk mixed with water."

But it is time to tramp back to the house of our habitation; and as the sun goes down we are sitting round the camp fire with the dark velvet moors behind and the land sloping away in front to a wooded wyke, dear to our Norse ancestors, a "bowery hollow crowned with summer sea."

We were often flattered by being taken for the Church Van, the Gospel Van, and the forerunner of entertainments for the fair. And once we knew the meaning of fame: three days after our arrival a police notice was posted, addressed "To Wayfarers," assuring us in legal phraseology that sleepers in carts or waggons would be summarily taken before the justices of the peace unless they could show some visible means of subsistence.

We halted for ten days near to the old red farm of two of Nature's gentlefolk. Tall and strong, with a stoop born of seventy years of labour, with handsome face and iron-grey hair, the dalesman worked his farm and wielded his flail. His comely wife, simple and unpretentious, kept away from the van for fear of intruding, and when at last she was persuaded to visit us, a plain Sunday gown showed how we were honoured.

A theological postman took a fancy to us when we pitched near his beat. He assumed our agreement with his orthodoxy in essentials and accidents, resenting the last "supply," who had spoken with disrespect of Habakkuk. He advised us to sing the doxology one fine morning, assuring us that it was bound to give us a leg-up some time. He had been a local preacher, and took occasion during the last sermon he was destined to preach, to talk straight to the people: "For ten minutes ah poot t'ring i' their noäses."

Alas that the wayfaring life is over, and that the noise of city strife dominates the present. But he was no philosopher who exalted the Present and put down the mighty Past and Future; for the Past is not beyond recall, and the Future is not out of our grasp. Memory commands the one, and Fancy gives the other—divine handmaidens these. In their companionship we link one Autumn to another Spring.

A. R.

AN ARTIST'S POLITICS.

THERE is a passage, half-humorous, half-melancholy, in Anatole France's "Sur la Pierre Blanche," which defines, from the standpoint of a Continental Socialist, the ultimate destiny of England amid the humane democracies of his dream. He foresees the federation of all the European peoples in a league of peace, with the triumph of Socialism, democratic, free-thinking, republican, as its economic and political basis; England alone stands aloof, still monarchical, still capitalistic, still religious, linked to the Continent not by any community of thought, but rather by some empirical system of compromises which enables her to reach, under her antique formulae, a practical régime of tolerance, peace and social justice. It is a remote and whimsical speculation, but it interprets, aptly enough, at once the foibles of our national character and the limitations of our actual politics. Burke, thundering against that un-English "Revolution Society," which declared that the right to "cashier our governors" was imbedded in the British Constitution, pointed out, once for all, the radical difference of spirit between French and English politics. When our forefathers did, under the sheer pressure of necessity, "cashier" James II., their main preoccupation seems to have been so to hedge and prescribe their achievement, that no general principle could be based upon it. In stating their reasons, they accumulated, with a wilful and conscious elaboration, every personal and temporal circumstance in their indictment, as though they intended thereby to challenge Time and the accidents of future turmoil to reproduce a situation exactly parallel to the precedent they were reluctantly creating. They shunned innovation; they abhorred universals, and Burke, in scolding the French for going back to the natural rights of man, and the first principles of society, implored them even to defy history, by inventing some antiquarian fiction of ancient popular rights and recent royal usurpations, upon which they might base a fabric of constitutional monarchy. That empirical temper has survived a century of reform; it still presides over the thinking of a democratic movement, which agrees, in all its immediate purposes and hopes, with the standpoint of a French Socialist or Radical.

* As if to help us to realise the contrast which he himself indicated, Anatole France has published a collection of his speeches (Vers les Temps Meilleurs. Paris: Edouard Pelletan.) In the spectacle of this fastidious artist in words, the critic whom one pictures in the pose of the familiar portrait—his hand resting on some exquisite statuette by Rodin, standing in a great library whose treasures he owes to a pen as popular as it is disciplined—coming out on to the hustling, moulding his sensitive style to a rousing platform polemic, lending grace to a mass meeting of international reds and Parisian working-men, or reviewing the politics of the day at a Socialist party congress—in this spectacle we have at once an evidence and an explanation of the intellectual position of French Socialism. Our own Labour Party could not have attracted a Walter Pater or a Matthew Arnold to its platforms; it is not, as Continental Socialism is, a doctrine, a theory of life and morals, a view of the universe, and, in some sense, a religion. There is in the attitude of the French intellectuals who have definitely associated themselves with Socialism no trace of condescension. They are not consciously bridging the gulf between the classes and the masses. They are not stretching out a helping hand from above to the aspiring members of a less fortunate class. They are simply taking their place as natural leaders in a movement of social transformation. They aim, not at the rescue of individuals, but at the triumph of the proletariat. Some of the most interesting of the addresses in this volume were delivered at the popular universities, staffed, in some instances, by some of the first scholars and scientists of France, which are springing up in all the greater towns and in every quarter of Paris. They are doing on a rather larger scale, what University Settlements are attempting to do among us. But their attitude and conception are quite different. One can conceive an English literary man encouraging the students of a Polytechnic, a Settlement, or a Mechanics' Institute to study science as a recreation, as a help to modern industry. He would not commend it, as Anatole France does, as the foundation of a democratic and humanitarian conception of the universe; still less would he sing pæans in the manner of Lucretius to science the liberator, who purges fear from the heavens and builds a barrier for civilisation against superstition. He might commend study and industry as the conditions of self-help, the path to what one of Gorky's heroes of the slums used to call "the clean life of a merchant." But he would not preach study as a preparation for revolution, or commend the reading of political economy as a weapon for mastering capitalism. The English intellectual who works among the proletariat is a missionary who is striving to diffuse among them the privileges, the pleasures, and the enlightenment of his own class; the French intellectual of the same generation is frankly an exile, a mutineer.

When one comes to ask what it is that has driven a sensitive, sceptical temperament like that of Anatole France—a temperament as remote from the poetic communism of a Morris as it is from the economics of the early Fabians—into this uncompromising adherence to Socialism, the answer is doubtless to be sought in a series of historic accidents. He is not a profound or original thinker; he is rather the exquisite voice which adorns and varies the themes of ruder singers. The purely economic aspect of Socialism does not interest him. His conversion dates, like that of M. de Pressensé, from the Dreyfus case. He has not convinced himself, as the Germans have, that the working-classes are, by the necessities of a purely economic evolution, the predestined vehicles of a fundamental change, in which their appetites and their class interests will act as motive forces. Rather he hails them in a quite uncritical and emotional spirit, as the class which, by some law of nature, has retained a natural aspiration for justice and for peace.

Historically, the justification for this attitude is to be found in the eloquent addresses in which he dwells on the Dreyfus affair—the starting-point of the great moral revival, half-humanitarian, half-puritanical, in modern French politics. Individual Radicals fought bravely; as a party, only the Socialists were staunch and unanimous from the first hour to the triumphant end. Behind this crisis lay, however, another fundamental fact in French politics, which differentiates them so absolutely from our own. The individualism of Cobden and Bright is founded on an intense respect for personal liberty, and an intense jealousy of the tyranny of the State. The active and potent individualism of France is the individualism of the Napoleonic code, which isolates the citizen and makes of him a helpless unit, only to exalt the power of a centralised State in alliance with a hierarchical Church. Against this tendency the Socialism which battles for the right of combination is essentially a Liberal force. It was not a mere accident which arrayed it against the middle classes; it is not a mere accident which causes it to fight, as Anatole France does so gallantly, for the right of the teachers in State schools to form trade unions. It is, too, the same dread of a centralised authority which makes it so resolutely anticlerical. The individualism which it combats is essentially repressive; the collectivism which it exalts is that of free co-operation for the defence of individual right.

But of all the historical accidents which have ranged such men as Anatole France and Francis de Pressensé in the Socialist camp, the most influential is, without doubt, the Franco-Russian Alliance, and the militarism which made it inevitable. For them, the revolution in Russia is not a remote and alien event. Tsarism is, for them, as Anatole France puts it, in one of five eloquent speeches, "an epidemic disease," and its financial relations with France make it possible to identify the cause of the despotism on the Neva with that of capitalism on the Seine. We in England sympathise with the Russian democrats much as we sympathise with the Gracchi. A French Socialist realises that they are allies in his own fight against the internal reaction. He rises easily to a generalisation worthy of the stoics—"il n'y a plus au monde de crimes étrangers." He flings his whole force into the cause now of the Macedonians, now of the Armenians, now of the Congolese. He has realised, as our working-classes cannot, that militarism is an international evil.

Music.

THE LEEDS MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

LIKE the other Festival Committees, that at Leeds this year has been very generous in the matter of new works. It must be counted unto it for righteousness, inasmuch as new works do not draw the Philistine musical public like the old ones, and the Philistines' money is necessary if these gigantic Festivals are to go on. Their days, perhaps, are already numbered. They are so costly to run that they cannot exist without the support of wealthy musical people, and the number of these does not grow in the same proportion as the expenses of the Festival. Larger orchestras and larger choruses are required each time; more rehearsals are needed in order to ensure a standard of performance that will satisfy expert ears; the fees of singers and players are always going up. For these reasons all concert-giving is becoming a much more expensive affair than it used to be. In the case of the Festivals the cost of bringing an orchestra of a hundred players from London, and paying it for eight performances and rehearsals, is enormous; yet no English town except Manchester and Liverpool can provide an orchestra of its own fit to do work of this exacting kind. The prices charged at Festivals are already excessive, and little or no expansion can be hoped for in this direction. Thus wedged between a practically stationary income and a steadily increasing expenditure, the lot of the Committees is not a happy one. It is true that at some places there is a surplus to be handed over to the charities, but that surplus is entirely dependent upon its charitable destination. At Birmingham, for example, it is the custom for wealthy men to give a donation of, say, fifty or a hundred pounds after each performance. There are not many who would give anything like this amount for music alone. And a great evil of the Festivals is that the prices of admission keep out large numbers of the most truly musical people. During the interval between two of the Festival performances at Leeds, the present writer went to the Colosseum in the same town to hear a recital by Paderewski. There was a crowded house, mostly of the popular kind, that showed both by its demeanour and its applause what intense pleasure it found in the music. One could not help feeling a pang of regret that these people, and those of the same social standing in other towns, should find the doors of the great Festivals banged in their faces. The only solution of the problem seems to be the establishment of a permanent local orchestra in each large town. If this were capable of giving performances of Festival standard, what is at present the greatest expense would be considerably cut down.

On the whole, the programmes and the performances at Leeds were very good. The Committee earned the heartfelt thanks of the weary critics by putting both "The Messiah" and "Elijah" on one side, though it marred this act of grace by including Parry's "The Love That Casteth Out Fear," and an extremely inadequate setting by Dr. Arthur Somervell of Wordsworth's great "Ode on the Intimations of Immortality." The other novelties, with the exception of Dr. Brewer's four "Pastorals" for tenor solo, were highly interesting. Dr. Brewer persists, much to his own disadvantage, in pursuing that vein of affected Arcadianism of which he gave us some thin samples in the three Pastorals produced at Hereford a year or so ago. Any modern musician of the slightest fancy could turn out these artificial "Fa-la-la" confections by the gross. Much the best of the new Pastorals was the setting of Milton's "Song on May Morning," where the sincerity of the poem made for more sincerity in the music.

Sir Charles Stanford's "Stabat Mater," if not a work of the first order throughout, has some first-rate things in it. It begins well and ends well, the orchestral prelude and the choral finale both having a note of first-hand sincerity that is mostly lacking in the middle portion, where one is often conscious of no more than a clever musician trafficking in the current musical formulæ of grief. The clashing seconds at the words "Pertransivit gladius," for example, leave us quite cold, because the effect is merely a calculated musical one, without any pressure of real feeling behind it. The orchestral prelude is a very able piece of writing—a delineation of the grief of the sorrowing mother that in its modernity of idiom and wealth of colouring almost suggests the symphonic poem. Had the composer kept the whole work on this plane, it would have been exceptionally good.

Mr. Vaughan Williams's setting of Walt Whitman's "Toward the Unknown Region" is just a little Brahmsian in feeling and just a little chilly in manner here and there, but is, on the whole, a sincerely felt and well-expressed work, the slow building up of the big choral climax being remarkably fine. Mr. Rutland Boughton broke fresh ground in his delightful variations upon two old folk-songs, for unaccompanied chorus. It was a happy idea to take these fine old tunes and intensify them by turning upon them some of the resources of modern musical art—heightening and deepening their humour and their pathos, and at the same time pleasing the purely musical ear by putting them through all kinds of cunning transformations. In less sympathetic or less expert hands this kind of thing might easily become tiresome; but Mr. Boughton has both the imaginative quickwittedness and the good musicianship that it requires.

Mr. Granville Bantock's choral and orchestral work, "Sea-Wanderers," struck the most modern note in the whole Festival. It is in his usual style—an orchestral score pulsating with life, and a choral texture of such novelty that it is no wonder the Leeds singers could make little of it. The performance of the work brought home afresh to one how backward are the ordinary English notions of choral singing. Here is a score that aims at reproducing the mystery, the sadness and the vastness of the sea. It should be sung only by a small chorus, and one skilled in all the most delicate nuances of choral expression. But the Leeds Festival Committee had engaged a great chorus of over three hundred splendid voices, and, of course, it had to take a part in everything; if composers will persist in painting in greys and violets instead of flaming crimsons they must take the consequences of their folly. So Mr. Bantock's work was sung in crimson—superb singing of its kind, but quite the wrong kind. When will the Festival Committees learn that the full strength of the chorus should no more be used on every occasion than the full strength of the orchestra?

Poetry.

IN THE COOL OF THE EVENING.

I.

IN the cool of the evening, when the low sweet whispers waken,
When the labourers turn them homeward, and the weary have their will,
When the censers of the roses o'er the forest-aisles are shaken,
Is it but the wind that cometh o'er the far green hill?

II.

For they say 'tis but the sunset winds that wander through the heather,
Rustle all the meadow-grass and bend the dewy fern;
They say 'tis but the winds that bow the reeds in prayer together,
And fill the shaken pools with fire along the shadowy burn.

III.

In the beauty of the twilight, in the Garden that He loveth,
They have veiled His lovely vesture with the darkness of a name!
Thro' His Garden, thro' His Garden it is but the wind that moveth,
No more; but O, the miracle, the miracle is the same!

IV.

In the cool of the evening, when the sky is an old story
Slowly dying, but remembered, ay, and loved with passion still,
Hush! . . . the fringes of His garment, in the fading golden glory,
Softly rustling as He cometh o'er the far green hill.

ALFRED NOYES.

Open Questions.

IS SOCIALISM PLUNDER?

To most well-to-do persons Socialism means spoliation; under democracy the many "have-nots" will seek to confiscate the property of the few "haves" by means of discriminative legislation and taxation. This abuse of power seems to them a natural and inevitable fruit of the demand for expensive social reforms to be carried out by the State. The Old-Age Pensions proposal appears to give substance to their fears. The working classes, upon whom the tax-collector makes no direct call, naturally look upon the State as a fairy godmother. "It is the business of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to find the money" is for them a sufficient discussion of finance. They know that they will not pay and that others will. Such is the growl of the "Daily Telegraph" and the Duke of Bedford. To raise the public income required for Old-Age Pensions and other "social" reforms by taxes imposed upon the property and incomes of the well-to-do appears to the latter at once unjust and economically dangerous.

It is an unfair distribution of burdens, and an injurious disturbance of industrial incentives. These are the two chief heads of the indictment. A third is sometimes added, namely, that such confiscation, reducing the expenditure of the well-to-do, diminishes the employment of labour, so reacting detrimentally upon the workers in whose interest this policy is devised. But since there is no prima facie reason for supposing that money expended, either well or ill, by the State, employs less labour than when expended by private persons, we may ignore this contention as obviously invalid, confining our attention to the two graver charges.

Does the canon of taxation according to "ability to bear," or "equality of sacrifice," forbid the raising of the "social progress" fund from the well-to-do, exempting the poorer classes from all contribution? Any just consideration of the income and mode of living among the manual labouring classes will show that they possess no real ability to bear a tax, in the sense of possessing a margin of income over what is necessary to maintain themselves in industrial efficiency. But if they have no such margin, then any tax exacted from them must either be shifted on to their employers or the consumer by a rise of wages (in which case, cadit quaestio, for they do not bear the tax), or else it must be attended by an impaired productivity of labour, and prove, ipso facto, an injurious tax. There is no reason to suppose that the portion of the people living upon incomes below the line of income-tax has any true "ability" to bear a tax. The suggestion that it is a good thing, all the same, to call upon them to pay taxes, which they think they pay, though in the long run they do not, in order to evoke a sense of political responsibility, is a doctrine as foolish economically as it is morally corrupt. If they do bear the tax it is bad for them and for the industrial efficiency of the nation that they do so; if they do not, it is wasteful to cause a needless shifting of the tax and to create a misconception as to incidence.

If a public fund for social progress is required, it is both just and expedient that it should be raised entirely from the relatively well-to-do. But can these bear it, or will their industrial efficiency be impaired as well? Lord Balfour of Burleigh, for instance, seems to think it will. "The essential condition for the progress of a community is that the incentive to efficiency on the part of its individuals shall be of the strongest possible kind. This required incentive can only be supplied by a strict application of the principle that the earnings of each individual shall be securely preserved to him. The development of our system of justice has been governed by this principle, and its chief aim has been to prevent individuals from plundering one another, and to maintain intact for each whatever he has earned. But it is forgotten that the evil to the community is as great whether the plunderer be merely an individual member of society or society itself." Though Lord Balfour evidently overstrains his argument in the last sentence, appearing to deny that ultimate right of "eminent domain" essential to the existence of every State, he touches here the quick of the matter at issue. "If anyone is allowed to take my earnings, whether another person or the State, I will not take the trouble to earn them. Unless my income is secured to me intact I will not produce the goods or services for which that income is paid me." When it is thus set out, the true limits of the taxing power of the State and the meaning of "ability to bear" become evident. So far as an income is really "earned," in the sense of evoking a personal effort or sacrifice with a value socially equivalent, it cannot fairly or advantageously be made a subject of taxation. At any rate, there must always be a real danger in encroaching on an income which is the product of voluntary, fruitful effort on the part of its recipient. As in the case of the wage-earner, so in that of the professional or employing classes, such encroachments will either be resisted by a shifting of the tax, or may discourage the output of personal energy and ability.

It is quite evident that the issue hinges upon the meaning of the term "earned," and upon the quantity of income which at any given time remains uncovered by this term. Is there a fund or flow of income which represents no equivalent of personal effort on the part of its owner, and which, therefore, if taken, disturbs no incentive to industry? Lord Balfour, I believe, in common with most thoughtful politicians, admits that the rising rents of city land contains such a fund of "unearned" income. Land reformers forcibly contend that this can be so taxed as not merely to disturb no useful economic incentive but to liberate certain incentives to the socially serviceable use of land which are at present inoperative. Of economic rent it is admitted that it is unearned—or, more correctly, that it represents the earnings of society, the product of the union of social work and social wants expressing themselves in enhanced values given to soil and surface. This forms an income of society which belongs to society because it has earned it, but which, in the ordinary distribution of wealth, passes into the hands of individuals and so requires to be reclaimed by process of taxation. The really important matter to determine is how far these same conditions are applicable to other sorts of incomes which come to individuals. Do these contain "unearned" elements of income similar to rent, created not by individual effort but by public activity, elements which also can be taken by taxation without the disturbance of any incentive to industrial efficiency? Modern scientific economics, analysing the various business structures and the processes of buying and selling in which the units of income emerge, discovers that the so-called monopoly or restriction of land from which rent is derived does not stand alone; that many groups of business or professional men are so advantageously situated, so protected from free, full, constant competition, by legal privilege, combination, social status, education, or other special conditions, as to be able to exact rates of profit, interest, salary, or other payments, far larger than would, and do in other circumstances, suffice to evoke the application of their capital, skill, industry, and enterprise. The truth of this general statement every informed person can test for himself in such departments of industry as are known to him. It is not too much to say that upon its validity and general acceptance the entire finance of the social reform policy depends.

If it be true that the "Socialism" to which the Liberal Party is committed in its constructive measures of social reform implies the confiscation of the just earnings of the rich, the property which, by their individual energy, thrift, and foresight, they have brought into economical existence, even the language of the Duke of Rutland may not be too strong for the condemnation of such a policy. But, if, on the other hand, there exists to-day a large and growing income due not to individual action but to social and economic conditions, which is required for purposes of profitable public expenditure, and which can be taken without impairing any sort of productive individual effort, the taking and the spending of this income surely form the true object of public finance, and upon the amount of such income as can be safely taken the pace of social reform must largely depend.

Social reformers insist that such an income does exist. The State they regard as the trustee of this fund, drawing by taxation the income derived from the productive forces of society which everywhere support and commingle with individual productive energy. Society simply demands its proper share of the common wealth, its earnings. This conception of society as a maker of wealth, earning its own income by its efforts and requiring its expenditure for the support and enrichment of its life, is no doubt a novel one to those unaccustomed to regard a society as a real unity or anything beyond an aggregate of individual units. But the question is not whether the conception is novel but whether it is true and socially serviceable as an instrument of policy.

Translated into the vulgar tongue of to-day, this "Socialism" means, "It is our money we want." Social reformers, though feeling their way towards such a doctrine of public finance, have not yet clearly thought it out. Land reformers have confined too narrowly the conception of "unearned increment"; Socialists and Labour men have looked too exclusively at the so-styled "surplus-value" arising from the power of employers to beat down the price of labour. A broader and more multiform conception of "surplus-value" or "unearned" income must be reached if the finance of social reform is to stand upon a solid foundation. We must be sure that there exists this large fund of social income due to social, as distinct from individual, work and wants, and needed for social uses in the same way that individuals require for individual uses the income which represents their personal effort and productivity.

The acceptance of this doctrine, the existence of this social fund, are necessary to meet the charge of confiscation which will be urged with increasing insistence against the finance that is essential to the democratic policy of social reform.

J.A.H.

Letters to the Editor.

A REMARKABLE LITTLE BOOK.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—If "Harmsworth's History of the World" is anything like the "Little Book about a Great Book" sent forth from Carmelite Street to herald it, the History will be a startling production. The little book gives some samples of what will be found in the great history. Amongst them we find statements about events that never happened. Here are some of these remarkable events:—

"We see an Emperor of France dragged to the block while appealing to his people."—(p. 10.)

It will be news to most people that any such tragedy ever happened. Can it be that the office boy at Carmelite Street has discovered that poor Louis XVI. was an Emperor? There is a reference to Marie Antoinette in the same paragraph, so perhaps this is the key to the mystery.

The "little book" is decidedly novel in its references to recent French history. Here is another incident that is new to me:

"We see the Empress of France fleeing from an angry mob outside Versailles."—(p. 18.)

When did this happen? The only Empress that fled from a mob was the Empress Eugénie. But most people, even Dr. Evans, who helped her to get away, have until now believed that the incident happened in Paris at the Tuilleries.

The portrait of the great Napoleon appears on the wrapper. The brief sketch of his career is a bit mixed, and is open to some correction.

"We see him a private soldier in a revolution which destroyed a million lives."—(p. 8.)

Hitherto all biographers of Napoleon have told us that he was a commissioned officer, long before the Revolution began.

"We hear the tread of his horse at the head of a million men."

When and where was he ever at the head of a million men? His biggest army, that of the Russian campaign of 1812, was not even half-a-million strong. Otto Berndt, the great military statistician, makes it 442,000 men (Zahl im Kriege, p. 29). He is described (after Waterloo) as "riding into Paris with the news of his defeat." He arrived less picturesquely, sleeping in a travelling carriage.

Of Gambetta we are told that:

"He had proclaimed the Republic on the evening of Sedan."—(p. 22.)

The "evening of Sedan" was Thursday, September 1st, 1870. The Republic was proclaimed about mid-day on Sunday, September 4th.

By the way, at p. 14, we hear of Napoleon III. surrendering at Sedan with "86,000 men." If the compilers of the History will turn to the careful statistics in the "Kriegsgeschichtliche Einzelschriften," published by the German General Staff, and of later date than the Staff History, they will find that, including wounded men, the number of French prisoners was 82,000.

What is one to make of a mix-up of dates such as occurs in the following paragraph?—

"We see the opening scene of the great Civil War, when Lincoln sat with his Cabinet for the last time. 'I have had a dream, gentlemen,' said the President, 'and I have dreamed the same thing three times. I am on a great, broad, rolling river; and I am in a boat . . . and I drift . . . and I drift . . . But this is not business. Let us get to business, gentlemen.' And we see Lincoln pass out of his Cabinet to the bourne that is beyond all wars."—(p. 10.)

The paragraph is headed, "President Lincoln's Last Dream." If Lincoln held his last Cabinet at the opening of the Civil War, he must have governed without a Cabinet from 1861 to 1865. If he had his last dream at the opening of the Civil War, he must have enjoyed dreamless sleep for four years. Of course, the story belongs to the close of the war, and is a wonderful sample of editing as done at Carmelite Street.

Here is another precious bit:

"In the depths of Africa a white man is saying to the natives about him: 'Build me a hut to die in. I am very cold; put more grass over the hut'; and in the morning the news comes to the world that, alone in a hut, with no human being beside him, David Livingstone died."—(p. 20.)

Livingstone was found dead in his hut at Ilala on May 1st, 1873. For many a long week after the news did not "come to the world." A moment's clear thought must have shown the writer of the passage that it was impossible for news to travel fast from the swampy shores of Lake Bangweolo to the outer world in 1873.

On the same page we have proof that if the new History is to give us startling facts as to events that never happened ("Stirring events that would have been true if they could," as the song puts it), it will also hash up again for popular consumption some exploded fictions of old-fashioned writers. This is suggested by the following passage:

"We see Charles V. setting aside the Imperial purple to end his days rehearsing his funeral in a convent."—(p. 20.)

If the History had been produced sixty years ago, this might have passed muster. Robertson's "Charles V." was then still an authority, and the story was accepted that Charles assisted as a mourner at a requiem and funeral service for himself at San Yuste. But any serious historian dealing with the time ought to know that half a century ago Mignet's researches at Simancas exploded the legend, and proved, moreover, that, in his retirement, the Emperor, instead of busying himself with such farcical performances as mock funerals, was engaged in serious correspondence on affairs of State. Mignet's book, "Charles Quint, son Abdication, son Séjour et sa Mort au Monastère de Yuste," was published as long ago as 1854. The historian of Carmelite Street does not seem to have heard of it yet.

The last paragraph in this puff-preliminary of the History is a puzzle. "But for Lord Kelvin," it says, "you would perhaps not be alive to-day; it is certain that but for Lord Kelvin thousands of people would not be alive to-day." Now, Lord Kelvin, before he took to his life-work as an electrician and physicist, is said to have qualified as a doctor, but never practised. The world does not owe him any great medical discovery. If Lord Lister had been thus spoken of, one could understand it; or, if the writer had noted that but for Lord Kelvin the "Daily Mail" might not have such a good and cheap service of cablegrams.—Yours, &c.,

HISTORICUS.

IS IT PLAGIARISM?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The following are extracts from "Colonel Enderby's Wife," by Lucas Malet, published a few years ago, and from "Captain Desmond, V.C.," published this year.

"Colonel Enderby's Wife," Book 5, Chapter III. :—

"The measure of a man's true worth is not to be found in the sudden conception of an heroic idea, but in the carrying out of that idea consistently, faithfully, through slowly accumulating days and months, even perchance years, when the glory has faded from the undertaking, when the freshness and the bloom have departed, and when the quick inspiration of an illuminated moment has passed into the silent continuous habit of a life."

"Captain Desmond, V.C., Chapter XIV. :—

"The true measure of a man's worth is not to be found in a heroic impulse or a fine idea, but in the steadfast working out of either through accumulating weeks and months—when the glow has faded from the heights, when the inspiration of an illumined moment has passed into the unrecognised chivalry of daily life."

The reader must draw his own conclusion.—Yours, &c.,

"PUZZLED."

Whitehaven, October 8th, 1907.

"INSURANCE v. TRIAL BY JURY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Both Mr. Montagu Ryland and "Verb. Sap." write in your last issue under some misapprehension, and probably upon information obtained second hand. Mr. Ryland overlooks the fact that all additions to the cost of carrying on the business of fire insurance must ultimately come out of the pockets of the insuring public. Insurance offices, although pursuing a beneficent calling, are not philanthropists, and must be expected to reserve a sufficient margin of profit to enable them, in these days of severe and unscrupulous competition, to pay their shareholders a reasonable return for the security they afford. I, of course, have no mission to speak on behalf of the insurance offices, but I am inclined to believe that if it were compulsory upon the public to submit their grievances of this sort to the Commercial Court, the fire offices might be induced to waive their "condition precedent in favour of arbitration," assuming that the public would acquiesce in this more expensive and elaborate way of settling a dispute. Mr. Ryland is wrong in stating that an arbitrator's hearing is necessarily private. The interested public can attend, although the proceedings are not of sufficient general interest to get into public print. The same reason would apply to proceedings in the Commercial Court, for I doubt whether THE NATION, or any other enterprising journal, would allow its columns to be used for matter so essentially complicated and dull. I can also assure Mr. Ryland that the number of arbitrations in which offices are engaged is really a negligible quantity in comparison with the thousands of claims amicably settled in the year. "Absence of reported litigation," as he puts it, is as scarce as actual litigation. It is a fact, for which

I am prepared to vouch, that claimants themselves, when it comes to the point, distinctly prefer a hearing by arbitration, as they, like the insurance offices, "do not hanker after a gratuitous advertisement in the Law Courts," exposing their methods of business and trade profits. Arbitration is a bogey which persons have raised who have some axe to grind, and which is adroitly up their sleeve, and I fear Mr. Ryland is too unsuspecting to detect it.

These remarks cover some of the ground taken up by "Verb. Sap.," who affirms, with some audacity, that the hardship of arbitration "is the great increase of cost," and he adds, "the Arbitrator is not infrequently a barrister of some eminence, and has to be handsomely paid for his services, whereas the Judge of the High Court is paid by the community at large." Surely, these comments answer themselves, and I think even Mr. Ryland will see that the truism employed in my article, and to which he takes exception, was not altogether unnecessary. "Verb. Sap." is of opinion that the Arbitration Act came upon the Statute Book to delay the ordinary course of legal procedure, and to make arbitrators "busy men" with a handsome remuneration. I am leaving alone the last paragraph of his letter, which is clearly an advertisement.—Yours, &c.,

THE WRITER OF THE ARTICLE.

"SOCIALISM IN LIBERALISM."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I beg leave to make the following comments on your article concerning the relation of Socialism to Liberalism :

1. In one of its aspects, Socialism is a movement for eliminating from our social system the risk of destitution by establishing universal State-guaranteed security against this risk; in other words, by turning the State into a mutual insurance society against destitution. In this respect, Socialism is an anti-destitution movement analogous to the anti-slavery movement. This is not the whole of Socialism, the programme of which includes also the elimination of the private capitalist with his appropriation of "surplus-value" for private use. There are even Socialists who are anti-capitalists without being anti-destitutionists, who propose to eliminate the private appropriation of "surplus-value" without eliminating the risk of destitution. However, to the great majority of its adherents and sympathisers, Socialism means, above all, anti-destitutionism, while anti-capitalism is but the method of eliminating the risk of destitution.

2. The Liberal Party is sure to break up if it ever adopts the anti-capitalistic part of the Socialist programme. Nay, this is true even for the Labour Party, at least just now. The case is different with anti-destitutionism, which is quite separable from anti-capitalism. The Liberal Party is definitely committed to anti-destitutionism. The right to publicly provided employment, if taken together with the right to universal old age pensions, amounts to the complete elimination of the risk of destitution, to the establishment of universal security against destitution. The Labour Party will press forward this programme next session. The Government is committed to one of these anti-destitution measures, the old age pensions, and is bound to deal with the problem of unemployment. Liberalism may, therefore, adopt the anti-destitutionist programme without great strain on its adherents. This will force the Conservatives to declare themselves openly as defenders of destitutionism, the now-prevalent principle of public policy. We shall then have a clear vital issue between Progressives of all kinds and Conservatives of all kinds.

3. The adoption of anti-destitutionism is indeed the last chance of British Liberalism, which will otherwise suffer the fate of Continental Liberalism. In presence of such an issue as that between destitutionism and anti-destitutionism, the real issue which now divides men, there is no room for a great party which claims to be progressive without definitely taking the progressive side on the issue which must override all other issues until it has been definitely settled in the progressive sense.—Yours, &c.,

E. O. POST.

38, Holywell Street, Oxford.
October 15th, 1907.

"THE CANT OF MILITARISM."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue of the 5th inst. you published a virulent attack on the National Service League, which I propose to answer, as you have ventured therein to impute to Lord Roberts and the National Service League a want of honesty in their purpose and proceedings. Incidentally you have shown such ignorance of the principles of the League, and have so perversely misrepresented them for your readers, that it is encumbent upon you in common fairness to publish this reply.

Lord Roberts and the National Service League have not abandoned the word "conscription" because it is unpopular, or because it implies compulsion, or because they propose the adoption of "a national force to be in appearance voluntary, but in reality compulsory," but because it does not correctly describe the universal, and therefore compulsory, military training for home defence which they advocate. Conscription which, with true historical sense, is rightly hated by the people, is the system invented by Frederick the Great, and perfected by Napoleon, under which the men needed for the defence of the country were obtained by casting lots among all males between certain ages. When the lot fell upon the rich they were allowed to purchase substitutes, and thus throw the whole burden of service on the poor. Nor did tyranny and injustice end here, for Napoleon used the men thus obtained for wars of aggression, and kept them for indefinite periods in the ranks. To suggest that the compulsory military training proposed by the National Service League is the same as this essentially vicious and undemocratic system is merely an attempt to create prejudice and confuse issues, and seems scarcely in place in an article directed against what you style "The Cant of Militarism."

The objects of the National Service League, as described in its official programme, are generally:—

1. To ensure peace and security for the British Empire by organising our Land Forces in such a manner that we may not only be able to defend successfully any portion of the Empire against attack, but also that the strength of our defensive arrangements may render any attack improbable.
2. To improve the moral and physical condition of the nation and thereby to increase its industrial efficiency.

With a view to attaining these two objects, the League advocates that, subject to certain exemptions to be defined by law, including those necessary to provide for the requirements of the Navy and the Mercantile Marine:—

Every man of sound physique, without distinction of class, shall be legally liable during certain years of his life to be called upon for service in the United Kingdom in case of emergency;

In order to fit him for this duty he shall be legally obliged to undergo three or four months' military training when he arrives at the military age.

The distinction between conscription and universal compulsory military training is no arbitrary ruling of the National Service League, as you would have your readers believe. It has been emphasised by accurate and fair-minded thinkers of such different character as Professor Seeley, Herr Bebel, the German Socialist leader, the writers of the Army Book of the British Empire, the Bishop of North Queensland, Baron Von der Goltz, and a score of others. The distinction between compulsory service and compulsory training is equally just, for, as Mr. Ellis Barker remarked in his able lecture on "National and Non-national Armies," "In the Continental barracks an incredible amount of time is wasted on traditional trivialities and housemaid's work, whilst war-training is neglected and the soldier is kept for two or three years with the colours." The National Service League proposes only a few months' thorough training between the ages of 18 and 21, devoted entirely to rendering the men fit for the duty of defending their country, a duty never denied by honest men, but shuffled off on the shoulders of the proletariats by those who, like THE NATION, proclaim the fine superiority of the "voluntary" system, which enables them to be defended by the soldier and the sailor whom they are only too ready to abuse in time of peace,

The instances which Mr. Farrer gives of "the successful inroads of this new moral gospel (of universal training) in the Church, the Bar, and the medical profession" are not in the least amazing. On the contrary, proposals so sane, just, moderate, and democratic as those of the League are almost invariably accepted wherever they are explained and understood, and nowhere do they receive stronger support than among those who have undertaken the responsibility of educating the young, for they recognise at once the improvements effected by military training, morally, physically, and mentally on those who are entrusted to their care.

As to your remarks on the "life of fatuous frivolity and vice led openly by most officers," the accusation is so unworthy that it is difficult to deal with it with patience. The class whom you, Sir, hold up to opprobrium and contempt are, as a whole, a cleanly living, manly, straightforward, honourable, and courageous set of men, devoted to their profession, and ready at any moment to lay down their lives to defend their country and those who throw mud at them. It is they who, by their courage and devotion, have largely made the British Empire what it is, and who keep the peace throughout its wide dominions in spite of the efforts of those of their fellow-countrymen who are ready to sow dissension and sedition wherever the ground seems favourable. To borrow your own sentence, "It is difficult to describe the modes by which this conspiracy against the peace and progress of our country is advanced, without seeming to impute a too conscious cunning to machinations which are largely instinctive." Hence you, Sir, may raise the cry of cant in connection with the moral value of military discipline and training, a cry so suitable to a paper which regrets that we are not yet prepared to relinquish India, though it is held "by bonds of force and not of love," but the history of all ages, and the instinctive wisdom of modern democracy have ever recognised, in the training which teaches a man to give up something of comfort and convenience, and, if necessary, life itself, in defence of great causes, that universal military training constitutes "at once a basis of democracy, a school of manliness, a school of civic virtue, of self-sacrifice, and of faithfulness to duty," to quote the words of the President of the Swiss Confederacy, addressed to the British Committee of Enquiry organised by the National Service League.—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE F. SHEE,
Secretary,

The National Service League
(With which is incorporated the Lads' Drill Association),

72, Victoria Street, S.W.
October 17th, 1907.

[Mr. Shee's inflamed rhetoric does not illuminate the issue but obscures it. If "conscription," as he admits, "is rightly hated by the people," why did Lord Roberts use this term in the opening phases of his campaign of popular education, and why does he now write "it is not conscription that the League advocates but national service"? Mr. Shee chooses to give a particular signification to the term with a spurious historic origin. The undemocratic character of certain forms of conscription does not, however, belong to the essence of the evil thing. Compulsory training, entailing compulsory service, as the official programme of his League makes clear it does entail, is in effect conscription, and will be understood as such wherever the full obligations it implies are stated. Mr. Shee is playing with words, and the excellent reasons for his doing so we unfolded in our article. The main object of that article was to indicate the fact that, having failed to win popular acceptance of the proposal to make soldiers of all our adult male population by scares of invasion, the conscriptionists were endeavouring to sap the moral and intellectual integrity of the nation by hawking their discredited wares as a moral and hygienic panacea, "a moral factor of untold value in the life of the people." The other point raised by Mr. Shee we have already dealt with. We may add that the extremely discourteous tone of the covering letter which accompanied this criticism was such as would certainly have justified us in ignoring the latter,—
EDITOR, THE NATION.]

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

THE first number of "The New Quarterly," a review of science and literature, is to appear at the end of the month. The greater part of each number will be concerned with literary subjects—special attention being given to French literature—but there are also to be scientific articles written by specialists but appealing to the general reader. Current English politics will be excluded, though general economic and political principles will be occasionally discussed. Another feature is to be the appearance of articles upon controversial topics by different writers in the same number. The editor is Mr. Desmond MacCarthy, and among the contents of the first number are "How do we perceive the direction of sound?" by Lord Rayleigh; "On the Art of Caricature," by Mr. Max Beerbohm; "A Tryptych of Poets," by Mr. Arthur Symons; "The Study of Mathematics," by Mr. Bertrand Russell; "Baudelaire," by Mr. Sturge Moore; "Biology and Politics," by Mr. G. A. Paley; and the first of a series of unpublished extracts from the note-books of Samuel Butler. We wish every success to the new venture.

* * *

A NEW biography of the famous Quaker, William Penn, has been written by one of his direct descendants, Mrs. Colquhoun Grant. Mrs. Grant's book has had a large number of predecessors, one of the best of them being Hepworth Dixon's reply to Macaulay's onslaught in the "History." Her work, which is to be published by Mr. Murray, has, however, the advantage of containing some hitherto unpublished letters. Penn's best book, "Some Fruits of Solitude," although reprinted some years ago by Mr. Gosse, is not as well known as it deserves. In sending it to a friend, Stevenson wrote: "If ever in all my human conduct I have done a better thing than handing on to you this sweet and wholesome work, I know I shall hear of it on the last day."

* * *

THE unpublished letters of David Garrick, which Messrs. Constable are to issue in a few weeks, though only about forty in number, possess considerable interest. Anything is welcome which makes us better acquainted with the personality of the wonderful actor whom Goldsmith described as "an abridgment of all that was pleasant in man," of whom Dr. Burney said that the very skirts of his coat seemed animated, and of whom Mrs. Clive said, with an eighteenth-century oath, that "he could act a gridiron." Professor G. P. Baker, who edits the volume, observes in his preface that it is remarkable that so small a collection of letters "should rectify certain impressions about Garrick's relations with Lady Burlington; throw light on the earlier part of his friendship with John Hoadley; reveal a friendship of his last days the closeness of which has hitherto been unsuspected—that with Miss Cadogan; go far to justify his treatment of Home's 'Douglas'; prove that he was really thinking seriously in 1765 of withdrawing from the stage; and in more than one instance so fill gaps in the 'Private Correspondence' as to make letters printed therein much clearer and more significant."

* * *

To sociologists by far the most interesting announcement of the autumn is that of the second volume of Professor Westernmarck's "Origin and Development of the Moral Ideas" (Macmillan). The first volume, which appeared in the beginning of 1906, contained the author's general theory of the nature and basis of moral judgments, the setting forth of which occupied about half the volume. The remaining half was an exposition of the actual morality of mankind, as exhibited in custom, law, religious teaching, and so forth. Certain great departments of action were covered, and others left over for further treatment, which they doubtless receive in the coming volume. The two volumes together will constitute a mass of information of unequalled value for comparative sociology. The value of Professor Westernmarck's work has been recognised not only in his native country, Finland, but by his appointment to one of the chairs of sociology recently founded by Mr. Martin White in the University of London. His range of information is unequalled, and for primitive peoples of lower civilisations in particular the student who has hitherto had to search through an uncharted sea of miscellaneous material now finds three-fourths of his work already done for him.

* * *

WHILE everybody knows the title at least of Mary Wollstonecraft's "Vindication of the Rights of Woman," few seem to remember that she was also the writer of some of the most passionate love-letters in the language. These first appeared in the "Posthumous Works" published in 1798, by her husband, William Godwin, and were addressed to Captain Gilbert Imlay, an American timber-merchant, who succeeded Fuseli and preceded Godwin in her affections. They were reprinted by Mr. Kegan Paul in 1879, but have been long out of print. Messrs. Hutchinson are now to issue a new edition, with an introduction by Mr. Roger Ingpen, the last part of whose finely illustrated edition of Boswell is also in the press.

* * *

ALTHOUGH Merejkowski is hardly in the same rank as Tolstoy, or even as Maxim Gorky, his novels "The Death of the Gods," and "The Romance of Leonardo da Vinci," made a great impression upon many readers. His work on Tolstoy and Dostoevsky, translated into English a few years ago by Mr. Herbert Trench, showed that besides being a great novelist, he is a critic of considerable insight. We are pleased to see that that work is to be followed up by a translation of his essays on Ibsen, Montaigne, and Pliny the younger, which Mr. G. A. Mounsey is to publish through the De la More Press in a few weeks.

* * *

A FEW months ago we drew attention to the publication of Professor Otto Pfeiderer's lectures on the development of religious thought. A translation of the series on "Religion and Historic Faiths" ("Religion und Religionen") has now been completed, and will be shortly issued by Mr. Fisher Unwin. The book should prove most useful to English theological students, for, as we said when speaking of the German edition, Professor Pfeiderer possesses a gift of lucid exposition, as well as an almost unequalled mastery over his materials.

* * *

UNDER the title, "Fenelon et Madame Guyon," Professor Masson, of the Swiss University of Fribourg, has recently published the secret correspondence which passed between the celebrated Archbishop of Cambrai and the remarkable woman who formed the centre of the great Quietist movement. This correspondence took place during the years 1688-9, and sheds a curious light on the character of Fenelon. It shows that the relations between Fenelon and Madame Guyon were quite harmless but peculiar and erratic. If these letters had been published during the Quietist controversy, they would have thrown a temporary cloud over Fenelon's reputation.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Letters of Queen Victoria: A Selection from Her Majesty's Correspondence, 1837-1861." Edited by A. C. Benson and Viscount Esher. (Murray, 3 vols., 63s. net.)

"Milan under the Sforza." By C. M. Ady. (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net.)

"George Sand and Her Lovers." By Francis Gribble. (Nash, 15s. net.)

"Rabelais." By Arthur Tilley. (Lippincott, 6s. net.)

"The Life of Cavour." By Edward Cadogan. (Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d. net.)

"Hugo Wolf." By Ernest Newman. (Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.)

"Sir George Grey." By G. C. Henderson. (Dent, 12s. 6d. net.)

"The Collected Poems of Dora Sigerson Shorter: With an Introduction by George Meredith." (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.)

"The Ghosts of Piccadilly." By G. S. Street. (Constable, 7s. 6d. net.)

"Modern Studies." By Oliver Elton. (Arnold, 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Child's Mind: Its Growth and Training." By W. E. Urwick. (Arnold, 4s. 6d. net.)

"The Resurrection of Jesus Christ." By Professor Kirsopp Lake. Crown Theological Library. (Williams & Norgate, 6s.)

"The Square Peg." By W. E. Norris. (Constable, 6s.)

"La Presse littéraire sous la Restauration, 1815-1830." Par Ch. M. Des Granges. (Paris: Société du Mercure de France, 7fr. 50.)

"L'Evolution du Protestantisme français au XIXe Siècle." Par C. Coignet. (Paris: Alcan, 2fr. 50.)

"Notre Minnie," Roman. Par André Lichtenberger. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit, 3fr. 50.)

Reviews.

THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.*

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN turned aside from writing the life of Fox to describe the quarrel with America because he felt that what was done and spoken at Westminster could not be rightly explained without a clear account of what was happening at the time beyond the Atlantic. His new volume is the third instalment of this history, and it brings the narrative down to the momentous year, 1778. The narrative is almost exclusively confined to America. It is no reflection on Sir George Trevelyan's power of making the adventures and tragedies of war interesting and real to say that most people would rather that he would describe the events that happened during those years in England than those that happened in America. The Whig secession, the difficult relations of the two sections of the Opposition which were an omen of the catastrophe of 1782, the death of Chatham, the process of disillusionment in the country, which changed the temper alike of the nation and of Parliament, and produced the great economy movement, these are themes of engrossing interest which Sir George Trevelyan would discuss with an authority and a grace to which no other living writer can pretend. It is perhaps not ungracious for a reviewer who has read this latest volume with intense pleasure and admiration to hint at the impatience with which most of his readers await the day of Sir George Trevelyan's return to the scenes of his great triumph. Every now and again in this volume there are fleeting glimpses into those scenes, and in one of them Sir George Trevelyan pays a high tribute to a Whig who has certainly had less than justice from modern critics. "Captain Richard Fitzpatrick, of the Grenadier Guards, survived to hold military rank just below the very highest and to acquire some distinction and much popularity in the House of Commons. And yet, all which he accomplished, by sword or tongue, was little in comparison with the celebrity merited rather than obtained by his pen. No old-fashioned Whig who loves a well-turned couplet would admit that the author of "The Liars" and the most crisp and vivacious fragments of verse in the Rolliad is inferior to any political satirist since John Dryden." The author of that interesting and challenging judgment must not allow himself too long a digression in fields that he shares with many writers from the province that is peculiarly his own. Old-fashioned Whig literature is not so much in fashion that it can afford to dispense with its most brilliant interpreter.

The greater part of the present volume is taken up with the military operations which ended in Burgoyne's surrender at Saratoga, and with Howe's occupation of Philadelphia, his winter there, and the evacuation of Philadelphia by Howe's successor, Clinton. The military achievements are not on an imposing scale, but there is a great element of human interest, and Sir George Trevelyan may be trusted to make the most of it. Nothing, for example, could be better than his touching picture of the fall of Burgoyne's army. It is not merely that the narrative possesses a genuine dignity and pathos; that the drama unfolds itself with a quiet and solemn power. The whole treatment of Burgoyne, who, in spite of his pompous rhetoric, his self-seeking intrigues, and his odious proclamations, is not altogether an ungenerous figure, is admirable in its fairness. Washington is, of course, the hero of a series of events in which failure is throughout more conspicuous than success. The villains on both sides are the politicians. Lord George Germaine's treatment of his generals was cruel and dishonourable. He was as incompetent for the management of the American War as Dundas was for the management of the French War. He was destitute of the elements of loyalty, and his conduct to Burgoyne, to Howe, to Clinton, and to the Commissioners can only be characterised as treachery. All the worst mistakes must be charged to the Government at home. This is conspicuously true of the worst mistake of all, the employment of Indians, for it was in the teeth of the strongest protest from Sir Guy Carleton that the Cabinet insisted that the invading army from Canada should be attended by a strong force of these savage allies. The army lived to repent that decision very bitterly. The Red Indians were more terrible to their friends than to their foes in times of crisis and adversity, and the horror inspired by their proceedings among the Royalist partisans led to energetic but fruitless protests, to which the English officers could only reply that it was impossible to restrain their brutalities in a conquered country. This was cold consolation to the lonely and scattered inhabitants, but, unhappily, it was perfectly true. Some of our Indian allies murdered a young woman, Jane Maccree, who lived in the house of a leading Tory and was engaged to a Volunteer who had brought a company of Loyalist sharpshooters to the assistance of Burgoyne. The English General demanded the surrender of the murderer, meaning to send him to the gallows. But the murderer turned out to be a very important chief, and it was felt to be too dangerous to meddle with him. That was the kind of warrior whom the English Government at home turned loose on the colonists. Well might Chatham exclaim: "Who is the man that has dared to authorise as associate to our armies the tomahawk and scalping knife of the savage, to call into civilised alliance the wild and inhuman savage of the wood, to delegate to the merciless Indian the defence of disputed rights, and to wage the horrors of his barbarous war against our brethren?" The brethren in this case happened to belong to both sides, for, to the savage who found himself in New England, a Loyalist scalp was as good as any other.

Washington, on his side, had good reason to dread his own Government. A revolutionary assembly is not a good master for an army. Its very virtues raise difficulties. It would be difficult to exaggerate the consequences of the discovery in the early days of the French Revolution that a marine artillerist was a kind of aristocrat, and that his place ought to be taken by men who had as guides no other principle than that of nature and a heart truly French. The statesmen of the American Republic approached military problems from much the same simple point of view, and if it had not been for Washington's incomparable patience they would have been as effective in demoralising the American army as the French doctrinaires afterwards proved themselves in demoralising the French navy. Not that Congress was merely the victim of its own abstract enthusiasms. It was the centre of intrigue and mischief. The worst soldiers could always get its ear for their own ends; the best soldiers could count on ingratitude and calumny. Sir George Trevelyan gives a lively picture of the individuals who were most conspicuous in the less creditable activities of the lobby. One of them was Dr. Benjamin Rush, a delegate from Pennsylvania. Patrick Henry, the Governor of Virginia, put a very outrageous diatribe into Washington's hands at a time when those attacks were very numerous. Washington identified it as the handwriting of Rush, who, he added, had been elaborate and studied in his professions of regard for him. Rush is of interest because, some years later, he fell into the hands of a less urbane critic than Washington. Rush was a physician as well as a politician, and when there was a violent outbreak of yellow fever in Philadelphia in 1797, he developed a system of treatment which attracted wide notice. Cobbett, who wanted to pick a quarrel with him for his politics, attacked his system with great humour and enjoyment, comparing Rush with another great advocate of bleeding, Dr. Sangrado, in "Gil Blas." Rush had called his remedy the "Samson of medicine," and Cobbett said it was an excellent name, for it had killed more Americans than ever Samson killed of the Philistines. Rush brought a libel action and got 5,000 dollars, and it was this law-suit that led indirectly to Cobbett's return to England. The story of the cabal against Washington and the quiet and commanding dignity with which Washington extinguished it reveals almost more graphically than anything else the stupendous difficulties that Washington subdued. If he had made a false step from pride or pique at any point, the success of the Revolution would have been in the gravest danger. It is no exaggeration to say that the turning point in the military fortunes of the Revolution came when Washington had at last wrested from Congress the authority to create an army. That was the great result of the winter in the Valley Forge, where the sufferings of Washington's army taught the politicians a lesson they could never have learned from victory.

* "The American Revolution. Part III. Saratoga and Brandywine Valley Forge. England and France at War." By the Right Hon. Sir George Otto Trevelyan, Bart. Longmans, Green. 12s. 6d. net.

Sir George Trevelyan urges us to remember that if the faults of Congress are notorious, its virtues and successes have been obscured in the vindictive memories with which men of all parties have fastened on its vices. "The Congressmen of 1776 and 1777 handled some matters very badly; but they faced difficulties and dangers as fast as they arose with business-like promptitude, and they attacked one question of high administration after another, at sometimes ten of a morning, with hearty zest and unflinching self-confidence." The warning is certainly just and needed, but Sir George Trevelyan's own volume will not dispose his readers to readjust the proportions of praise and blame as between Washington and Congress. As far as this volume is not the record of blunder and failure, it is the record of the success of two men: Washington, in America; and Franklin, in Paris. The last chapter, on European opinion, is particularly interesting. It analyses French opinion and French politics; it traces the unscrupulous policy of Frederick the Great in urging France into war, and the singularly ingenuous spirit in which the advice was received; it gives a delightful picture of the enthusiasm in France over Lafayette and his comrades; it paints in sombre and severe colours the double dealing of Vergennes and his Government. But perhaps nothing is more entertaining than the description of the hard task, in which Franklin succeeded, of counteracting the impressions made by the amateur diplomatists whom Congress chose to carry on its delicate business in Europe.

DRAMA AT THE COURT THEATRE.*

To the student of the drama Mr. Desmond MacCarthy's volume will be of use and interest, if only for its accurate history of three years' doings at the Sloane Square theatre. Those three years will doubtless mark an epoch in British drama, and they deserve some permanent record. Mr. MacCarthy has not been content, however, with the rôle of a chronicler of dry facts. He has given himself a free hand as critic. The critical part of the book is, naturally, of the most interest, but it also touches on the debatable ground of opinion, and therefore rather lessens the value of the volume as an historical survey. Happily, Mr. MacCarthy has real acumen as critic. He does not mistake facile adulation for criticism, and he gives reasons for his opinions.

On the whole, Mr. MacCarthy is at his best in criticising the playing at the Court Theatre. He points out that the excellence of the ensemble there is due not only to patient rehearsal and the absence of any necessity to consider the autocratic claims of an actor-manager, but also to the psychological solidity of the plays produced. It should be pointed out, however, that the style of acting at the Court Theatre is only one style of acting, and that in more emotional plays than Mr. Shaw, Mr. Hankin, and Mr. Barker have written, a very different style, and, in some ways, a more difficult style, is required. Mr. MacCarthy praises the performances of "Euripides" at the Court, but to many minds they were wanting in emotional grandeur. The actors seemed hardly at one with their theme. In other respects, Mr. MacCarthy's appreciation of the players is excellent, but it is impossible to agree with him that Mrs. Patrick Campbell's "Hedda Gabler" "was not one hair's-breadth out." She was much too listless and monotonous, and there was none of the purposeless rebellion against the meanness and narrowness of environment which is the motive force of the character.

One turns to the chapters on Bernard Shaw with interest. Mr. Shaw has not yet been finally transfixed by criticism. Mr. MacCarthy has made a valiant attempt, but his criticism is more remarkable for what it suggests than for what it actually states. It is admitted that Mr. Shaw errs in making his characters more stupid than the average of mankind. It is a big admission, and really knocks at the secret chambers of the Shavian method. Then Mr. MacCarthy makes other interesting discoveries. "In 'Man and Superman' he sets out purposely to write a play in which sexual attraction should be the main interest; but in his other plays also he has always made the nature of the attraction between his characters quite clear. What is remarkable about the scenes in which this is done is the extent to which sexual passion is isolated from all other sentiments and emotions." Instances are given from "You Never Can Tell" and "Man and Superman." Mr. MacCarthy's analysis is acute, but he does not draw any definite critical conclusion. This isolation of sexual passion is the very quality which mars Mr. Shaw's plays. In witnessing his love scenes one invariably thinks "men and women are not like that." The truth is that Mr. Shaw's heroes, and, to a less extent, his heroines, look on sexual attraction as a thing to fight against. It is never in his plays a mutual attraction, and it is always held up as an expression of physical attraction only. In his desire to show, too, that the old-fashioned value put on love is unreal, Mr. Shaw makes his characters (especially his men) turn on themselves in an artificial fashion. His men are always conscious that they are making fools of themselves, and resent it with a humorous acceptance of the inevitable, whereas the irony of life is that men in love are incapable of seeing themselves and their lovers in clear perspective. Nature has taken care that they should not. A dramatist may look on men and women from Nature's point of view, and show us either the comic or the romantic side of a passion which does so much work in the world, but his characters should not invariably be conscious that they are mere puppets in the hands of Nature. Mr. Shaw's men are always literary men, with a pretty turn for self-analysis. Also they appear to suffer from chronic poorness of blood. His women are more vital, but they are also addicted to literary self-analysis. Scratch a Shavian hero or heroine and you find a philandering sensualist. As particular types both may be true enough to life, but they are not general types, and yet it is clear that Mr. Shaw means them to be, for they appear in every one of his plays under different names, and the whole philosophic tendency of his dramas is based on them as representing male and female human beings.

Mr. MacCarthy possibly recognises this. At any rate, his criticism suggests that he does, although he does not carry it out to a logical conclusion. Had he done so his criticism would have been less appreciative. Indeed, it would naturally have become an indictment of Shaw as dramatist, and to some extent of the whole Vedrenne-Barker Theatre. The critic of the future will probably make the indictment as a commonplace of criticism, but at the same time he must allow, as Mr. MacCarthy does very handsomely, that in the creation of comedy characters, apart from his main drama, Mr. Shaw stands pre-eminent among living playwrights.

THE RELIGIONS OF THE EAST.*

THIS volume, though in itself a complete and independent whole, forms part of an important series of volumes at present appearing in Germany under the general title: "The Culture of the Age." The editor of this series is Mr. Paul Hinneberg; its object is to embrace the whole field of contemporary thought and life—religion, philosophy, literature, art, sociology in its widest sense, the organic and inorganic sciences, and the technical arts. An enterprise of such scope and magnitude was manifestly more than could be grappled with by a single mind; in bringing it to maturity, Mr. Hinneberg has been fortunate in securing all the best available talent of the German-speaking peoples, crowned with the special approbation of the Kaiser himself. For some time past a feeling has been growing up and gathering volume in the best Continental circles, that specialisation, the mere collection of isolated facts, must be supplemented by a synthesis drawn from these facts which will give us an outlook upon the general scheme of life and things. In order to satisfy this want, something more than a dictionary or an encyclopædia is needed. The alphabetical order adopted in works of this kind is convenient for purposes of reference, but it is not the order in which the great structure of human knowledge has been reared; it presents us with the conquests and generalisations of the contemporary mind in the form of disconnected fragments, not as a correlated and organic whole. Mr. Hinneberg's great undertaking follows the organic, not the alphabetical order, and by this means we are enabled in every department of thought and achievement to look back upon what civilisation has accomplished in the past, and to look forward upon the problems which are confronting it in the future.

* "The Court Theatre, 1904-1907." A Commentary and Criticism. By Desmond MacCarthy. With an Appendix Containing Reprint Programmes of the "Vedrenne-Barker" Performances. A. H. Bullen.

* "Die Orientalischen Religionen." Von E. Lehmann, A. Erman, C. Bezold, H. Oldenberg, I. Goldziher, A. Gruenwedel, B. G. Teubner, 1906. 7s.

The present volume on "The Religions of the East" falls within that part of Mr. Hinneberg's plan which embraces religious phenomena as a whole. Whatever we may think of the origin and character of religion; whether we consider it merely as a product of the human mind, or as a force in man which has its root in a Divine order of the world, it is at all events a momentous fact which will always repay the most attentive study. It is one of the few certainties of history that the march of civilisation has hitherto always been penetrated, and at some periods completely dominated, by religious ideas. And it is equally true that all those ideas which have acquired the greatest force and permanence in civilisation are ideas which have been stamped with the sanctity and authority of religion. That all ideas which have been consecrated by religious sanctions have been of value to humanity it would be folly to maintain. But whether they have been valuable or whether they have been pernicious, they will always repay the attentive consideration of the student of civilisation. The soul of a people, its deepest hopes and fears, its ultimate conceptions of the world and life, are most vividly revealed to us in its religion. When Lord Avebury published the first edition of his book on the "Origin of Civilisation," he put forward the opinion that the uncivilised races of the world were without religion. But closer investigation, as Professor Lehmann shows in the volume before us, has disclosed the fact that, among primitive peoples, religion, that is to say their ideas of what we should call the supernatural, is the principal source of all their acts. Of course, if we confine the idea of religion to the Christian conception of monotheism, it might be said with Cardinal Newman that many non-Christian cults are not religious but merely "malignant and incurable superstitions." Although this is the traditional Christian standpoint, the view of Augustine and St. Paul, it is now felt to be misleading and inadequate. We are living in an age which feels no constraining call to suppress and obliterate all save one cherished form of faith; and if we widen our conception of religion so that it includes a belief in all supernatural powers and forces, we must admit that pre-Christian peoples and non-Christian peoples have a religion, although it is in its details a different one from ours.

It is a more charitable, as well as a more philosophic view, to look upon the religions of pre-Christian peoples as a preparation for the great religion of the West. We cannot read Dr. Erman's account of ancient Egyptian beliefs as to the condition and ultimate fate of the dead without being struck with the points of similarity existing between them and the Christian doctrine of immortality and the last judgment. Such similarities may be merely instances of parallelism and not of borrowing, but from whatever point of view we regard them, they shed an interesting light on the attitude of the religious consciousness towards the mysterious fatality of death. The Babylonian Assyrian religion, of which Dr. Bezold gives us an illuminating sketch, reveals not merely parallelisms with the religion of the Old and New Testaments, but definite points of contact. It is impossible to read the Babylonian story of the Flood without feeling that the resemblances between it and the familiar narrative in the Book of Genesis are more than merely accidental parallels. Even the most cautious of students will admit that one of these flood stories must have been borrowed from the other, and there can be no doubt that the true origin of the Biblical deluge is to be found in the Babylonian myth. In this ancient story we are told that the gods were wroth with the sins of men, and resolved to destroy them in an overwhelming flood. But Ea, the lord of wisdom, warned one of the dwellers in the city of Shurippak of the coming judgment. England bore the built a great ship:—

"O man of Shurippak, son of Ubar, even when a French Frame a house, build a ship; landed a force in the Forsake thy possessions, seek to sail off by the islanders, Abandon thy goods, and cause thy the engagement which Bring up into the midst of the ship, tried to force sort."

The man of Shurippak did as he was told, and waited for the fateful day. The storm burst forth with such terrific fury that the gods fled in consternation to heaven, "cowering like dogs," and Ishtar, the lady of the gods, cried "like a woman in travail." On the seventh day the storm abated the ship grounded on a mountain, and after remaining there for six days, the Babylonian Noah says:—

"When the seventh day arrived,
I brought forth a dove and let it go:
The dove went to and fro;
As there was no resting place it turned back.
I brought forth a swallow and let it go:
The swallow went to and fro;
As there was no resting place it turned back.
I brought forth a raven and let it go:
The raven went and saw the decrease of the waters;
It ate, it waded, it croaked, it turned not back."

It would be easy to bring forward additional instances to show that many of the ideas which we are accustomed to regard as peculiarly Biblical have their roots either in Babylonia, or in the common soil of general Semitic faith. What the Biblical writers accomplished was to stamp the raw materials of myth and legend in circulation around them with a unique impress, which made them fit to become the religious property of the world.

We have left ourselves little space to speak of the remaining articles in this excellent volume. Dr. Oldenberg is well known to scholars as an authority of the first order on the religions of India and Persia, and in the space at his disposal he has drawn a brilliant sketch of the fundamental features of Vedic religion, Buddhism, Hinduism, and the life and teaching of Zoroaster. One of the most living religions of the world at the present moment is the faith of Islam. Apart altogether from its religious value, Mohammedanism, which possesses the characteristic of absorbing the State within the Church, is a political force of the first rank. If it should exhibit a capacity for reform—and signs of reforming energy are not wanting in Mohammedan circles—it may yet play a mighty part, both political and religious, in the future of the world. The rise of Japan has opened the eyes of the West to the assimilative and organising powers of the East, and it is not at all impossible that a renovated Mohammedanism, quickened into fresh life by the arts and ideas of the West, may yet revolutionise civilisation among the two hundred millions of believers who look to the Crescent as their guide. In view of what Dr. Goldziher tells us, in his chapter on the religion of Islam, of the reform movement now in progress among enlightened Mohammedans, we must beware of accepting the assertion so often put forward that Islam has reached the stage of immobility and petrification. We cannot close this notice without calling attention to the valuable articles on Chinese religion by Dr. de Groot, and Japanese religion by Dr. Florenz.

THE CASE FOR WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.*

THE first of these books is made up of fifteen essays and two appendices, consisting of speeches made by Mr. Zangwill. It suffers, like all collections of essays, from the want of arrangement and order. There is constant repetition, and though certain aspects of women's suffrage are discussed again and again there are others that are quite ignored. Perhaps the most interesting contributions are those which describe the growth of the demand for women's suffrage among organisations like the Co-operative Guild. It is impossible not to respect the indignation with which different contributors comment on the gross injustices still suffered by women, the gross injustices from which they have only comparatively

*"The Case for Women's Suffrage." Edited by Brougham Villiers. T. Fisher Unwin.

*"La Féminisme." Par Mme. Avril de Sainte-Croix. Préface de Victor Marguerite. V. Giard et E. Brière. 16me. Soufflet. Paris.

in the military fortunes of is very important that those grievington had at last wrested before the public mind. But there create an army. That in dwelling on them to get into the in the Valley Forge, who are engaged in a struggle between army taught the politician the whole of one sex wants to be learned from victory. The whole of the other wants to prevent its Sir George. The danger of this sort of generalisation is appreciated; the author of the little French volume which traces the progress of the women's movement, Madame Avril de Sainte-Croix looks forward, as we do, to a day when the liberation of women will be complete, and she thinks, she says that feminism, "which is a temporary and sometimes rather brutal manifestation," will then disappear in "a larger state of mind." Her volume is mainly a record, and it is concerned with all countries, so that it is necessarily rather a sketch than a detailed exposition. She discusses the failure of the French Revolution from the point of view of women and the falling off from the enlightened views of Condorcet. But it is in many respects an encouraging record, and she ends on a sanguine note.

The tendency to suppose that the battle for women's suffrage is simply a battle of the sexes runs through a great part of Mr. Brougham Villiers's volume. The result is that there is a good deal more declamation than analysis in its pages. The actual difficulties are not faced, for the reason, we fancy, that they are not realised. It is assumed, among others, by the editor, that nothing would be easier than the enfranchisement of women, and that if a Government does not proceed at once to such a measure, it must be from hostility and sex arrogance. There is a great majority of members pledged to support women's suffrage, and therefore a Government could easily carry it. But women's suffrage upon what terms?

It is explained in one of the papers that everyone who holds the view expressed by the Prime Minister on the debate on Mr. Dickinson's Bill on March 8th is an insidious enemy of women's suffrage. That view, as our readers will remember, was that women's suffrage ought to enfranchise the poor as well as the rich. The Prime Minister said he would vote for the Bill, but try to enlarge it in Committee. Here, then, we start from the principle that to prefer a complete to a limited Bill is to write yourself down an enemy of women's suffrage. A little later in the volume we get a description of the movement in favour of women's suffrage among the trade unionists of Lancashire, and several admirable arguments are advanced to show why working women ought to interest themselves in women's suffrage. It is also pointed out that Mr. Shackleton represents a Trade Union with a majority of women members. We turn back to the debate of March, and we find that Mr. Shackleton took precisely the same ground as the Prime Minister, and showed that not one of the twenty thousand married working women in his Trade Union would get the vote under Mr. Dickinson's Bill. We turn to Mrs. Nash's article a little later in the volume and find that the Co-operative Guild are tainted with the same heresy. Thus a considerable element of those who are on paper supporters of women's suffrage come into Mrs. Pankhurst's category of dishonest opponents. What becomes, then, of the argument based on the large number of members pledged to women's suffrage? Even the contributors to this volume do not all satisfy Mrs. Pankhurst's standard, by which only those are for women's suffrage who are content with a Bill that enfranchises the rich and well-to-do.

It would, we think, have been doing a better service to their cause if the editor had tried to come to close quarters with actual details. Would Mr. Dickinson's Bill have enfranchised a single agricultural labourer's wife? Now, we agree that a woman may argue, as it is argued in these pages, that the enfranchisement of a few women would mark a moral revolution, and that therefore a woman ought to desire any measure however limited. But that argument rules out a great many other arguments used in these pages. It is urged, for example, and we cordially agree, that women ought to have a vote to influence social legislation. But would the objects which the trade unionist women of Lancashire seek to attain or advance by women's suffrage be promoted by enfranchising so redoubtable an opponent of Labour legislation as Mrs. Fawcett, and having the women who are affected by social legislation unenfranchised? Those Liberals who want a complete Bill take their stand on democratic principles. They do not think the squire's wife can be trusted to represent the agricultural labourer's wife any more than they think that the squire can be trusted to represent the agricultural labourer. They cannot ignore the injustices between classes in their attempt to remedy injustices between sexes. Yet, none of the writers in this volume try to show that a limited Bill will not aggravate those injustices. They do not try to answer Mr. Shackleton's statement in the House of Commons. They talk about democracy, but they go out of their way to say that the democratic solution of this problem is unthinkable. They are the champions of a middle-class suffrage. What should we think of a proposal to enfranchise bachelors and rich married men?

A similar disregard of realities characterises the allusions to the tactics of violence. We could quite understand the position of the women who argue that in invading the House of Commons and private members' cloak rooms, and private houses, and suffering imprisonment for breaking the law, they are showing that they are personally in earnest. But what we cannot understand is the argument that they ought to be allowed to do these things with impunity. They can speak in any town or village in England; they can organise processions; they can present petitions. They can do everything that men can do. What they ask is that they shall be allowed to do everything that men cannot do. When they have such excellent ground for complaining of the inequalities of the law it is surely bad tactics to complain of its equalities. We are glad to see they do not carry that argument as far as they did. They only argue now that the law ought to distinguish between men and women; they no longer argue that it ought to distinguish between other women and Mr. Cobden's daughters, which was carrying the hereditary principle further than most Tories would carry it. If the writers argue that they ought from the first to have been treated as first-class misdemeanants, we entirely concur; but their argument is the much wider one, that a Liberal Government ought to instruct the police to disregard all illegalities committed by women who want votes. From their point of view it seems to us very dangerous ground to take.

If we have treated this volume in a critical spirit, it must not be inferred that we are hostile to women's suffrage. We belong to the despised school who think that a wide measure of enfranchisement is not only just and politic, but that it is also practicable. Every Reform Bill has gone further than people of the time thought possible. If all those persons who want a wide measure to-day would say so, the reform would be within our reach. Unfortunately, a great many of those who want it spend their time and energy in saying it can never come or in supporting those partisans of women's suffrage who look to a limited Bill as the best bulwark against a democratic enfranchisement which they dread. We think also that the leaders of the women's movement ought not to forget that the unenlightened and narrow views of women's rights, which they attack with such just indignation, are not, unhappily, confined to the sex in possession.

THE STATECRAFT OF HENRY VIII.

THERE are none too many things of which to be proud in English historical scholarship; but one of them is certainly the "Letters and Papers of Henry VIII." It is fifty-one years since the Master of the Rolls commissioned the late John Sherren Brewer to compile a calendar of the historical documents relating to Henry's reign, and now the second part of the twentieth volume lies before us. It carries us down to the end of 1545, so that only thirteen months remain to complete the task. Dr. James Gairdner, who has been editor-in-chief of the series since Brewer's death in 1879, has been connected with it since its inception; and, in spite of his eighty years, we trust will live to see its completion. Finis coronat opus, and that would be the best reward for a long and useful career of research which has hardly received its due recognition.

* "Letters and Papers, Foreign and Domestic, of the Reign of Henry VIII." Vol. XX., pt. 2. Arranged and catalogued by James Gairdner, C.B., LL.D., and R. H. Brodie. H.M. Stationery Office.

The mere mention of twenty volumes conveys no idea of the scope of this work. A volume may be anything—or nothing; but one of this calendar comprises an introduction of six hundred and seventy pages and three parts, each averaging twelve hundred pages and some two thousand documents. The series, when complete, will run to fifty thousand documents and thirty-five thousand pages. Even this mass of manuscript does not exhaust the original materials for the reign of Henry VIII.: for there are records of legal proceedings, episcopal and parish registers, contemporary chronicles, and controversial writings which do not come within the scope of this calendar. Yet it is unique in its catholicity. We have had other calendars, but none have been executed on so broad a plan. Almost invariably they have been confined to State papers; while these “Letters and Papers” summarise private correspondence, personal grants, and ecclesiastical documents. Other series, too, have been limited with regard to the provenance of the documents; the Foreign and Domestic Calendars only deal with materials in the Record Office. Dr. Gairdner and his colleagues deal with them wherever they may be found, and that is the only rational plan for the sixteenth century, when the idea of State property in official documents had not been evolved. A Secretary of State carried off his official correspondence and kept it: hence the thousands of documents in Lord Salisbury’s possession at Hatfield. Other Secretaries were not so careful as Burghley and his son, and much has been destroyed. Those which Sir Robert Cotton begged, borrowed, or stole have found their way, burnt and mutilated, to the British Museum; one collection, dealing with Scottish affairs, migrated to Berlin, but has since been recovered; others lie buried in country houses. Now that the known sources have been gathered into one repository, vast though it be, there is some possibility of a satisfactory history of this reign.

But the classic notion of history stands in the way, the idea that history is merely a work of art, a story the virtue of which consists in the way it is told and not in its truth. There is much to excuse the Ancient historian who holds this view; because he is denied those advantages on which the Modern historian bases his claim to science. Original materials hardly exist for ancient history: no living man has seen a line in the handwriting of Cæsar or Cicero, let alone any Greek. Dr. Gairdner knows the handwriting of hundreds of Tudor officials as well as he knows his own. He can test his materials in numerous ways unknown to the historian of ancient Greece or Rome. The paper on which they are written, the seals with which they are sealed, the spelling, the endorsements, the expressions, the form of the document, all tell their tale to the expert. He does not accept a letter written on paper with an eighteenth-century watermark as an original letter of Oliver Cromwell’s; he can tell us by the shape of the letters the half-century or quarter of a century in which they were written. He is aware of the difference in value between a “record” and a “chronicle”; he distrusts memoirs and rejects altogether obituary notices; and he realises that the work of historical writers is not evidence. The mass of real evidence within his reach enables him to dispense with the tenth-hand gossip of men who could not possibly know the facts. This is the service rendered by Dr. Gairdner’s “Calendar.” We can construct our history of Henry’s reign from materials dating from that reign, from the ipsissima verba of the King and his ministers, from letters written in secret and designed for no eye except the recipient.

When this volume opens in August, 1545, there was assembled at Spithead—as in August, 1907—a naval force unequalled at that date; and then, too, a King hoisted his flag and played at being an Admiral. Fortunately, there was no repetition last month of the disaster in which the “Mary Rose” capsized and sank with all hands on board, though it was repeated on the same spot when the “Royal George” went down in 1782. In 1545, however, there was real warfare. The Emperor Charles V. and Henry VIII. had declared war on Francis I., and in 1544 Henry had captured Boulogne. Then Charles made terms with France at the Peace of Crêpy, leaving Henry to bear the brunt of the war single-handed. England bore the strain with an equanimity partly due to the absence of a Yellow Press: there was no panic even when a French fleet appeared off Bembridge and landed a force in the Isle of Wight. This force was driven off by the islanders, and the French admiral shirked the engagement which Lisle, the future Duke of Northumberland, tried to force upon him. The weather was so favourable to the French that it was called “The Frenchmen’s God”; but when the wind changed, the French fleet made off to Normandy, having accomplished nothing. Equally unsuccessful were the French attempts to recapture Boulogne; but Henry’s efforts to bring German mercenaries into the north-east of France were not happy. Agents sent to scour the north of Germany were welcomed; one of them relates how he was received “as though he had been a prince” and “supper lasted from 8 p.m. to 3 a.m.” Seven hours seems to have been the regular duration for a royal feast; and in 1517, when Henry was entertaining Charles’s envoys, a papal nuncio tells us that “the guests remained at table for seven hours by the clock.” The results were hardly commensurate; the Germans never got to France; they wanted four months’ pay for two months’ service, and when they could not get it, they mutinied, imprisoned Henry’s commissaries, and threatened to hang them; a similar fate had attended another of Henry’s agents earlier in the reign. “Happy is he,” wrote one, “that hath no need of Almaynes: for, of all the nations under the heavens, they be the worst, most rudest, and unreasonablest to deal withal.” On sea the English more than held their own: “L’Inglese,” writes an Italian, “se trova signor del mar.” “The French,” declares a Spaniard, were “astounded at the spirit of the English.” Even thus early they were boasting that one Englishman was equal to three Frenchmen.

Both parties were now feeling the financial strain of the war. “The French,” writes a Spanish agent, “have had tremendous loss by sea, including the herring fishery upon which the Normans depend, while their people everywhere are so distressed as to threaten a general rising if burdened with further taxes.” Henry had been compelled to debase the currency, and was meditating the confiscation of the chantries. Two hostile powers were anxious to bring the French and English to terms—the Emperor, because his engagements to Henry might easily involve him in the war with France and thus impede his contemplated measures against the Lutherans—and the German Protestants themselves, because they hoped for a league between themselves, the French, and the English to counteract the Emperor. A great part of this volume is occupied with these two sets of negotiations. But Francis I. was not yet prepared to acquiesce in the loss of Boulogne, and Henry absolutely refused to give it up. His council dreaded the cost of its retention, and Dr. Gairdner emphasises the result as a remarkable illustration of “subservience” to the royal will. It might be paralleled outside Henry’s reign: in 1557 Mary declared war on France, though every Privy Councillor except Paget voted against it; and Elizabeth was equally autocratic in her marriage negotiations with Anjou. Indeed, considering that the Privy Council was appointed by, and responsible solely to, the Crown, independence was not to be expected. Nor was conciliar despotism preferable to royal despotism; until Parliament gained control of the Privy Council, nothing was to be gained by making the Council independent of the Crown. Dr. Gairdner further uses this incident to exculpate Wolsey from recent attacks. “Wolsey himself,” he says, “could never affect Henry’s policy otherwise than by pointing out natural obstacles and considerations of expediency.” This assumes that in Wolsey’s time Henry had a policy and cared to enforce it; but there is overwhelming testimony against this view. Foreign envoys and English agents agree in depicting Henry in his early years as careless of government. “Wolsey,” writes Bishop Fox, “is not Cardinal, but King.” “This Cardinal,” declares the Venetian ambassador, “is King, nor does His Majesty depart in the least from the counsel and opinion of his lordship.” “Agere cum rege,” he wrote, “est nihil agere”; and it is not possible to justify Wolsey by pleading under these circumstances that the policy was the King’s. Gradually, of course, Henry began to assert himself, and that assertion marks the difference between the first and second halves of Henry’s reign. A. F. POLLARD.

THE CONGO HORROR.*

WHENEVER the world is suffering from some notorious evil or oppression, be it a Turkish tyranny or a Congo slavery, there will always be found a certain number of apologists. The very desperateness of the cause attracts certain minds to defence. It is not necessary to believe that those pleas, sinister and cynical as they often are, always proceed from any base motive. It is notorious, indeed, that vast sums of money have been spent, and are still being spent, by the Congo State in the subornation of apparently genuine Press defenders in every part of the world. But men like Mr. Frederick Starr must be carefully distinguished from the ordinary creatures of unscrupulous wealth. Mr. Starr, a capable American writer, went to the Congo two years ago as an ethnologist, and while there was drawn into a cursory examination of the native problem. He was, as he admits to us freely in the course of this clever little volume, a guest of the Congo State. He was taken up the Congo on the short new Congo Railway, from Stanleyville to Ponthier-ville, not open at that time to ordinary traffic. He was conveyed in the State steamers, and slept at the State resting places. He listened to the State talk, and he has here recorded the State defence—a defence perfectly familiar to the unhappy reader of Congo literature, but presented, we are ready to admit, with a certain amount of freshness and vitality.

Now, we do not severely criticise Mr. Frederick Starr, or any other of the Congo visitors who have put forward this defence in face of the most damning body of evidence yet submitted to the world. For the evil of the Congo business is that it is practically impossible for any visitor hurrying through the main highway of the Congo to discover the facts for himself. The worst regions—the regions where the worst oppression is taking place—are away from the highway and often closed to the world. In the other parts of the Congo—the regions near the coast, which the traveller can visit—the means of transport are entirely in the hands of the Congo State and the Missionary Societies. If you put yourself in the hands of the State, you will discover only what the State wants you to discover. The only alternative is the Mission transport and hospitality, of which Mr. Starr did not avail himself.

The safest plan, probably, is to trust to the evidence of the men on the spot. Of those, the employees of the State have their mouths closed—except in cases like that of Lemaire, who is convincing those still unconvinced in Belgium. But the English missionaries and Consuls fortunately speak boldly in spite of Leopold's threats and penalties. They still keep sending home a stream of evidence which shows that things are little, if any, better now than at the time of the Report of the famous Special Commission.

But while the evidence of such defenders of oppression as Mr. Starr is of little value or importance, their point of view is often very interesting. You find in these books the revelation of a strange and dangerous habit of mind which is the chief peril to the relations between the white and the black man in the future of the world. Mr. Frederick Starr, for instance, does not take the simple and obvious course of denying the Congo atrocities, but to a large extent admits them. "It is true," he says, "that there are floggings and chain gangs and prisons." He even admits to mutilations, and confesses to excessive taxation; but his comment on all this is two-fold. Firstly, he argues that the black man has not the same feelings as a white man, the plea of the fisherman who says that the fish cannot feel. It leads Mr. Starr to some curious conclusions. Take, for instance, his opinion on a form of ordeal of witchcraft by which the Congo native in the old days was in the habit of getting rid of a rich or dangerous neighbour. Mr. Starr actually holds the opinion that missionaries have been wrong in opposing this practice.

"This whole matter of witchcraft and the ordeal has been magnified by many writers. It is true that there was constant danger for a progressive man, a rich man, or a great chief. Such men would naturally arouse jealousy and envy, and no doubt accusations were frequently made against them without cause. For my own part, however, I have long believed that the ordeal of witchcraft was not an unmixed evil, and I was more than pleased at hearing a missionary, who has been many years in the Congo, state that, after all, while it was subject to occasional abuse, it tended toward wholesome control of conditions in a community."

One who holds this view naturally cannot see anything very wrong in other forms of atrocity.

The next step is to argue that the climate is a sufficient excuse. Mr. Starr devotes a chapter to showing the disorganisation and demoralisation that come on the white man who lives for long in the tropics. He is pulled down first by disease, then by his degrading human surroundings.

"Constant sight of cruelty begets cruelty. Alone in a population so unlike himself, his only safety rests in his commanding at once fear, respect, obedience. He frequently possesses governmental power. The only white man in a large area of country, he must insist upon the fulfilment of the requirements which are passed down to him from his superiors. There are no white men living who could pass unscathed through such a trial. The wonder is not that from time to time company agents and governmental officials are encountered who are monsters of cruelty. The wonder is, with the constant sapping of the physical, the mental, and the moral nature, that any decent men are left to treat with natives."

If this allegation be accepted as true, the only answer is that clearly in that case the presence of the white man in tropical countries must be a wholly unmixed evil, harmful both to himself and to the natives, and that his absence would be equally profitable to both. Mr. Starr will not admit that the demoralisation is confined to the Congo officials, but would extend it to all white men in tropical countries.

If this were so, then a black man might well be excused for regarding the white man as a particular burden, but we remain unconvinced as to the facts. It is a disgraceful slur upon English officials in Nigeria and Uganda to compare them with the scum of Europe sent by King Leopold to the Congo. It is notorious that, in choosing his officials, King Leopold has descended to the lowest stratum of population yet selected by civilised powers for the task of governing, that he rewards them in proportion to their activity in ill-doing, and pays a premium upon vigour in extortion. To compare such a system with anything that goes on under English rule is a calumny against British civil servants, which only a close scrutiny could justify. Has Mr. Starr made it?

Mr. Starr, to our mind, fails to appreciate the very elements of the Congo problem. He has made no attempt to grasp the economic system in the Congo; he has made no study of these extraordinary edicts by which King Leopold has claimed for himself practically the whole lives and properties of that vast region. He confuses in a muddled way the Congo system with that of other tropical regions, such as Uganda or Nigeria, nor does he realise the fundamental difference which sets the Congo apart from all other experiments in governing black men by white. That difference is that the Congo native is not a citizen but a slave. Mr. Starr speaks of the taxation in the Congo being excessive. He is wrong. There is no taxation in the Congo. The word is misapplied. The proper term is not taxation but robbery. You do not tax when you take all a man's goods, not for his own good but for your own. As well might a pirate pretend that he was an official of the Board of Inland Revenue.

Next time that Mr. Starr goes to the Congo we would advise him to keep clear of the State officials. He must know as a publicist that the first necessity in matters of investigation is not to place yourself in the hands of the accused party. There is one very luminous passage in his book. "Unfortunately," he says, "there is a strained relation amounting at times to bitterness between the State officials and the English-speaking missionaries." "This feeling," he says, "is general." But the cause is notorious, and has been indeed stated by the Commission which investigated the affairs of the Congo. The reason is that the "evangelical missionary," in the words of a trained observer of the Congo, is "the only friend of the natives." He is, as Mr. Starr himself says, the only white man who learns the language of the country, and the only man who is not engaged in exploiting the native. We would, therefore, advise Mr. Starr in his next visit to the Congo to reinforce this information by closer intercourse with missionaries. If he will add a few visits to the foreign Consuls, he will then come back with more valuable information than he seems to have derived by his journey under the Blue and Gold flag of the Congo State.

* "The Truth About the Congo." By Frederick Starr. Werner Laurie. 1s. 6d.

THE CONVERT and THE HALO

All readers of fine Fiction should note that there is now ready a New Novel by ELIZABETH ROBINS, Author of "The Magnetic North." It is entitled THE CONVERT. The demand for it is very great.

A delightful Story entitled THE HALO, by Baroness VON HUTTEN, Author of "Pam," is now ready.

A WOMAN'S TREK FROM THE CAPE TO CAIRO. By MARY HALL. With 64 Illustrations and 2 Maps, demy 8vo, 16s. net.

Under the title "A Woman's Trek" are given here the experiences of an adventurous lady's journey through Africa, from south to north. We learn why she went, how she managed her own caravan, and the reception accorded her by the Government officials and the natives.

A PRINCESS OF THE OLD WORLD. By ELEANOR C. PRICE. With 21 Illustrations, 12s. 6d. net. This volume deals with the life and surroundings of Anne Marie Louise d'Orléans. She was the first Princess of the blood royal, and was known as La Grande Mademoiselle. A most characteristic and original personage.

PETRARCH AND HIS TIMES. By H. C. HOLLWAY-CALTHORP. With 24 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

CONSTABLE. By HERBERT W. TOMPKINS. With 41 Illustrations, demy 16mo, 2s. 6d. net. [Little Books on Art.

WORDSWORTH AND HIS CIRCLE. By D. W. RANNIE. With 20 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. A study, biographical and critical, drawn from original sources, of the man and poet in his relations to his chief friends and contemporaries.

HUGO WOLF. By ERNEST NEWMAN. With 12 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [The New Library of Music.

Since Wolf's untimely death, four years ago, he has been more and more fully recognised as the most remarkable song-writer since Schubert. The present volume contains a full account of his life and letters, and a study of his art in every aspect.

GEORGE MEREDITH: NOVELIST, POET, REFORMER. By MAY STURGE HENDERSON. With a Portrait. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A careful study of the novels in chronological order, and of the consistent ideas underlying Meredith's work as novelist, poet, critic and essayist.

THE SOUTH-BOUND CAR. By OWEN LLEWELLYN and L. RAVEN-HILL. With 85 Illustrations, cr. 8vo, 6s. A vivacious narrative of the events of a motor tour in Spain. Mr. Raven-Hill's sketches illustrate the incidents, humorous and otherwise.

THE GENTLEST ART. An Anthology of Entertaining Letters. By E. V. LUCAS. Fcap. 8vo, 5s.

Under the above title Mr. Lucas has brought together some hundreds of familiar letters of great and small writers, arranged like its companion volumes, "The Open Road" and "The Friendly Town." Every letter in his pages is interesting for its matter as much as its manner.

Messrs. METHUEN'S New Illustrated Announcement List is now ready, and will be sent with their Bulletin to any applicant. They have prepared prospectuses of all their important books and these, too, can be had.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

AN ARTIST'S REMINISCENCES. By WALTER CRANE.

With 123 Illustrations by the Author, and others' Illustrations. Second edition. Demy 8vo, 18s. net.

"A record in which we meet all the great figures of the last half-century."—Daily News.

"The volume contains a great deal of interest and delight. The fine illustrations add considerably to its value."—Morning Post.

QUEENS OF THE RENAISSANCE. By Mrs. M. B.

RYLEY. With 24 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

WILD LIFE ON A NORFOLK ESTUARY. By

ARTHUR H. PATTERSON. With 40 Illustrations by the Author, and a Prefatory Note by Her Grace the DUCHESS OF BEDFORD. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

The wild life of that celebrated estuary Breydon Water.

A HISTORY OF MILAN UNDER THE SFORZA.

By CECILIA M. ADY. With 20 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

This is the first volume of a new series of histories of the Italian States, of which Mr. Edward Armstrong, of Queen's College, Oxford, and Mr. R. Langton Douglas are the general editors. The aim of this book is to present, in its various aspects, a typical despotism of the Italian Renaissance.

THE CARE OF THE BODY. By FRANCIS CAVANAGH,

M.D. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [New Library of Medicine.

This book deals with Sleep, Bathing, Exercise, Training and Athletics, Proper Clothing, the Skin, Hair, Teeth, Feet, and Hands.

ENGLISH CHILDREN IN THE OLDEN TIME. By

ELIZABETH GODFREY. With 32 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"This is a work well worth doing and well done. Scientific enough to command confidence, and not too scientific to be readable."—Spectator.

WOMAN IN TRANSITION. By ANNETTE M. B. MEAKIN,

Fellow of the Anthropological Institute. Demy 8vo, 6s.

"A thoughtful and fearless book on the greatest problem of the age."—Tribune.

"Most interesting, stimulating, and valuable."—Daily Telegraph.

TREES IN NATURE, MYTH, AND ART. By J. ERNEST

PHYTHIAN. With 24 Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s.

MY MEMOIRS. By ALEXANDRE DUMAS. Translated

by E. M. WALLER. In 6 vols., with Frontispieces in Photogravure, crown 8vo, 6s. each. Volume I., 1802-1821.

One of the famous books of the world, very long, but full of romance, thrilling incident, vivid touches, and frank and charming self-revelation. The book has never before been rendered into English.

TWO LEGS, and other Stories. By CARL EWALD. Translated by A. TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS. With many Illustrations by Miss AUGUSTA GUEST. Large crown 8vo, 6s.

A book of fairy tales by an exquisite Danish writer.

CHARACTER AND COMEDY. By E. V. LUCAS.

Second Edition. Fcap. 8vo, 5s.

"Mr. Lucas is a pretty humourist, and in this dainty volume he shows, very prettily, the variety of his range."—Athenæum.

"Mr. Lucas is an admirable causeur; he is always amusing and suggestive."—Tribune.

CO-OPERATIVE INDUSTRY. By ERNEST AVES.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

The origin, aims, and general progress of Co-operation are described. Special sections have been devoted to Industrial Co-partnership, and to Co-operation in Agriculture.

ALL ABOUT PHILIPPINE. By PHILIP CARMICHAEL.

With 8 Illustrations, crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

The adventures of an extremely youthful heroine and her parents.

SIX SHILLING NOVELS.

SECOND EDITION.

TALES OF TWO PEOPLE. By ANTHONY HOPE. With a Frontispiece by A. H. BUCKLAND.

"Mr. Hope's best qualities are to be found in this collection, the personal touch, the whimsical grace, the delightful repartee."—Manchester Courier.

"Every sentence bears the stamp of its author, who is, perhaps, the prettiest writer of fiction now producing."—Daily Telegraph.

SECOND EDITION.

THE SECRET AGENT. By JOSEPH CONRAD.

"A work rich in surprise and suspense, original in conception and treatment, lavishly endowed, in fine, with the singular qualities which have won for Mr. Conrad a unique position amongst the British novelists of to-day."—Spectator.

"The novel is more of a portrait gallery than a story, although it is a story, too, and a really exciting one. All the characters are made vivid, and their interaction is marvellously managed."—Times.

SECOND EDITION.

MAJOR VIGOUREUX. By "Q."

"Here we find the delightful 'Q,' his merry humour, his West Country breeziness, his fine simplicity, his love of honest romance."—Tribune.

"Steady and virile invention, original conception of story, and sane yet startling humour."—Daily News.

THIRD EDITION.

THE BOTOR CHAPERON. By C. N. and A. M.

WILLIAMSON.

"Fiction and travel have never been more happily blended."—Outlook.

"Another delightful romance of travel."—Daily Mail.

FOURTH EDITION.

A MOTHER'S SON. By Mr. and Mrs. C. B. FRY.

"The whole story is so good, with its air of purity, the friendly benevolence to all men, and its careful character studies, that we should not like to have missed a single page of it."—Westminster Gazette.

SECOND EDITION.

AN ENGLISH GIRL. By FORD MADDOX HUEFFER.

"Full of ideas, character-work, and admirable writing."—Outlook.

"At once striking, fresh, and unconventional."—Country Life.

SECOND EDITION.

THE NEW RELIGION. By MAARTEN MAARTENS.

"An amusing, well-written novel."—Daily Chronicle.

"A really remarkable book."—Morning Leader.

SECOND EDITION.

NAME OF GARLAND. By W. PETT RIDGE.

"The story, with all its humour, has an undertone of real pathos."—Athenæum.

"Gay and irresistible humour at every turn."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Mr. Pett Ridge has the secret of making his people natural and humorous."—Tribune.

SECOND EDITION.

LOVE THE JUDGE. By WYMOND CAREY.

"A story of unflagging interest."—Athenæum.

THE PRIVATEERS. By H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON.

With 8 Illustrations by CYRUS CUNEO.

"A rousing story of adventure."—Athenæum.

"Full of surprising and exciting adventures."—Morning Post.

THIRD EDITION.

THE SHEEP AND THE GOATS. By MARY E. MANN.

"Admirably conceived and put together."—Nation.

"A good story; entertainingly told."—Tribune.

SECOND EDITION.

MARGERY O' THE MILL. By M. E. FRANCIS.

A North Country Story of the Regency Period.

"Full of sunshine, humour, and human nature."—Scotsman.

SECOND EDITION.

THE GIRL AND THE MIRACLE. By RICHARD MARSH.

A young girl, friendless, alone in the London streets at night, picks up a key, and unlocks the gate which opens the place of miracles. A story too strange not to be true.

"A thrilling story of strange happenings."—Country Life.

IRELAND IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

MR. LOCKER LAMPSON, in his somewhat salt and disillusioned preface, prognosticates for his book some forty-two readers (out of the forty-two million dwellers in these countries), and no praise at all. He is, no doubt, somewhat unhappy in having such a rival in the field as M. Paul Dubois, whose masterly diagnosis of contemporary Ireland was recently reviewed in these columns. Still, we should hope for considerable study of his book in those Unionist circles to which his declaration against Home Rule will naturally recommend it.

The volume is somewhat difficult to characterise. It is not a systematic history, conceived in the spirit of pure and, as one may say, relentless scholarship. Mr. Locker Lampson has certainly not spun it out of his head; his reading is both wide and deep, and he has crowded into his pages a great deal of information that one does not exactly pick up by the roadside. But his book is neither large enough nor calm enough to be strict history. On the other hand, while he has his own special cure and charm for Irish maladies, he is far too keenly moved by past events viewed simply as a spectacle to limit himself to a merely medicinal outlook. He has produced a series of loosely-linked chapters, in which the more important Irish problems are traced down from their sources by a light which is neither purely historical nor purely political. Mr. Locker Lampson is a Unionist. There will, we trust, be no offence in assigning him to what may be called the picturesque-penitent school of writers in that interest. The representative of this school is ready to exalt, in swinging strophes, any Irish "agitator"—provided only that he is sufficiently dead—and to denounce every stupidity and tyranny practised in regard to Ireland except those which it is in his power, as an English elector, to help to amend. Mr. Lampson passes under review the great reforms of the century. He shows us the tithe proctor removed from the economy of Irish life by seven years' civil war, and Catholic Emancipation carried by menace of civil war. His pages are filled with specimens of the quite demented scurrility with which the "Times" confronted the very moderate programme and velvet Parliamentary methods of O'Connell. He recalls the Episcopalian Church, disestablished by Fenian dynamite, amid Orange prophesying of evil far direr than those evoked by Home Rule. He has no illusions about landlordism. He prints on his title page the famous and unanswered question, "How is it that the King is none the richer for Ireland?" In an appendix he gives Sir Robert Giffen's conclusions on this score to the effect that while Ireland was taxed £3,000,000 a year beyond her capacity, England was losing another £3,000,000 a year for the privilege of over-taxing her. He gives the following as the natural history of reform movements in Ireland:—

"It (Catholic Emancipation) is an epitome of the policy of Ireland's governors—robbery followed by a cruel persecution; then a gradual growth of public opinion strong enough to irritate, but too weak to force the hand of the ascendancy of the day. Then agitation, exasperation, outrage, promises of reform, failure to fulfil them, and crass ignorance and senseless brutality vying with one another in the government of the disordered country. Then increased agitation, crime, and coercion, a greater volume of public opinion, a growth of menial fear in the rulers of Ireland, and lastly, after many years of insult and indifference, redress forced from authority, not through a consciousness of justice inexcusably delayed, but under the influence of menace, and menace alone."

That is the history of Irish reform under Unionism, and the conclusion drawn from it by Mr. Lampson is that at the next election he will, in the interest of Ireland, vote Unionist! He should of a surety have added one other cause of Irish irritation—retrospective indignation and abstract sympathy.

The literary quality of the volume is excellent. The sketch of Disraeli, interpolated into the chapter on University Education, is memorably rich and picturesque. One is sorry to see Mr. Lampson abandon his intelligence to that mysticism so popular with the Tory pamphleteer which streams forth in vague reveries over the "impulsive," "lovable," "undependable," "emotional," "extravagant" Celt. The temperament of Ireland is not, of course, that of England. But we deceive ourselves and irritate the Irish when we write of them in such fashion as Mr. Lampson writes on pages 395 and 396.

There are, no doubt, two sides to the problem of Irish government, and able men will be found on both sides. But whatever else is disputed, it must be admitted that the questions at issue between the two countries are not in the least "Celtic" and elusive, but are of a most comprehensible and earthy kind. Form of government, system of finance, laws of property, machinery of education, are not these the factors of the equation that has to be solved? And to whom does it bring any profit to cloud them with vain phrases about Celt and Saxon, elusiveness and stolidity?

Some mistakes have gone uncorrected in the reading of the proofs. The date of Sir Robert Giffen's famous article, for instance, should be 1886, not 1866. On page 2 "guarantees" should be "grantees," and so forth. These are trivial matters, and in the main lines of his work Mr. Lampson is remarkably accurate and well-informed. If we have quarrelled sharply with his drift and conclusions it is because one cannot resent too strongly anything that tends at this moment to strengthen the reactionaries who are ready to sacrifice Ireland in order to injure Liberalism, and to sacrifice Liberalism in order to injure Ireland.

THE COMPENSATION ACT.*

In this little hand-book of 126 small octavo pages, only 72 of which are devoted to the subject itself, Mr. Clement Edwards, M.P., has sought to explain to the average man the Compensation Act, which came into operation on July 1st. To be of any wide use, a work of this sort must be brief and simple. By reason of its comprehensiveness, the Act is much less litigious than the one it amends. It is the exclusions in the present law which have mainly given rise to so many bewildering judicial decisions, stamping it as one of the fattest things the legal profession have ever had.

But a perusal of these pages makes it clear that the new Act is capable of providing some Chinese puzzles for the lawyers. Thus, in the second of the ten chapters, Mr. Edwards gives us some useful examples. Take the £250 salary limit. If a man receives £4 a week, or £208 per year, from one firm, and £100 per year from another, is he outside the range of the Act? Mr. Edwards contents himself with telling us that the Act does not say.

Again, the question of casual employment is not straight sailing. It is, however, made fairly intelligible by Mr. Edwards. Certainly, his illustrations have the great merit of simplicity. Take this one: Mr. Smith engages casually a charwoman to scrub down his private house. That is not for the purpose of his business, and so if she meets with an accident is outside of the Act. But the same woman is employed casually to scrub out his shop. If she meets with a mishap Mr. Edwards thinks that she is within the Act.

Beginning with a brief historical sketch, Mr. Edwards manages to condense in the nine succeeding short chapters the mass of details contained in the Act. In plain language he sets forth the person to whom compensation is payable, when it is due, who is liable, and the scale on which it has to be paid. Special chapters are given to Seamen and Industrial Diseases. Both of them are new features of the Act, and the space devoted to this portion of the measure is well used.

Procedure and Insurance form the subjects of the two concluding chapters, and both deserve careful perusal. Unless the proper steps are taken to put the machinery into motion, the benefits of the Act will be lost. It will not be Mr. Edwards' fault if this happens, for the most uninstructed will be able to follow the course he marks out for them. In the same way, the necessity of insurance is pointed out most clearly, and the dangers of neglecting it are made manifest. The full text of the Act, and a table giving the cost of Post Office Annuities, with a useful index, are given at the end of the work.

Subject to accuracy of legal interpretation, a matter on which a layman cannot speak with authority, Mr. Edwards' little book may be commended with confidence as a guide to those who need to know the material points of the Workmen's Compensation Act of last year.

* "A Consideration of the State of Ireland in the Nineteenth Century." By G. Locker Lampson. Constable. 18s. net.

* "The Compensation Act, 1906." By Clement Edwards, M.P. Chatto & Windus, 1s. 6d. net.

¶ During the next ten days it is my intention to publish the following five notable books :—COKE OF NORFOLK AND HIS FRIENDS, the Life of Thomas William Coke, First Earl of Leicester of Holkham. An account of His ancestry, surroundings, public services, private friendships, including many unpublished letters from noted men of his day, English and American. By A. M. W. STIRLING. With 20 Photogravure and 43 other Illustrations.

¶ Immediately after the death of Lord Leicester, or, as he was better known to his generation, "Coke of Norfolk," many biographies of him were commenced but were abandoned upon the authoritative life being undertaken by the Hon. Thomas Keppel. By a curious chain of events the MS. of this work was lost. Thus it is that the name of Coke of Norfolk, once a household word in England and America, has sunk into oblivion. Coke's position was unique; as a landlord owner he is said to have transformed the agriculture of both hemispheres; as a politician and a prominent member of the House of Commons he exercised a peculiar influence upon the political world of his day. During that period he not only was offered a peerage seven times for his services, but he was the prime mover in several important political crises. It is, perhaps, in another aspect that his life presents the greatest attraction: in his friendships, in his relation to the other great spirits of his age. The correspondence preserved by him from the noted men of his day re-creates his generation for us, and presents it to us. We see Lafayette, as the humble farmer absorbed in rearing his pigs and his cattle. We see Lord Hastings, as a youth climbing a volcano during an eruption; as a young soldier frightened in his first battle. We see the "first Gentleman in Europe," as the fickle friend, pocketing humiliation in order to condone his deceit. We see Fox, as a slovenly schoolboy playing pitch-and-toss at Eton. We see Nelson, as the delicate son of an obscure Norfolk clergyman, coursing with Coke's hounds, calling to make his declaration for half-pay before Coke as the local magistrate. Incongruous in their endless variety the characters move across the pages—Pope Clement XIV.; Louise of Stolberg, the pretty, romantic bride of drink-sodden Prince Charlie; Dr. Parr; Amelia Opie; honest King William accepting home-truths from Coke, his admired "First Commoner"; his pompous brother, the Duke of Sussex; Chantrey, witty Lord Erskine, Gainsborough, Roscoe, Sir James Smith, Sir Humphry Davy—a great international train, amongst whom, and perhaps more remarkable than all at that especial date, are celebrities from the United States—at a date when, be it remembered, all who came thence were looked at askance as the recent foes of England, and were, as Raikes remarks, "foreigners." This circumstance is accounted for, possibly, by the fact that it was Coke's resolution in the Commons which terminated the War of Independence. We can hear the actual words which are uttered, we can listen to living denunciations of the "bloody-minded tyrant George III. and his Minions";—almost we share the conviction that England is foredoomed through the machinations of the "Vile Tories and their Viler head, Mr. Pitt." Through that dead world, once more instinct with life, Coke moves, the central figure. The type of Englishmen which he represents is no longer to be found among us; the large-hearted, open-handed Whig-Prince, who rode with the foremost, drank with impunity what would kill his descendants (his beer bill alone amounted to £3,000 per annum), spoke with a vehemence which would shock latter-day susceptibilities. He died in 1842, aged 88. The work is complete in two vols., price 32s. net.

¶ At the same time I have arranged to issue a daring novel, by the HON. HENRY COKE, the octogenarian son of "Coke of Norfolk," entitled OPEN HATCHWAYS. Mr. Coke is well-known as the Author of "Tracks of a Rolling Stone," a book which attracted considerable attention when published. The price of the new novel will be 6/-.

¶ Some weeks ago a remarkable controversy arose in Europe on the occasion of the publication in Paris of M. FRANCIS LAUR'S volume THE HEART OF GAMBETTA. I have acquired the English rights of this work and have every confidence that MR. JOHN MACDONALD'S remarkable introduction will reopen the discussion. Apart from this, the story of the love of the great patriot and statesman for LÉONIE LÉON, and the influence she possessed over him, is gradually unfolded in the letters which passed between them. When flushed by success or depressed with failure, GAMBETTA sought his "dear adored one," whose love and inspiring comradeship for the great French statesman probably influenced to a large degree the destinies of France. This book contains five Illustrations including a photogravure portrait of LÉONIE LÉON. The price will be 7/6 net.

¶ There is no more individual spot in England than the Isle of Purbeck, a fact which is largely due to its celebrated quarries at Swanage. "IN AND AROUND THE ISLE OF PURBECK," by MISS IDA WOODWARD, tells the story of the antiquity of this part of Dorsetshire—the romance of Corfe Castle and the story of its old families. MR. JOHN W. G. BOND, who contributes thirty-six water-colour drawings, is a scion of the Bonds of Grange, and near relative of the famous editor of the Purbeck section of Hutchings' classic, "The History of Dorset." The size of this volume is quarto, and the price a guinea net.

¶ It is now TEN YEARS ago since I published MR. STEPHEN PHILLIPS' "Poems," in which was included "Marpessa" and "Christ in Hades," yet it will be well remembered how he was heralded as a new poet of distinction. I am now able to announce NEW POEMS. The longest poem in the volume, entitled "IOLE," will, it is claimed, be hailed by all literary critics and lovers of poetry as equal to "MARPESSA" in charm and beauty; whilst some of the shorter pieces have already won the approval of that select band who read modern poetry. The present volume will be in every way uniform with its predecessor, and the price is the same—viz., 4s. 6d. net.

THE BODLEY HEAD, LONDON, AND NEW YORK.

JOHN LANE.

THE NOVEL OF THE WEEK.*

It is interesting to turn now and again to our cousins, the Norse peoples, and see what they are thinking and feeling in their corner of Europe, safely shut out from the speed and roar and restless strife of life in our European centres of industry. And when we read such a novel as Madame Alvide Prydz's, which depicts the flow of quiet currents of life in a little Norwegian harbour, we see how mysterious and richly fascinating Europe and the South appear to the Norse imagination. Thus, Irmild Myrland, the Norwegian girl, is shown us as lying still in her little sailing-boat, dreaming of its drifting away on the tide, anywhere—to London, to the land of Spain! anywhere from Haero, where nothing ever happened, with its shrill voices of the sea-birds and its gleaming ground swells, while "far out were the ships going to the South, to the South . . . to sail, perhaps, round the world." And in these stories of modern Norse life, as in many of Ibsen's works, the hero is the weary travelled man who returns to his native place after years of wandering, bringing with him the relics and souvenirs of his romantic passages in Europe, a strand of a woman's hair, a piece of oriental drapery, a Spanish knife, an intaglio, "a little piece of Italy," something that speaks to the Norse imagination of to-day the same language that the loot of Europe spoke to the Viking imagination twelve hundred years ago. It is interesting also to compare the ideals, in character and conduct, of our Norse cousins with our own, and to note how, at back, they correspond. All that Peer Gynt knows that he is not is his ideal; and the figure of the heroine, Gunvor, in "The Heart of the Northern Sea," which is an embodiment of the virtues that we English prize most, stands, so to say, as a bridge where the two peoples can meet, and feel racially as one.

Gunvor Haero is the daughter of the proud Haero family, one of those old families in which the vigour of the race remains alive in the women long after it had gone to seed in the men. Her dead father has encumbered the estate and brought shame on the family, but it is Fru Elin and Gunvor, the daughter, who uphold its dignity, and set to work with brave hearts to develop and superintend the growing trade in fish at Haero, by which the debts are finally cleared off. Gunvor is engaged to Sven Torgersen, the hedonistic young doctor, and nothing could be cleverer than the way in which the author brings out the contrast between the man and woman's fundamental ideas and ideals. Gunvor is Torgersen's "rigid, northerly, cold conscience," regal and severe, and he is always telling her that though her eyes look at him so mildly, "there is a rigid earnestness lurking behind their soft greyness." Torgersen has lately come home from a long holiday in Italy, and instead of settling down resolutely to work, as he had promised, he is determined to make use of the few chances of enjoyment that still remain to him. An epidemic has broken out in one of the villages, but Torgersen, whose conscience is always in the most excellent order, explains that it is a pity not to get some salmon fishing, now it is at their doors, for the fish wont wait, and the sick people can always be got hold of afterwards. The effect of Gunvor's strenuous nature on her lover's temperament is admirably conveyed. Everywhere his open character and imperturbable good nature win him friends. It costs nothing to him to give presents, for the next minute he had forgotten all about it. "At the same time he would accept the greatest sacrifice without thinking at all of the cost to the person who had made it." "He had got into the habit, especially in later years, of taking things easily, and going through life without burdens, and he throve on those principles." And he explains to Gunvor, smilingly, that if he doesn't keep his promises, it is her fault. With great truth he tells her that it is "her terrible thoroughness that is to blame." "Yes, your terrible thoroughness, Gunvor. One always finds you yourself behind your words. It is as if you had already done it when you say a thing." And this wearies him. And, little by little, Gunvor, who knows that Torgersen loves her, comes to recognise that there is not the same joy for her in intimacy with him as before, and that something is developing in him which makes the difference between them greater. But when he analyses these differences, and tells her that in his opinion a person's grandest qualities can become so overpowering that they are positively faults, Gunvor, woman-like, turns to him and says, "Only tell me that you love me!"

The development of the story traces for us in a masterly way how Torgersen, though his marriage with Gunvor is near at hand, is seduced by the restless exciting charm of the wilful and odd girl, Irmild, and how despite his hidden antipathy for her, she begins "to bind his senses and absorb his will." He feels a sensation of feebleness before her gliding elusiveness, her furtive searching glances, her flexible movements, her strange capriciousness and her voice "that sounded like the enticing call of a bird." "Her young uncurbed will asserted itself, and claimed its desire with the same proud right as the lilies of the field," and Torgersen recognises that when he is near her he can no longer answer for himself. And yet, it is against his will too! He doesn't wish to succumb . . . but he does. In a very fine and subtle passage the author paints the scene between the two when Torgersen finds himself quite helpless before Irmild. "And when her mouth kissed him, he had a sense of something giving way, and falling to pieces inside him. She was like a wave that came, and dragged him down with her into the depths." It is most true to life that Irmild should be represented as adoring and worshipping Gunvor all the time that she is unconsciously charming away Torgersen. And Torgersen's reflections, when he is deceiving his betrothed, are analysed also with the skill of an unerring psychologist. He decides to tell Gunvor what has happened. He has so high an idea of her that he is sure she will understand it. He felt he loved Gunvor simply unspeakably, and when sitting by her, she made him realise how much he loved everything pure and true. But . . . he does not tell Gunvor, and it is she who detects the amour, and breaks off her marriage. Torgersen is forced to marry Irmild quickly. And Gunvor "manages everything at the wedding, which is celebrated in the handsomest way. The neighbouring ladies are baffled by Gunvor's air of friendliness to her old lover, but the Haero family was always annoying in that way; they always looked as though nothing had happened."

We have not space here to allude to the other persons of the story, nor to dwell upon Madame Prydz's really remarkable gift of catching and delicately recording the finest emotions of personal contact. Her work excels as a most sensitive register of woman's confused and tremulous sensations before man. In a page or so the authoress can suggest the delicate germination of sexual fascination, and foreshadow the inevitable course that the relations of a man and woman will take. There is in the atmosphere a haunting suggestiveness of Norse mysticism, and the strange capricious eeriness of the hero Falck's dreamings recalls the music of Grieg. The novel is quite national in its blend of realism shot with the wildest fantasy of mood, and we are grateful to Miss Tyra Engdahl and Miss Jessie Rew, who have put it into English.

SIENA AND HER ARTISTS.*

THIS volume is half a guide-book to Siena and half a disquisition on the painters and craftsmen who helped to make it famous. Siennese art, from Duccio di Buoninsegna onwards, was isolated from the Italian Renaissance; it remained in its own channel, and that was more in sympathy with Byzantium than with Rome or Florence. Yet it was not a stationary art. It developed while it remained true to its conservative traditions, and its greatest names—Duccio, Jacopo della Quercia, and the brothers Lorenzetti, for instance—bear witness to the strength of its development. Ultimately, of course, Siena fell under the influence of the other centres of Italian culture, but it required the coming of Pinturicchio to paint the frescoes of the Piccolomini Library, before the machinery that was to convert Siennese art into Umbrian could be set in motion. In his description of the town Mr. Seymour gives us no new facts, nor does he rise above the average literary level, and his style elsewhere inclines to a rather dangerous hilarity in its obvious effort to be light.

* "The Heart of the Northern Sea." By Alvide Prydz. Translated from the Norwegian by Tyra Engdahl and Jessie Rew. George Allen. 5s. net.

* "Siena and her Artists." By Frederick H. H. Seymour. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 6s. net.

Mr. Eveleigh Nash's New BooksA Book of Real Importance.—By Major Martin Hume.

NOW READY.—18s. net.

The Court of Philip IV.

By MARTIN HUME,

Author of "The Wives of Henry VIII.," &c.

It is the true inner history of the Court of Philip IV. of Spain that Major Martin Hume now tells for the first time, from sources largely manuscript and all contemporary, hitherto unused for the purpose by English writers. Major Hume has been at work on this new book for many years, and if you wish to avoid weeks of waiting to read the work, you should order it now from your bookseller or librarian.

A CLASSIC—NEW EDITION.—10s. 6d. net.Santa Teresa:*Being Some Account of her Life and Times.

By GABRIELA CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM.

This is one of the greatest biographies in the language, and is not only a Life of the Saint, but presents a magnificent picture of the times in which she lived. No library can be complete without this book.

IN GREAT DEMAND.—With 50 Illustrations, 21s. net.

Queer Things About Persia.

By EUSTACHE DE LOREY.

Formerly of the Legation of France at the Court of Persia,

And DOUGLAS SLADEN,

Author of "Queer Things About Japan," &c.

The Spectator says: "If you want to know the Persian as he is, read M. Eustache de Lorey, from whose dictation Mr. Douglas Sladen has presented us with a fascinating and most instructive book."

NOW READY.—Demy 8vo, with Portraits, 15s. net.

George Sand & her Lovers.

By FRANCIS GRIBBLE,

Author of "Madame de Staël and her Lovers."

Mr. Francis Gribble's new volume will throw fresh light upon one of the most romantic chapters in modern literary history. It is strange that no full and adequate biography of George Sand exists in any language. Mr. Gribble's qualifications for the task are many, and his book on "Madame de Staël and her Lovers" is alone a sufficient guarantee that his treatment of the subject will be both romantic and interesting.

FOUR NEW NOVELS.—Price 6s.

At all Booksellers and Libraries throughout the Kingdom.

Second Large Impression in Preparation.

A FINE NOVEL.THE WONDROUS WIFE.

By CHARLES MARRIOTT,

Author of "Mrs. Alemere's Elopement," &c.

Daily Chronicle.—"Shall we call it the wondrous book! It is really exceptionally clever."

Times.—"There are few living novelists who show signs of thinking out things so broadly and independently as Mr. Marriott in this book. The characters are full of life."

A DRAMATIC STORY.JULIAN REVAL.

By P. LAURENCE OLIPHANT,

Author of "The River of Vengeance," &c.

The hero of this novel is a man of magnetic personality and mystery. A fugitive from Russia, he comes to London, and at once draws into the toils of conspiracy those with whom he comes in contact. The long arm of the Tsar's Government is stretched out against him, and the weapon with which it strikes is a jealous woman.

AN ABSORBING ROMANCE.A WOMAN FROM THE SEA.

By J. BLOUNDELLE-BURTON,

Author of "Knighthood's Flower," &c.

Mr. Bloundelle-Burton always gives his readers a book which they must read to a finish. This is a story of the days when the National Convention declared war on England and withdrew its Ambassador.

THE PLOTTERS OF PEKING.

By CARLTON DAWE,

Author of "Her Highness's Secretary," &c.

The doings of Edward Clandon during his residence in China earned for him the title of "the Emperor's Watchdog." He moved in illustrious circles, and his friendship with the Emperor led him into many exciting situations.

LONDON: EVELEIGH NASH, 32, BEDFORD STREET.

POETS' COUNTRY

Edited by ANDREW LANG. 2Is. net.

This beautiful Colour Book contains Reproductions of 50 Drawings by Mr. F. S. Walker, who has visited and portrayed scenes familiar to the poets. "A deeply interesting book that brings before the mind the scenes in which our great poets moved, the very atmosphere which they breathed, and the surroundings which inspired their genius to its noblest efforts. Mr. Lang and his collaborateurs deserve heartiest congratulations on the perfection of their work."—The OUTLOOK.

ROMANCE OF EMPIRE

A NEW SERIES, giving the Romantic Story of Empire-building. The First Volume Ready.

CANADA By BECKLES WILLSON.

6s. net.

With 12 Coloured Illustrations by Henry Sandham. "Every chapter is overflowing with adventure from the time of Cartier to Louis Riel. The illustrations in colour are well done, and in themselves will secure a ready welcome for the volume by the young reader who relishes his romance none the less because it is fact and not fiction."—

The SATURDAY REVIEW.

Messrs. Jack have pleasure in announcing

A NEW WAVERLEY

These volumes are printed in the same type as the Edinburgh Waverley, and each contains a complete novel. Each novel is illustrated by 12 Reproductions in Colour of Original Drawings by a selected artist. Mr. Clement Shorter writes in the SPHERE:—"Undoubtedly the best edition of Scott now obtainable." The volumes now ready are:—IVANHOE, 12 Illustrations by Maurice Grieffenhagen. KENILWORTH, 12 Illustrations by H. J. Ford. THE TALISMAN, 12 Illustrations by S. H. Vedder. Square 8vo, 6s. net per volume.

GEORGE III. as MAN, MONARCH, and STATESMAN.

By BECKLES WILLSON. 12s. 6d. net.

This work, which extends to 600 pages, and includes 25 interesting Illustrations, presents the man and the period in a distinctly new light. "A well-written, well-illustrated, well-produced book on a subject which commands the interest of many readers."—

DAILY NEWS.

London: T. C. & E. C. JACK,
16, Henrietta Street, W.C.; and Edinburgh.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

THE second volume of the "Memoirs of the Comtesse de Boigne" (Heinemann, 10s. net.) deals with the years from 1815 to 1819. Like the first volume, which we noticed some months ago, it contains a number of piquant anecdotes, related in a vivacious and agreeable style. The author's stay in London as daughter of the French ambassador gave her an excellent opportunity for drawing comparisons between English and French manners and social life. This she does with great shrewdness and a certain amount of sarcasm. Her reflections on the English divorce system and the payment of £12,000 damages by Lord Bective to Lord George Beresford, and her criticism of the system of holding large receptions at extraordinarily late hours, have just that spice of malice that makes entertaining reading. She was also struck by the independence of the English character, and attributes it to the equality of all Englishmen in the eyes of the law. "In passing through a village one may often hear a man upon his cottage doorstep say to his little daughter, 'Curtsey to your betters, Betsy.' But this man would never admit any superior to himself upon a point where his legal rights were in question. He can apply to the law for protection against the county lord by whom he may think himself injured, or for a summons against a neighbour with whom he has quarrelled in a public-house. This confidence that the law will protect him in every department of life forms the basis of that feeling of independence whence is born that self-respect which marks the free man."

* * *

THE man-eaters who form the subject of Colonel Patterson's "The Man-Eaters of Tsavo" (Macmillan, 7s. 6d. net) were two lions who for nine months carried on a war against the men employed in building the Uganda railway. They actually succeeded on one occasion in putting a complete stop to the railway works for three weeks. Colonel Patterson at last shot them, but not before they had killed and eaten many men engaged upon the railway works. Mr. F. C. Selous writes a short introduction to the book, in which he says that no lion story he has ever heard or read equals in its long-sustained and dramatic interest the story of the Tsavo man-eaters, as told by Colonel Patterson. There are besides a number of thrilling adventures with man-eating lions in various parts of the world, all told in a quiet and convincing style.

* * *

WE note with pleasure the issue of a second and cheaper edition of Judge Madden's "The Diary of Master William Silence: A Study of Shakespeare and of Elizabethan Sport" (Longman, 6s. 6d. net.). The first edition appeared ten years ago, and at once attracted the notice of Shakespearean students throughout the country. Judge Madden's plan of gathering together the different references to field sports in Shakespeare's works, and illustrating them by passages from Elizabethan books upon hunting, hawk-ing, and so forth, was a very happy one, and the way in which he carried it out deserves the highest praise. His claim that Shakespeare's knowledge of wood-craft and falconry may be a factor in determining the text of some controverted passages is certainly justified, although his view of the authority of the First Folio—a view shared by Mr. H. H. Furness, who adopts the First Folio as the text of his great Variorum Edition—will hardly command general assent. Every student of Shakespeare owes a debt to Judge Madden for his delightful and scholarly piece of work.

* * *

IN "The Pirates of Malabar" (Smith, Elder, 6s. net.), Colonel Biddulph deals with a side of Indian history upon which singularly little has been written. We generally think of the West rather than of the East Indies when we speak of the pirates and freebooters of the sea, forgetting that, as Colonel Biddulph says, "Hardly had the last of the buccaneers disappeared from the Western seas, when a more lawless race of rovers appeared, who extended their operations into the Indian Ocean." The enormous loss to commerce caused by the operations of those "free traders" may be indicated by the fact that one of them, Bartholomew Roberts, captured eleven ships in a single day, and is supposed to have destroyed four hundred trading vessels in three years. Colonel Biddulph gives a history of Indian piracy from the time of the early Dutch and Portuguese pirates in the first half of the seventeenth century to the destruction of the Angrian fleet and the capture of Gheriah by Clive. The accounts of the different expeditions sent against the pirates form an interesting chapter of naval history, and the descriptions of some of the sea fights show that Colonel Biddulph has an eye for the details which give vividness to such narratives. The concluding chapter relates the remarkable adventures of an Englishwoman, Mrs. Gyfford, who sailed for India in 1709, became the heroine of many romantic and exciting adventures, and finally brought an action in the Court of Chancery against the East India Company, the result of which, unfortunately, is not given in Colonel Biddulph's book.

* * *

"FORTY YEARS IN PARIS," by W. F. Loneragan (Fisher Unwin, 10s. 6d. net.) is a disappointing book. Mr. Loneragan was for many years a correspondent of the "Daily Telegraph," and in carrying on his journalistic work he had many opportunities of meeting Parisians famous in the world of art and letters, as well as in politics. But although great names figure in his book, he has little of value to tell us about any of them. Victor Hugo, he says, he never met and never wished to meet, regarding him as "one of the overrated and over-boomed category of celebrities." After such a judgment the reader may expect to find that Mr. Loneragan's sense of proportion is at fault. He writes at length about obscure persons whose doings might well have remained unchronicled, and passes over many of the really great men in a couple of sentences. He is better when giving his reminiscences of the political world of Paris, but here, too, we miss those personal touches and anecdotes which are the only excuse for such a volume. More interesting than the letterpress are portraits of the distinguished men mentioned in the book. There are thirty-two of them, and they are all well reproduced.

* * *

THE latest batch of additions to "Everyman's Library" (Dent, 1s. net. each volume) maintains the high standard of that admirable series. The collection now numbers more than two hundred and sixty volumes, all carefully chosen, and in many cases containing critical introductions of distinct value. Among the more notable of the books recently issued are the first two volumes of a set of "Hakluyt's Voyages," with a capital introduction describing Elizabethan ships and seamen by Mr. John Masefield; "The Early Romances in Prose and Verse of William Morris," edited by Mr. Alfred Noyes; a selection from John Bright's speeches, with a preface by Mr. Joseph Sturge; a revised edition of Galton's "Inquiries into Human Faculty and its Development"; a version in blank verse of "The Eclogues and Georgics of Virgil," by Mr. F. T. Royds; an edition of Shelley's "Poems"; a reprint of Harvey's "Motion of the Heart and Blood"; and the Bible and Apocrypha in four volumes, with an introduction by the Rev. R. Bruce Taylor. Fiction is represented by ten volumes of Dickens, to each of which Mr. G. K. Chesterton contributes a characteristic preface, and Mrs. Oliphant's "Salem Chapel." The latter volume has a very able appreciation of Mrs. Oliphant and of her relation to modern Nonconformity by Dr. Robertson Nicoll.

* * *

MR. GUERBER describes his book on "The Myths of Greece and Rome" (Harrap, 7s. 6d. net.) as having a two-fold aim, "first, to present outlines of the stories in a simple form, pleasurable to the reader who has no desire further than to obtain a general knowledge of the myths, or to be entertained; and, second, to furnish a practical guide for the student who wishes to prosecute his mythological studies." He is to be congratulated on the successful way in which both these aims have been accomplished. The stories are well told, and the arrangement of the book is admirable. Indeed, we know no other book in which the classical myths are treated with such a combination of accurate scholarship, simplicity, and literary skill. The book should prove a mine of delight for young people or others who have not yet made the acquaintance of Greek and Roman mythology. The quotations from the English poets and the large number of reproductions of pictures by famous artists add considerably to its value.

THE COURT THEATRE, 1904-1907.

A CRITICISM and COMMENTARY by DESMOND MacCARTHY. 2s. 6d. net.

MAX BEERBOHM in the "Saturday Review" says:—

"When Mr. MacCarthy was writing weekly criticisms, I always turned to him as to one by whom an austere sobriety of judgment was surprisingly expressed in terms of youthful ardour. In this book he is as ardent as ever, and as just; and his appreciation of Mr. Shaw as dramatist seems to me both the most suggestive and the soundest that has been done yet."

"The Court Theatre—that is, the Court Theatre as it was under the management of Messrs. Vedrenne and Barker—well deserves such commentary as this which Mr. Desmond MacCarthy has given it."—Daily Mail.

"A very interesting work which should find a place in every dramatic library. I do but voice the opinion of other old Courtiers when I say we are all of us very much obliged to Mr. MacCarthy for his intelligent anticipation, and to Mr. Bullen for the attractive form in which he has presented it."—CARADOS in the Referee.

"Mr. Desmond MacCarthy writes the history of the venture in a thoroughly critical spirit. . . . Much that he says about Mr. Bernard Shaw's plays will rank amongst the best criticism which that somewhat over-eulogised playwright has had to encounter. . . . A useful collection of play-bills adds to the value of the volume as a work of reference."—Telegraph.

"The chief virtue of these pages . . . is their historical comprehensiveness. A finely critical examination of a dramatic reformation."—Evening Standard.

"EXHILARATING"—"AMUSING"—"INTERESTING." THE LOG OF THE 'BLUE DRAGON,'

1902-1904. By C. C. LYNAM, M.A., with a Coloured Frontispiece and many Illustrations and Maps.

Large Medium 8vo, 6s. net.

"There are remarkably few yachtsmen who can write an interesting log—we say it who should know. . . . Almost invariably the fault is a lack of human interest, and it is the presence of this salient quality that makes 'The Log of the 'Blue Dragon' such a delightful reading."—The Yachting and Boating Monthly.

"To find most things 'ripping' was the holiday humour of all who sailed in the 'Blue Dragon,' and it is that spirit which makes this Log so attractive."—The Daily Chronicle.

"Artless and wholly delightful."—The Morning Leader. "Full of charm."—Spectator. "Replete with incident."—Queen. "The book is crammed full of high spirits and the enjoyment of life."—The Evening Standard. "A readable book on yachting is enough of a rarity to justify us in congratulating Mr. Lynam on having produced one. . . . We can recall no other book directly comparable with 'The Log of the 'Blue Dragon'."—Athenæum.

A. H. BULLEN, 47, GREAT RUSSELL STREET, W.C.

TWO HUNDRED & FIFTY GUINEAS.

THE LITERARY AGENCY OF LONDON is instructed by a London Publishing House to offer the sum of £262 10s. for the BEST FIRST NOVEL.

MR. ANDREW LANG, MR. W. L. COURTNEY, and MR. CLEMENT SHORTER have consented to act as Final Adjudicators.—Applications, which must be accompanied by a stamped and addressed envelope for particulars, are to be addressed to

THE LITERARY AGENCY OF LONDON,
5, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW.

OCTOBER, 1907. No. 422. Price 6s.

- | | |
|---|--|
| 1. SIGNS OF THE TIMES IN INDIA. | 5. THE BAGHDAD RAILWAY. |
| 2. HENRY VIII. AND THE ENGLISH REFORMATION. | 6. ROME AND THE REPRESENTATION OF THOUGHT. |
| 3. SIR GEORGE CLARKE AND FORTIFICATION. | 7. AN INTERPRETER OF JAPAN. |
| 4. LA CAMPAGNE MARITIME DE 1805. | 8. HIBERNIA IMPACATA. |
| | 9. PALERMO. |
| | 10. A LAST WORD ON THE PEELITES. |
- LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., 39, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

Pp. 776. Portrait and Memoir. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. post free.

COMPENDIUM OF SWEDENBORG'S THEOLOGICAL WRITINGS.

"Because Swedenborg has written so much, many who are strangers to his works are deterred from making their acquaintance from not knowing what to select and where to begin. This work contains the most important passages, arranged under heads, so as to present a complete and authoritative exposition of what he taught."

London: SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury Street.

OCCULTISM and COMMON-SENSE

On MONDAY NEXT, October 21,

The Westminster Gazette

will begin the publication of a series of twelve articles which are the result of an inquiry by an impartial investigator into the phenomena usually called "psychical." The subject will be dealt with on the following plan:

Science and the "Supernatural"—The Induced Hypnotic Trance—Phantasms of the Living—Dreams—Hallucinations—Phantasms of the Dead.

* * * The twelve papers containing these articles will be sent as they are published to any address inland by post for 1s. 6d.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE, Tudor Street, London, E.C.

THE NEW AGE: An Independent Socialist Review of Politics, Literature and Art.

Edited by A. R. ORAGE and HOLBROOK JACKSON.

EVERY THURSDAY: ONE PENNY.

Write for Specimen Copy to MANAGER, 1 & 2, TOOK COURT, E.C.

MR. R. B. HALDANE AND "PUBLIC OPINION."

THE Right Hon. R. B. Haldane, M.P., Secretary for War, has addressed the following letter to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION:—

WAR OFFICE, 1st October, 1907.

Dear Mr. Parker,

I think that in the new form of "Public Opinion" under your editorship, you do well to make prominent what is concrete and living in the shape of the opinions maturely formed of men who are trying to do the work of the nation and of journalists the standard of whose criticism is high. What interests people is that which is expressed in a concrete form and has in it the touch of humanity. The views of strenuous spirits and the criticisms of really competent critics given in their own words comply with this condition. Your paper will succeed if it can only keep up to this standard, and I think you have brought it on to the right lines.

Yours faithfully,

R. B. HALDANE.

Percy L. Parker, Esq.,

Office of "Public Opinion,"

Temple House, Tallis Street, E.C.

PUBLIC OPINION.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF CURRENT THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY.
TWO PENCE WEEKLY.

Post free to any part of the World, 13/- Yearly, or 10/10 for the United Kingdom.

The Week in the City.

It has not been at all a comfortable week for financiers. To begin with, the news of the illness of the aged Emperor of Austria upset the bourses of continental Europe, and more than counterbalanced the favourable impression produced by the unexpected settlement of the long-vexed financial arrangement, or Ausgleich, between Austria and Hungary. It seems that the refusal of the Hungarians to come to terms had led to heavy selling of Hungarian securities in foreign markets, and that the change of tone in Budapest was due to financial embarrassment and apprehension. The prolongation of Francis Joseph's life has been a great blessing. Now that the Ausgleich has been arranged and the Austrian franchise reformed, there is much less need to regard the succession of Prince Ferdinand with anxiety. His clerical and anti-Magyar prejudices have probably been softened and rationalised in the last few years. Then again, the heavy losses of speculators in copper and low-class securities have led to a crisis in Amsterdam, and on Thursday it was reported that a large and old-established firm in Hamburg had failed, and that the losses will be seriously felt in Germany. Wall Street also is in a rather parlous plight, though, as one financier put it, speculators who have not been killed by a fall from the 40th floor to the fourth will probably survive a further drop to the basement. In London there is every reason to believe that the structure of credit is substantially sound. Much has been said about the difficulties caused by the failure of underground railway finance; but the losses (though great) are probably much exaggerated by rumour. The same is true of the Manchester Bank, which is supposed to have been involved in Egyptian losses, and also in over-free lending on American securities. I understand, however, that an amalgamation has been arranged which will put matters right. It is a good sign that Consols have stood so firm of late, and it is generally anticipated here (in view of the much greater strength of the Bank Reserve now than last year at this time) that the Bank Rate will not go higher than five per cent. The Home Railway Market is still distressed by fear of a strike; but there is reason to believe that the Board of Trade will be successful in its efforts to avert such a calamity. American securities are still on the down grade, and it is generally believed that want of ready money will soon compel most of the companies to cut down their dividends. The Mexican dividend of 5½ per cent. on the Second Preference was wonderfully good, but nevertheless both the Second Preference and the Ordinary fell sharply on the announcement. This, I think, shows how little buoyancy and how little floating capital there is to play with just now.

TRADE, PRICES, AND LABOUR.

Perhaps the first distinct evidence of an actual recession in trade here in England (in line with the retrogression in America and on the Continent) is provided by the monthly memorandum of labour statistics issued by the Board of Trade for September. In the 273 trade unions (with a total membership of 631,241) which enter into this return, the unemployed percentage was 4·6, as compared with 3·8 for September a year ago, and 4 in August 1907. Coal mining benefited by the boom in prices, and the textile industries were also better even than a year ago; but the shipbuilding and engineering trades were less active, while the building and furnishing trades drooped. The building trade suffers especially from dear money, and has never recovered from the depression that followed the Boer War. The furnishing trades complain that many of their best customers have transferred the funds they formerly used for furnishing and decorating to the purchase and upkeep of motor cars. The increase of unemployment just before the approach of winter is a very unwelcome sign, especially when it is accompanied by a rise in the price of wheat and bread to the highest point it has touched for many years. As usual, wheat has dragged after it many other foods, and the poor man's grocery bill is likely to be seriously swollen for some time to come. The country that will be worst hit is Germany. There has been a bad crop of cereals, and the deficit is reported to be much larger than ever before. In fact, the sharp advance in grain prices during the last few weeks is put down largely to the very heavy imports into Germany. This means that the Germans will have to pay full tariff duty on all the grain consumed there, whether grown or imported, and as the duties were made much heavier by the late tariff, it is safe to predict that much suffering and discontent will ensue. When I was in Germany a short time ago, I met some scientific Protectionists, including one or two Professors who are consulted by the Government. They admitted that the tariff on food imports had been raised to an undue height, in order to satisfy the agrarian party.

RAILWAYS IN CHINA.

A new book on "Railway Enterprise in China" has just been published by Messrs. Edward Arnold. The author is Mr. Percy H. Kent, an Oxford man, who had a legal training, and went out to China a few years ago. He has made admirable use of his opportunities, which have been large; for he acknowledges valuable assistance from some of the leading authorities on finance and railway administration in Peking, Tientsin, and Shanghai. Some of the maps that illustrate the book have been revised by Mr. A. G. Cox of the Imperial Railways of North China. The story of the various lines is told in a business-like, matter-of-fact way, with an occasional gleam of humour and side remarks that show the writer to have got a good insight into the ways of Chinamen and Chinese officials. One tale of the Woosung road, the first railway in China, and how it was at length bought and the rails uprooted by the Chinese Government in 1877, is very well told. The engines and rolling stock were conveyed, however, to the island of Formosa, where the Chinese Governor Ting was known to favour the introduction of railways.

There is a good description of Formosa and of the building of this line. The Chinese indulged in many costly economies, such as tunnel-making without drains or props. One of their economies, however, the choice of wood instead of iron for a railway bridge over the Tamsui river, "served them well," as Mr. Kent says. The Tamsui bridge was completed in 1889. But it "lasted out their time and came to no harm until a year or so after the Japanese occupation, when it was washed away by a freshet." The completeness of Mr. Kent's work will recommend it to those who are at all interested in what is probably the best field now open to railway enterprise. After describing the Kaiping tramway and railway administration, the author reviews the Imperial Railways of North China and the Chinese Eastern Railway from 1890 to the present day. "The Battle for Concessions," which began between foreign promoters after the War between China and Japan. The legal character of these so-called "concessions" is carefully considered and defined, and then follow chapters on the Peking-Hankow and Hankow-Canton Railways, on the Peking Syndicate, the Yangtse Valley System, the German railway rights in Shantung, the French railway rights in South China, and a number of other projected or partly constructed lines. Mr. Kent may be warmly congratulated on having produced the standard authority on a subject of immense commercial and financial interest. His last chapter of conclusions is full of good sense, and quite free from the superior or insolent tone that too often marks English books on Eastern subjects. The practical question just now is, he says, how to secure foreign capital without encroaching on Chinese sovereignty; and the answer is to be found in a study of the Imperial Railways of North China. But for this I must refer my readers to the book itself.

LUCELLUM.

A CHEAPER edition of Captain Percy Scott's "Voyage of the Discovery" (Smith, Elder & Co. 2 vols. 10s. net.) will be welcomed by those to whom the price of the work in its original form, 42s., was prohibitive. Captain Scott's story of the South Polar Expedition received such cordial and unanimous praise when it appeared that to further commend it would be "wasteful and ridiculous excess." The book is worthy of the achievements it records and of the brave men who achieved them.

Cadbury's Cocoa is unequalled for nourishment, purity, and strength. An invaluable food. A delicious and healthful drink.

Cadbury's is essentially the purest cocoa, made amidst the purest surroundings in England's Garden Factory at Bournville.

The pipe that clears today of past regrets and future fears

Omar Khayyam (modernised).

is a pipe filled with

Player's Navy Mixture

A Tobacco of Matchless Charm.

Sold in Two Strengths:

MILD, 5d.
per oz.

MEDIUM, 4½d.
per oz.

John Player & Sons,
Nottingham, will forward
Testing Samples
post free to applicants mentioning this paper.

0442

OCTOBER IS THE GREAT MONTH
OF THE YEAR FOR NEW BOOKS,
AND PARTICULARS OF THOSE
FORTHCOMING WILL BE FOUND IN
THE OCTOBER "BOOK MONTHLY,"
NOW READY, 6d. NET. ITS VARIED,
INFORMING, AND EMINENTLY
READABLE CONTENTS INCLUDE
AN ARTICLE BY MR. G. K. CHES-
TERTON ON "LITERARY LONDON."

The OCTOBER "BOOK MONTHLY" begins a New Annual Volume, so now is the time to order the Magazine. The publishers, SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London, will send a specimen copy of the current number on receipt of 2d. to cover postage.

Suction Gas Power.

80% REDUCTION
OF YOUR GAS ENGINE
GAS BILL.

TANGYES Ltd., Birmingham.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

BORD'S PIANOS

Illustrated
Lists of the
"BORD"

Pianos will be sent free, showing prices and rates
of hire of the various Models, on the THREE YEARS' SYSTEM, from 15s. per month. Second-hand, from 10s. 6d. per month.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

The "BECHSTEIN" Pianos may also be had on the same system, at advantageous prices and terms.

LIBERAL DISCOUNT FOR CASH.

CHAS. STILES & CO.,

74 and 76, Southampton Row, London, W.C.
PIANOS EXCHANGED.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout,
Bathrooms on every Floor,
Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard
and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplage. "The English Home."ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.*THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

BOOKSELLERS.

SPECIAL NOTICE TO LARGE BIBLE BUYERS,
CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS, SCHOOLS, &c.THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C., are offering 5,000 BIBLES also VICTORIAN PRAYER BOOKS
at HALF-PRICE.

ILLUSTRATED BIBLES from 1s.

LISTS SENT POST FREE.

TELEPHONE: CENTRAL 329.

A. LIONEL ISAACS, 5, Pall Mall, S.W.
(CARLTON HOTEL BUILDING).

Choice Books.
Rare Autographs and MSS.
Pictures and Prints.

CATALOGUES ISSUED.

TELEPHONE: 1784 CENTRAL.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold
and Exchanged.THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.
(And at READING.)

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

MISCELLANEOUS.

CURIO BARGAINS.—All those desirous of securing
Curios and Antiques at bargain prices, should visit the London Opinion Curio Club, 107, Regent Street, London, W. Terms of membership on application to the Secretary, 107, Regent Street, W.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc.
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.BOURNEMOUTH.*THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; ModerateSILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. weekBRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.
BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.BRIGHTON.*THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.BUXTON.*ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.CHINGFORD, ESSEX.*ROYAL FOREST HOTEL. Mr. John Brill.DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.*THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.DEAL.*BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.EASTBOURNE.*CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.EXETER.*DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.*THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.HENLEY-ON-THAMES.*RED LICN HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.ILFRACOMBE.*COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.LEEDS.*HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.LLANELLY.*CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.MALDON.*TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill. C. Simons, Manager.MALVERN.*HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.MANCHESTER.*THE PRINCES CAFE. Oxford Street.THE DEANS GATE HOTEL. Deansgate.MATLOCK.*SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).OXFORD (near).*SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. LecturePENTRE.*PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.PLYMOUTH.*GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.PORTSMOUTH.*SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.SOUTHSEA.*STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.SWANAGE."CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.TEIGNMOUTH.*REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.WHITBY.*WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.*WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

COUNTY OF LONDON.

The London County Council invites applications for the under-mentioned posts:—

(1) ASSISTANT WOMAN LECTURER in History at the Clapham Day Training College, Cedars Road, Clapham. The Salary will commence at £130 a year, and rise by annual increments of £10, to £170 a year.

(2) HISTORY MISTRESS in the Peckham Secondary School. The commencing salary attaching to the post will be £120 a year, rising by annual increments of £10, subject to satisfactory service, to £220 a year.

A commencing salary higher than that stated above will be allowed if the successful applicant has had satisfactory experience, and in this connection two years' satisfactory service in a school approved by the Council for the purpose will be counted as the equivalent of one year spent in one of the Council's schools, provided that (1) experience of less than two years in any one school shall not be reckoned, and (2) not more than ten years' outside service in all shall be taken into account.

Applications should be made on Form T.S. 56, to be obtained, together with particulars of the appointment, from the Clerk of the Council, Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C., to whom they must be returned not later than 11 a.m., on November 5th, 1907, in the case of (1), and November 14th, 1907, in the case of (2).

Applications for the above posts must be accompanied by copies of three testimonials of recent date.

Candidates applying through the post for the form of application should enclose a stamped and addressed envelope.

Canvassing, either directly or indirectly, will be held to be a disqualification for employment.

Full particulars of appointments in the Council's service are published in the "London County Council Gazette," which can be obtained from the Council's Publishers, Messrs. P. S. King & Son, 2 and 4, Great Smith Street, Westminster, S.W., price (including postage), 1½d. an issue, or, for the year, a prepaid subscription of 6s. 6d.

G. L. GOMME,
Clerk of the London County Council.

Education Offices,
Victoria Embankment, W.C.,
October 17th, 1907.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

Boys from this PUBLIC SCHOOL have done well at the Universities.

The School stands in its own grounds of about 45 acres, high above the town and the Thames Valley.

For Honours List, Prospectus, particulars of Scholarships, and other information, apply to the Headmaster, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School.

HASLEMERE, SURREY.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS. Sandy soil; nine acres of ground; nearly 600 ft. above sea level.

Principals: Miss AMY KEMP, Camb. Certif. for Theory and Practice of Teaching (St. George's Training College, Edinburgh); Diploma for the Teaching of German (Berlin); and Miss HELEN T. NEILD, M.A. (Vict.), Classical Tripos (Camb.), Certificated Student of Girton College; 11 years at the Mount School, York.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS AT END OF EVERY TERM.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,
R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.

Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

LECTURES.

Lectures on Art and Architecture

FOR EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS AND SCHOOLS,

By ERNEST RADFORD, LL.M., CANTAB., formerly Secretary of the Arts and Crafts Exhibition.

Mr. Radford has recently Lectured for the Education Department of the London County Council.

For terms and particulars of Courses and Single Lectures kindly apply to the Lecturer, 1, Portland Villas, Hampstead, N.W.

TYPEWRITING. — Typewriting of every description.

High-class work, reasonable charges, prompt, accurate.

E. G. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. By Post, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION, INCLUDING POSTAGE,

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

Telephone No: Gerrard 4035.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—Neale's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Carl Johans Gade, 41 and 43.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Capetown—Messrs. Gordon and Gotch; Messrs. J. C. Juta and Co.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.	Narrow Column. ½ PAGE
Back Page, or Page facing matter ... }	£10 0 0	£5 10 0	£3 0 0	£3 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 10 0	2 10 0	3 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:

13 Insertions ...	8d. per line.
52 " ...	6d. "

FROM

Messrs. CHATTO & WINDUS'S LIST.

Prospectuses of any or all of the following Series will be sent post free on application, viz. :—
 THE MEDICI SERIES OF COLOURED REPRODUCTIONS AFTER THE OLD MASTERS. | THE KING'S CLASSICS. | BIBLIOTHECA ROMANICA.
 THE NEW MEDIAEVAL LIBRARY. | THE SHAKESPEARE LIBRARY (INCLUDING THE ST. MARTIN'S LIBRARY.
 THE SHAKESPEARE CLASSICS). | AUTHORS FOR THE POCKET.

PART I. NOW READY; PART II. READY DECEMBER 1.

Early Painters of the Netherlands from the Van Eyck to Pieter Breughel, the Elder.

By POL DE MONT, Director of the Royal Museum, Antwerp. With 50 Reproductions after the Original Paintings selected by the Author.

Early German Painters from Meister Wilhelm, of Cologne, to Adam Elsheimer.

By MAX FRIEDLANDER, Director of the Kaiser-Friedrich Museum, Berlin. With 50 Reproductions in Coloured Collotype after the Original Paintings selected by the Author. The price of both the above works is £50 net; or ten payments of £5 5s. net.

Italian Painters of the Quattrocento and Cinquecento.

By WILHELM BODE, General Director of the Royal Museums, Berlin. With 75 Reproductions in Coloured Collotype after the Original Paintings selected by the Author. £75 net; or fifteen payments of £5 5s. net.

Messrs. CHATTO & WINDUS, in announcing the above important volumes, have the privilege of first introducing to the English public the results of yet another advance in modern colour-printing.

While in no way desiring to create the impression that these volumes are mere albums of pictures, however fine—they are, indeed, serious critical works written by three of the first modern critics, each a specialist in his subject—the Publishers may justifiably draw particular attention to the splendid series of coloured reproductions accompanying each publication.

Full particulars, together with method of publication, &c., will be found in an Illustrated Prospectus which will be sent post free on application.

THE MEDICI SERIES OF COLOURED REPRODUCTIONS AFTER THE OLD MASTERS.

The Burlington Magazine says:—"Nothing of the kind so good or so cheap has ever before been offered to the public."
 The Connoisseur says:—"A degree of perfection has been reached which, up to now, seemed beyond the scope of mechanical processes. These plates retain the subtlest gradations of colour and the most delicate touches of the brush . . . in short, the nearest approach to perfection that has been achieved."

READY, NOVEMBER 1.

VI. Lorenzo Di Credi. THE ANNUNCIATION, after the Painting in tempera on wooden panel, Uffizi Gallery, Florence. Colour Surface, 17½ by 12 in. 15s. net.

READY SHORTLY.

VII. Filippino Lippi. (?) THE VIRGIN IN ADORATION, after the Painting in tempera on wooden panel, purchased in 1903 by the Uffizi Gallery, Florence. Colour Surface, 19½ by 15 in. Size of Oriental Picture, 39 by 30 in. 15s. net.

VIII. Botticelli. THE BIRTH OF VENUS, after the Painting in tempera on wooden panel, Uffizi Gallery, Florence. Colour Surface, 36 by 21½ in. 25s. net.

The following Plate, which is just ready, is reproduced by the Medici Process; but it is not published in the Medici Series, as the plate has had details painted out.

Lippi-Filippo. THE VIRGIN, after the Painting in tempera on wooden panel, Uffizi Gallery, Florence, of the Virgin, the Child, St. John, and an Angel. Colour Surface 13½ by 10 in. Size of Original, 36 by 24 in. 10s. 6d. net.

Inland Postage (Great Britain), 6d. per plate, except Nos. IV. and VIII., which are 9d. Foreign Postages double these amounts.

TUSCAN FEASTS AND TUSCAN FRIENDS.

By DOROTHY NEVILLE LEES. With 12 Reproductions after Photographs of typical Tuscan Scenes. Cloth. Special Binding Design 5s. net.

Times.—"This is no usual travel book, still less a guide-book, but chapters written with a good deal of charm about the author's life in an old-world Tuscan villa. . . . Throughout, she reveals a mind readily receptive of the impressions of the Italian country, its customs, its simple life, its associations, and its scenery."

WOMEN OF FLORENCE: A Study of their Influence on Florentine History during and prior to the Cinquecento.

Translated from the Italian of Professor Isidoro del Lungo by MARY G. STEGMANN, with an Introduction by Dr. Guido Biagi. With 2 Plates in four-colour and 24 in Half-tone. Extra crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net; parchment, 10s. 6d. net.

CAIRO, JERUSALEM, AND DAMASCUS: Three Chief Cities of the Egyptian Sultans.

By D. S. MARGOLIOUTH, D.Litt., Laudian Professor of Arabic in the University of Oxford. Fully Illustrated in Colour after Water-Colour Drawings by W. S. S. TYRWHITT, R.B.A., with additional Plates after Paintings by REGINALD BARRATT, A.R.W.S., and from Line Drawings. Large fcap 4to, gilt top, 20s. net. Also 105 Large-Paper Copies, Crown 4to, full parchment, the Plates mounted, 42s. net.

Uniform with "Stories of the Italian Artists from Vasari."

ARTISTS OF THE ITALIAN RENAISSANCE: Being Stories of the Italian Artists of the Renaissance, as set forth by VASARI, RIDOLFI, LANZI, and the CHRONICLERS. Collected and Arranged by E. L. SEELEY. With 8 Four-colour Plates and 24 in Half-tone. Large crown 8vo., red buckram, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

Also a SPECIAL EDITION on pure rag paper, with 4 extra Four-colour Plates, the Half-tones printed in two tints and a special Frontispiece, engraved upon Wood and printed in Colours after the Madonna im grünen (Vienna) by Raphael. Small 4to, parchment, gilt top, 15s. net; vellum, 20s. net; red polished morocco (to order), 30s. net.

NEW BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

ALICE IN WONDERLAND. By LEWIS CARROLL.

From the latest copyright text, by special permission of Messrs. Macmillan & Co., Ltd. With 12 Coloured and many Line Illustrations by MILLICENT SOWERBY. Extra crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, with special binding design and end-papers printed in gold, 5s. net.

THE BED-TIME BOOK. By HELEN H. WHITNEY.

With many illustrations in three and two colours by JESSIE W. SMITH. Royal quarto (12½ by 11 in.), art canvas back, picture sides, and designed end-papers, 5s. net.

Unlike Miss SOWERBY, whose paintings are almost miniatures in their finish, Mrs. WHITNEY's brush moves in bold lines. Her earlier books have shown her power to please young and old alike; her present volume surpasses them alike in the charm and in the technical excellence of the drawings.

THE CHILD-LOVER'S CALENDAR. With Illustrations in colours by AMELIA BAUERLE. Small 8vo, 1s. net.

THE STORY OF SCRAGGLES. By G. W. JAMES.

Small crown 8vo, cloth, with 6 Half-tone Illustrations, after Drawings and Photographs, 2s. 6d.

This book, relating the history of a sparrow sadly injured by a fall from the nest, which was found and cared for by its finder, a Professor, is a book which cannot fail to appeal as fully to all children of to-day as did "The Story of the Robins" to an older generation.

CHILDHOOD: Being Twelve Days from our Youth.

Pictured in Colours by MILLICENT SOWERBY, and written in verse by GITHA SOWERBY. Half-bound decorated boards and designed end-papers printed in gold, the text printed in two colours, and with some 30 illustrations in the text. 7½ by 9½ in. 3s. 6d. net.

BUMBLETOES: Being their Adventures with Belinda and the Buttons Boy.

Pictured in Twelve Scenes by MILLICENT SOWERBY, and written in verse by GITHA SOWERBY. Decorated boards and title, tinted end-papers, the 12 scenes in colour and 18 further illustrations in the text. 5½ by 7 in. 1s. 6d. net.

NEW FICTION.

Copper Under the Gold. By E. F. ALMAZ. 6s.

The Pagan Woman. By NORMA LORIMER. 6s.

The Cable-Man. By WEATHERBY CHESNEY. 6s.

The Conqueress. By GEORGES OHNET. 6s.

Shakespeare's Sweetheart. By SARAH H. STERLING. 6s.

The City of Pleasure. By ARNOLD BENNETT. 6s.

Lord Cammarleigh's Secret. By ROY HORNIMAN. 6s.

Vanity. By PAUL and VICTOR MARGUERITE. 6s.

The Windfall. By CHARLES EGBERT CRADDOCK. 6s.

The Inevitable Law. By F. E. PENNY. 6s.

My Lady of Whims. By FLORENCE WARDEN. 6s.

The Mystery of Mary Anne. By GEORGE R. SIMS. 3s. 6d.

Three Speeds Forward. By LLOYD OSBOURNE. 3s. 6s.

Daphne: A Pastoral of Italy. By MARGARET SHERWOOD. 3s. 6s.

CHATTO & WINDUS, III, St. Martin's Lane, London, W.C.

The Nation

VOL. II., No. 4.]

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1907.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1d.]

CONTENTS.

PAGE	PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK ... 105	LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—	Ireland and Liberalism. By
The Only Way Out ... 108	"A Protestant Elector" ... 121
The Impatience of the Idealist 109	The Case for Women's Suffrage. By Christabel Pankhurst ... 121
Women in Industry ... 110	"Socialism in Liberalism." By "A Liberal of the Centre" 121
Invention and Progress ... 111	"Tyrants of the Road." By "Quercus Robur," D. K. Auchterlonie, and J. Leng Sturrock ... 122
LIFE AND LETTERS:—	A Censored Play. By Joseph A. Leckie and Maurice G. Holmes ... 123
The Old Order. By John Galworthy ... 113	"Casa Blanca: The French Case." By Douglas Fox Pitt ... 123
The Uses of the Autumn Campaign ... 114	"The Cant of Militarism." By "A Civilian" ... 123
A November Pike ... 115	REVIEWS:—
THE DRAMA:—	Blake and the Imagination ... 124
Sarah Bernhardt's Secret ... 116	The Wise Men of the East ... 124
PRESENT-DAY PROBLEMS:—	Contemporary France ... 125
A Defence of Unlicensed Play- ing. By Professor Gilbert Murray ... 117	Living Sermons ... 125
OPEN QUESTIONS:—	Short Studies on Great Subjects ... 126
Is Socialism Tyranny? By J. A. H. ... 118	The Novel of the Week ... 128
POETRY:—	Books in Brief ... 130
My Garden. By Adeline Mary Bank ... 119	THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 131
THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 120
Books to be Read ... 120

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

It is extremely difficult here to realise the sudden panic that has seized on the well-to-do classes of New York, and it would require a volume to trace the train of antecedents that have led up to the catastrophe. Probably few honest Americans doubt in their heart of hearts that the highest Protective Tariff in the world, the mother of all the Trusts and most of the corruption, is the originating cause of all the mischief; for if that were removed, commercial morality would rise as the profits of commercial immorality declined. If, however, we search for proximate causes, we may find them in the action of Mr. Harriman and his associates a year or two back. That the directors of banking and other corporations should use the trust funds in their charge for the purpose of buying or selling stock exchange securities, in the rise or fall of which the directors are personally interested, would, we hope, be impossible on a large scale in any other civilised country. Since the Harriman disclosures, speculators in American stocks have slowly lost confidence, and the artificial stimulus which produced last year's boom having been removed, a stream of liquidation, sometimes interrupted only to be renewed with increased volume and violence, has been going on in all classes of American securities, regardless of dividends, traffic receipts, speeches, interviews, and all the devices and machinations of the bull party. The fact is, the people have lost confidence in the honesty of their commercial and financial magnates. Law-breaking has become a fine art.

* * *

THE beginning of the popular panic as distinct from the Stock Exchange collapse began on Tuesday, with the run on the Knickerbocker Trust Company. The Trust Companies in New York are powerful corporations which compete with the banks, and were, in fact, constituted in order to evade the Banking Law so as to earn larger profits by carrying smaller reserves. They attract the public by offering higher interest than the banks, and they have earned large dividends. The New York bankers dislike them, and will not be sorry if their wings are clipped. On Monday night the National Bank of Commerce informed the Clearing House Association that it would cease to clear for the Knickerbocker Trust Company. The President of the Trust Company (Barney) then resigned, and another (Higgins) was selected in his stead. The other Trust Company directors then met, and at 2 a.m. a director of the Knickerbocker Company declared (falsely) that the Trust Companies had agreed to lend his concern ten million dollars if required. The early morning saw crowds of anxious depositors collected at the doors of the four New York branches of the Knickerbocker Trust. The coolness and patience recommended by the officials were conspicuously absent. The best version by far of what happened has been given by the correspondent of the "Daily Telegraph." The Company, it appears, tried hard. Thousands of dollars were rushed to the branches from headquarters in the early hours of the morning, motor-cars, milk waggons, and all manner of vehicles being requisitioned to transport small stacks of paper money and bags of silver coin.

* * *

On the tellers' tables piles of money were heaped up in the hope that depositors would be satiated and confidence restored. At 9.30 a.m. the doors were open, and Mr. Joseph Brown, the chief cashier, put out a statement to the following effect: "We are prepared to pay out as rapidly as the people demand the money. We can keep on paying all day and not be in the least pressed." But the sight of lucky depositors going off in triumph, bulging with bank notes (some of which were snatched by thieves who plied their trade in the crowd), only inflamed the appetite of the rest. At twelve o'clock the Fifth Avenue Branch, where the biggest depositors were withdrawing, had come nearly to the end of its resources, and the officials then suddenly declared that they would no longer pay on certificates of deposit, but would insist on the five days' notice to which they were entitled. The same declaration was made soon after at the other branches; but the certificate-holders were pushed aside by the depositors with running accounts, and the withdrawals went on with unabated strength. At 12.30 the branches suspended payment, and the scene that followed must be described in the words of the "Daily Telegraph's" correspondent:—

"At that time the banking offices were besieged by panic-stricken throngs, many of whom had been ranged in line since early morning. The announcement of suspension was received with howls of rage. 'Give us back our dough,' they shouted. 'Dough,' in American vernacular, let me explain, corresponds to the English slang word 'brass'; hence 'dough day' at Tammany Hall is the day set apart for the distribution of dollars to the district leaders 'to enable them to collect the votes.'"

It is not easy to predict the immediate future. All we can say is that the American public is being severely punished, but not beyond its deserts, for the corruption of its politics, its commerce, and its finance.

* * *

THERE could be no clearer proof of the need of the conference between directors and trade unionist railway workers suggested by Mr. Bell to discuss the meaning of "recognition" than the manifesto issued by Lord

Claud Hamilton on Wednesday last. Lord Claud Hamilton puts the demand for recognition of the men's Societies as if it were the first step in a Socialist plot,—though it happens to be made by a leading anti-Socialist in the Labour Party—and suggests that once these Societies were recognised they would be used by Socialists as weapons for carrying on war against traders and manufacturers of every description. Even wider of the mark is his declaration that the companies, in refusing to recognise the unions are acting in the interests of the men, who “desire to be protected from the domination and tyranny of an irresponsible body.” If, as Lord Claud Hamilton declares, the great majority of the men are opposed to the trade unions, and the Great Eastern Railway, of which Lord Claud Hamilton is Chairman, has a smaller proportion of unionists than any other railway, why is it necessary for the directors to “protect” them by refusing to give any locus standi to societies likely to die of inanition? The statement of the considerate treatment given to its employees by the Great Eastern Railway will be read with satisfaction, but it has nothing to do with the present quarrel. The question at issue is simply whether the men, in dealing with these powerful corporations, for which Lord Claud Hamilton claims the most unfettered powers, must act in isolation, and without the advantage of trained minds to put their case effectively.

* * *

THE week has been fruitful in political speeches. On Saturday, Mr. Asquith, speaking at Ladybank, dealt with the relations, “actual or supposed,” between Liberalism and Socialism.” There was much in what was vaguely described and loosely denounced as the spread of Socialism which meant no more than this—that men's social vision was being enlarged, and their social conscience aroused. That this should be the case, far from being a matter of regret, was “one of the healthiest signs of the times.” But while admitting that “there was a large place for the collective and organised efforts of the community,” Mr. Asquith said that any gain accruing through a reconstruction of society on extreme Socialistic lines would be more than counterbalanced by liberty being “slowly but surely starved to death, and that with the superficial equality of fortunes and conditions, even if that could be attained, we should have the most startling despotism that the world has ever seen.”

* * *

At Arbroath, on Monday, Mr. John Morley defended his Indian policy in a speech of considerable length. Its literary form and phrasing were powerful and suggestive. Its tone showed that Mr. Morley has been pained by the criticisms of Professor Beesly and the Indian group in the House of Commons. These men he regards as “impatient idealists,” who say, “You admit that So-and-So is right. Why don't you do it now?” “Ah! how many of the most tragic miscarriages in human history have been due to the influence of the idealist?” “After all,” continued Mr. Morley, “you would not have me see men try to set the prairie on fire without arresting their hands. You would not thank me if I saw men smoking their pipes, political pipes or ordinary pipes, smoking pipes near powder magazines; you would not blame me, you would not call me an arch-coercionist if I said, ‘Away with the men, and away with the pipes.’” If the condition of India may be compared to a powder magazine, we still hope we may accept Mr. Morley's assurance, given a few minutes later, “that the situation is not at all dangerous, but it requires serious and urgent attention.” Mr. Morley thought that the educated Hindoos were “intoxicated with the ideas of freedom and nationality and self-government” owing to their reading of Milton, Burke, Macaulay, and John Stuart Mill—we might add, of the biographer of Burke and the friend of Mill.

THE Prime Minister, addressing his constituents at Dunfermline on Tuesday, reiterated the Government's determination “to put the relations of the two Houses on a business-like and statesmanlike footing,” and reaffirmed his belief that the truest Imperialism began at home. “What avails it to the real strength of the Empire if your people at home are weakened and demoralised and decimated by drunkenness, depopulation, bad housing, infant mortality, and ignorance? The day for soft phrases on these subjects has gone.” The Prime Minister is never at a loss for an apt quotation, and not the least happy thrust in an adroit speech was his application of lines to the Protectionist who masqueraded as a Tariff Reformer:

“A merchant to secure his treasure
Conveys it in a borrowed name.
Euphemia serves to grace my measure,
But Chloe is my real flame.”

* * *

LORD ROSEBERY's style resembles late Renaissance work—it is given to decorative exuberance. Speaking at Glasgow on Wednesday, in an after-luncheon speech, he described the Scottish Land Bill as “vicious,” “pregnant with malignant possibilities,” and meant as a “battering ram against the House of Lords”—which he advised to reject it a second time. The Government had stood on their “Irish leg in Scotland,” and where their “Scottish leg was, God alone knows.” They were trying artificially to create small holdings in Scotland where they had failed, and their method was contrary to Free Trade, which Lord Rosebery appears to identify with the purest form of individualism.

* * *

THE 8,700 clergy who signed the memorial presented by Lord Halifax to the Primate, inviting him to organise a passive resistance movement in opposition to the new marriage law, would do well to reflect upon the words used by the Bishop of Hereford in addressing his Diocesan Conference on Thursday last. Dr. Percival, who voted against the measure in the House of Lords, is prepared to work it now that it has become law, and he is keenly alive to the possibility that the action of the extremists on the question may precipitate Disestablishment. It is this claim of clericalism to reserve matters of doctrine and morals for the decision of the clerical order that “has led democracies to say that clericalism is the enemy; and it is a claim so lacking in Scriptural authority, and so fundamentally at variance with the principles of the Church of England . . . that it cannot be entertained by an educated people.” Every Churchman, he went on, who is inclined to join in the policy of upholding a Canon against the Statute Law of the Realm should ask himself if he is also prepared to advocate a policy of Disestablishment and Disendowment. “It must be clear, I think, to any intelligence,” added the Bishop, “that we cannot have it both ways.”

* * *

THE Primate's “letter” to the clergy and laity of his diocese, issued by Messrs. Macmillan, will, we are afraid, chiefly strike its readers, lay and clerical, as a study in moral anarchy. For Dr. Davidson, while describing marriages with a deceased wife's sister as “contrary to sound and sacred principle” (what “sacred principle”?) and declaring that they “ought to take place elsewhere than in Church,” suggests that those who contract themselves should not be debarred from Holy Communion, or refused Christian Burial. As if to emphasise his incapacity either to meet the moral or social difficulties of the problem, or to control any section of his clergy, extreme or moderate, the Primate specifies that he is tendering “advice,” and not issuing an “injunction,” and invites, or, at least, forestalls, disobedience by saying that he will not regard recalcitrant clergymen as “disloyal.” Finally, the Primate admits that the law of the Church—whatever that may be—is now, so far as Canon 99 is concerned, “contrariant” to the law of the realm, but does not say whether Convocation should now alter the Table of Kindred. Indeed, he expressly ignores the point of the fanatical Ritualists that these marriages are sinful, and allows the churches either to be open or shut to their solemnisation.

* * *

THE comments of the European Press on the work of the Hague Conference reveal a nearly unanimous disappointment, and it is those who least desire progress who express the least discontent. A review of actual progress achieved shows, indeed, a very meagre result. In the domain of arbitration, the Convention of 1899 was expanded from 61 to 94 Articles, which introduce a few improvements in procedure, but make no advance in principle. The Russian proposal, that the Powers should agree to refer disputes of fact to Commissions of Enquiry, was defeated with the aid of the English delegates, who would only consent to declare that such enquiries are useful. The only real advance towards the prevention of war was made by the adoption of the “Porter Proposition,” a variant of the “Drago Doctrine.” It lays down the principle that force may not be used by States to collect contractual debts from other States, until a Court of Arbitration, formed in accordance with the Hague procedure, shall have found for the creditor, assessed the amount of the debt, and prescribed the time and manner of payment. Force will henceforth be applicable only to a debtor who refuses arbitration, or disobeys the award. This, amid much failure, stands out as a solid and important advance, which raises a real barrier against aggressive financial Imperialism.

* * *

THE main work of the Conference lay in the regulation of naval warfare. A Convention on the rights and duties of neutrals, dealing in a spirit much too favourable to the rights of belligerents, with such questions as the duration of the stay of warships in neutral ports, has failed to satisfy our Government. A very conservative Convention, dealing with floating and anchored mines, of which the most important provision is that floating mines must become harmless within an hour after they are laid, was criticised by our delegates as an insufficient protection for neutral commerce using the main highways of trade; but Germany repudiates even these moderate restrictions, and claims the right to act as her individual officers see fit. More satisfactory is the prohibition of the naval bombardment of undefended places; but if such a town as Casa Blanca, with some antique walls and a few unusable guns is to be considered as a fortified place, the gain to humanity may be exaggerated. The main success in this department was the creation of an International Naval Prize Court, to sit at the Hague in time of war, with full rights to “make” law by its decisions. But as we do not accept the code which it will have to administer, our assent is doubtful.

* * *

THE larger issues before the Conference were, for the most part, dealt with in expressions of a pious aspiration. A Convention making arbitration obligatory in a few very minor fields, such as patent law and copyright, was wrecked by German opposition. A plan for the establishment of a Permanent Court of Arbitration was accepted in principle and recommended to the study of governments. It remains a mere project, because the Greater Powers could not agree to the claim of the South American Republics and the less civilised States to an absolute equality in the appointment of the judges. The opposition of England and France prevented any advance on the subject of the right of capture of private property at sea, save indeed that mails are recognised as inviolable even when mail-steamer are captured and confiscated. Our attitude on this question is cited by the German Press as its excuse for refusing to surrender the barbarous practice of laying floating mines. On the English proposition for a reduction of armaments no real debate took place, and the Conference contented itself with once more recommending the study of this question. Save for the acceptance, in a modified form, of the Drago doctrine, nothing has been achieved to make war less probable or armaments less burdensome.

* * *

EURIPIDES’ “Medea,” in Professor Gilbert Murray’s splendid translation, is being performed at the Savoy Theatre every Tuesday and Friday afternoon until November 15th. To say that the Savoy production is at all perfect would be ridiculous. For “Medea” a Sarah Bernhardt with Duse’s intellectual subtlety is required. Miss Edyth Olive works hard at her difficult task, but she is too sentimental, too modern, and not sufficiently daemonic. Mr. Hubert Carter is more successful in portraying the middle-aged man of the world drawn so realistically by Euripides. The difficulty of the choruses is overcome at the Savoy by rhythmical speech. That is better than Miss Florence Farr’s too modern melodic style of musical declamation, but it is not altogether satisfactory. The chorus, if it is not to use music and dance, should at least act with some sense of the tragedy of which it is the witness and the conscience.

* * *

MR. G. F. BODLEY, R.A., whose death occurred last Monday, was one of the few modern architects capable of infusing real life and meaning into the modern Gothic style of Church architecture. Possessed of great knowledge of Gothic models, he was never guilty of a slavish imitation of any one example; he realised full well that architectural design on the latter lines was tantamount to the creation of bodies without souls. His faculty lay rather in the application of Gothic principles to that species of design in which his instinct told him they were admissible, and his own individuality invariably had the last word. The Liverpool Cathedral, with which Mr. Bodley was so prominently connected, is not yet completed, but there are the new buildings at Magdalen College, Oxford, and many works of hardly less importance, to bear witness to his infinite taste and skill. Part of his success in architecture was probably due to his sympathy with and his practical proficiency in the allied arts. His grip of decorative draughtsmanship was secure; he was an accomplished and inventive draughtsman himself; a sincere love of music and a taste for poetry also belonged to him.

* * *

A POINTED memorial, urging the release of the Denshawai prisoners, has been published over an influential list of signatures, both literary and political. Sir Edward Grey’s reply is curt and unsatisfactory. It refers the petitioners to his speech on the Foreign Office vote. This speech urged no reason why the sentences imposed by an unconstitutional court in a moment of panic should be carried out. Indeed, it foreshadowed release, but urged that this measure of clemency must seem to be the spontaneous act of the Khedive’s Government. To this there are several answers. It is not for clemency but for justice that the petitioners ask. The sentence was more than harsh; it was a miscarriage of justice. It was not the Khedive, but the occupation authorities who managed the whole affair. And finally, if the fate of a number of peasants who were harshly and irregularly punished is to depend on the cessation of the agitation for their release, the justice of governments is made to depend on the indifference of peoples. If it is for silence in Egypt that Sir Edward Grey is waiting, he may wait indefinitely.

Politics and Affairs.

THE ONLY WAY OUT.

WE are not sure that, though Lord Claud Hamilton's manifesto on the railway crisis is clearly calculated, and, we suppose, intended to bring to naught the informal conference between the railway directors and the Board of Trade, the public will have reason to regret its appearance. For both in tone and in content, it represents a view about trade unionism and labour problems which we are sure that the great mass of the British nation regards as out of date. It is out of date, for example, to speak of trade unionism, only just re-established by the consent of both Houses of Parliament as a kind of State institution, not only as if it were inconsistent with industrial management and discipline, but as if it were identical with "domination and tyranny." It is not less absurd to identify it with Socialism, and to speak of Mr. Bell, the chief anti-Socialist in British trade unionism, as the engineer of a "deep-laid campaign" impelling the unions against "individualism and capital." Our "traders and manufacturers" are invited to mark this insidious plot and to help the railway companies to defeat it. But as almost every great staple industry in Great Britain, and almost every branch in such an industry, is well habituated to deal with trade unionism, and as in particular one railway company, whose prosperity is out of all proportion to that of the Great Eastern, has long conceded the claim which Lord Claud Hamilton denies, we do not expect an overwhelming response to his appeal. Indeed, we should have thought, speaking quite frankly, that the railway companies themselves might pause before unreservedly accepting Lord Claud Hamilton as their champion. Apart from a certain arrogance of tone and looseness of rhetoric, which suggest the politician rather than the man of business, railway directors not interested in the Great Eastern may well note Lord Claud's avowal of the special and separate position of his company. While he enlarges on the menace of trade unionism to the general interests of capital, he is careful to explain that a strike means very little to the Great Eastern Railway, because a very small proportion of its lines are served by members of the Amalgamated Society. Clearly this fact places Lord Claud and his fellow-directors on the G.E.R. in a position not merely of independence but of advantage. If a strike should come, his line would be able not only to maintain its own traffic, but to receive trade, especially Continental trade, which other lines, more fully supplied by trade union labour, would be unable to handle. It is easy to see how a rising port, like Harwich, would stand to gain by such a dislocation of railway business. We have no doubt that Lord Claud Hamilton is sincere in his hostility to Trade Unionism. But it is certainly true that, as in most of these great labour disputes, the interests of all the representatives of capital are by no means identical, and before this lamentable quarrel has gone much further the directors of some of our great industrial lines may have cause to regret the advocacy of the Chairman of the Railway Companies' Association.

But if the general body of railway directors and railway shareholders have no interest in satisfying Lord Claud Hamilton's dislike of Trade Unionism, the public have still smaller reason for gratifying it. For, if Lord Claud's method and tactics are adopted, and no power interferes in the interests of the community, a strike is inevitable, and, indeed, we have a right to assume that the directors have no great desire to avert it, and even that they regard it with complacency. But what does a strike mean? The threat of a railway strike in Italy—and a very partial, ill-advised, and almost universally reprobated threat it was—was enough to disorganise for some days the railway service in the southern provinces. But in Italy the railways are in the hands of the State, and almost immediately the entire force of public opinion, the disciplinary power of the Government over its servants, and the advice of the moderate sections in the Socialist and Trade Unionist camps, were available for bringing the incipient movement to a rapid conclusion. No such organised influence exists here. Mr. George's powers are already being exercised to their full extent, and we may rely upon it that so active and energetic a spirit will not under-value them. But, with us, the State does not possess the powers of control over the working of the railways which it wielded in Italy, through its central inspectorate, even in the days when the superseded companies were in existence and were running the system to its ruin. We may, therefore, assume, with the rally of the whole force of British Trade Unionism which such infatuate documents as Lord Claud Hamilton's manifesto are bringing into the field, that a railway strike will be a terribly effective weapon. And effective for what? At its worst for a state of physical misery and helplessness which even those well acquainted with the absolute dependence of a modern State on its railways can hardly realise. With the great English railways ceasing to run, or running with great difficulty and irregularity, no man's business or pleasure could well be safe from vexatious or tragic interruption. It was proposed, when the Italian strike was contemplated, to leave the service of the hospitals out of the sphere of interference by the strikers. No such distinction could, of course, have been observed. It would not be observed in England. But, supposing that the passenger services were fairly well maintained, the traffic in goods must suffer heavily. In other words, not only must British trade, in its thousand varieties, risk loss, delay, unemployment, disorganisation, but the companies would be unable to ensure the warming, lighting, and feeding of our great cities and urban centres, and the health of the children, patients, and weakling population.

Now, in a situation of this character we have one remark to make. We think it quite probable that, though the language and the claims of the railwaymen were even more moderate than they are—and they have been conspicuous for moderation—and though the attitude of the railway directors were more intolerant even than Lord Claud Hamilton's manifesto, the public would turn against the men under the intolerable strain produced by the sudden collapse of the great arteries of our railway system. But we are quite sure that it would turn with equal vehemence to the Government and call upon it, as with one voice, to put an end to the strike. The pressure to act would become irresistible; no Government that valued its life could resist it. But in these early days, we must remind that rather thoughtless entity, the man in the street, that there is and can be only one way of bringing to book our Bourbons of railway directors—and, if the public so regards them, our anarchs of railway workers—and that is by giving Mr. Lloyd George and his colleagues an ad hoc power of forcing a settlement of the dispute. The Board of Trade is, we are assured, prepared to go to the full length of its powers. But they are purely voluntary. They depend on goodwill where no goodwill exists or, apparently, can be implanted. Then the public will realise its complete powerlessness and that of its representatives in the Cabinet and in Parliament. The line of compulsory arbitration alone remains; and to that we must come, with the consent, we hope, of the trade unions, so far, at least, as this emergency case of the railways is concerned. But with their consent or without, we are not going to have the industrial and personal life of the nation disorganised and imperilled because a handful of obstinate and ill-informed men have honestly convinced themselves that trade unionism is a poison, years after it has fully entered into our commercial system.

THE "IMPATIENCE" OF THE IDEALIST.

MR. JOHN MORLEY speaks with great verve and brilliancy on India, and we shall certainly not blame him merely because he persists in informing Indian native opinion that he contemplates a modification rather than a vital change in our system of government. Such a word must be spoken in a time of turbulence; it is, if one may use the phrase, an interim word, only it must be clearly and emphatically uttered. But the statesman who speaks it must, of all men, be conscious of its very limited magic. English rule in India encounters three main difficulties. It is an alien rule conducted at enormous distance from the true centre of power, it is an unrepresentative rule, and it is not a very sympathetic rule. Nature has not so made the governing Englishman that he can employ the saving gift of tact to disguise or to soften the hard facts of political ascendancy. But there is a fourth difficulty, which, by a rather unhappy irony, rebounds with special force upon Mr. Morley himself, and that is that in the main the Indian movement of change and reform, at once temperate and intemperate, violent and reasonable, but fairly intelligent and watchful, bases itself largely on Liberal theories of government, and Mr. Morley's own animated and suggestive dealings with them. It is never pleasant to observe a fine mind placed in a hard situation, and, undoubtedly, the Indian situation is a hard one for Mr. Morley. He stands alone, separated from the native mind of India by thousands of miles of space and by the absence of any authoritative means of approach. His two chief advisers cannot be spoken to face to face, while they are closely involved, for every hour of the day, in the working of the great military and bureaucratic machine which they control. His visible counsellors are mainly the experienced inspectors of that machine, no longer in close touch with it. The only critical force is that of British Parliamentary democracy, which Mr. Morley praises for the wisdom and patience of its handling of the problem of Indian government. But British democracy is not merely patient; it is ignorant. It cannot possibly learn the facts about Indian coercion as fully, for example, as it has learnt the facts of Irish coercion. It must take much for granted. It must trust Mr. Morley for much, and hope for more.

But we confess our doubt as to whether, on the whole, it is quite satisfied with the Indian situation, or that it entirely follows Mr. Morley when, to use his own picturesque metaphor, he suggests that the case of Canada and the case of India differ as widely as the kind of dress that is suited to the two climates. Does Mr. Morley himself regard them as entirely disparate? Does he, with his wide knowledge of history, think that the capacity for government has left the East, once its chief centre, never to return? Even in these days the democratic code has not altogether ceased to run east of Suez, any more than, pace Mr. Kipling, the ten commandments fail to apply to the regions that gave them birth. It is surely true of India, as of Canada, that, on the whole, liberty is a good rather than a bad thing for men and societies, and that a conscientious Government, as we believe our government of India to be, should be strengthened by a continued and extended use of the methods which we Westerns adopt for teaching people how to govern themselves. Given these very moderate concessions to the validity of the movement in our East Indian possessions, we may very well bring Mr. Morley into evidence with his own account of the Anglo-Indian situation. Mr. Keir Hardie has been blamed for his speeches in India. But at least he joins Mr. Morley in declaring that the danger of a rising has been much exaggerated, and that the history of the agitation in Bengal and elsewhere has not been free from the suspicion of irritation and aggravation by an untrustworthy native police. Mr. Morley's testimony is, of course, much more authoritative. His view is that the occasion is not so much perilous as calling for urgent attention. Such a verdict places in their proper relations the two phases of Mr. Morley's policy. With the coercive part we hope that we have in the main parted for good; of the reforming part we hope we shall hear a good deal more. We know that judgment on the changes—on the character of the two native appointments to the Secretary of State's Council, on the value of the re-constitution of the Provincial and Advisory Councils—differs widely. We shall certainly not conclude that they are ineffective, or even reactionary, until a full trial has been made of them. But the fact that they have been proposed and carried through in a period of administrative stress is, we think, a testimony not merely to Mr. Morley's Liberalism, but to the necessities of our Indian policy. For if we are debarred from calling our rule representative, that is to say, from linking it on to our method of government at home, we cannot well protest that we have imposed on India a defensible system so long, for example, as we retain such patent abuses as the blending of the judicial and the executive power. Mr. Morley, we are sure, seeks to find some moral basis for our sovereignty in India, and that being his aim, he cannot complain if the men whom he calls "impatient idealists" remain dissatisfied even with the most powerful and appealing exposition of the material necessities of the military and bureaucratic situation. "We cannot leave India," says Mr. Morley in effect; "I decline to cable for Lord Kitchener's return, and I am sure the British people will not hear with patience the roar of confusion that would follow on such a message." Quite true; but on the other hand, democratic opinion would like to know that on the whole British Liberalism feels itself able to deal with a rather confused, ill-balanced, noisy, but not entirely unreasonable or untimely call for Home Rule in India in something of the spirit that it has applied to political agitation in Canada and in Ireland.

There is, indeed, a considerable body of reasons why, with great respect to Mr. Morley, we think the "idealist" should be "impatient" with the actual progress of the modern political world, and why the sympathetic statesman should not be impatient with him. Take the Hague Conference, which has closed, after sitting through the summer and autumn, without taking one serious step towards the advancement of international peace and disarmament—the two causes of its existence. It is difficult to see how any other result is possible so long as the discussion of questions which are essentially moral, that is to say, universal in their character, are entrusted to a body of men who concern themselves purely with material, i.e., with particular and immediate interests. We all know now what was, in the main, the objective of the diplomatists and experts who met at the Hague. It was to see that no disadvantage accrued to the Power they represented from the set of new facts which came to light in the course of the Russo-Japanese War, and that, if possible, the balance of mischief should be transferred to its rivals. The chief antagonists in this unfriendly game were Germany and England. On the whole, England lost, and Germany won. Germany, greatly to her discredit, has maintained the floating mine; England has refused to abandon the right of capture. The two Powers have neutralised each other's capacity for good, and, in the main, the hopes of peace must rest, for some years to come, less on combinations of Governments than on the progress of two irregular, anti-governmental, political movements among the peoples, Socialism and anti-militarism. These forces are not yet strong enough or interested enough to influence meetings like the Hague Conference, and the timid, disillusioned men who attend them. European democracy has hitherto despised the Conference, and preferred to menace the Governments that treat war as an irremovable feature of State life with the prospect that the new State armies will refuse to fight in an aggressive war. That is one of the reasons why we think modern progressive statesmen should be very slow to deprecate idealism in politics even when they think it "impatient" or untimely. If they are loth to satisfy ideas, ideas will not die. They will rather choose other ways of mastering events than through the medium of modern statesmanship.

WOMEN IN INDUSTRY.

DURING the last quarter of a century a considerable advance in wages and other conditions of employment has been made by almost every class of male wage-earner in this country. The progress of women workers, starting from a far lower level, has been slighter. As one after another the industries connected with the preparation of food and the making of clothes, and other articles of domestic use, have left the home and set up as independent factory trades, women have followed them, taking an ever larger share in the regular routine industrial life of the nation. Wholesale and retail commerce, the civil services, and the lower grades of the professions, have opened up new, large avenues of female employment, so that a very large proportion of the women of the nation are engaged in earning a livelihood by regular wage-work. In very few instances have they directly displaced male labour, very rarely are the two brought into direct competition. Women mostly undertake, under new conditions, work which was theirs before, or take some share in new industries which, from time to time, are created to satisfy new wants. But very little of this work is done under safe and satisfactory conditions. The general survey of women's sphere to-day as wage-earner shows that a very small percentage of women earn a wage sufficient to support them in independence, and full industrial efficiency, which, as regards hours of labour, sanitary and other hygienic conditions, their standard is, except in a few instances, definitely worse than that of the male workers of their class. It is impossible to read the speeches of delegates at the Conference of the Union of Women Workers, held this week at Manchester, without recognising that each separate problem of industrial life presses far more urgently upon the weaker sex. It may, indeed, be asserted, without fear of challenge, that the normal wage for an able-bodied woman worker is a "sweating" wage. The recent work of Messrs. Cadbury and Shand on women's work in Birmingham, corroborated from a score of other testimonials drawn from other towns, shows that a virtually unlimited amount of competent women workers can be got for factories and workshops at a wage of from ten to twelve shillings a week. Legions of shop hands and clerks are obtainable at wages very little above that figure, while the annals of the domestic workshop and of home industries mark no bottom to the degradation of the wage system as it presses on the weakest competitors.

The economic causes responsible for this plight are well known: the smaller normal efficiency of women, their fewer and less expensive "wants," the dominion of custom, inability to organise, want of technical instruction, the subsidisation of their wage from other sources, are separate and cumulative sources of weakness. Some of these defects seem well nigh incurable. Trade Unionism, which has done so much for men, apparently can do very little for women, except in certain textile and a few other special trades; organisation is most difficult precisely in those cases where it is needed most. Nor is it quite clear that technical instruction, however valuable for certain trade purposes, can very much avail to raise the general level of women's wages; for we find, in Birmingham and elsewhere, not a few instances of trades where considerable skill and experience have very little influence upon the rate of pay. It seems to be an established fact that the same level of skill and efficiency can be bought from women in the labour market at about half the price which must be paid to men. Two related facts lie at the root of the matter, the chronic oversupply of female labour for nearly all employments that are open to them, and the fact that, while a normal male wage is based on the presumption that it must support a family, the normal female wage presumes that its recipient is partly kept out of some male wage. If redress for the low wage of women is to be confined to the ordinary operation of economic forces, it can only operate by altering these facts. If the rising standard of the family wage, due mainly to the higher pay for men, induces the male earner to keep his wife and daughters at home, instead of allowing or encouraging them to supplement his wages, the excessive competition of women can be checked: to some extent, though not adequately, this check is active among the more self-respecting classes of skilled operatives. But so long as the independent woman wage-earner is confronted by the cut-throat competition of her subsidised sisters, her struggle must remain terribly acute, while the woman who has others to support besides herself has no ultimate escape from starvation save the poor-houses. Thrift, industry, and other personal virtues, are obviously impotent to deal with these deplorable conditions, nor can the scrupulosity of employers or private charity offer any sufficient remedy. Even if it be admitted that economic forces are gradually raising the industrial status of women, such movement is extremely slow, and meantime our whole social system is suffering in the physique and the morale of its members.

These are not merely the sufferings of weak individuals, they are diseases of the body politic. It is, therefore, natural enough that women, deprived of the efficacy of private co-operative action, should look for some measure of remedy to the larger co-operation of the State, of which, though not endowed with the formal rights of citizenship, they are real members. Wages Boards, to enforce upon all employers a minimum rate of wages, and other humane conditions of labour, constitute one of the proposals which is being widely canvassed, though we observe that the active spokesmen for women workers are not unanimous as to its efficacy. How far such Boards, already existing in our Australasian Colonies, can be successfully adapted to the more complex conditions of our city industries, is legitimate matter for debate, and we hope, for experiment. But seeing that one necessary effect of such a measure would certainly be the destruction of some of those low trades which are "morbid survivals" in our modern industrial system, and the forcible ejection of the workers engaged in them, many of whom could not find employment in the newly constituted trades, such a drastic interference could not stand alone. The low wages and long hours are inseparably connected with insecurity and insufficiency of employment. Any effective organic remedy, such as is proposed, therefore, brings up the root issue of unemployment. The adoption of Wages Boards, or of any other interference with the current system, involves a definite provision for the increased unemployment among women which it would entail. At present both our Unemployed Acts and our Old Age Pension schemes look more to the men than to the women workers. It should, however, be plainly recognised that any serious and vigorous attempt by new legislation, or otherwise, to tackle the grave problem of the deficient wages paid to women, not only in the so-styled sweated industries, but in many employments which would feel themselves insulted by the application of that term, can only be undertaken as part of a larger programme, which must include a sufficient public provision against unemployment among women.

INVENTION AND PROGRESS.

MANY years have passed since the principle of the storage of electrical energy was first introduced. Hailed at the time as opening a new epoch in mechanics, an epoch wherein we should exploit the energy of the great forces of Nature, harnessing rivers, tides, and winds, store their work, and distribute it at leisure, to use when and where we pleased, the principle has, in fact, had but a very limited application. In the course of the week, however, Mr. Edison has shown that he has been able to introduce improvements into the electrical storage battery which will make it available as an efficient and economical engine for motor traffic, and thereby bring the motor car within the reach of thousands who cannot now afford it. Mr. Edison is a sanguine man, and we should like to hear the verdict of some cold-blooded critic on the workings of his new device before committing ourselves to any prophecies. But taken in conjunction with the quite recent establishment of the regular Transatlantic wireless telegraphic service, and with the triumphs of the turbine in the "record" voyage of the "Lusitania," it does suggest reflections on that rapid march of invention, which for many people seems to be the be-all and end-all of progress.

The first great epoch of mechanical inventions extends, roughly speaking, over the last half of the eighteenth and the first half of the nineteenth century. This epoch covers the period of Watt, Fulton, Trevithick, and Stevenson; of Arkwright, Cartwright, and Hargreaves, of Volta, Faraday, Wheatstone, and Cooke. It witnessed the birth of the steam engine—as distinct from the “atmospheric” engines of an earlier period; its application to railways, and to navigation; the rise of the science of electricity and its application to telegraphy; and the transformation of the textile industries from hand to machine work. These changes, vast as they are, are but a fraction of the transformations effected within two or three generations of the first great age of applied science. Their effect upon the externals of life is still matter of everyday comment. All know that so far as the arts of life are concerned, the changes effected in that single century are greater than those of twenty or thirty centuries preceding. The increment of human power over external Nature was greater than anything that had been seen since the discovery of those primitive arts which gave man the command of fire, of the metals, and of spinning and weaving by hand. The invention of printing, of gunpowder, and of the mariner’s compass are perhaps the only discoveries of the intervening period that can challenge comparison with them, and those were scattered over many centuries, and the honour of them is divided among many peoples. Praise the great inventors of the Watts-Stevenson period as we may, we shall hardly over-estimate the greatness of their combined achievements.

With the perfection of the steam engine and the electric telegraph, there seemed for a moment to be a pause in the movement of invention. It seemed likely, at least, that the mechanical problems of the future would consist in a gradual development and extension of the fundamental inventions already in existence, and that the pace both of scientific discovery and of mechanical invention might be slackened. But in our own time this appears to be a mistaken view. We are witnessing a transformation of the externals of life more rapid and probably more far-reaching even than that which startled our great-grandfathers. The new applications of electricity, the perfection of the turbine, the introduction of internal-combustion engines, are once more revolutionising locomotion. The difference between the “Lusitania” and the “Great Western” is fairly comparable to that between the “Great Western” and the “clippers” that for a time held their own against steam. The telephone, from being a toy, has within a generation become a matter of everyday usage. What is more, the opening up of new fields of scientific research—and it is science which gives the stimulus and marks the limit of inventive activity—proceeds with even accelerated pace. The new physics reveal vistas of discovery as vast and as strange as those of the seventeenth century. There is every indication that the main work of the new century will lie not in following up and applying the ideas of an older generation, but in exploring fresh and undreamt-of fields of work. Far from approaching the end of physical discovery, we seem to have reached the horizon only to discover that the country beyond is vaster than that already traversed.

In all this there is much that is stimulating, much to strengthen hopes for the ultimate future and faith in the mission of humanity, much to suggest that the world is not old but young, that civilisation, far from being decadent, is rather in the first vigour of assured strength. But there is another side to the picture. The control of nature—the distinguishing feature of our civilisation as compared with all that has gone before—needs one condition only to make it a source of real happiness and essential betterment. But that condition is a hard one. To the control of physical nature needs to be added the control of human nature—or, if the phrase be preferred, of the social forces on which the life of humanity depends. Apart from such control, the gigantic forces liberated by mechanical invention may be useless or worse than useless to mankind. They may become engines of tyranny, enslaving the men who seem to use them. It was not without force that John Mill, writing at the end of the first great period which we have described, expressed a grave doubt whether all the machines yet invented had lightened the day’s toil of a single human being. Mill, of course, did not ignore the obvious fact that they had brought wealth to thousands, and treasures beyond the dreams of avarice to hundreds. But he meant that the gains of the few were overweighted in the scale by the economic depression of the many. This great inventive period was also for the country and the provinces, which were the special homes of invention, a period of perhaps the greatest economic misery that had been known since England settled down after the close of the invasions. The steam monster was an invader of happy homes and a destroyer of prosperous industry such as had hardly been known since the “harrying of the North.” War itself might produce a more acute but hardly so continuous and far-reaching a dislocation.

The social reform of the mid-Victorian age, Free Trade and the Factory Acts, came as a tardy remedy, and from that time onwards a new period of social progress began. Yet the social reformer may well sigh for a few years’ respite from mechanical improvements when he considers how far simpler it would be to achieve social progress with more stable industrial conditions. The democrat who finds political freedom nullified by the ever-extended power of concentrated capital, the economist who follows up the sources of taxable wealth only to find that they are changing during the very course of his investigation, might breathe a similar aspiration. We might conceivably solve the social problem if it were not for ever changing under our hands. For the bare question whether the indefinite progress of mechanical invention is necessarily good for society has hardly yet entered into the general consciousness. Here and there we have had futile denunciations of machinery at large. Now and again we hear laments over the decay of handicraft. We are tolerably familiar with denunciations of the depression of the artisan by the machine power. But of any organised attempt on the part of society to guide the progress of invention, to turn it to its own uses, to bend this vast increase of human power to the real service of humanity, modern history will show us scarcely a trace. We have not even begun to cope with the tragedy now repeated yearly for four generations of the skilled mechanic who finds himself thrust upon the street by the competing machine. All “vested” interests we compensate, but over this great human interest we shrug our shoulders, pay it the tribute of a passing sigh, and console ourselves with some phrase about the incidental drawbacks of the great march of progress. How little do we stay to ask ourselves whither this progress is taking us, whether it is really “progress”—forward movement—at all, or merely movement, random, undirected, or even in the wrong direction!

Life and Letters.

THE OLD ORDER.

THE motor cars were crossing the Downs to Goodwood races. Slowly they mounted, sending forth an oily reek, a jerky grinding sound; and a cloud of dust hung over the white road. Since ten o'clock they had been mounting, one by one, each freighted with the pale conquerors of time and space; each steely entrained, fiery lunged; each with a strenuous hurried soul. None paused on the top of the green heights, but with a convulsive shaking leaped and glided swiftly down; and the tooting of their valves and the whirring of their wheels spread on either hand along the hills.

But from the clump of beech trees on the very top nothing of their progress could be heard, and nothing seen, but the haze of dust trailing behind them like a hurried ghost.

Amongst the smooth grey beech stems of that grove were the pallid forms of sheep, and it was cool and still as in a temple. Outside the day was bright, and a hundred yards away in the hot sun, the shepherd of the sheep, an old bent man, in an ancient coat, was leaning on his stick. His brown face, all wrinkled like a walnut, was fringed round with a stubble of grey beard. He stood there very still, and waited to be spoken to.

"A fine day?"

"Aye, fine enough; a little sun won't do no harm. 'Twon't last!"

"How can you tell that?"

"Tell? I been upon these Downs for sixty year!"

"You must have seen some changes?"

He knelt upon one knee before he made reply.

"Changes in men—an' sheep!"

"And wages, too, I suppose; what were they when you were twenty?"

"Eight shillin' a week!"

"But living was surely more expensive?"

"So 'twas; the bread was mortal dear, I know, an' the flour that black! An' pie-crust, why! 'twas 'ard as wood."

"And what are wages now?"

"There's not a man about the Downs don't get his sixteen shillin'; some gets a pound, some more. . . . There they go! Shan't get 'em out now till tew o'clock!" His sheep, indeed, were slipping one by one into the grove of beech trees, where, in the pale light and cool, no flies tormented them. His little blue eyes seemed to rebuke his sheep because they would not feed the whole day long.

"It's cool in there. Some says that sheep is silly. 'Tain't so very much that they don't know."

"So you think the times have changed a lot?"

"Well! There's a mint more money in the country."

"And education?"

"Ah! Ejucation—'s far's I can see, they spends all day about it. Look at the railways, too, an' telegraphs! See! That's bound to make a difference."

"So, things are better, on the whole?"

He smiled.

"I was married at twenty on eight shillin' a week; you won't find 'em doin' such a thing as that these days—they want their comforts now. There's not the spirit of content about of forty or fifty year ago. All's for movin' away, an' goin' to the towns; an' when they get there, from what I've heard, they wishes they was back; but they don't never come."

There was no complaining in his voice; rather a matter-of-fact and slightly mocking tolerance.

"You'll see none now that live their lives up on the Downs an' never want to change. The more they get the more they want. They smell the money that these millioners is spendin'—seems to make 'em think they can do just anythin' s' long as they get some of it themselves. Times past, a man would do his job, an' never think because 'is master wus rich that he could cheat 'im; he gave a value for his wages, to keep well with 'imself. Now a man thinks that 'cos he's poor, 'e ought to ha' been rich, and goes about complainin', doin' just as little as he can. It's my belief they get their notions from the daily papers; hear too much of all that's goin' on—it unsettles them; they read about this Sawcialism, an' these millioners; it makes a pudden' in their 'eads. Look at the beer that's drunk about it. For one gallon that was drunk when I were young, there's twenty gallon now. The very sheep a' changed since I remember; not one o' them ewes you see before you there that isn't pedigree, and the care that's taken o' them! They'd have me think that men's improvin', too; richer they may be, but what's the yuse o' riches if your wants are bigger than your purse? A man's riches is the things 'e does without an' never misses."

Still crouching on his knee, he added:

"Ther' goes the last o' them; shan't get 'em out now till tew o'clock. One gone—all go."

And squatting down as though responsibility were at an end, he leaned one elbow on the grass, his eyes screwed up against the sun. And in his brown old face, with its myriad wrinkles and square chin, there was a queer contentment, as though approving the perversity of sheep.

"So riches don't consist in man's possessions, but in what he doesn't want? You are an enemy of progress?"

"These Downs don't change—'tis only man that changes; what good's he doin', that's what I ask—he's makin' wants as fast as ever 'e makes riches."

"Won't a time come when he will see that to be really rich his supply must be in excess of his demand? When he sees that, he will go on making riches, but control his wants."

He paused, to see if there were any meaning in such words, then answered:

"On these Downs I been, man an' boy, for sixty year."

"And are you happy?"

He wrinkled up his brows.

"What age d'you think I am? Seventy-six!"

"You look as if you'd live to be a hundred."

"Can't expect it. My 'ealth's good, though, 'cept for these."

All the fingers of both hands from the top joint to the tip were warped towards the thumb, like the wind-warped branches of a tree.

"Looks funny? I don't feel 'em, though; an' what you don't feel don't trouble you!"

"But what has caused it?"

"They tell me rheumatiz; I don't make nothin' of it. Where there's doctors there's disease."

"So, then, you think we make our ailments, too, as fast as we make remedies?"

He slowly passed his old gnarled hand over the short grass that was worn to the palms of the hand.

"My old missus had the doctor when she died. . . . See that dust? That's motor cars bringin' folks to Goodwood races. Wonderful quick travellin' things."

"A fine invention?"

"There's some believes in them. But if they folk weren't doin' everything, and goin' everywhere at once, ther'd be no need for them rampagin' motors."

"Have you ever been in one yourself?"

His little patient eyes began to twinkle mockingly. He shook his head.

"I'd like to get one here on a snowy winter's day, when ye've to find yer way by sound and smell; there's things up here they wouldn't make so free with. Downs'll be left when they're all gone. There's things no man can ride away from. . . . They say from London ye can get to anywhere. Never been off the Downs meself."

"But don't you ever feel you'd like to go?"

"There isn't not hardly one as knows what these Downs are. I see the young men growin' up, and off they go. I see folk comin' down, same as yourself, to look at 'em."

"And the Downs, what are they then?"

His little eyes, that saw so vastly better than my eyes, deepened in his walnut-coloured face. Fixed on those grey-green Downs, that reigned serene above the country spread below in all its little fields, and woods, and villages, they answered for him. It was long before he spoke:

"'Ealthiest spot in England! Talkin' you was of comfort; well, look at bacon—four times the price now that ever it was when I were young. And families—thirteen we 'ad, my missus and meself; but nowadays if they 'ave three or four it's as much as ever they'll put up with. The country's changed."

"Does that surprise you? When you came up here this morning the sun was just behind that clump of beech—it's travelled on since then!"

He looked at it.

"There's no puttin' of it back, I guess, if that's your meanin'? It were risin' then, an' now it's gone past noon."

"Joshua made the sun stand still; it was a great achievement."

"May well say that; won't never be done again, I'm thinkin'. And as to knowin' o' the time o' day, them ewes they know it better than ever humans do; at tew o'clock you'll see them comin' out again to feed."

"Ah! well, I must be getting on. Good-bye!"

His little eyes began to twinkle with a sort of friendly mockery.

"Ye're like the country, all for movin' on your way! Well, keep on, along the tops, ye can't make no mistake!"

He gave me his old gnarled hand, whose finger tips were all so strangely warped. Then, leaning on his stick, he fixed his eyes upon the beech grove where his ewes were lying in the cool.

Beyond him in the sun the hazy line of dust trailed across the grey-green Downs, and on the rising breeze came the far-off music of the motor cars.

JOHN GALSWORTHY.

THE USES OF THE AUTUMN CAMPAIGN.

PARTY politics aside, and regarded merely as an instrument of political education, the annual flood of speech-making which we call the autumn campaign is a great and valuable asset. It is doubtful whether any nation gets quite so good and so abundant an education in politics as the people of this country. Whether they profit by it as much as they should and might is another question. The fact remains that the ordinary Englishman's chances of receiving instruction from the fountain head on the public questions of the day are at least three or four times more numerous than the German's, perhaps double the Frenchman's, and beyond comparison greater than the American's. This is very largely due to the practice that at least once a year sends nearly every Member of Parliament on the tour of his constituency. Almost since Burke's time it has been our custom to regard these annual meetings between representatives and voters as one of the essential duties of public life in Britain. Their function in the general scheme of popular government has an importance it would be hard to exaggerate. Oratory, after all, is the most impressive, and in the long run the most adequate, way of educating the democracy. The fundamental reason why "correspondence colleges" are such poor things is that instruction doled out in writing is never so lasting and effectual as instruction by word of mouth. People remember what they hear far more firmly than what they read, and an electioneering agent who knew his business would far sooner have at his disposal one really good speaker than whole tons of "campaign literature." Even the Press, as an agent of political proselytism, has to yield in persuasiveness and influence to the orator. At the back of their minds people never quite forget that the journalist, however able, is, after all, but an outside critic or expounder, and that the actual guidance of affairs is in other hands. The Press emphasises and confirms rather than leads. But when a Member of Parliament speaks, he is deferred to as one having the authority of practical experience, and, as such, not only entitled but expected to point the way.

And on the whole the average British Member of Parliament is very well qualified for this task of giving the nation a lead. For one thing, he represents the intelligence of the electorate—far more adequately at any rate than French or Italian or Spanish Deputies or American Congressmen represent their countrymen. For another, he is naturally didactic. All Englishmen are. If they are not preaching themselves they like to listen to someone who is; and this is a characteristic that enormously contributes, both among the teachers and the taught, to the smooth working of the political curriculum. Our Parliamentary orators have their faults and shortcomings. They lack, as a rule, the flexibility of French speakers, the freshness, ease, and colloquial pungency of the Americans, the superb grace of the Spaniards. They are rarely well versed in the mechanics of their craft, and they often singularly fail to feel the pulse of the audience they are addressing. Foreigners declare that you may hear at Westminster more sound thoughts spoilt by a prosy and pointless way of putting them than in any Chamber in the world. Perhaps so. Americans especially complain of a note of pomposity and condescension in the bearing of Englishmen on public platforms. They say they address a popular audience as though they were professors lecturing a class. But these charges hint obliquely at what is the real strength of English oratory—its extreme practicality, its gift for exposition. The House itself never shows to better advantage than when hammering out the details of a Bill in Committee, and members carry from the House to the platform the habit of coming to close quarters with their subject. They excel in concrete précis work, and are not afraid of dry details in laying their case before the people. Their speeches have substance. They rarely generalise and are hardly ever florid or bombastic. Being party men, they, of course, exaggerate, try to make out that the second-best is the absolute best, and never deal quite honestly either with themselves or their audiences. But, on the whole, there is more argument in English public speaking and less "clap-trap," more sober reasoning and less appeal to prejudice, more attempts at practical elucidation and less casuistry, than in any country we know of.

These are qualities that are seen at their best during the autumn campaign. The circumstances that surround these annual meetings give them a special value. They are held at a time when electioneering is in abeyance, and when nothing worse than a merely human partisanship is required of the speaker. An M.P. who has no immediate need to worry about his seat may condescend to an impartiality that a candidate can hardly afford. He has no personal points to score, no opponent more formidable than a stray heckler to encounter, and no stress is put upon him to enforce more than the normal party view. And even that he need not press too eagerly, the average Englishman in his heart of hearts rather disliking political zealots. In short, he has a chance of treating the topics of the day with a clarity and breadth that neither Parliament nor the hustings quite compass. And the chance as often as not is admirably seized. The speeches made during the autumn campaign are, as a rule, far more informing than those which the same speaker delivers at election time or from the floor of the House. These meetings, again, fulfil another function of even greater moment. They help to concentrate attention on the actual work of administration and the broader aspects of policy. This is to render a most important service, for democracies everywhere are too apt to think that they have solved the problems of government when they elect one set of candidates to office in preference to another set. Too much thought is given to who is to do the work and too little to how it is being done, and the temptation is always a pressing one to regard the ballot-box not as a means to an end but as an end in itself. Against such an attitude towards politics and political questions the constant appearances of M.P.s on the platform is a sure preventive. It serves to put elections in their proper place, and makes the people see that success at the polls is of less consequence than efficiency in office. In other words, these meetings supply that incessant stream of criticism which is the condition of all satisfactory working of the democratic system. They keep the nation informed of the rights and wrongs of public questions, not spasmodically or for the purposes of a single election, but regularly and continuously. No one can carry on this work so fruitfully as the representatives of the people themselves, and in all countries where they have neglected or abandoned the duty of instructing the electorate, you find that fads and "crazes" flourish, and that politics have degenerated into mere problems of organisation, are controlled by caucuses, professionals, and machines, and are manipulated in the interests of cliques and bosses. The autumn campaign, as we have it in Britain, is at least a great saving-clause.

A NOVEMBER PIKE.

UNDER the willows, stripped of their leaves, except for a few fluttering pennons, the river runs full and deep and mellow. The sedges have died into every kind of bronze and golden glory, and below water a good part of the vegetation has yielded to the flood and got itself tucked out of sight or carried away. Right across the river a wall of gloomy bullrushes stands four feet deep in the water and never were neighboured by lesser weeds. Their shade swallows the yellow tone of the water, and gives us from where we stand a pool of deep, unfathomable steel. It is splashed into silver ripples as our sprat, thrown to catch a pike, falls gently in at the end of a taut line some thirty yards in length. The first cast of the season is often a perfect one, as the first visit to the golf links after a long rest produces a stroke that fills us with wonder. As we work the lure towards us on a long slant across the stream, we see it from the mind's eye flashing and hobbling like a wounded fish. We see also a great pike pivot round to watch its course, grinning at it with all his teeth and gathering his springs for a rush at the escaping prey. However, the flashing sprat comes home to us without that rush having been made.

Along the hollow bank guarded by alder trees, right across the broad reach rippled by a bit of wind, in and out the deep, dark trench between osier beds, round the perch-haunted "Swan's Neck" bend, swims the apparently adventurous sprat. The perch are game enough to worry the tail of the bait, which is not to-day guarded by a triangle, but nowhere except between the osiers is there a pike that happens to be in the mood for fight or feed. And when the solitary rise comes, it results only in a mere foot-long jack that we gladly release to grow big and fight a better battle another day. But this spinning with a two-handed greenheart rod is excellent practice for a far colder day than this. Some claim for rowing, others for walking, others for cycling, exercise that benefits the maximum number of our four hundred named muscles. Spinning, of course, includes walking, and it gives extra work besides for some muscles, including the important ones that clothe the lumbar region, as next day's stiffness abundantly shows. When we have gone a mile or two, we are amply inclined to rest and passively receive the benefits of a beautiful day.

Our stream occupies a mere trench in a valley that must once have been a river-bed more than a mile wide. Some of the greenest meadows in England stretch over the gentle slope that ends in hills barely a hundred feet higher than the centre of the valley. Then come snow-clad mountains, as they seem, really clouds moulded and lighted in an exquisite manner that extracts admiration though they are seen everywhere and every day just now. The zenith is clear, fleckless blue, yet there is no reason to suppose that the air overhead is clearer of vapour than that between us and the horizon. In fact, the clouds we see away there are, if anywhere, over the heads of some other people, who, nevertheless, like us, see blue sky. Those beautiful, curdlike, everchanging masses are only visions. So is the solitary beech blazing with splendour in the midst of a rising field. Field and beech are both visions. We can catch and analyse the blades of grass and the orange-scarlet leaves, as we can catch spots of the water that go to make up the clouds, but field and tree and cloud or mountain, as we see them, must disappear as we walk up to them. Rod and line and we ourselves are a little more real, or we think we are.

A big flight of plover passes from the invisibility of the blue to show every flying dot against the cloud peaks, to be lost again as they come between us and the sepia masses nearer the horizon, then to show like a snowstorm as they all turn their white breasts before sinking below the line of the hills. A mallard and two ducks rise with clangour from the reeds at our feet and fly off in a long sweep that may or may not become a complete circle.

Moorhens are clucking uneasily in the dark shadows beneath the osiers. A weasel, slipping eagerly through an outlying fringe of withered meadow-sweet, reveals sufficient cause for their anxiety. It is here that we saw in the summer a tiny moorhen disappear in a flurry of ripples as a pike, doubtless, came by a meal not found in his strictly regular bill of fare. The memory sets our sprat spinning with new hope, but we comb the suspected lair of the monster without tangible result.

Below the mill and lock, the river comes down in two streams, one scarcely running, for the mill is not working to-day, the other hastening in little waves that leap over one another in their haste to leave the wide pool behind the island. Oaks and a wild pear tree all in scarlet stand there, great blotches of indigo shadow caught in the yet well-foliaged branches of the former. Across them an insect flying in the sun traces a lazy golden line, for it is flying with the languor of almost its last day. We trace it to a hole almost at our feet, whence peers out the sleepy face of another wasp pretending to keep guard, as was done in summer days. We can poke a stick into the doorway, stamp overhead, and tickle the door-keeper with impunity. The great round cave down there is empty of wasp valuables, its paper cubicles sinking down into one shapeless, bulkless ruin. Overhead, the last brood of the buff-tip caterpillars are endeavouring to find food enough to enable them to get into chrysalis before the winter begins. Ten of them are eating at once almost the last leaf on the tree, and that little more than juiceless fibre. It has handed in its little store of starch to the community, and is being slowly but surely cut adrift by the bud that will take its place next year. And the buff-tips will be cast away in their youth, instances of Nature's carelessness of the individual, so long as the type is preserved.

From above the island, the broad pool shows white and vast. Here the green cloth of the meadow curves over to meet it, hiding caves in which the water voles and an occasional otter can drowse in dry security, their favourite element within reach at a spring. There the warm-tinted red willow shoots fling their reflection in the mirror and show that it is faintly lumped and streaked as it hurries through the narrowing channel at the lower end of the pool. The oaks from this sunny side are points of rosy light, partly by reason of their own tints, partly because the sun is westering. In the amber mass of their reflection, a bright harsh note is struck by our scarlet float travelling to and fro in little jerks as the captive gudgeon directs. For we have had to acknowledge our failure to-day in the art of spinning and are bidding for our pike in a less sportsmanlike way.

The pool is stirred on our side now and then by a little V-shaped wave running rapidly towards the shore, then turning and running obliquely out again. Evidently, the perch are on the feed, and it behoves certain small fry to be very much on the alert. Then, far out, towards the apron of falling water, two bright silver fish leap hurriedly to right and left, as some pike makes his rush at them from below. He does not deign to chase his prey as the perch do, but bides his time to make his rush again at them or some other quarry. Of course, we imagine him steering straight for the place where our lure awaits him. But we have so often imagined such a thing in vain that it is a matter for startled wonder when we see the scarlet float make a dive as though into an unfathomable depth. It is astonishing what depth a float seems to find under such circumstances, even in no more than a yard of water. The tautening of the tackle makes it dimly visible for an instant before the pike dashes off with the snap hook fast in his jaw. Twenty minutes' fight makes it clear that his lordship of the pool is at an end, though when he leaps up and tries to fall backward on the line, he strikes us as a monster of at least ten pounds. We will not say what the scales make of him. His weight is destined to vanish under that test as his silver and old ivory marked with splashes and stripes of deep olive green and the golden bronze of his gills vanish when the life goes out of him. So, much as he is to be admired when, an hour after dark, he is shown to those who had ordered his capture, none but ourselves can know the full glory of our October pike.

The Drama.

SARAH BERNHARDT'S SECRET.

SARDOU'S "La Sorcière," with which the great actress opened her season at the New Royalty Theatre, is poor, pretentious melodrama, tinselled over with glittering patches of theatrical effectiveness. It was designed for Sarah Bernhardt, and is played by her as if it were a great classic. No actor or actress could have written a piece better calculated to sound the full gamut of emotional acting. The musical playgoer is reminded of the fireworks of Paganini and other violinists and pianists who have written for their instruments. In a sense Sardou's "La Sorcière" is Sarah Bernhardt, and the play forms an appendix, as it were, to the volume of Memoirs just published.* Those memoirs give one the curious feeling that Sarah Bernhardt, a gifted creature in many directions, strong of will, imaginative and passionate, was never an artist. You may search in vain through these pages, crowded with the chronicles of quarrels with managers and actors, and of triumphs and failures, for any illuminating thought on her art or for any opinion on drama apart from herself. The great actress draws herself cleverly, it is true. She dramatises her childhood at a convent school—she acts over again the scenes of her examination at the Conservatoire, of her début at the Comédie Française, of the siege of Paris, of her first appearance in London, and of her exciting tour through America; she tells us how she was always prone to fits of violent temper almost amounting to madness, and we are given portraits of herself from childhood in all kinds of characters, and even in her coffin. We see her as sculptor and in her Paris home. Indeed, the memoirs leave nothing unsaid of Sarah Bernhardt as woman. Of Sarah Bernhardt as an artist they are practically silent. Yet that very silence is eloquent to those who have long known her style of playing.

The psychology of acting is a strange and complex affair. The general idea is that the more characters an actor can portray the finer artist he is. Some worthy playgoers will tell you, for instance, that Mr. Beerbohm Tree is a great actor because he has an extraordinary gift of making himself look like someone else, whereas that is only a question of make-up and of mimicry. In the old days actors did not have the advantage of elaborate make-up. The prints of Garrick in Shakespearian characters show us merely a clean-shaved, elderly man, with a mobile face and abnormal, bright eyes. He never troubled to look like a character, and in the well-known picture of himself as Macbeth, and Mrs. Pritchard as Lady Macbeth, he is garbed in a Georgian uniform. Absurd as it may seem, the want of verisimilitude to which no playgoers objected in the eighteenth century had genuine dramatic truth as its basis. No great actor can ever hide his personality by make-up or by adopting a tone of voice which is not his own; his business in great parts is more the expression of emotion than of external character; and anything that stands in the way of that expression is inartistic. The actor's affair is to express himself, with the modification that the greater his talent the more extended and complex will be his personality. When you think seriously of the matter, no players of renown have been anything but themselves. Ellen Terry was always Ellen Terry; Duse was always Duse; Ada Rehan was always Ada Rehan—with variations. It must not be thought, however, that this means an actress has only to be herself on the stage to be a great artist. She must have the power of expressing all shades of emotions and of portraying subtle states of mind. These again are modified by the character-drawing of the dramatist. The Duse in "La Locandiera" was very different from the Duse in "Magda," or from the Duse in "La Gioconda," and yet there was a common denominator to all the characters. Each expressed some side of the great actress's nature, but all were within the terms of that nature. The acting was really the effect of Duse's vivid imagination calling fictitious emotions into play. That is the basis of real acting. Naturally, the true artist has to go further. She must express herself in settled terms of character, for, however impressive it might be, the mere pulling out of the emotional stop would give us only absolute emotion. This has to be conditioned by the psychology of the character the actress is playing, and that is the real difficulty of acting. It is easy enough for an actress to indulge in sheer emotion, and there are many ladies on the stage who are capable of making an effect if they are asked to portray the kind of emotion that is natural to them, but there are few who can condition this emotional expression by the subtle working of imagination. The great artist, then, must have an extended emotional nature, a vivid imagination, and a close co-relation between the mind and the body. Her voice, face, and body make the instrument on which her mind must be able to play with the certainty of a great violinist's fingers and bowing arm.

Sarah Bernhardt has all these gifts as a matter of course. She still has a most wonderful voice, capable of a melting tenderness and of the hoarse accent of stifling passion; her body speaks with no less eloquence, and she has a vivid and passionate imagination. In force of individuality she is alone on the modern stage. Duse is not to be compared with her in this. But the Bernhardt has made a fetish of her individuality. Every page of her Memoirs brings out this fact clearly. The most interesting character in the world to Sarah Bernhardt is Sarah Bernhardt herself. She is her own drama, and in writing of herself she makes scarce an attempt to disguise her intense interest in herself. As a consequence, her acting for many years has been egotistical acting. She early became a virtuoso of the stage, and began to make capital of herself as an astonishing creature. Her school of acting is an exaggeration of the real basis of the art, for instead of expressing her own nature in the terms of a dramatist's character she has sought to express nothing but herself. A Duse and, to a less extent, an Ellen Terry, placed their natures at the service of the dramatist. Sarah Bernhardt, as every player of the egotistical, virtuoso school, imposes herself on the author. It becomes his duty to provide the necessary scenes of display, culminating through contrasts to a climax of violence. There is no need for him to invent a character or to search about for ideas. His whole business is to contrive action which shall enable Sarah Bernhardt to give her well-known exhibition of the self which her imagination and brilliant mind have created. Sardou understands this well. His plays provide just the right scenes for the actress. "La Sorcière," with all its banal melodrama, is wonderfully contrived in that respect. Its motives are absurd; its situations trite; its characters figures of cardboard; but it enables Sarah Bernhardt to display her extraordinary gifts in a well-calculated crescendo. And in being able to give life to such a machine-made play the genius of the actress is the more remarkable. There is nothing in the drawing of Zoraya, the Moorish girl accused of being a socreress, for an actress to grasp. In the first act she is merely a simple and tender-hearted girl, gathering herbs in the moonlight; in the second act she has a love scene culminating in a heart-broken cry when she discovers that her lover is on the eve of marriage; the third supplies the actress with a bare sensational situation, and so with the fourth; and in the last she embraces death. Sarah Bernhardt's imagination practically creates the play. The subtlety of her voice and the elusive grace of her gestures surround her with a curious and suggestive poetry in the first act. The love scene is made into a lyrical poem by the actress's restrained passion, and the torturing examination of Zoraya before the inquisition is lifted to the plane of tragedy. Her acting throughout this melodramatically contrived situation is an amazing exhibition of what can be done by histrionic genius. By dint of imagination Sarah Bernhardt is able to convey the impression that Zoraya's restraint when falsely accused is due to her grasp of the fact that mere denial will avail nothing. The scene becomes almost a battle of wit and will between her and the grand inquisitor, although there is really nothing in the actual writing of the play to suggest this. Probably it is what M. Sardou meant, and is the joint product of the brains of the dramatist and the actress, but it is certainly a scene with which an ordinary actress could do absolutely nothing. The whole performance is an extraordinary exhibition of Sarah Bernhardt's personality, imagination, and histrionic plasticity. It actually gives one the impression that the art of acting is, in its way, a creative art, but when you are free from the hypnotic influence of the actress and able to think with some freedom, it becomes clear that, after all, Sarah Bernhardt herself has been the heroine, that her acting has been a virtuoso display of absolute emotion expressed in the terms of the theatre, and that the author has purposely written his play so that the actress shall have free play to express herself. It is the triumph of a strong individuality, of a nature gifted beyond the common. Sarah Bernhardt chose to shine as an egotistical tragédienne from the days when she made her first tour in America. She was then the star actress, and has remained that ever since. Into the bare mould of an author's invention she has poured all the brilliance of her mind and all the fascinating variety of her temperament, and has always chosen to act in plays that give her this personal and absolute freedom. Yet—and this is a strange side of her character—when she wrote her version of "Adrienne Lecouvreur," Sarah Bernhardt threw theatricality to the winds, and contrived a play of subtle thought and characterisation. It might almost be imagined that she had not yet met the dramatist clever enough to create a character which she would have to re-create, and that in lacking the assistance of that dramatist she has been compelled to dramatise herself.

* "My Double Life." Memoirs of Sarah Bernhardt. William Heinemann.

Present-Day Problems.

A DEFENCE OF UNLICENSED PLAYING.

THE difficulty in this question of the censorship is to get the parties to understand one another. A playwright who, after long and serious work at his profession, suddenly finds the result of his work destroyed and himself branded as a purveyor of indecency by the secret decree of an irresponsible official, can hardly be expected to take the matter lightly. And a large part of the public, on the other hand, quite refuse to take it seriously. The suppressing of a play is to them a storm in a tea-cup. They did not want particularly to see the play. They have no reason to think it was a good play. In any case, they argue, the stage is far too much occupied with sex questions as it is. There is scarcely a play in London to which they can take their daughters with the assurance of passing an inoffensive evening. And they wish, on the whole, that there were six censors instead of one.

With much of this I sympathise. Other parts of it I will try to answer later on. But I wish to state emphatically, at the outset, that it is no special interest in sex questions, no desire for a licentious stage, that actuates those who wish to have the censorship of plays abolished. We believe that the proper preservative of decency on the stage is the good feeling of the audience. If that should fail in any given case, there remain the ample safeguards of the ordinary law; the annual licensing of theatres on the recommendation of the County Council; in the last resort, the police. We object to the censorship as a means of protecting morality because it is ineffectual; because it is peculiarly galling, tyrannical, and reminiscent of obsolete methods of government; thirdly, because its lash falls on the wrong shoulders. It misses the vicious man and hits the reformer.

It is ineffectual. Indeed, at first sight, it would seem from the evidence to be rather worse than ineffectual. There is no censor in America, and the American stage is, if anything, rather more severe in morals than the English. There is no censor in Ireland. And we all remember how Dublin audiences expressed an effective disapproval of "Lord Quex." One might add that there are, or were until recently, several censors in France. But I do not suggest that the moral tone of the French stage is directly due to their influence. The French censors have almost given up morality in plays as an unattainable ideal, and content themselves with protecting politics and religion.

In the main, no doubt, the censor has no effect at all. The moral tone of the entertainments in any place depends simply on the tastes of the public. The London music halls, for instance, have in general the same class of audience as the more frivolous theatres. The music halls have no censor to protect their morals; the theatres have. To compare accurately those two classes of entertainment would be a task for which I have no qualification except impartiality. But I am told that the moral level is about the same in both. No open indecency, but a slight general lowering of all possible moral standards; the distinction, if any, somewhat in favour of the music hall. The general result is the same everywhere. The Americans and the Irish like a reasonably correct stage; and they have it, with no censor to help them. The French like something different, and their censors do not interfere with their taste. A certain part of play-going London likes a sort of timid and veiled immorality, and procures it equally at the uncensored halls and the theatres watched over by Mr. Redford.

But, further, the censorship is not only an instrument which utterly fails to achieve its supposed end, it is also a peculiarly tyrannical and insulting instrument. The history of the institution tells its own tale. It was in 1737 an obsolete office, specially revived by Sir Robert Walpole for the purpose of forbidding public criticism of the corruption of Parliament. Even then it was felt to be of doubtful "civility," and to smack of the Stuarts rather than the House of Hanover. It was connected with the old statute which classed play-actors, except indeed such as were some particular nobleman's servants, among "rogues, vagabonds, and sturdy beggars." And that conception lies in its essence still. As many books as plays are immoral. Many more books than plays are subversive, anarchical, irreligious. But the ordinary author is at least supposed to be a decent citizen till some offence is proved against him. He does not have to send his MS. to the nearest J.P. or sergeant-major to be approved or forbidden. But the playwright, that is a different matter! We know what kind of fellow he is! We must set Dogberry to see that the rogue does not use any bad words, or, if he think fit, to confiscate the rogue's property! You must not treat a playwright like an ordinary free citizen! The whole principle of this is iniquitous. Its practice in detail is inevitably almost always ridiculous. When Colman was censor, he always cut out the word "angel" as sailing too close to religion. When Sir William Gilbert used the phrase, "a house fit for a lord," the same censor objected, on the same grounds, to the use of the word "lord." A year or so ago, when Mr. Yeats's poem, "On Baille's Strand," was before the present censor, the play was passed, but two of Mr. Yeats's verses were not satisfactory to his master's refined ear. He deleted certain adjectives and had other adjectives suggested for him to choose from. An official amending Mr. Yeats's verse! To a man of the world surely such a spectacle is a little ridiculous. To an artist it is simply nauseating. How can the present holder of the censorship, a kind man by all accounts, and even by nature a sensible man, really enjoy himself in such an office?

If one collected the plays forbidden by the censor in England at various times during the last twenty years, they would certainly form a most distinguished list. It might begin with "The Cenci," perhaps the greatest dramatic poem in English since Shakespeare; or, better still, with the "Oedipus Tyrannus." It would include "Ghosts," "Monna Vanna," "La Citta Morta," and several of Brieux's most poignant social homilies. It would include, oddly enough, "La Dame aux Camélias," though one might have expected that to escape, since it really has a dash of immorality in it. It would include Rostand's "La Samaritaine," and that most tremendous of religious dramas, Tolstoi's "Power of Darkness." All these works are, or have been, forbidden to the British public. It is sent instead to batten on the "Giddy Goat" and the "Spring Chicken!"

These prohibitions matter little to Sophocles and Shelley; not much more perhaps to Tolstoi. But at this moment we have at least two authors actively wronged. Mr. Garnett's forbidden play, "The Breaking Point," has been published and is being widely read. I need not dwell upon its merits or its possible defects, except to say that it is visibly a sincere and thoughtful piece of literature, with no immoral tendency, which certainly deserved its chance of a hearing. As for Mr. Granville Barker's tragedy, "Waste," I do not know if it will be published. It is at any rate forbidden. If there is to be a censor, and he is to act upon the traditional principles of his unwholesome office, I dare say that he could not help condemning "Waste." But the fact remains that we have Mr. Barker's work confiscated by the act of an irresponsible official. Mr. Barker is beyond question one of the most interesting and most admirable forces at work in the drama of the present time. He has achieved his present position entirely by work tending to elevate the stage. His adverse critics only complain of his being too intellectual, too austere, too much bent on inducing the public to accept a higher style of drama than it really likes. And when such a man as this spends a good year of very hard work in writing a tragedy on a theme which has impressed his mind, we are to be debarred from seeing that play because, forsooth, a part of its subject is not suited for tea-table conversation! What art can flourish under such conditions? What painter, sculptor, novelist, historian, or philosopher is expected to submit to them.

It is a miserable error to judge anything—be it work of art or action or human character—by a standard too low for it. And it is just this miserable error that the censor is always committing, and is bound to commit. The dramatists whom he quarrels with are not "rogues and vagabonds" eagerly trying how close to the edge of indecency they can run without being stopped. They are serious artists, trying to express the best work and thought that is in them, thought sometimes profound in itself, and often about profound subjects, which cannot be treated properly except in clear and sincere language. And before this work can be given to its natural audience, it must be passed by a judge who considers only whether or no its subject and its vocabulary are polite!

It is an old quarrel, this of the seriousness of art, between the artist and the public. The artist needs must take his art as an important thing. It fills his working day; it expresses his most intense ideals and experiences. It matters to him more than anything beside. But to the public it is only an amusement for spare moments, a relaxation, or, at the best, a superfluous piece of "culture." This difference in some degree will always remain. Yet a generous public will surely understand and admit the artist's point of view. A wise public will realise that it is a matter of some national importance whether the amusers of its spare hours are self-respecting men giving of the best work of their brains, or only so many slavish caterers to the tastes of their patrons, slippery fellows who must never be allowed to open their mouths until we have made sure beforehand what they are going to say.

GILBERT MURRAY.

Open Questions.

IS SOCIALISM TYRANNY?

"As public organisation or control of industry advances the real liberty of the private citizen shrinks: the free area of employment for his capital or ability is curtailed, a larger and larger proportion of the workers have no real option to do otherwise than sell their labour to the State: all consumers of many classes of goods and services must buy those furnished by the State, or go without. This means the progressive enslavement of the individual to the State, the virtual tyranny of bodies of officials over an increasing number of trades and groups of public employees. The State or the municipality will impose methods of work and pay, determine what sorts of goods shall be made and at what price they shall be sold and will brook no outside competition. The power wielded now by the imperial Post Office or the Municipal Waterworks will be wielded by a hundred similar central or local authorities; the business man, the worker, the citizen will find himself at every turn in the grip of a bureaucracy."

That this Frankenstein-monster view of "Socialism" inspires genuine dread in many "lovers of liberty" is certain. As soon as the State passes beyond its distinctively defensive functions, its despotic power is conceived as a public peril: if in a few instances this peril must be faced as the lesser of two evils, the narrowest limits should be set on such extension of essential tyranny. This widespread dislike and mistrust of a dictatorial and mechanical bureaucracy is firmly fastened in the mind of travelled Englishmen by experience of countries like France and Germany, where State Socialism is more advanced than here, and furnishes in all classes a strong bulwark of sentiment against encroachments of public power in this country.

Underlying this view and sentiment is the conception of an antagonism not merely between the State and the individual, but also between the State and the community or body of individuals who are said to be its members. The meaning of this antagonism deserves investigation. Let us approach it indirectly. Many of those most strenuous in their hostility to State or municipal collectivism are ardent supporters of co-operative movements, and would set no limits upon the application of the principle of private voluntary co-operation in industry. Now take the case of some great co-operative centre, such as Oldham or Bâle, where consumers' and producers' co-operation has entered and almost monopolised certain branches of local industry and trade. Suppose this co-operative enterprise grew so strong as gradually to absorb all the local industries, so that the co-operative societies owned all the mills, warehouses, shops, and other businesses in the city, and by their building companies got possession of all the houses. What would be the position of a young citizen of such an Oldham, when, after passing through school, he confronted the industrial and social system of his native town, in which he wished to earn his living? It is evident that he would have to work in whatever trade the co-operative committee chose to put him, upon whatever terms that committee chose to employ him, and to live in such house as the same committee chose to let him. It would be a complete "tyranny," with the sole alternative of getting out of Oldham and seeking his bread among strangers in some other place. Here, as the ripe fruit of individual liberty working through free association, we find what is in effect the same sort of public tyranny as that to which completed municipal Socialism is alleged to lead. In such towns as Oldham it would seem to be a mere matter of convenience whether the co-operators should continue to govern themselves industrially through their committee or should by their votes as citizens convert that committee into the town council and give a formal sanction to the public powers they exercise. The substance of their power—the strength and nature of their "tyranny," if so it be deemed—will be the same whether they operate through an elected committee or an elected town council. A little Socialist State would thus be evolved by natural process out of individual liberty of co-operation. In what essential ways would the "slavery" of the individual in such a Socialism differ from that imputed to ordinary municipal or State Socialism? In each case the will of the majority appears to "coerce" the individual; in each case there exists the difficult and painful alternative of secession. Those who oppose private co-operative or profit-sharing movements to Socialism fail to recognise this essential identity because they take for their comparison an inadequate or imperfect co-operation instead of a fully-developed type.

Is the dilemma here suggested a fair one? Those who regard a municipality as at present constituted will reply in the negative. Two differences will suggest themselves: one in the feeling of the individual towards the "government," the other in the mode of exercising control. A co-operator, it will be claimed, feels a more real sympathy with and responsibility for the acts of the society to which he belongs than the ordinary citizen feels in the case of his town government. True that in both cases the governing body is supposed to be his agent and to be executing his will. But in the one case the sentiment of popular control of democracy is far more real than in the other. The members of a co-operative society are more immediately concerned in the success or failure of their undertaking than the mass of citizens in the municipal undertaking. This difference of sentiment is undeniably important. Whence does it arise? Partly, perhaps, from the fact that most co-operative undertakings are new and their members are personally concerned in their history, and have seen and helped to make them grow. In the second or third generation of a completely co-operative Oldham this spirit might suffer a change. The conservative sense of the authority of an established institution as something separate and superimposed might creep in and weaken the vital relation between the individual will and the collective instrument of action.

Partly, however, the difference lies in this: that a co-operative society generally implies equality of sacrifice and of interest among its members, a sense of equal participation in a common enterprise. Now there is, it will be forcibly urged, no such substantial equality among the ratepayer citizens. It is, indeed, just here that we strike the deepest root of the objection to Municipal or State Socialism. If every citizen contributed an equal quota to the rates and only sought to receive an equal benefit from the public services on which they were expended, most of the sting would be taken out of Socialism. Now, since most opponents of Socialism generally believe that its effect is to saddle the burden of the rates and taxes on the propertied classes and to expend the income taken for the chief or exclusive benefit of the needy, it is natural that they should dread the moral as well as the financial consequences of such a policy. There can, it would appear, be no security for honesty and efficiency of administration here such as is attainable in a co-operative society. Where the minority pay the piper and the majority call the tune, no political harmony is got. This common view of the origin and nature of the public income from rates and taxes I have already exposed. But, even were it clearly accepted that the income taken by taxation is not confiscated but publicly earned and forms the rightful property of the city or the State, it is tolerably certain that a long and slow process of civic education would be required in order to enable the body of citizens to realise fully their responsibility in administering this public income.

The sense of tyranny, nay, the reality of tyranny, in a "Socialistic" municipality or State, survives just so long and so far as the moral sense of democracy remains defective. So long as the ordinary citizen looks upon the city government, its property and the public services it operates, as things which are outside his personality and for which he has no responsibility, the evils of bureaucracy which are charged against Socialism are very real. This is the chief of all reasons why Socialism must be gradual and must at any time be attuned to the civic spirit. The tyranny of Socialism means the weakness of democracy. Every strengthening of the spirit of democracy abates this tyranny, enabling the rational will of a people to express itself more fully in popular institutions operated for the common good. Just in proportion as a group of ordinary citizens, realising the significance of public property, comes to speak naturally of "our" trains, "our" waterworks, "our" parks, "our" schools, and to stamp the meaning of such speech on civic action, does this Municipal Socialism cease to be tyranny and become voluntary co-operation.

J. A. H.

Poetry.

MY GARDEN

No tall and stately palm trees wave
 Their branches high,
 No lilies lift their golden cups,
 No song birds fly
 And call to others far away,
 No shimmering leaves
 In sunny hours may form a shade
 Where fancy weaves
 Through all the golden afternoon
 A glowing tale,
 Before which life's realities
 Grow old and pale.

But though no stately palm trees wave,
 One tall ash tree
 Puts forth its tender leaves in spring,
 And one may see
 Through slanting boughs a pale blue sky.
 In summer time
 The sparrows chirp among its leaves
 From chime to chime.
 Remote the fields of living green
 Where wild flowers tell
 Their secrets to the nodding grass
 In many a dell.

But in a narrow space railed in
 I sit and dream
 Of olive groves and fruitful lands,
 So oft I seem
 Though in a tiny space enclosed,
 To hear the flow
 Of rushing waves on distant shores
 That sob and sigh,
 Or break forth into harmonies
 With rhythmic swell,
 Enlarging all this little space
 Where now I dwell.

But now 'tis winter, and my tree,
 My tall ash tree,
 Stript bare of all its summer leaves,
 Shakes dismally.
 So now I dream of Hebrides
 And islands far,
 Where shines o'er glittering fields of ice
 The polar star,
 Shines over all the gleaming space
 With clear cold ray,
 Where flocks of wild birds wheel about
 On plumage grey.

Through all the happy budding time
 I work and dream,
 And thus when winter strips my tree,
 I catch a gleam
 Of secret things that come and go,
 That move the earth,
 And now beneath their shroud of snow,
 Spring forth to birth,
 With forces ever moving on,
 Strong, glad and free,
 And see the sunrise gild with light
 A distant sea.

ADELINE MARY BANKS

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

IN these days of biographies it is strange that we should have no adequate account of Dr. Gilbert Burnet, the famous Bishop of Salisbury, whose untiring energy as theologian, politician, and historian aroused so many controversies among his contemporaries. The want is, however, to be supplied by an elaborate volume to be published by the Cambridge University Press in a couple of weeks. It is the joint work of the Rev. T. E. S. Clarke, minister of Saltoun (a living which Burnet once held), and Mr. H. C. Foxcroft, the editor of the Supplement to Burnet's "History of His Own Time." The book should add considerably to our knowledge of the English Revolution, as the authors have been fortunate enough to unearth a number of letters of first-rate importance from the Hanovrian Archives and the Library of the Remonstrants, Amsterdam. Professor Firth contributes an introduction on Burnet as an historian, in which he has a happy comparison between Burnet and Clarendon:—

"Clarendon and Burnet have a totally different way of telling the anecdotes with which they illustrate the character of the times or of the men they describe. Clarendon tells a story in a large, leisurely, oratorical manner, making almost a small epic or a little drama out of it. . . . Burnet's stories are little bits of gossip that drop naturally from his pen, with a sort of artless garrulity, as they used to do from his tongue; he seems to tell them, not so much to produce an effect, but because having heard or seen something of interest, he cannot keep it to himself. His writing has all the qualities of his conversation, which, if report can be trusted, was as full of historical scandal as his book."

This agrees with Horace Walpole's judgment: "It seems as if he had just come from the king's closet, or from the apartments of the men whom he describes, and was telling his readers in plain, honest terms what he had seen and heard."

DR. ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE has just completed a new work, which Messrs. Macmillan are to publish under the title "Is Mars Habitable?" It has been called forth by Mr. P. Lowell's "Mars and Its Canals," a volume published last year by an American astronomer, whose extreme positiveness excited a storm of discussion. Dr. Russel Wallace disputes Mr. Lowell's conclusions, and puts forward an alternative theory.

THE "Atlantic Monthly," as it was happily christened by James Russell Lowell, was first published in November, 1857. Next month, accordingly, it will celebrate its semi-centennial by a number of exceptional strength. Among the contributors will be W. D. Howells, the "Dean of American Letters," who writes on "Recollections of Atlantic Editorship," the veteran Charles Eliot Norton, J. T. Trowbridge, the brilliant writer of books for boys, Bliss Perry, and a number of other writers already known to readers of the magazine on both sides of the Atlantic. A feature of peculiar interest will be a hitherto unpublished poem by James Russell Lowell.

It is interesting to learn that Mr. Arthur Symons is preparing a selection from the poems of John Clare for the "Oxford Library of Prose and Poetry." Clare was a Northamptonshire peasant, the son of a pauper, who educated himself by saving the money he earned as a plough-boy. At the age of twenty-five he resolved to publish a volume of verse, and, by hard work, saved a pound to print prospectuses. One of them fell into the hands of a Stamford bookseller, and in 1820 appeared "Poems Descriptive of Rural Life and Scenery, by John Clare, a Northamptonshire Peasant." The book was well received, and Clare found a number of patrons, who placed him on a small farm. His investments turned out badly, and the pressure of care and want wrecked his mind. He died in the Northampton lunatic asylum in 1864. Clare's poems of country life are full of pleasant imagery, drawn first-hand from nature. His pathetic "Lines Written in Northampton County Asylum" may be read in the "Oxford Book of English Verse."

MR. W. H. MALLOCK has been lecturing on Socialism in the United States. He has now collected the lectures into a volume, which is to be published by Messrs. Harper, under the title "A Critical Examination of Socialism." He aims at showing both the weak and strong points of the doctrine as it is understood in the twentieth century—readers of his previous works on the subject will expect to find more stress laid on the former than on the latter—and the book also contains a close analysis of modern wealth production.

READERS often complain that there is no really good history of Russian literature in English. Perhaps the translation of Professor Brucker's "History of Russian Literature," which Mr. Fisher Unwin has in preparation, may meet the want. Professor Brucker's book has been praised by Professor Morfill, of Oxford, who is one of the greatest authorities in this country upon the subject, and as the greater portion of the work is devoted to the more modern writers, it should appeal to general readers as well as students of this newest, and in some respects most interesting, of European literatures. An important feature is to be the free introduction of examples and extracts, which have been rendered with special care by Professor Minns, of Cambridge, who edits the book.

ANOTHER translation to be issued by Mr. Unwin is a new rendering of Seneca's tragedies into English blank verse, with appropriate lyric metres for the choruses by Mr. Frank Justus Miller, an American writer. The value of the work will be enhanced by an introduction on the influence of the tragedies of Seneca upon early English drama, contributed by Professor J. M. Manly, and it will also contain a review of the Roman historical drama, together with comparative analyses of Seneca's tragedies and the corresponding Greek dramas. Seneca's influence on English dramatic literature may be judged from the fact that in the well-known verses prefixed to the first folio of Shakespeare, Ben Jonson speaks of him in the same breath with Æschylus and Euripides.

HAECKEL'S philosophical speculations have been the subject of a good deal of criticism in his native land, and a little brochure published recently by the celebrated botanist, Professor Reinke, on "Haeckel's Monism," is an admirable review of Haeckel's position from a purely scientific standpoint.

THE affinities between Babylonian and Hebrew thought are in some instances remarkably striking, and the selection of Babylonian Hymns and Prayers ("Babylonische Hymnen und Gebete," Leipzig, Heinrichs), which Professor Zimmern has just edited, is an admirable introduction to some of the deeper aspects of Babylonian piety. It may also be of interest to mention that Otto Weber has recently completed his History of the Literature of the Babylonians and Assyrians. The publishers are Heinrichs, of Leipzig.

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

- "The Old Venetian Palaces and Old Venetian Folk." By Thomas Okey. (Dent, 21s. net.)
- "The Memoirs of Sarah Bernhardt." (Heinemann, 15s. net.)
- "A Swan and Her Friends." By E. V. Lucas. (Methuen, 12s. 6d. net.)
- "William Allingham: a Diary." Edited by H. Allingham and D. Radford. (Macmillan, 12s. net.)
- "Drama and Life." By A. B. Walkley. (Methuen, 6s. net.)
- "The Claims of French Poetry." By J. C. Bailey. (Constable, 7s. 6d. net.)
- "George Meredith." By M. Sturge Henderson. (Methuen, 6s.)
- "The Scot of the Eighteenth Century." By John Watson, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s. net.)
- "A Soldier of the Legion: An Englishman's Adventures under the French Flag in Algeria and Tonquin." By George Manington. Edited by W. B. Slater and A. J. Sarl. (Murray, 10s. 6d. net.)
- "Across Persia." By E. Crawshaw Williams. (Arnold, 12s. 6d. net.)
- "Tales of Two People." By Anthony Hope. (Methuen, 6s.)
- "Causeries d'Egypte." Par G. Maspero. (Paris: Guilmoto, 7fr. 50.)
- "Charles Nodier et le Groupe Romantique." Par Michel Salomon. (Paris: Perrin, 3fr. 50.)
- "La Comtesse de Mirabeau, 1752-1800." Par Dauphin Meunier. (Paris: Perrin, 5fr.)
- "Le Journal d'un Prêtre." Roman. Par Ferdinand Hamelin. (Paris: Stock, 3fr. 50.)
- "Rosen." Von H. Sudermann. (Stuttgart: Costa M.3.)

Letters to the Editor.

IRELAND AND LIBERALISM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The public in England seems hardly to have grasped the full significance of Cardinal Logue's recent speech at Londonderry, when he denounced Mr. Redmond for advising the Irish voters at Kirkdale to support the Labour candidate. The Cardinal's action does not stand alone; it is only the most prominent of a series of events which have been constantly recurring during the last two or three years, and have provided the Conservative Press with occasional short-sighted paragraphs under the heading of "Nationalist Dissensions." In a word, the significance of Cardinal Logue's speech is that he, like other ecclesiastics of his Church, both in Ireland and elsewhere, has entirely failed to understand the essential nature of a Nationalist policy, or, if he understands, at least declines to accept it. He said that it was the duty of Irish Roman Catholic voters to oppose the Labour candidate, generally as a Socialist and an Atheist, more particularly as an enemy of denominational education. Whether his denunciations were justified or not, need not concern us here; the point to notice is that the Cardinal wished the Nationalist voters in an English election to vote on the merits of the case as they would have presented themselves to an ordinary English elector.

Now it is absolutely essential to a successful Nationalist policy that it should detach itself entirely from the current controversies of English political life. The strength of a small party is wholly dependent on the steadiness and singleness of purpose with which it keeps one clearly-defined object in view. Very little was done for Ireland at Westminster while the majority of the Irish members were divided on the ordinary lines of Liberal and Tory; and the whole strength of the party would be dissipated at once if its members were suffered to be drawn aside from their main object into the innumerable controversies of English legislation. Such a policy as is demanded by Cardinal Logue would be a flat denial of the principle on which the Nationalist party is formed. They are at Westminster, not to legislate for England, but to secure Home Rule for Ireland. Irish electors in Great Britain are in a corresponding position, and to vote for a Unionist candidate against a Home Ruler on grounds which do not concern Ireland at all is equivalent to a repudiation of Home Rule.

In view of the crisis which seems to be imminent in Ireland, the attitude of English Liberals is of supreme importance. It is becoming increasingly evident that the Roman Catholic hierarchy in Ireland have used the Home Rule movement only in so far as it strengthened their own power, and are now beginning to regard it with suspicion. They do not realise that a true Nationalism must prefer Ireland not only to England, but also to Rome. During the past century the short-sighted policy of Dublin Castle and the willingness of the Protestant gentry to be maintained in power by a foreign garrison instead of by their fellow-countrymen have had the natural effect of driving the people into the arms of the priests, who have thus obtained over an uneducated peasantry a domination that all educated Irishmen of any creed must regard as pernicious. The strong Protestant feeling which contributes so largely to the formation of English Liberal opinion must surely recognise by now that Dublin Castle is the bulwark, not of Protestantism, but of Ultramontanism. The irony of historical circumstances has forced every stream of thought in Ireland into a wrong channel; the forces of Protestantism are still being spent in the endeavour to maintain what is left of landlordism and class ascendancy; the forces of educated Roman Catholic opinion are being applied not where they are most needed in Ireland, but in the terribly wasteful campaign against English misgovernment. It is the duty of English Liberals by a generous and statesmanlike policy based upon mutual trust to give all the assistance they can to the growing forces of Liberalism in Ireland.—Yours, &c.,

A PROTESTANT ELECTOR.

October 24th, 1907.

THE CASE FOR WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the review of the "Case for Women's Suffrage," edited by Mr. Broughton Villiers, which appears in the last issue of THE NATION, the contributors to the volume are charged with resisting a measure for Women's Suffrage which would include all adult women. Let me explain that the Women's Social and Political Union, and I believe all the other Women's Suffrage Societies, will accept gladly the most extensive measure of women's enfranchisement which the Government may choose to introduce. What we think we may reasonably expect, however, is a Bill to abolish the political disability of sex. Such a Bill would have the immediate effect of admitting women to the existing Parliamentary Franchise, and the ultimate effect of making every future improvement of the Franchise apply automatically to women. We shall be content to arrive at the goal of universal suffrage in this way.

After all, the duty and responsibility of drafting this and all other legislative measures rests upon the Government. The Prime Minister has it in his power to grant by means of a single measure the Parliamentary vote to every adult man and woman. The question that I should like Liberals to answer is this: Does the Prime Minister intend to take the step of enfranchising the whole adult population of the country? If not, he must at least allow women to share the benefit of the more or less imperfect Franchise which men enjoy at the present time.

Your reviewer asserts that he cannot understand the argument that women Suffragists should be allowed to invade the House of Commons with impunity. We make no such claim. What we do desire is that the political grievance against which we make this kind of protest shall be removed.

Your reviewer proceeds to say: "They (women) may speak in any town in England; they can organise processions, they can present petitions. They can do everything that men can do." He is mistaken. Men can do one other thing more important than all the rest; they can vote. Women, because they have no vote, cannot get votes. They travel in a vicious circle. One way, it seems to us, of breaking through this circle is to adopt certain methods of agitation which, though they have been much condemned have already produced good results.—Yours, &c.,

CHRISTABEL PANKHURST.

October 23rd, 1907.

"SOCIALISM IN LIBERALISM."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—After reading the somewhat nebulous articles on Socialism in THE NATION, and the violent diatribes in the Conservative Press, may I be permitted to indicate where, in my opinion, the Liberal will part company with the Socialist.

I am a Liberal because Liberalism preaches the doctrine of equal opportunities for everyone in the race of life, so far as the laws of nature admit: but the Liberal does not propose a radical alteration in the social and economic organisation of society, because he recognises that virtue and vice, idleness and industry, knowledge and ignorance, capacity and incapacity, are functions partly of the individual and only partly of his environment, and that if everyone started in the race under ideal conditions of fairness, the result would not widely differ from that which obtains to-day, that, in short, if all the money in the land were equally divided up to-day, human nature is such that we should have a new plutocracy—possibly worse than the old—within a twelvemonth. The Liberal, therefore, recognises that as each man must fight his own battle in the moral sphere, so he must do in the economic, the function of the State being to supervise the fairness of the conditions. The Liberal, however, is prepared to go a certain distance with the Socialist, and to mitigate the rigour of his individualism in favour of those worsted in the race and especially in favour of women and children, but only in so far as the bare necessities of life are concerned: the humane man of superior ability and superior earning power will not agree to accept bay leaves as the sole reward of his superior services to society. The Socialist, on the other hand, a philanthropist in a hurry, fails to perceive that the disease is only partly economic, and that a cure of social ills presupposes the moral and intellectual uplifting of the masses, that the cure must be gradual and can never be complete: therefore, he decides to make the race not exactly a handicap, but one of equal prizes and no blanks, and objects to the ideal Liberal method which would automatically adjust a man's rate of pay to the value which the public puts upon his labour and desires to substitute a method by which the recipient indirectly fixes the rate of his own wages—in short, he aims at equality of payment to every individual irrespective of the quality or quantity of his output of work. He also clearly recognises that the conditions preliminary to this end are: (1) nationalisation or municipalisation of all industries; (2) abolition of private capital and interest thereon; (3) nationalisation of all land. This seems to me to be the bed-rock of Socialism, and this is the theory which is so abhorrent to the Liberal Centre as well as to the Conservative Party.

Now all successful political movements have had moral and intellectual force behind them; but this movement in its extreme form is essentially immoral, in that it aims at rectifying one evil by the creation of another, it aims at curing poverty by making the earnings of the capable the spoil of the incapable: therefore, the movement will always have the morality, the industry and the brains of the community, against it, and, under these circumstances, with no drawing force but mere numbers, no agitation has ever succeeded or ever will succeed.

Therefore, because Socialism says "equality" where Nature shouts "inequality," I, who have never in my life before voted for a Tory candidate, will do so at the next election unless his opponent is absolutely untainted by the doctrines of the extreme Socialist.—Yours, &c.,

October 20th, 1907. A LIBERAL OF THE CENTRE.

[The real question raised by this letter is, "What sort of alterations in the social and economic organisation of society are necessary in order to achieve 'equal opportunities for everyone in the race of life'?" No Socialist, so far as we know, has ever proposed that "all the money in the land" should be "equally divided up": some Socialists propose to socialise all industries and to equalise all incomes, but many Socialists do not. In any case, it cannot be assumed that "Socialism," as such, implies these extremities; certainly we should not say that Liberalism is called upon to accept them.—EDITOR, THE NATION.]

"TYRANTS OF THE ROAD."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The letters which you are publishing on this subject, strongly-worded as some of them are, form but a faint echo of the murmur of disapproval which arises from town, and suburb, and country. Wherever the motor car passes, it causes danger, discomfort, and inconvenience, and inspires widespread, deep-seated and just feelings of discontent and hostility.

May I be permitted to sum up briefly the reasons for this general condemnation, and suggest a few remedies?

(1) Danger: It cannot be contested that the presence on the road of these swift vehicles, often carelessly and clumsily handled, is fraught with peril to all wayfarers. Aged, infirm, and timid persons are driven into byeways, or forced to remain indoors; while the arrogant bearing of the oxygen-intoxicated motorists causes natural feelings of irritation in drivers of carts and carriages, cyclists and pedestrians. Public opinion demands that speed-limits should be much stricter, and more rigidly enforced. Few, if any, motor car riders or drivers are on urgent business which necessitates their covering a given distance in a certain time. It is in pursuit of pleasure and exhilaration only that they whirl along in their mad career. If boys play a dangerous game in the streets they are checked at once; and the same rule should apply to speed-maniacs. Again, anyone who discharges a firearm in the public ways is liable to severe punishment. So, those who delight to turn themselves into human projectiles should be imprisoned, or have their cars confiscated. If necessary, special police should be trained as motor-scouts, and the cost defrayed by a tax on the cars. They cause the expense; it is only fair that they should foot the bill.

(2) Dust: This is another nuisance, directly due to the broad, metal-studded tyres of the motor cars, and to their high rates of speed. From it arise injury to health, depreciation of property, ruined gardens, spoilt clothes, and the destruction of delicate wayside and hedgerow plants. The obvious remedy is the special treatment of all road-surfaces on which speeds of eight or more miles per hour are allowed. The cost again, should be met by taxing the cars which render such treatment necessary.

(3) Dazzling Lights: No one who has passed a motor car at night and taken a dive into the dark after being blinded by the brilliance of the lamps, will deny the magnitude of this evil. Such lamps would not be needed if only a reasonable speed were maintained. So a low candle-power limit should be fixed and enforced, with all the rigour of the law.

(4) Smell: This may be regarded as a minor nuisance, but only because the others are so great. No one possessing the spirit of a Christian or a gentleman would inflict on his fellow-creatures the discomfort of inhaling such abominable odours as are emitted from the majority of motor cars. Heavy fines should be inflicted in the worst cases. This seems to be the only argument understood by those who are deaf to all the appeals of courtesy and chivalry.

It is to be hoped that the centralisation of local taxation will foreshadow a heavy motor-car tax in next year's Budget. This, with the measures suggested above, should afford some relief to the long-suffering people of these islands. If our legislators fail in their duty of defending public rights on public roads, it is much to be feared that motor-baiting will become more common. Our English spirit is slow to rouse, but when roused it is very apt to take the law into its own hands, and then regrettable acts of violence will become prevalent, and a heavy reckoning will be paid in full with bloodshed and broken bones.—Yours, &c.,

"QUERCUS ROBUR."

Watford, Herts.,

October 17th, 1907.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Sturrock's apology for the "road-hog" is utterly ineffective, for it is against the motor which deserves this opprobrious name that the great and growing detestation of the public is directed. The motorists who were content to go along the public highways at no higher speed than that of an ordinary carriage and pair would be readily tolerated. But where are such motorists to be found?

Residing at a town on the Great Deeside Road during the month of August, I had an ample opportunity of studying the ways of this "Blatant Beast," and I noticed that, excepting some motors belonging to local medical men and town neighbours, all the motors that passed through were worthy to be registered as "road-hogs." If any coachman had flogged his horses up to the average rate of these vagrant automobilists, he would have been summoned before the magistrate for furious driving.

Mr. Sturrock praises the marked benevolence of some motorists. In the management of these swarms of machines that drove through Banchory on their way to the shrine of St. Grouse, the conspicuous thing was an unscrupulous and brutal disregard for the rights of others on the King's highway. If these new locomotives run at railway speed, they must be banished from the highway.—Yours, &c.,

D. K. AUCHTERLONIE.

Craigham Manor, Aberdeen.

October 23rd, 1907.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—With your kind permission, I shall briefly refer to such points in the letter of "Civis Universitatis Edinensis" in your current issue as seem to require an answer.

(1) The businesses of the harness manufacturer and whip maker will be adversely affected by the advent of the automobile only where such men do not so avail themselves of the opportunity to cultivate fresh lines of business in supplying motor accessories and clothing. A glance at the stock-in-trade of the up-to-date leather merchants will indicate that he does what must inevitably be an increasing motor business.

(2) Unfortunately it is a regrettable accompaniment of such mechanical developments that old men are unable to find employment in the trade or labour of their youth. As to middle-aged men, however, they are to be seen driving motor-cars every day.

With all respect to your correspondent's general observations, I do not think that they are strictly relevant to a discussion of the question of motor traffic.—Yours, &c.,

J. LENG STURROCK.

October 22nd, 1907.

A CENSORED PLAY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—While in hearty sympathy with your protest against the action of the Censor in refusing to license Mr. Garnett's drama, "The Breaking Point," I consider the solution of the present impasse lies in putting the Censorship in commission rather than in its abolition. A small committee of three literary men, carefully selected for their knowledge of the drama and for their wide reading generally, would, I am convinced, be the most satisfactory method of meeting an intolerable situation.

There are many practical difficulties in the way of the abolition of the Censorship now so strenuously advocated in certain quarters. The Censorship, with all its faults, undoubtedly serves a useful purpose. Its negative effect must not be overlooked. Everyone knows at present that it is useless to submit to the Censor a flagrantly indecent play, and so plays of this character are not written. Abolish the Censorship, and authors and managers will be tempted to go to the utmost limit they consider the authorities and the public will stand.

It is all very well to advocate reliance on Police action and that of local authorities as a substitute for the Censor, but in practice there is no doubt that the law would hopelessly fail to deal effectively with the moral question.

Take a parallel case. How is it that the law has not been invoked to prosecute the publishers of the novels of the fleshly school now disgracing our bookstalls, and being sold by hundreds of thousands? Simply because it is so difficult to prove indecency, and the failure to do so would give a still greater advertisement to the publications complained of. Is it seriously proposed to give our theatrical managers the same freedom as the publishers of the low-class fiction now being sold as literature?

We require more than ever a Censorship of Plays, but it must be an enlightened censorship. And in view of the epidemic of novels of the fleshly school now pouring from the Press, we want still more an enlightened Censorship of books also.—Yours, &c.,

JOSEPH A. LECKIE.

Walsall, October 17th, 1907.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The announcement of the refusal of the Censor to license Mr. Granville Barker's new play, "Waste," coming, as it does, on the heels of an article entitled "A Censored Play," which appeared in your issue of October 12th, must call the attention of the theatre-going public to the danger which menaces our drama.

In an interview which appears in to-day's "Observer," Mr. Granville Barker announces that no play will be produced at the Savoy in the place of "Waste," and he adds significantly, "London is not the only place."

To those who, during the last three years, have enjoyed the Vedrenne-Barker performances at the Court Theatre, the prospect of losing Mr. Granville Barker will appear in the light of an absolute disaster. The matter resolves itself into a choice of one of two alternatives. We must either dispense with the services of the Licensor of Plays, and so conform with the practice of the rest of Europe, or we must be prepared to forego the continuance of what has been not inaptly described as the most notable achievement of modern dramatic production. The choice does not seem a difficult one to—Yours, &c.,

MAURICE G. HOLMES.

Balliol College, Oxford,
October 20th, 1907.

"CASA BLANCA: THE FRENCH CASE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Dell and others appear to be horrified at the discovery that there are some Englishmen bold enough not to let the entente cordiale interfere with what they conceive to be the truth concerning the recent French atrocities in Casa Blanca. The evidence of eye-witnesses, one of them a Scotch missionary, another a lady of unimpeachable veracity, not to mention statements made by the "Daily Mail" and "Morning Post" correspondents, is considered as worthless, compared with official denials in Paris, based on information received, as Mr. Cunningham-Graham suggests, from gentlemen who are too patriotic to give themselves away.—Yours, &c.,

DOUGLAS FOX PITT.

War Coppice, Caterham, Surrey,
October 16th, 1907.

"THE CANT OF MILITARISM."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—With reference to your views on the evils of military service, expressed under the heading, "The Cant of Militarism," I submit that, even if, as you say, many officers are addicted to frivolity and vice, it is unreasonable to regard such failings as the natural products of military life and training. They may be attributed to present conditions of service, but these are not necessarily beyond improvement, nor are they an essential feature of army life. If the average officer does not regard his profession as seriously as the schoolmaster or business man, the reason is that he has not the same stimulus to work. The ordinary man works vigorously because he has to earn his own living, and because he realises that, by industry and enterprise, he can improve his position. The officer has no such incentive. Owing to the low scale of pay and the expenses of regimental life, he is dependent on his private resources, and he does not realise the connection between work and subsistence. In the second place, the system of promotion by seniority removes any spur to industry, in the case of those not keenly interested in soldiering. The young lieutenant knows that, however vigorously he studies his profession, no efforts will bring him his captaincy until his turn arrives, often after a long term of years. At the same time he knows that, when the time comes, promotion is certain, unless he is grossly incompetent. And as captain he has to wait for his majority in the same way, unless some special chance of service offers. It is not surprising that many officers, who enter the Army full of enthusiasm, find their keenness dulled and their zeal cooled as time goes on. Lacking the incentives to work that other professions provide, many officers naturally tend to devote undue attention to amusements and sport. But are the tastes, even of the worst set, different from those distinguishing the young men of the day? A walk round London at night must convince any observer that frivolity and vice attract a very large number of civilians. In any case it is manifestly unfair to draw general inferences, regarding the effect of military life on character, from the failings of soldiers living under the present conditions. Is your prejudice against military service so strong that you would deny the probability that the officer would equal the business man or schoolmaster in keenness and industry if the Army were available as a career to men with their way to make in the world, and if the same opportunities for advancement by merit existed as prevailed in other professions.—Yours, &c.,

A CIVILIAN.

[We agree that some of the evils on which we dwell are not inherent in militarism. The art of killing, however necessary, and we do not here dispute its necessity, has certain degrading reactions which belong to every military system; but it is quite evident that the particular defects on which "A Civilian" dwells have their roots in the special social and economic factors which damage our Army as a serious profession.—EDITOR, THE NATION].

Reviews.

BLAKE AND THE IMAGINATION.*

In the writings of William Blake and in the commentaries of his critics there is one sovereign word which, from its copious and emphatic repetition, must surely possess an equally pre-eminent significance. It is curious that this word, which is in fact the beginning and end of his system, should have met with neither a clear definition in the one place nor a strict analysis in the other. "The nature of my work," he himself has no hesitation in saying, "is visionary or imaginative"; and we are most of us acquainted with the memorable sentence in "Jerusalem," where he explains that "Imagination is the real and eternal world of which this vegetable universe is but a faint shadow, and in which we shall live in our eternal or imaginative bodies, when these vegetable mortal bodies are no more." And, besides this one, there are, up and down his writings, a number of similar passages wherein both the efficacy and the manifestations of this supreme power (the essence, as he believed, of all being and the source of all becoming) are disclosed in a language vaguely recalling the Platonic myth. But to the uninitiate intelligence these things are apt to be no more than "tinkling cymbals!" Mr. Arthur Symons, who in a triple capacity of biographer, critic, and editor has everywhere, in his most valuable book, made good use of a refined intuition and an efficient judgment, even if he does not bring the whole matter to light, comes perhaps nearer than anyone else to the true psychological aspect of Blake's invention. He has at least hinted at the purely human and internal origin of the inspiration. "The poetry of Blake," he writes (and the same obtains throughout his art), "is a poetry of the mind, abstract in substance, concrete in form; its passion is the passion of the imagination, its emotion is the emotion of thought, its beauty is the beauty of idea. . . . There are . . . in the world of Blake's poetry, only primal instincts and the energies of the imagination." This imagination, or "vision," it is as well to remember, is the "Poetic Genius" of "The Marriage of Heaven and Hell"; and it appears elsewhere in a variety of synonyms, of which "the Divine Body of Jesus" is the commonest as well as the most remarkable. In the fourfold division of man's nature, which is the basis of Blake's psychology, it is the primary function of the "Emanation," whose business is with creation, that is to say the exercise of those activities whereby the visible universe puts off its concrete, transitory, fallen state, and resumes through art the unity and beauty of its first infinite and imperishable existence; while the "Spectre," or reasoning faculty, which, in our fallen condition, is its perpetual antagonist, is concerned only with the mere ratio of the pseudo-substances of phenomenal life. A confusion has arisen—doubtless from Blake's own association of himself with the visionaries of the Old Testament, for the material of whose books an external origin is generally claimed—by which he is assumed to pretend to a like revelation, and thus to remove the validity of his art from the normal plane into a superior sphere. But in view of this error it is, in the first place, necessary to remark that in "The Marriage of Heaven and Hell" he is careful to demolish (in the mouth of one of their number) this idea of an objective visitation, even in the case of the accepted prophets; for the prophet Isaiah, on being reminded by Blake of the popular misunderstanding, is at once ready to confess that he "saw no God" in the ordinary sense of the word, but "discovered the infinite in everything," and thus became "persuaded that the voice of honest indignation is the voice of God." Blake's further question, "Does a firm persuasion that a thing is so make it so?" and the prophet's answer, "All poets believe that it does," have at once the result of pointing within for the source of inspiration and of levelling "prophecy" with the rest of inspired literature or art. "Art is inspiration," Blake said to Crabb Robinson (whose reminiscences of their discussions together are for the first time accurately and fully printed by Mr. Symons), and, he went on to say (making it clear by his words that in his own claim to spiritual authority he is only arrogating to himself an authority similar in kind to that belonging to all creative genius), "When Michael Angelo or Raphael, or Mr. Flaxman does any of his fine things, he does them in the spirit." It is the fashion now to class Blake among "spiritualists," but it is abundantly evident from his own very definite statements that the nature of his evocations was wholly free from any taint of the impositions or delusions with which such persons are still able to astonish the middle-class intellect. When he speaks, in his well-known letter to Hayley, of his converse with the spirit of his dead brother, he is careful to explain that it is only in his remembrance, in the regions of his imagination, that he sees him, and if he adds that he now "hears his advice" and "writes from his dictate," we need not surely wonder that one to whom mental images alone were real should be able to quicken this embodiment of his recollection to any degree of reality he might please. It is especially necessary for all readers of Blake's Prophetic Books to realise the purely subjective being of both the characters and machinery of his visions. These books are the soul's autobiography. The scene is the human brain. The person of the myths are the various elements of the soul divided against itself in its fallen state. It is strange that these things should have been so consistently overlooked, although Blake himself leaves us in no doubt. It is sufficient to refer to the opening lines of Milton, where the Muses are invoked and summoned "from out the portals of" his "brain,"

"Where by your ministry
The Eternal Great Humanity Divine [i.e., the imagination] planted his Paradise.
And in it caus'd the Spectres of the Dead to take sweet form
In likeness of himself."

or to Los's admission (in the first book of "Vala") in regard to himself and his fellow zoas:

"Though in the brain of Man we live and in his circling nerves,
Though this bright world of all our joy is in the human brain
Where Urizen and all his hosts hang their immortal lamps."

"All things exist," for Blake, "in the human imagination"; and he uses the word in its purely normal and human sense, only enlarging its scope. Through it every man must be the creator of his own immortality. Tu n'es que ce que tu penses; pense-toi donc éternel, Blake would have said, with Villiers de l'Isle-Adam. "There is no God but Man," and therefore no eternity but that which is within you. "All deities," he wrote in "The Marriage of Heaven and Hell," "reside in the human breast," and "God only acts and is in existing beings and men." It is this act of faith which recognises the separate existence of other beings of a like nature with himself, which alone removes him from absolute solipsism. This religion is a religion of human nature. "Thou art a man: God is no more; thine own humanity learn to adore," is the central doctrine of his everlasting gospel. It was upon this mystery of the coexistence of God in every being that he founded his belief in redemption through the self-annihilation of Love.

THE WISE MEN OF THE EAST.*

THERE are various methods of surveying a district. Your survey may be geological, botanical, zoological, &c. There is no reason why it should not be literary. So it has occurred to Mr. William A. Dutt to ransack Norfolk and Suffolk for the purpose of securing a mixed bag of men of letters. In his "Little Guides" he collected, from the same area, churches and halls and monuments. In "Some Literary Associations of East Anglia," he has followed big game and caught literary lions. Very wisely he took with him a graceful artist, Mr. Walter Dexter, R.B.A., who has enriched his volume with sixteen illustrations of the habitat of his fauna, which make it one of the best of the new "coloured books" of the period. Mr. Dexter works in delicate sub-iridescent tones, which rise to gorgeousness in his "Tomb of Henry Howard, Earl of

* "William Blake." By Arthur Symons. Constable. 10s. 6d. net.

* "Some Literary Associations of East Anglia." By William A. Dutt. With sixteen illustrations in colour by Walter Dexter, R.B.A. Methuen & Co. 7s. 6d.

Surrey," or fade to celadon in his "Norwich from Mousehold Heath" and "East Dereham Church." If the originals of this exquisite series are to be purchased, the Arts Committee of the Norwich Museum might do well to add them to their collection. While still upon the outworks of Mr. Dutt's volume, we may remark that it would have been improved by a map, a little map like "The Railways of the County of Norfolk" in his Guide, with the literary localities distinguished. Another small grumble is that Mr. Dutt, though he gives a list of "Works Consulted" at the end of his book, allows no references in his text, and the reader who wishes to locate, verify, or extend the citation is unassisted by the author. The complaint that Mr. Dutt has not exhausted the literary interest of his area would be unfair. He professes to detail only "some" of the associations of East Anglia with the world of letters. His actual selection is pretty ample, and will not leave much to the gleaner in the same fields, but the juridically-minded will not overlook the slighting reference to the Austin circle: "Nor do the associations with Norwich of John Austin, the celebrated jurist and friend of J. Stuart Mill; of his wife Sarah Austin, who was the daughter of a Norwich yarn-maker, and who was as handsome as she was gifted; or of Charles Austin, who was for a time a doctor's assistant in the city, possess much interest for us to-day." That is a matter of taste—but there can be no doubt that Chateaubriand's Christian name should be accented; or that Dr. Kitchin is Dean of Durham, though once of Winchester.

Now to flit about this East Anglia garden. It would be absurd to systematise in a matter essentially episodic. An Oxford philosopher once bemoaned that his mind was "tragically episodic." It would be quite to the point to say that Mr. Dutt's method, if not his mind, is topographically episodic. We must take times and countries as they are and people as we find them. Of course, it would be possible to philosophise in the manner of Taine, and try to demonstrate that Frederick Denison Maurice and James Martineau are specifically products of East Anglican soil, climate and creation; or that the Norwich literary school is an integral part of the Idea, a "moment" in the Lebens-system of the Universe. But that is not Mr. Dutt's way. That is to take the train to some town or village, and ramble about in likely neighbourhoods in search of literary adventures. King's Lynn, for instance, discovers to him Roger L'Estrange, Horace Walpole, Fanny Burney, Eugene Aram, Sir Walter Besant, Captain Marryat. A very good bag for one day. Then Mr. Dutt presents us with a trophy of each. Roger L'Estrange's description, beneath his caricature, in the form of a "Hue and Cry," runs thus:—

"He has a thousand tricks, viz., to fetch for the Papists, carry for the Protestants, whine to the King, dance to Noll's fiddle, fawn on the courtier, wag his tail at all bitches, hunt counter to the plot, tongue-pad the evidence, and cringe to the crucifix, but, above all, he has a damn'd old trick of slipping the halter."

A pretty piece of vernacular, beside which Horace Walpole's sentimental vapourings at Houghton wax pale. But he is able to console himself with the reflection that the "language" of Lynn citizens "is polished since I lived among them," though his father built Houghton "for his grandson to annihilate, or for his son to mourn over." Fanny Burney at Lynn is a shadow; she was only eight, and backward for her age, when her father removed to London; and when she revisited her native town she found it as dull and gossipy as most country towns—"such a set of tittle-tattle, prittle-prattle visitants! Oh, dear! I am so sick of the ceremony and fuss of these fall-lall people." If Eugene Aram had never visited Heacham Vicarage he might never have been detected; but how many people are aware that according to competent authorities he was the "true father of comparative lexicography," "having lighted upon a truth of the greatest moment, unrecognised in his day by any scholar—the affinity of the Celtic to other European languages." Sir Walter Besant's connection with the town is the very slightest. He came there for the local colour of his "Lady of Lynn"—and left no stone unlimned. As for Captain Marryat, he dwelt at Langham, near Wells, but miles from Lynn, and it is sufficient to record of his domestic manners and customs that when a friend whom he wished to detain insisted on departing, "the Captain despatched his bloodhound after him, causing him to take to a tree and stay in its branches all night." So much for Lynn's literary worthies, as a sample from bulk.

Mr. Dutt, however, does not merely tear pages from old books. He adds caustic and lively comments of his own. His diagnosis of Borrow is rather neat: "He was good-natured but bad-tempered, and always had a somewhat exaggerated idea of his own importance." He can correct Crabbe's botany. "But he must have been a slow-footed lover who, starting when the ling was flowering, saw the 'snow-white bloom' fall 'flaky from the thorn' before he reached his journey's end; and it was unworthy of so skilled a botanist as Crabbe to take advantage of poetic licence to the extent of making so many spring and autumn wild flowers bloom together as he does in the 'Lover's Journey.'" He indulges in sly humour at Sir Thomas Browne's taste for ancient burial urns, and thinks that a find of such things in a field at Old Walsingham would have put the best or worst of patients at a disadvantage, and doubts whether their preservation would not have been the more urgent "case." But he atones for this gibe in a passage of something like real eloquence:—

"The sight of them suddenly fanned the sinking flame of his imagination, and, after years of literary idleness, it glowed again like a gorgeous pyre, illuminating the darkest recesses of the tomb. By the light of it we see revealed the faces of Homer's heroes and old Norse vikings, of Roman emperors, and Celtic priests; and all the time the walls of the hall of death re-echo the music of a dirge-like march by which the sons of men move onward to the grave."

The reiterated assonance of "walls" and "hall," before the verb "re-echo," reveals the touch of the artist in letters. Mr. Dutt has not lingered among ancient monuments or turned the page of sepulchral eloquence in vain.

CONTEMPORARY FRANCE.*

THE position of M. Gabriel Hanotaux as a member of the French Academy is, it may be frankly admitted, due, rather to his services as a statesman than to his eminence as a man of letters. At the time of his election, indeed, the ponderable bulk of his "literary baggage" was comprised in his monograph on Cardinal Richelieu. His claims as a man of affairs were more substantial. Foreign Minister in the Dupuy, Ribot, and Méline Cabinets between 1894 and 1898, he had been one of the chief agents in the conclusion of the Franco-Russian Alliance. His candidature for the Academy in 1897 therefore involved a question of political expediency. His rejection, it was widely felt, would be something too like a criticism on the value of the rapprochement with Russia, to which he had been so largely instrumental.

Since his retirement from public and official life, M. Hanotaux has been best known as a frequent contributor to the Press, both Parisian and Provincial. As a journalist he shows a considerable literary proficiency, and an even more considerable caution, a caution acquired, no doubt, during his career at the Quai d'Orsay, where he was for some years a permanent official before becoming Minister. This latter quality in his work is, however, its only suggestion of the former statesman. It seldom reveals that grasp of, and insight into, political events which we expect of the trained and proved diplomatist.

This defect is especially obvious in the third volume of M. Hanotaux's "Contemporary France" now under review. His industry has collected an enormous mass of facts, which his want of general ideas and of historical perspective leaves a bewildering chaos, uninformed by any ordering or controlling spirit. For all its bulk, the work is rather the skeleton of a history than a history itself, a compilation of newspaper-cuttings and lifeless data rather than a philosophic and critical survey of events. To English readers a comparison at once suggests itself between the work of M. Hanotaux and that of Mr. Bodley on the same subject. Both authors are masters of a huge amount of material; but whereas Mr. Bodley has grouped his in the light of several "architectonic ideas," has disposed his facts in a manner really constructive, M. Hanotaux has been content to arrange his in an elaborate chronological table and to leave to the reader the task of digestion and discrimination of values. In the whole volume, the only portion seeming to rise above this criticism is the fifth chapter, a review of the Constitution of 1875. It is this Constitution, scarcely modified, under which the France of to-day exists, and which, in right of mere durability, is the most interesting and valuable of any French constitutional experiment since the Revolution. Here M. Hanotaux is worthy of attention. The chapter, however, is only forty pages in length, the whole volume over six hundred!

* "Contemporary France." By Gabriel Hanotaux. Vol. III. Translated from the French. A. Constable and Co., Ltd. 15s. net.

The period covered, from May, 1874, to May, 1877, is, of course, excessively complicated and difficult. The merest résumé of political events in France between these terms will convince us of that. A year before the earlier date, M. Thiers had been overthrown by the Right, which section of the National Assembly, ignorant how to utilise the power of its majority, had wasted the fruits of conquest. The Duc de Broglie, representing the Right Centre, was, in May, 1874, defeated by a coalition which united the extreme Royalists, supporters of Divine Right, the Bonapartists, beginning to recover some of their lost prestige, and a certain number of Republicans. A reactionary Cabinet, led by General de Cissey, then held office for a year. Meanwhile the National Assembly began to discuss the Constitution. The various sections of the Right, unable to agree on any particular form of monarchical régime, rendered inevitable the adoption of a Republican Constitution as a provisional arrangement, the permanence of which was resolved on by the Republicans as the bye-elections strengthened their hands. In 1875 the Constitution was voted by the National Assembly, which continued to govern France till March, 1876, with a Ministry under M. Buffet. The first elections under the new Constitution took place in February of that year, and, under the growing influence of Gambetta, were favourable to the Republicans, the majority in the Chamber being the famous 363, though the Senate was distinctly reactionary. M. Dufaure, first Premier, under the title of President of the Council, was a Liberal of the old school. Born under the Directory, he had lived through all the subsequent phases of the Revolution. His policy of compromise and conciliation, however, left him "caught between the Chamber and the Senate," and having suffered defeat in both, he offered his resignation to the Marshal-President in December, 1876. The latter now called upon Jules Simon to form a Ministry, which was of distinctly moderate composition, the Duc Decazes being retained as Foreign Minister. However, MacMahon had decided to break with the Republican majority, and on May 16th, 1877, a letter from him to Jules Simon announced the latter's dismissal. This was the famous Coup d'Etat of the Seize Mai. With this important event the volume closes.

The complex history revealed in this barest of outlines is certainly not simplified or elucidated by M. Hanotaux's method of presentation. The essential and unessential, the events and influences pregnant for the future, and those sterile even for the moment, are brought before us on one dead level of colourless accuracy. In its effort to focus so many objects, the eye of the mind becomes first confused, afterwards wholly unresponsive.

Space forbids us to consider M. Hanotaux's treatment of foreign affairs, but it is pleasant to note his grateful recognition of the part played by the Queen and Government of this country in the war scare of 1875, when Bismarck threatened to fall again upon his victim of '70. In view of recent events there is also considerable interest in those portions which deal with Ultramontane pretensions and with the hostility of the Vatican and French bishops to the young Republic. When Jules Simon, one of the best friends of the Catholic Church in France, was, with their usual fatuity, treated by the clericals as an enemy, then were laid the germs of that ardent anti-clericalism of which to-day we see the development.

The English translator surely deserves a better reward than anonymity. His or her work is on the whole done in excellent style. The version is easy and readable, and such errors as we have observed are the result of a too curious fidelity to M. Hanotaux's French. For example, M. Hanotaux speaks of Lord Hartington and Disraeli as in the House of Lords in 1875, and the English translation preserves the misstatement. Again, the French text disfigures the famous editor of the "Times" as M. "Delannes," a slip carefully repeated (p. 251). There are also a number of imperfections in the index.

LIVING SERMONS.*

In the great change that has come about in religious thought in recent years, a feature full of hope for the future is the remarkable way in which representatives of very different schools of theology and ecclesiastical association are found to be drawing nearer to each other in their attempts to restate in the language of to-day the ultimate realities of religion and the relation of faith to life. This is a rapprochement which involves something much deeper than the recognition of a common foe in the selfish materialism against which, at its best, all religion is a protest: still less does it imply indifference as to dogma or to the intellectual expression of the inner life. It is rather the outcome at once of a deepening consciousness of the fundamentals of the Christian religion and a growing apprehension of the inadequacy of language and of any individual mind to express them fully, which has led men to see in other systems than their own an honest endeavour to express some aspect of the truths which transcend them all, even though they may to some extent be immanent in all.

This consciousness, and with it a strong sense of the historic importance for the development of thought and for the spiritual life of humanity both of the Catholic Church as a whole and of the schisms and divisions which have arisen along the ages within it and around it, characterises the remarkable volume of sermons by the Rev. A. L. Lilley, which has recently been published under the title of "Adventus Regni." The sermons deal with the parables of the Kingdom, one parable forming the theme sometimes of several addresses, and the vigour of thought and depth of insight which mark them bear witness to Mr. Lilley's power as a preacher.

Exposition of the teaching of Christ on the true greatness which expresses itself in service, and on the fellowship of His disciples as an earnest of the fellowship of humanity, characterises the passages in which the preacher deals with relations of the Church to the world and to social reform, in such sermons as those on the draw-net, the labourers in the vineyard, the rich fool and the precedence of the guests; while, as one reads, one is sensible once again of the inexhaustible freshness of the Master's words which form the theme of the discourse.

MESSRS. LONGMAN, GREEN & Co. have done well to publish a pocket, india-paper edition of Froude's brilliant "Short Studies on Great Subjects" in five attractively got-up volumes at two shillings each. These studies have stood the test of nearly half a century, and are as fresh and living to-day as when they came from Froude's pen. Granted that the writer was singularly happy in his choice of topics, it is no less true that his vigorous mind and perfect style would have made the dry bones of any subject live. For sheer mastery of words, for ease, lucidity, and strength, Froude is only excelled by Swift, and "Ireland Since the Union" or "On the Uses of a Landed Gentry" may stand beside "The Conduct of the Allies" without shame. The essays, written at intervals between 1852 and 1882, "contain my thoughts, cast in various forms, on the problems with which the present generation has been perplexed." The period was one of immense change—change spiritual, change moral, social, and political. The foundations in every department of thought had broken up, and the disintegration of opinion was so rapid "that wise men and foolish" were equally ignorant where the close of the waning century would find them. The nation, as Froude saw it, was embarked on an irresistible current, and his studies were the observations and experiences of "a single voyager" drawing near the end of his own journey. They contain some of his best and ripest work; nothing sprang more directly from his heart than "A Fortnight in Kerry" or is more pregnant with the best wisdom than "A Siding at a Railway Station." Those who know the Studies with the intimacy of affection will be glad to have them in this new and attractive form; those who have yet to be introduced to them could not make their acquaintance in pleasanter dress.

* "Adventus Regni: Being Sermons, chiefly on the Parables of the Kingdom, preached at St. Mary's, Paddington Green." By A. L. Lilley. 8vo. F. Griffiths. ("English Preachers.")

A Selection from

Messrs. HUTCHINSON & CO.'SAUTUMN ANNOUNCEMENTS*Passages from the Past

By the DUKE OF ARGYLL

In 2 vols. demy 8vo, cloth gilt and gilt top, 24s. net. With 2 Photogravure Frontispieces, numerous Illustrations, many from the Author's own Drawings, and several Facsimile Letters from Celebrated Men. [November 4th.

In the Strange South Seas

By BEATRICE GRIMSHAW

In cloth gilt and gilt top, 16s. net. With 56 Illustrations on Art Paper, principally from the Author's Photographs.

"The writing is admirable; virility, elegance, conciseness, wit, and not a few touches of pathos, contributing to the delight of the reader. There is not a chapter which may be missed without loss; piquant, and vastly entertaining from cover to cover."—Morning Post.

Extinct Birds

By the Hon. WALTER ROTHCHILD, M.P.

An attempt to write in one volume a short account of those birds which have become extinct in historical times—that is, within the last six or seven hundred years; to which are added a few which still exist but are on the verge of extinction. In imperial 4to, half-bound leather, £25 net. With 45 magnificent Coloured Plates (embracing 63 subjects) from Paintings executed expressly for the Work and other Illustrations. [Immediately.

A 1st Edition of 5,000 copies

In Wildest Africa

By C. G. SCHILLINGS

Author of "With Flashlight and Rifle in Equatorial East Africa."

In 2 vols. cloth gilt and gilt top, 24s. net. Printed throughout on the finest English Art Paper. With about 300 Illustrations direct from the Author's Flashlight and other Photographs.

"His book eclipses in interest, as well as in importance, his well-known work 'With Flashlight and Rifle,' which at the time it was published we declared to be the greatest triumph in photography of wild animals ever achieved."—Outlook.

Mandalay, and other Cities of

By V. C. SCOTT O'CONNOR

In 1 volume, 400 pages, super royal 8vo, cloth richly gilt and gilt top, 21s. net. With 8 Coloured Plates and about 200 other Illustrations; the whole printed on Fine Art Paper.

Clubs and Clubmen

By Major ARTHUR GRIFFITHS

In demy 8vo, cloth gilt and gilt top, 10s. 6d. net. [Tuesday next.

Napoleon

By Dr. MAX LENZ

In demy 8vo, cloth gilt and gilt top, 16s. net. With about 50 Portraits and other Illustrations printed on Art Paper, also with Maps and Facsimiles of Autographs. [November 5th.

The House of Howard

By the late GERALD BRENAN and E. PHILLIPS STATHAM

In two volumes, demy 8vo, cloth gilt and gilt top, 24s. net. With 2 Photogravure Frontispieces and 32 Portraits and Illustrations on Art Paper. [November 12th.

"A Fascinating Volume"

Nearest the Pole

By Commander R. E. PEARY

With an Introduction by President ROOSEVELT, and with 90 Illustrations from a collection of 1,200 of the Author's Photographs, and with Coloured Plate, Maps, &c. In crown 4to, buckram gilt and gilt top, 21s. net.

LONDON: HUTCHINSON & CO., Paternoster Row.

THE GRANT RICHARDS BOOKS

The Grant Richards Books may be found everywhere. They are recognisable by their distinctive excellence of format. Among the notable new ones this Autumn are:

Nooks and Corners of Old Paris, by Georges Cain, with over one hundred illustrations. "An attractive book full of beautiful reproductions."—The Times. 10/6 net.

A new volume of essays, by G. W. E. Russell, author of "Collections and Re-collections"—A Pocketful of Sixpences, which will be ready on Nov. 6th. 7/6 net.

A new novel by the author of "Susan." The Scoundrel, by Ernest Oldmeadow. "Excellent," says The Morning Post. "A distinct advance on 'Susan'."—The Tribune. 6/-

The Genteel AB, by A. J. Dawson, author of "The Message." "Only surpassed, if at all, by W. W. Jacobs' stories."—The Morning Post. "A great creation." 2nd edition. 6/-

"A book which every boy will prize," says The Daily News, is The Boys' Book of Locomotives, by J. R. Howden, with over 100 illustrations from photographs. 6/-

Folk of the Wild, by Bertram Atkey, with thirty-two illustrations by Harry Rown-tree. "An excellent book, entertaining throughout."—Athenæum. 6/-

A prose anthology, The Call of the Sea, by F. G. Aflalo, "For which there is distinctly room," says The Scotsman. With coloured endpapers by William Hyde. 4/- net.

Bernard Shaw, by Holbrook Jackson. "A really interesting and capable book on G. B. S.," says G. K. Chesterton in The Morning Post. With four portraits. 5/- net.

Send for Illustrated Autumn List (ready shortly) or prospectuses of any book to Department N., c/o E. Grant Richards, 7, Carlton Street, London, S.W.

E. GRANT RICHARDS, LONDON.

THE NOVEL OF THE WEEK.*

SOME years ago Mr. James Prior in "Forest Folk" wrote one of the best novels of country life our generation has produced. It was not especially remarked on by the reviewers, and small wonder. Solid, honest in workmanship, framed with a cunning experience of the hard realities of the countryman's life, it stood among modern novels much as a piece of farmhouse oaken furniture stands among the glued and gimcrack rubbish of these manufacturing days. Its fate was the fate of that finely unconventional novel of Richard Jefferies, "Amaryllis at the Fair," which has been passed over by our tasteless generation. But in "Forest Folk" Mr. James Prior showed himself of the elect, and "A Walking Gentleman" confirms the enthusiasm a few critics felt for the former work six years ago. "A Walking Gentleman" is by no means a perfect thing, but it is the rare genuine thing, which is almost, if not quite, as good.

"Not for the middle classes" would perhaps be the most apt designation of the novel. For what is simply human, frank, direct in observation of life, free from idealistic gilding, and the stucco of patent unrealities, seems to be out of middle-class favour. And Mr. Prior's novel chronicles in most simple and forcible style the racy coarseness, the slang and roadside gibes, of Nottinghamshire labourers, harvesters, pit-hands, tramps, stonebreakers, beanfeasters; chronicles, in short, the humours of the democracy, fasting, feasting, fighting, stomaching everything that comes in the day's work. Mr. Prior is a master of "low life," as the eighteenth century styled it, but let not the reader run away with the idea that his novel is therefore unrefined, unfit for polite reading. Oh, dear, no! His novel is a test of the reader's mental quality, and the Misses Pole, the "Polite Finer Shades" of Meredith's "Sandra Belloni," would have condemned it as unreservedly as Lady Charlotte would have delighted in it. For in "A Walking Gentleman" the author breaks through the flimsy skin of appearances and appeals to the essential man in all of us, to our appetite for adventure, to our depth of heart, to our capacity for wholesome laughter, to our sense of human comradeship. And that is why the novel is not for the man who is ashamed of his own feelings and nervously expert at dodging reality.

The hero of the novel, Lord Bailey, overcome with a feeling of unutterable boredom, and depressed because he is "within twenty-eight hours of wedlock" with a woman, Lady Sarah Sallis, whom he likes but does not love, in a fit of mental vacuity, leaves The Towers one fine morning and faces the open road. To escape from himself, he plunges into companionship with a party of factory hands beanfeasting, passes the night out, and by a series of accidents leaves his bride to face the position of reaching and leaving the church doors without a bridegroom. Finding himself unable to explain, and not wishing to explain anything, he hides his whereabouts from his friends, hobnobs with vagrants, carters, miners, stonebreakers, &c., and enters on the odyssey of hard times which is destined to make a new man of him. Mr. Prior by his treatment of this odd passage in a man's ordinary life, and his breaking-away from the clinging mesh of habit, shows rare psychological insight into the obscure sensations of a suffering spirit in a fatigued body. We believe in Lord Bailey from the first page, not so much in the man's character as in the sequence of sensations which assail him while he is exposed to the abnormal vicissitudes of his wandering life. The author catches with an unerring instinct the eerie feelings of a man's twilight consciousness, and the agitations of obscure and sick terror in the face of complete isolation at night, when, worn out and lost in unknown country, the wanderer tries vainly to escape back to human life. Mr. Prior has a poetic sense of landscape, of the fugitive effects of dawn and dusk that is really quite remarkable. It is this strange mingling of romance and realism that makes his novel, and gives it an individuality all its own. The direct and striking realism of the talk of Nottinghamshire rustics is quite Hogarthian in its force, and nobody in our day, we venture to say, has come so close to the labouring man's density of brain with his shrewd faculty of dealing out home truths.

* "A Walking Gentleman." By James Prior. Constable & Co. 6s.

The coarse surface of rural life, the half-animal passions, the cautious stolidity that amounts to cowardice, the harshness and hardness of the field labourer's view along with all the better instincts that quickly respond on occasion, these are admirably drawn by Mr. Prior, and in the aristocratic Lord Bailey's sensitiveness and truth of feeling, he has found the artistic contrast and measuring standard. With all the praise we give to "A Walking Gentleman," and it is difficult to overpraise the quality of this performance, it must be added that if Mr. Prior has not written a masterpiece it is because his faculty of self-criticism is not particularly strong. Whenever he touches on middle-class life he jars. Whenever he passes from the real life of the country people, which he knows so intimately, to the extravagances of cityfied vagabonds, such as the nigger minstrel Sambo, and Jack the tramp, his work loses sureness of touch, and becomes at times even a little vulgar. The chapters dealing with Lord Bailey's experiences with Sambo are not worthy to stand with the rest. We feel that the humour is forced, the talk not quite natural, the human observation often at fault. Perhaps a fourth of the book could be pruned away, with great advantage to the rest. But in the remainder the play of humour and insight is a perpetual feast. Though no quotation can give much idea of the novel's atmosphere, we quote a passage that describes a quarrel between rustics greedily eager for the hundred pounds reward offered for the discovery of Lord Bailey:—

"That theer hunderd pound's mine," said the middle-aged; "my lad fun' 'im out."

With heavy activity he rose to his feet.

"Twere my paper," said his junior, who, starting later, was on his feet as soon.

"What's the paper got to do wee't?"

"What's your lad got to do wee't?"

The old man came up too, saying:

"It belungs all on's, we're all in co for't, by raison an' by natur'."

"If yo stop an' faight now, fayther," said the boy, "the mester ull mizzle."

Thick-head that he was the father saw the force of the reasoning, and turned his ireful face from opposition to his comrade. Both ran in pursuit. The boy followed, the old man came last; the dog, seeing the prevalent excitement, rushed ahead barking; then stopped and looked back with a what-can-I-do-for-you expression, as if distracted between imaginations of rats, stray sheep, hostile dogs, and felonious strangers. At which, and the loud holloaing of the men, Bailey turned, as the lighter man got within arm's length. But before he had spoken his rival was level with him, so much had greed stood him instead of agility.

"Who be yer?"

"Be yer Lord Bailey?"

As their utterances were simultaneous, so his answer was joint.

"I decline to answer."

The quietude of his speech and bearing abashed them; they stood not knowing what to do except damn the dog for barking; until presently the old man arrived and thrust breathlessly into the conference.

"We mun tek 'im to the pinfo'd," he gasped.

The boy aimed his stone before he aimed his retort.

"He'd ger out; like a scooperell. Fayther, tek 'im to the pleeceman."

Straightway the father's heavy hand was on the peer's right shoulder.

"Yo mun coom wi' me."

As quick was Dick to hook himself to the peer's left arm.

"An' wi' me."

"An' me an' all," squeaked the oldster behind, taking an eager, trembling hold on Bailey's belt. "I may a third."

"How can yer?" said the youngest. "Baint yer on th' parish?"

"That shan't stan' in th' road; I'll goo off the parish."

"Oad Sim Wood'us," said Nat, clenching his fist and gathering his brows, "if yer doan't tek yer damned wezzened oad hand off'n 'im I'll bash yer oad brains out for to muck the ground wee'."

Old Sim Woodhouse shrank back but a very little, so nearly did greed balance fear.

"Dick Pres'on, the man's mine; let 'im goo."

"I wain't," said Dick Preston, with a rising choleric redness. "M'appen, Nat Ragdale, yo think yo're head Sir Rag?"

The two began to threaten and curse, hustle and haul.

"Listen to me, you two dunderheads," said Lord Bailey; and perforce they listened. "I don't particularly object to going to the police-station with you, since you think well to take that urchin's advice; but understand that I'm not obliged to go and that I go in my own way or not at all. Remove your hand." Dick's hand was off even while he meditated refusal. "And yours." Nat Ragdale's grasp was loosened almost before he spoke. "Now then! Do you wish to go?"

"Ay," said Dick.

"Of coorse I do," said Nat.

"We agree to that," said Sim Woodhouse.

"Then keep that dog quiet and lead the way."

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.

INDIAN JOTTINGS.—Some Experiences of an English Clergyman during ten years of Mission Work in and around Poona City. By the REV. EDWARD F. ELWIN, of the Society of St. John the Evangelist. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

A SOLDIER OF THE LEGION.—An Englishman's adventures under the French Flag in Algeria and Tonquin. By GEORGE MANINGTON. Edited by WILLIAM B. SLATER and ARTHUR J. SARL. With Maps and Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

THE LETTERS OF ROBERT SCHUMANN, Musician and Composer, 1810–1856. Translated from the German of Dr. CHARLES STORCK by Miss HANNAH BRYANT. With a Portrait. Demy 8vo. 9s. net. [Ready next week.]

LUCRETIIUS, Epicurean and Poet. By JOHN MASSON, LL.D. Demy 8vo. 12s. net. [Ready next week.]

MARMADUKE PICKTHALL'S NEW NOVEL.
THE MYOPES. 6s.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

No. 418. OCTOBER, 1907. 6s.

1. The Peelites.
2. Oliver Goldsmith. By Sidney T. Irwin.
3. The Religions of the Far East. I—China. By Sir C. Eliot, K.C.M.G.
4. The Water-Supply of the United Kingdom. By Urquhart A. Forbes.
5. Florentine Athens. By W. Miller.
6. Mysticism in the English Poets. By Caroline F. E. Spurgeon.
7. Burma Under British Rule.
8. The Gardens of Italy. By H. Sneyd.
9. The Gentle Craft. By Major Broadfoot, R.E.
10. M. Sorel's "Europe and the French Revolution."
11. The Letters of Queen Victoria.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

NISBET & CO.'S NEW BOOKS. CRIMINALS & CRIME.

Some Facts and Suggestions.

By SIR ROBERT ANDERSON, K.C.B.

Demy 8vo, 5s. net.

The Daily Mail says:—"A remarkable book. . . . Sir Robert Anderson's book, and the reforms he advocates, deserve careful scrutiny."

FRANK T. BULLEN'S NEW SEA-STORY. THE CALL OF THE DEEP.

With Coloured Illustrations. 6s.

The Daily Telegraph writes:—"An admirable sea story, worthy to rank after Captain Marryat's yarns. . . . Boys will like the book, and so will men and women."

The Spectator says:—"The story is full of real life from beginning to end . . . wholesome to the core."

By Mrs. L. T. MEADE.

THE RED CAP OF LIBERTY.

A Romance of the French Revolution.

The Tribune says:—"A charming tale."

The Liverpool Courier says:—"A brisk and attractive narrative."

By F. COWLEY WHITEHOUSE.

THE SNIPER. Fully Illustrated. 3s. 6d.

The Daily News says:—"One of the best school stories we have seen this season. It belongs to the very best type of schoolboy literature."

A HISTORY OF ITALIAN UNITY.

(1814-1871). By BOLTON KING, M.A.

In two vols. With Maps and Plans. Demy 8vo, 24s. net.

ITALY TO-DAY. A Study of her position, her politics, and her society. By BOLTON KING, and THOMAS OKEY. With Maps. Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

WORKS BY J. A. HOBSON.

In Cloth 2s. 6d. net.

JOHN RUSKIN. Social Reformer.

THE SOCIAL PROBLEM. Life and Work.

J. NISBET & Co. LTD., 22, Berners Street, W.

MESSRS. MACLEHOSE & SONS.

CAIRD.—LAY SERMONS AND ADDRESSES.

Delivered in the Hall of Balliol College, Oxford. By EDWARD CAIRD, LL.D., D.C.L., late Master. 1 vol. post 8vo., 6s. net.

"We can promise the reader of this volume a sense of spiritual refreshment and of moral stimulus such as are seldom met with in the literature of the day."—Manchester Guardian.

"The relation of the speaker to his audience gives a directness and a personal flavour to the short addresses which is hardly to be got in abstruser treatises and more elaborate lectures."—Times Literary Supplement.

"Young men in general, and middle-aged men too, may be heartily commended to the broadening and bracing influence of this most welcome volume."—Tribune.

Prof. HENRY JONES says:—"Reflective men, to whom the things of the spirit mean more than aught else, will consider that Dr. Edward Caird, by his more intimate expression of the thoughts which have ruled his own life and guided his great and consistent endeavour for the welfare of his people, has laid them under an obligation not easy to measure."—Glasgow Herald.

"They appeal not to dogma or authority, but to history, philosophy, and human nature. And for that reason they will be welcomed by a far wider audience than that to which they were originally addressed, as supplying something greatly needed by the modern man, and something which he very seldom finds in ordinary sermons or theological writings."—Westminster Gazette.

Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart.

A Record of Chivalry.

THE SCALACRONICA OF SIR THOMAS GRAY.

The Reigns of Edward I., Edward II., and Edward III., as recorded by SIR THOMAS GRAY. Translated by the Right Hon. SIR HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart. With 102 Heraldic Shields in Colour, 1 vol. crown 4to, 24s. net; Fine-Paper Edition, 42s. net.

The Edition is limited to 95 Copies on Hand-Made Paper with Proofs, and 195 Copies of the Ordinary Edition. Very few Copies remain for sale.

"Sir Herbert Maxwell has placed all students of Scottish history under a great debt of obligation. Here we get history at first hand and of special value. An important feature of the volume is the series of 102 heraldic shields in colour."—Antiquary.

"No book is more sure of a welcome from students of Scottish history than this valuable and scholarly version of an authority hitherto inaccessible to a great majority of readers."—Scotsman.

ALEXANDER.—A SHORT HISTORY OF PHILOSOPHY.

By ARCHD. B. D. ALEXANDER, M.A. 1 vol. post 8vo, 600 pages, 8s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Alexander's new book fills a wide gap in English philosophical works. It is a most useful book, both in matter and arrangement, and one that most of us have long wanted on our shelves."—Tribune.

"This is one of the most welcome and useful books that has recently come into our hands. . . . The general reader who wishes to round off his mental equipment with a clear view of the course of philosophic thought, will find here exactly what he is seeking."—Westminster Review.

"Mr. Alexander has produced a work that should be found of great service to students, and is, in English at least, something new. His exposition of individual writers is excellently clear."—Westminster Gazette.

"This is a book to be read and pondered by every man who cares to know what is the meaning of life and of the world of nature, of mind and of spirit."—Yorkshire Post.

ALLAN.—THE ADVENT OF THE FATHER.

By ARCHIBALD ALLAN, M.A., Minister of Channelkirk. 1 vol. crown 8vo, 6s. net.

"The writer has attempted to realise the Thought and Faith of Jesus from the Four Gospels, in order to reach some certainty regarding His distinctive teaching concerning the Father-God and all human relationship towards Him."—Extract from Preface.

ELIZABETHAN TRAVELS.

NEW VOLUMES.

FYNES MORYSON'S TRAVELS.

An Itinerary written by Fynes Moryson, Gent., containing his Ten Yeres Travell through the Twelve Dominions of Germany, Bohmerland, Switzerland, Netherland, Denmarke, Poland, Italy, Turkey, France, England, Scotland, and Ireland. 4 vols. 50s. net.

[Vols. I. and II. This day.]

SPECIAL EDITION on Hand-Made Paper, with Proofs on Japanese, limited to 100 Copies, £5 net.

This is the First Reprint since the Original Edition in 1617.

A fully Illustrated Prospectus of Messrs. MacLehose's very important Series of "Voyages and Travels in the Sixteenth Century" will be sent post-free on application.

Glasgow:

JAMES MACLEHOSE & SONS, Publishers to the University.
London, New York, and Toronto: MACMILLAN & CO., Limited.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

FOR many readers the most interesting chapter in "Some Dorset Manor Houses: With Their Literary and Historical Associations," by Sidney Heath and W. De C. Prideaux (Bemrose), will be the last. It describes Wool Manor House, the house to which Angel Clare took Tess on the day of their wedding, and in the kitchen of which she made the confession related with such tragic force by Mr. Hardy. The house, we are told in Hutchins's "History of Dorset," anciently belonged to the Abbey of Bindon, and "was granted, 32 Henry VIII., to Sir Thomas Poynings, and thence to his brother, Sir Adrian. Hence it came to the Turbervilles, 20 Eliz. John, son and heir of Thomas Turberville, held it, with the manor Winterburn Musterton and lands in Bere Regis; the same person held it 31 Eliz. This farm, with the manor of Bere, were purchased from the heirs of Turberville by Henry Drax, Esq., and in 1862 belongs to his heirs." Although neither Hutchins nor the authors of the present volume mention the fact, it seems probable that the Poynings referred to was the son of Sir Edward Poynings, who gave his name to the two famous Poynings' Laws which were for nearly three centuries the basis of English rule in Ireland. The most noteworthy of the Turbervilles (excepting Tess) was George Turberville, secretary to Sir Thomas Randolph, Queen Elizabeth's ambassador in Russia. His description of the manners and customs of the Russian people was published in Hakluyt's "Voyages," and his translation of Ovid into English verse was also celebrated in its day. The other manor houses described in the volume give the authors an opportunity for indulging in much pleasant gossip, but we regret that they have not stretched their net wider and included some of the smaller manors in which Dorset is so rich. As it is, there are only twenty houses dealt with—an absurdly small number considering the resources at the authors' disposal. Within the limits which they have fixed for themselves Mr. Heath and Mr. Prideaux are quite at home, and the pleasantly written accounts of the places they have chosen are delightful reading. The reproductions of memorial brasses from rubbings made by Mr. Prideaux are finely done, and add greatly to the value of the book.

* * *

MRS. ELEANOR C. SMYTH explains that the main facts in her Life of her father, published under the title "Sir Rowland Hill: The Story of a Great Reform" (Fisher Unwin, 5s. net), are taken from Dr. Birkbeck Hill's elaborate "Life of Sir Rowland Hill and History of Penny Postage." She had permission from Dr. Birkbeck Hill, who was her cousin, to take from his pages such materials as she cared to incorporate, but her book has a special interest as being written by "the one of my father's children most intimately associated with his home life," and therefore enjoying special opportunities of knowing his life-work. In an excellent introduction she touches upon the literary, artistic, and scientific men with whom her father was intimate, among the former being De Quincey, who, she tells us, was once, while under the influence of opium, discovered by Sir Rowland Hill and a friend hiding in an East End slum, under the wholly erroneous impression that "enemies" were seeking to molest him. The remainder of the book gives an excellent account of the Postal Reform movement, and Sir Rowland Hill's struggles against an opposition which now seems incredible. The difficulties he had to face were enormous, and the influences brought to bear against him may be gathered from the fact that Lord Canning, when Postmaster-General, thought it right to mention that Sir Rowland Hill had "enemies in high places," who made every endeavour to prejudice the Postmaster-General against him. Mrs. Smyth's readable volume is a worthy tribute to her father's memory.

* * *

"NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD PARIS," by Georges Cain, with a preface by Victorien Sardou (Grant Richards, 10s. 6d. net), is a gossip collection of facts and anecdotes about the famous streets and buildings of one of the most fascinating cities in the world. M. Cain, who is the curator of the Carnavalet Museum, knows his Paris well, and writes about it with gusto. He has a particular fondness for the places now haunted by booksellers, and pays a deserved tribute to the publisher Flammarion, whose generously displayed volumes in the arcades of the Odéon have attracted countless readers. It is said that an old book-lover of narrow purse owned that he had read the whole of Darwin's "Origin of Species" while standing in front of the stall. Even more interesting than M. Cain's text are the large number of illustrations. There are more than a hundred of them, and although the raison d'être of some of them in the book—such, for instance, as the portrait of Alfred de Musset at the age of twenty-three—is not obvious, the greater number will be welcomed by most readers. Unfortunately, the translator's part is not well performed. In many cases he seems unable to render a French idiom by a corresponding English one, while in others he gives irritating renderings of the names of places such as Vosges-square for the Place de Vosges.

* * *

AN exciting book of travel and adventure is "The Long Labrador Trail," by Dillon Wallace (Hodder & Stoughton, 7s. 6d.). Mr. Wallace, with five companions, started on his expedition in June, 1905 and got back to Eskimo Point in the April of the following year, having traversed in a little over eleven months nearly three thousand miles of unexplored territory. The details of the travelling are profoundly interesting. The explorers had many difficulties to overcome; their provisions fell short, more than once they lost the trail, and the cold was often intense. Mr. Wallace had peculiar opportunities of observing the Indians and Eskimos, and his chapters on their customs and beliefs are among the most interesting in the book. There are a number of illustrations from photographs which give a capital idea of the beauty of the empty land over which Mr. Wallace and his companions journeyed.

* * *

"SIR GAWAIN AND THE LADY OF LYS," translated by Jessie L. Weston (Nutt, 2s. net), is the seventh volume in the series of Arthurian romances not represented in Malory. The stories, "Sir Gawain and the Lady of Lys" and "Castle Orguellous," which it contains together with "Sir Gawain and the Green Knight," included in the first volume of the series, belong, Miss Weston thinks, to an early collection of poems dealing with the feats of Sir Gawain and his kin. Miss Weston has an enthusiastic admiration for her hero, and wishes that students of Malory would, despite the fascination of his noble style, lay him aside for a short time and, turning back to the true Arthurian legend, learn at last to do justice to one of the most gracious and picturesque figures in literature. Certainly the stories she gives us stir our admiration for the valiant and generous Sir Gawain who is their hero.

* * *

A NUMBER of interesting reprints have recently appeared. Mr. Fisher Unwin publishes a finely illustrated edition in two volumes of George Eliot's "Romola" (10s. net), with an introduction and notes by Dr. Guido Biagi, of the Laurentian Library, Florence; Mr. Dent issues Jane Austen's "Pride and Prejudice" in his "English Idylls" series, with beautiful illustrations in colour by Mr. C. E. Brock; Messrs. George Bell have added Ranke's "History of the Popes," George Ebers' "An Egyptian Princess," and Hooper's "Waterloo" (2s. net each volume) to their "York Library"—a great improvement in appearance and ease in handling to "Bohn"; and from Messrs. Chapman and Hall comes a welcome reprint in handy form of Forster's "Life of Charles Dickens" (2s. net). All these are standard works, and the publishers have issued them in a form which can be recommended to those who do not possess copies, or who wisely think that a book is one of the best presents one can make to a friend.

* * *

OF making books about Venice there is no end, but most readers will be glad to have a new and cheaper edition of Mr. Marion Crawford's "Studies in Venetian History" (Macmillan, 8s. 6d. net). His book is inspired by a genuine love of Venice, and is the work of one who is deeply versed in her romantic history. It has already won recognition in a more expensive form, so that there is no need to enlarge upon its merits. We can only recommend to those interested in Venetian history who do not already possess a copy this delightful volume from the pen of a writer who has also won distinction in other fields.

MAGMILLAN'S NEW BOOKS.

LEAVES FROM THE NOTE-BOOKS OF LADY DOROTHY NEVILL.

Edited by RALPH NEVILL. With Photogravure Portraits
8vo. 15s. net.

WILLIAM ALLINGHAM: A Diary.

Edited by H. ALLINGHAM and D. RADFORD. With Portraits in Photogravure. 8vo. 12s. net.

The Standard: "A delightful book, rich in the obiterdicta of men who have left a permanent mark on the literature of England."

FREDERIC HARRISON

THE PHILOSOPHY OF COMMON SENSE.

By FREDERIC HARRISON. Extra cover 8vo. 7s. 6d. net. [Wednesday.]

THE MAN-EATERS OF TSAVO.

And Other East African Adventures.

By Lieut-Colonel J. H. PATTERSON, D.S.O. With numerous Illustrations. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

The Saturday Review: "Colonel Patterson tells some of the most thrilling lion stories we have ever read. No boy's book of imaginary adventures published at this season is likely to make its reader hold his breath more frequently than this modest but veracious record."

CONCLUDING VOL. NOW READY.

A HISTORY OF THE INQUISITION OF SPAIN.

By HENRY CHARLES LEA, LL.D. In 4 vols. Vol. IV. 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

 Previously published Vols. I., II., and III., 10s. 6d. net each.

ENGLAND AND GERMANY.

Republished from the The Observer by AUSTIN HARRISON. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. [Tuesday.]

BRITISH COLONIAL POLICY, 1754-1765.

By GEORGE LOUIS BEER. 8vo. 8s. 6d. net.

NOW IS THE TIME TO SUBSCRIBE.

NEW VOL. COMMENCES WITH THE NOVEMBER NUMBER.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE

Illustrated. Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, 16s.
The NOVEMBER Number contains

THE QUEST OF EDITH.

By STEPHEN PHILLIPS.

THE REMINISCENCES OF LADY RANDOLPH CHURCHILL.

I.—Early Recollections—Paris in 1869. By Mrs. GEORGE CORNWALLIS-WEST.

MARS AS THE ABODE OF LIFE.

By PERCIVAL LOWELL.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.
Vol. LXXIV. May—October, 1907. Price 10s. 6d.

 Messrs. Macmillan will be glad to receive applications for their Illustrated List of Recent and Forthcoming Publications, which will be sent regularly to any address.

MACMILLAN & CO. LTD., LONDON.

Cloth, 2s. 6d. net, by post, 2s. 9d.

The Liberal State: A Speculation.

By THOMAS WHITTAKER.

"The democratic ideal."—Nottingham Daily Guardian.

"Deserves a cordial reception from those Liberals who realise how seriously present-day Liberalism needs a philosophy as distinguished from a programme."—The Nation.

"Mr. Whittaker shows a profound and scholarly knowledge of the classical writers upon this subject, and his essay marks him as a serious thinker of ability."—Daily News.

"Even if we differ diametrically from the opinions laid down, we may find pleasure in the breadth of the scholarly deductions drawn from historical example."—The Outlook.

"An interesting and suggestive book."—Tribune.

London: WATTS & Co., 17, Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, E.C.

Pp. 776. Portrait and Memoir. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. post free.

COMPENDIUM OF SWEDENBORG'S THEOLOGICAL WRITINGS.

 Because Swedenborg has written so much, many who are strangers to his works are deterred from making their acquaintance from not knowing what to select and where to begin. This work contains the most important passages, arranged under heads, so as to present a complete and authoritative exposition of what he taught.

London: SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury Street.

The KOH-I-NOOR PENCIL

A SIGN OF PENCIL PERFECTION

The Pencil that gives the best results and the most lasting satisfaction is undoubtedly L. & C. Hardtmuth's "Koh-I-Noor." It is without flaw or fault—the perfection of pencil production. The lead is prepared and compressed by a process which gives it an inimitable touch, smooth as velvet. One can use the "Koh-I-Noor" from end to end without once experiencing that jarring scratch or sudden snap of the lead which is so common an occurrence when using ordinary pencils.

IF A FOURPENNY KOH-I-NOOR EASILY OUTLASTS ANY SIX PENNY PENCILS, AND DOES BETTER WORK ALL THE TIME—THERE IS A DISTINCT SAVING FOR YOU. AND IT DOES.

KOH-I-NOOR Pencils 4d. each, 3s. 6d. per dozen, everywhere. Of Stationers, &c. Booklet post free from L. & C. HARDTMUTH, 12, Golden Lane, London, E.C.

MADE BY L. & C. HARDTMUTH IN AUSTRIA

ELLIOT STOCK'S NEW BOOKS.

In medium 8vo, tastefully printed, suitably bound and illustrated, price 6s. net.

GLEANINGS AFTER TIME: Chapters in Social and Domestic History. Edited by G. L. APPERSON, I.S.O., Author of "An Idler's Calendar," "Bygone London Life," &c. With 29 Illustrations. In this volume regard has been had to the human and domestic side of social history in this country and in America.

In large crown 8vo, suitably bound and illustrated, price 6s. net.

THE STORY OF THE ENGLISH CARDINALS FROM 1144 TO THE PRESENT DAY. By the Rev. CHARLES S. ISAACSON, Rector of Hardingham, and sometime Fellow of Clare College, Cambridge.

The "Story of the English Cardinals" is written on the plan of "The Story of the Later Popes" by the same author. It is of a personal and anecdotal character, but contains a fairly complete account of the dealings of the Papacy with England from the time of the first cardinal (A.D. 1144) to the present day.

NEW NOVELS.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

JAEL, AN AUSTRALIAN STORY. By E. L. SUTHERLAND.

'Jael' is the story of a girl who devoted her life to the carrying out of an ideal suggested to her by a book she read in her early teens.

NEW NOVEL FOUNDED ON ITALIAN LIFE IN THE MIDDLE OF THE LAST CENTURY. In Crown 8vo, bound in cloth, price 6s.

CAPTAIN VIVANTI'S PURSUIT. By G. S. GODKIN, Author of "The Life of Victor Emmanuel," "The Monastery of San Marco," "Stories from Italy," &c.

"Pleasantly readable . . . The author knows his ground, and writes with agreeable brightness."—Sheffield Daily Independent.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 2s. 6d. net.

THE MASTER KEY. A Story of Inspiration. By GEORGE ROYDS.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 2s. 6d.

THE NEW VICAR OF WAKEFIELD. An Australian Story. By S. G. FIELDING, Author of "The Southern Light," "Down to the Sea in Ships," &c.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "LOTUS OR LAUREL."

SECOND EDITION.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 6s.

HASTY FRUIT. By HELEN WALLACE. Author of "The Greatest of These," "Lotus or Laurel?" &c.

"A tale of merit, with fine character."—Times.

"Graphically written, and the interest is well maintained all the way through."—Sketch.

CHEAP EDITION.

In crown 8vo, bound in cloth, price 3s. 6d.

MY NEIGHBOUR. A Tale of Our Own Times. By E. G. STEVENSON.

"The book has a simple charm, while the wholesome love interest it contains will commend it to readers."—Dundee Advertiser.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62, Paternoster Row, LONDON, E.C.

The Week in the City.

THE MORAL OF THE AMERICAN CRISIS.

THIS has been one of the stormiest weeks in modern financial history. I have several times said of late that the monetary position here is far better than last year, if we judge merely by the strength of the Bank of England's gold reserve, which is usually a fair index to the state of the money market. But I have always added that the fair weather might be disturbed by collapses of credit in one of the great financial centres, such as New York or Berlin. The failures in Amsterdam and Hamburg, and the collapse of copper speculation in Boston and New York, were the heralds of the great panic in New York, which began on Tuesday with the run on the Knickerbocker Trust Company. In England a run on a bank means a run for gold. It was by playing on the fears of the Government and advising the people to "go for gold" that Francis Place helped to pass the Reform Bill of 1832. But a "run" on an American Bank means a run for paper and silver. It is just as terrible a thing. It marks the collapse of the fabric of credit. No bank, of course, can hope to keep all its resources liquid; and where the currency is in a chaotic and disorganised condition, as it is in the United States, institutions which incur popular suspicion at a time of crisis are doomed.

A brief description of the situation in New York and of the run on the Knickerbocker Trust Company will be found in the "Notes" at the commencement of THE NATION. I am only concerned here with the probable future, especially as they affect us here. The difficulties in Manchester have been solved, as I intimated last week, by a banking amalgamation, which absorbs the Lancaster Banking Company in the Manchester and Liverpool District Bank. So far as London is concerned, no serious difficulties are anticipated at present. The Stock Exchange is in a very cheerful mood, and I have heard leading brokers congratulating themselves on the emancipation of London from the United States. Certainly the amount of American paper financed in London has been much reduced. But there are many loans whose margins have run off, and certain institutions will have to nurse depreciated securities for a long time to come. It would be too much to hope that London will be unaffected by the crash in New York. Its echoes will be heard soon; but we are not likely to see anything like the debacle that is taking place across the Atlantic.

Our great safeguard is our free trade system, which makes it difficult for any concern to bolster itself up on artificial props. Our finance houses live and thrive or pine and die on their merits—on their successes and failures in open competition. We have very few rotten houses of importance that really compete with the banks after the fashion of the trust companies of New York. And all branches of our commerce are kept sound and healthy by the ever-present medicine of foreign competition. They tell me in the City that the Amsterdam crisis is now mending, and that the banks there are beginning to introduce a reformed plan, which will put an end to the system of serving out rubbishy securities to the foolish boors in the country districts. The Hamburg affair is more ominous, and I am afraid that the position in Berlin and some other banking centres of Germany is rather bad. The German banks are partners in all sorts of speculative concerns, and there would have been some open disturbances ere now were it not for the Prussian system of administration. If depositors take fright in Germany, I imagine that the police would be told to arrest them as they ran on the bank, and the bank would be heavily fined if it attempted to pay its depositors in gold! Of course, this artificiality really makes the banking position in Germany more dangerous as a whole; but it also makes it more difficult to predict exactly where and how the mischief will come to the surface. Certainly to the student international finance has never presented so many complex and fascinating problems. If I were asked to point out weak spots at home, I should mention the Kaffir Market, the firms which speculate in metals and in Canadian securities, and Metropolitan railway interests. The firmness of Consols is a mainstay, and reflects great credit on Mr. Asquith, whose big-sinking fund naturally inspires confidence. The twaddle about Socialism hardly deceives anyone, and even the Tory journals can scarcely bring themselves to support the railway directors in their refusal to confer with the Amalgamated Society.

THE FOOD PROBLEM AND STRIKES IN JAPAN.

According to a Japanese statistician, the cost of living has risen in the last ten years about 36 per cent. in Japan, and 42 per cent. in the United States. The price of rice, the staple food, last month was 20 per cent. higher in Japan than a year ago. Salt, soy, and other necessities of life have also risen, but wages remain unchanged. I commend this to our Tariff Reformers, who seem to imagine that when Protection has raised prices the manufacturers will be able to raise wages. The consequence in Japan is that there has been a serious crop of strikes in the industrial centres. The following account is translated from the "Osaka Mainichi," one of the best Japanese newspapers:—

"On January 14th, 30 employees of tailoring shops in Yamaguchi and a number of story-tellers went on strike for an increase of wages; on the 15th, 500 workers employed in sugar-refining in Osaka struck for an increase of wages and better treatment; on the 17th, the employees of the Takamatsu Electric Light Company left their work; on February 1st, 400 cotton printing operatives in Tokyo demanded an increase of wages by 30 per cent.; and 1,170 operatives in the Miike spinning mill also struck; on the 6th, carpenters and blacksmiths in Miike ceased work; on the 12th, 53 carriers in the Kyoto General Post Office struck; on the 16th, 800 operatives at the Mitsu Bishi Shipbuilding Yard at Nagasaki and 500 workers at the Ikuno mine struck work; on the 21st, the hands of the Horonai colliery struck; on March 3rd, 200 workers at the Shingu colliery in Kishu struck; on the 4th the Ashio copper mines workers struck and created a disturbance; on the 6th, 600 workers at the Ikushunetsu colliery in the Hokkaido struck; about 1,000 men at a gold mine in Niigata Prefecture also struck; on the 11th, all the workers at the Uraga Dock Yard; on June 6th, workers at the Besshi copper mine; on July 1st, 21 workers at the Yubari colliery; and between the 30th ultimo and the 2nd instant the workers at the Ikuno silver mine refused to work."

The grievance of the Ikuno miners is definitely stated to be the high price of rice supplied by the mine office. On the occasion of the last strike the office agreed to supply the men with rice at a low price, but they are charged 16 sen per sho. The men expected that they would have to pay from 8 to 10 sen, as at other mines. The strikers sent in an application accordingly, and, failing to receive satisfaction, went on strike. The market price of rice, it should be added, has risen to 19 or 20 sen per sho for the lower qualities; so the mine owners were naturally impelled to break their bargain. It is a good object lesson on the way in which the cost of food, like the cost of coal or raw material, enters into prices. A rise in the price of food is probably the worst thing that can happen to a manufacturing country.

A THEORY OF EXPORTS.

Another mistake of the Tariff Reformers was in choosing exports as the true test of prosperity. They used to deplore the excess of imports and the slow growth of exports. But for some time this has been reversed. A clever American economist has been pointing out that our Board of Trade returns for September, compared with recent American and German statistics, pointed to a new development in international trade balances, which will sadly perplex Mr. Hewins and his staff. The returns show, he said, an increase in exports over the same month last year of 26,000,000 dol., reducing the excess of imports to 50,000,000 dol., the smallest of any month since before the Boer War. Last year's September excess of imports was 72,717,000 dol.; in 1903 it was 110,675,000 dol. What, he asks, has brought about this extraordinary change? For one thing, he points out, by way of answer, England has not forced prices in her home market to abnormal levels; this has had the double result of keeping imports down—they hardly increased at all over September, 1906, and of getting a foreign market for its manufactures. But this is not all; the extraordinary increase in home consumption of merchandise, elsewhere than in England, and notably in Germany and in the United States, has not only forced the other great manufacturing States to import goods from Great Britain, but has left them unable to maintain their own previous export trade. What they have lost in exports of manufactures to neutral States, England has gained.

Restful nights

and wakeful days when you use

Plasmon Cocoa.

CONTAINS NEARLY 70%
NOURISHMENT.

START USING NOW.

The Best Tonic

For the restoration of energy and vitality; the relief of mental and nervous exhaustion, impaired digestion or appetite, there is no remedy so beneficial as

Horsford's Acid Phosphate

(Non-Alcoholic.)

It is a scientific and carefully prepared preparation of the phosphates that provides the tonic and nerve food needed to improve general health.

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bevril, Ltd., 152 Old Street, London, E. C.

MAPLE & CO

ARE SPECIALISTS
FOR COMFORTABLE

CLUB & LOUNGE
CHAIRS & SETTEES

Inspection invited, or Illustrated
Catalogue of Chairs sent free

LARGEST STOCK IN THE WORLD

LONDON PARIS BUENOS AIRES

Suction Gas Power.

80% REDUCTION
OF YOUR GAS ENGINE
GAS BILL.

TANGYES Ltd., Birmingham.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

BORD'S PIANOS

Illustrated
Lists of the
"BORD"

Pianos will be sent free, showing prices and rates of hire of the various Models, on the THREE YEARS' SYSTEM, from 15s. per month. Second-hand, from 10s. 6d. per month.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

The "BECHSTEIN" Pianos may also be had on the same system, at advantageous prices and terms.

LIBERAL DISCOUNT FOR CASH.

CHAS. STILES & CO.,

74 and 76, Southampton Row, London, W.C.
PIANOS EXCHANGED.

Rowntree's ELECT Cocoa

"the cup that cheers"

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout,
Bathrooms on every Floor,
Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard
and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors, Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 8/0.Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/8 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

WINTER NEAR OXFORD! SUNNINGWELL HALL,
Boars Hill (established as "Boars Hill Hydro"). Perfect climate, dry and sunny, yet bracing. House well warmed and ventilated.
An ideal Winter residence. Golf, &c., billiards, concerts, lectures debates. Ordinary and Vegetarian cuisine. Public and private rooms. Omnibus service to Oxford. Inclusive terms from £2 2s.
weekly. 7/- daily, upwards. Illustrated booklet free.

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.*THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE S.S. 1/6 PRIZE BIBLE.

With 29 beautifully coloured Photographic Views and Pictures from the Old Masters. Maps. Handsomely bound in crimson grained cloth, red under gold edges. 1/6, post free; 6 copies for 8/6 post free.
Also in crimson morocco at 2/-, post free; 6 copies for 11/6, post free.
Also with References and 59 Pictures 2/-, post free.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE, 53, Paternoster Row, E.C.

TELEPHONE: CENTRAL 329.

A. LIONEL ISAACS, 5, Pall Mall, S.W.
(CARLTON HOTEL BUILDING).

Choice Books.
Rare Autographs and MSS.
Pictures and Prints.

CATALOGUES ISSUED.

TELEPHONE: 1784 CENTRAL.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold
and Exchanged.THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.
(And at READING.)

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.ARUNDEL CHROMOS.LARGE Stock; many rare ones.—Send stamp for this month's list (which gives size and shape of each). St. Jude's Depôt, Birmingham.

MISCELLANEOUS.

CURIO BARGAINS.—All those desirous of securing
Curios and Antiques at bargain prices, should visit the London
Opinion Curio Club, 107, Regent Street, London, W. Terms of membership on application to the Secretary, 107, Regent Street, W.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc.
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.BOURNEMOUTH.*THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; ModerateSILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.*BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.BRIGHTON.*THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.BUXTON.*ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.CHINGFORD, ESSEX.*ROYAL FOREST HOTEL. Mr. John Brill.DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.*THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.DEAL.*BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.EASTBOURNE.*CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.EXETER.*DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.*THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.HENLEY-ON-THAMES.*RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.ILFRACOMBE.*COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.LEEDS.*HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.LLANELLY.*CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.MALDON.*TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill. C. Simons, Manager.MALVERN.*HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.MANCHESTER.*THE PRINCES CAFE. Oxford Street.THE DEANSGATE HOTEL. Deansgate.MATLOCK.*SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).OXFORD (near).*SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. LecturePENTRE.*PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.PLYMOUTH.*GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.PORTSMOUTH.*SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.SOUTHSEA.*STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.SWANAGE."CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.TEIGNMOUTH.*REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.WHITBY.*WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.*WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

Boys from this PUBLIC SCHOOL have done well at the Universities.

The School stands in its own grounds of about 45 acres, high above the town and the Thames Valley.

For Honours List, Prospectus, particulars of Scholarships, and other information, apply to the Headmaster, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School.

HASLEMERE, SURREY.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD SCHOOL for GIRLS. Sandy soil; nine acres of ground; nearly 600 ft. above sea level.

Principals: Miss AMY KEMP, Camb. Certif. for Theory and Practice of Teaching (St. George's Training College, Edinburgh); Diploma for the Teaching of German (Berlin); and Miss HELEN T. NEILD, M.A. (Vict.), Classical Tripos (Camb.), Certificated Student of Girton College; 11 years at the Mount School, York.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.

Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS AT END OF EVERY TERM.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

Ready Immediately. The November Issue of

THE ALBANY REVIEW.

EDITED BY CHARLES RODEN BUXTON.

CONTENTS: Current Events; Peace or War—G. LOWES DICKINSON; Doubts of Proportional Representation—E. JENKS; Positivism—S. F. MARVIN; The Pulse of the Nation—W. H. BEVERIDGE; A Postscript on Mr. Wells—VERNON LEE; Evolution of Corruption—G. K. CHESTERTON; Lafcadio Hearn; Olympian Houses—GILBERT MURRAY; In Prison—MAXIM GORKI; The Spanish Inquisition—C. G. COULTON; The Secret Agent—DESMOND MCCARTHY; The Creed of Christ—N. FIGGIS.

At all Booksellers', Libraries, and Railway Bookstalls, 2s. 6d. net.

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, LONDON AND NEW YORK.

PUBLIC OPINION.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF CURRENT THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY.

TWO PENCE WEEKLY.

Post free to any part of the World, 13/- Yearly, or 10/10 for the United Kingdom.

LECTURES.

Lectures on Art and Architecture

FOR EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS AND SCHOOLS,

By ERNEST RADFORD, LL.M., CANTAB., formerly Secretary of the Arts and Crafts Exhibition.

Mr. Radford has recently Lectured for the Education Department of the London County Council.

For terms and particulars of Courses and Single Lectures kindly apply to the Lecturer, 1, Portland Villas, Hampstead, N.W.

SCHOOL OF SOCIOLOGY AND SOCIAL ECONOMICS.

63, 64, Denison House, 296, Vauxhall Bridge Road, S.W.

SIX LECTURES by Mr. L. L. PRICE, M.A., Oriel Coll., Oxford, on "Social and Industrial Problems of the Nineteenth Century," at 4.30 on Fridays, beginning Nov. 1st. Six Lectures by Mr. W. H. BEVERIDGE, M.A., B.C.L. (Oxon.), on "Unemployment in Germany," at 4.30 on Thursdays, beginning Oct. 31st. Fee for either course, 5s., sin le lecture, 1s.

OCCULTISM and COMMON-SENSE

The Westminster Gazette

is now publishing a series of twelve articles which are the result of an inquiry by an impartial investigator into the phenomena usually called "psychical." The subject will be dealt with on the following plan:

Science and the "Supernatural"—The Induced Hypnotic Trance—Phantasms of the Living—Dreams—Hallucinations—Phantasms of the Dead.

* * The series began October 21st, and three articles are appearing weekly. The twelve papers containing them will be sent to any address inland by post for 1s. 6d.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE, Tudor Street, London, E.C.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION, INCLUDING POSTAGE,
HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

Telephone No: Gerrard 4035.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—Neale's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Carl Johans Gade, 41 and 43.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Capetown—Messrs. Gordon and Gotch; Messrs. J. C. Juta and Co.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Whisky and Soap.

Comparisons for the Curious.

Doctors, Scientists, and others have had much to say of late on the subject of Whisky, and its effect on the health and—the pocket. But is not the question also worth considering in its relation to Soap?

Here is a comparison: The cost of only a single glass of whisky a day will average, say, 2/4 a week. Now the use of Pears' Soap for the same period will not cost more than Twopence. As a comparison of economic results the difference is great.

A comparison of personal effect shows a similar disproportion. The delight of Whisky, however good the brand (even if it's Dewar's), is only for the moment, or, at least, for but a short time; whereas the beneficial effect of Pears' Soap is spread over a prolonged period.

Whisky is for internal application, Soap for external, and here again many curious comparisons might be drawn. To sum the whole matter up into a nutshell: Let your taste for Whisky be what it will, don't forget to use—

Pears' Soap.

The Nation

VOL. II., No. 5.]

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1907.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE	PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK ... 137	LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—	The New Marriage Act and
The Foreign Policy of Queen	the Bishops. By J. F. W. 151
Victoria 140	"Ireland and Liberalism,"
The Railway Crisis and Arbi-	By "A Non-Catholic Elector," tration 141	and "X." 151
A Test Case 143	"The Censorship of Plays,"
The Camarilla and Ab-	By Frederick Wellen and solutism 144	Gilbert Murray 152
LIFE AND LETTERS:—	Women's Suffrage, By Evelyn
The Case Against the Censor-	Sharp 152
ship 145	"Socialism in Liberalism,"
An American Statesman ... 145	By O. E. Post 153
How to Make a Rose Garden	REVIEWS:—
In Praise of Mushrooms ... 147	Letters of Queen Victoria,
OPEN QUESTIONS:—	1837-1861. By the Rt. Hon.
Is Socialism a Spoils System?	Lord Eversley 154
By J. A. H. 148	The Religion of a Layman ... 155
POETRY:—	The Journals of a Scholar ... 156
Vox Marium. By J. W.	Tom Morris 157
Feaver 149	The Censorship of Rome ... 158
THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 150	The Method of Mr. Anthony
Books to be Read 150	Hope 160
	Books in Brief 162
	THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 164

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

M. STOLYPIN'S coup d'état has given him the Duma he asked for. Imagine that in England more than half the voting power in every constituency were given to peers and justices of the peace, and that the working classes were practically obliterated as voters, and there would be some analogy to the situation created by the revision of the franchise. Out of 327 deputies chosen up to Tuesday last, only 62 belonged to the various progressive parties. Only 25 of these are Cadets, while of the Right 166 are avowed reactionaries, and members of the monarchist and "black hundred" leagues. The Octobrists, who profess to be constitutional Conservatives, but have a way of shedding their best men, numbered 64. It is hard to form an objective judgment of the future. The parties of the Left declare that the Duma might as well not exist, and that henceforth the battle will be outside it, and the issue the complete overthrow of the present régime. Moderate men, on the other hand, point out that this Duma may sit for five years, that few of the parties are really fixed, and that the Octobrists, with the Independents and the Cadets, may perhaps form a sort of Constitutional Centre, which will be allowed to do useful work.

* * *

THE weak point in this calculation is, of course, the fact that the extremists on both sides will work for a violent crisis. The reactionaries want no Duma at all, and the Left demands a free and representative Duma. There can be no peace until the former franchise is restored. Outside the Duma the Social Democrats are working hard to build up a strong trade unionist movement, as a basis for future action. They encounter the fiercest persecution, and their progress is likely to be slow. The terrorists, on the other hand, can still work in secret. A girl of twenty murdered the Chief of the Prison Department in his office on Monday. When she was seized, she was in the act of pulling a wire which would have exploded an immense quantity of dynamite concealed in her clothes, which would have blown up herself and the whole building. On Wednesday the crew of a destroyer at Vladivostok mutinied, led by a Jewess, and began to bombard the fortress. An engagement with four loyal vessels followed, in which the mutineer was destroyed, losing all on board but three men. The loyal officers also lost heavily. If this sort of thing continues, it is doubtful if the Duma will be allowed to do anything but discuss coercion Acts. The Government, however, assumes that a packed Duma will at once sanction a big foreign loan, and M. Iswolsky, who is in Paris, is supposed to be arranging its flotation in England and France.

* * *

THE voting in the ballot of members of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants is completed, and the result will be made known at the Albert Hall demonstration to-morrow. The informal Conference of railway directors and managers with Mr. Lloyd George has been resumed, and again adjourned, which is, in itself, a not unhopeful sign. In the meantime, it is useful to bear in mind the position of trade unions as recognised by Parliament. This was well put by Mr. J. E. Ellis, M.P., in a speech to his constituents at Netherfield on Monday evening. The general position of trades unionism had, he properly said, been fixed by the joint action of Conservatives and Liberals. As to the special question of the railways, in 1900 the Conservative Government passed an Act containing a clause beginning: "The Board of Trade shall consider any objection or suggestion made by or on behalf of persons who appear to them to be affected," &c., and the Liberal Act of 1893 relating to the hours of railway servants contained a similar clause. "If it is represented to the Board of Trade by or on behalf of the railway servants or any class of the servants of a railway company," &c. Mr. Ellis was perfectly familiar with all that took place with respect to that Act, and it was specifically stated by the Minister in charge of the Bill that the words "on behalf of the servants employed," meant a trade union. It is difficult, in the face of this, to resist Mr. Ellis's contention that "what is good enough for the Crown, Lords, and Commons, and a public Department of State, ought not to be ignored by a number of gentlemen sitting in the capacity of trustees for their shareholders." We notice, by the way, that the "Morning Post" favours a State Board of Conciliation for railways, and that the "Daily Mail," among other Unionist journals, favours State intervention, and rejects the railway directors' case for refusing recognition to their workers' trade unions.

* * *

THE speech-making of the week has been mostly on the Ministerial side. Mr. Harcourt declared at Rosendale on Monday that he opposed Socialism in the sense of general State ownership and the elimination of "individual effort, competition, and profit," but favoured old-age pensions, as an alternative to the brutality of the poor law. On the Marriage Act, he regretted that the Ministers had accepted the amendment which enabled the clergy to contract themselves out of its obligations, and said that the attitude of the Bishops was a "menace" to the Church which owed its existence to Parliament alone. The Bishops were the joint servants of the "Sovereign and Parliament," "who were jointly the only true and supreme head of the Church."—Mr. Haldane, speaking at Newcastle, condemned Socialism, not because he feared for property, but because its extravagance promoted reaction, and made for a return to Toryism.

ON Tuesday, Mr. Asquith, speaking at Tayport, made a valuable contribution to the case against the House of Lords. Before the Reform Bill of 1832 the Government of the country was founded on a representation of interests, the public being left out. But the Reform Bill established the will of the people as the "predominant power in the State." From that date the House of Lords, as an equal authority with the House of Commons, became a "paradox and an anachronism," and its veto must follow that of the Crown. The danger of encroachment by the Commons could be guarded, under the Government's plan, by the reduction of the duration of Parliaments from seven to five years. The Lords would gain by a limitation of their powers, and then, as the letters of Queen Victoria showed, there remained the revising, suggestive, and critical powers of the Crown, exercised in all Departments of the State. We cannot help thinking that in foreign affairs this power was exercised in excess, and that the famous "Letters" present a case for an increase of the power of the House of Commons over foreign policy.

* * *

ON Saturday last Mr. Haldane presented to the King a brilliant, almost an orchidaceous, array of the Lord-Lieutenants of England, Wales, and Scotland, that his Majesty might expound to them their responsibilities in connection with the Territorial Army. The King explained that in the hands of these gentlemen would lie the raising, equipment, and maintenance of this "second line" of the Army, the provision of rifle ranges, drill halls, and manoeuvring grounds, the guardianship of reservists and old soldiers. To these charges the King added a new duty, namely, the "fostering of a spirit of patriotic and voluntary effort." We are glad to see marked stress laid on the voluntary character of the new organisation, but it is too aristocratic, and we doubt whether the Lord Lieutenants ensure a sufficiently practical basis for it. Does Mr. Haldane realise how largely even the ablest of the Lord-Lieutenants—e.g., Lord Leicester in Norfolk—are divorced from the administrative life of their counties?

* * *

LORD CROMER was presented with the freedom of the City of London at the Guildhall, on Monday, in the presence of Sir Edward Grey and other Cabinet Ministers, and made a powerful but discursive and somewhat unbalanced political speech. He declared in favour of the policy of the Russian agreement, insisting that the question of internal freedom in Russia had a mere "academic" interest for Englishmen, whose foreign policy should depend on material considerations. This dictum, by the way, cuts not merely at Gladstone's conception of the basis of foreign policy, but at Lord Palmerston's and Lord John Russell's idea that, in the main, British action in Europe should be anti-despotic. Lord Cromer also hoped that his successor in Egypt, Sir Eldon Gorst, would pay no heed to "faddists" in London, who were supported by "a numerous tribe" in Egypt. He spoke with just pride of the great engineering achievement on the Nile, which has saved a people from starvation. He inveighed against Nationalist "extremists" in Cairo; "as also in Calcutta and in Dublin," and hoped that "agitators" in India would be kept "well in hand" by Mr. Morley and Lord Minto. This rather crude Bismarckianism is characteristic of Lord Cromer's later speech, but is not, we think, the distinctive mark of his vice-regency in Egypt.

* * *

ON Tuesday, the Berlin Court gave a verdict for the defendant in the libel action brought by Count Kuno von Moltke against Herr Harden, the Editor of "Zukunft." It found that his accusations of perverted tendencies were substantially true, and condemned the plaintiff to pay the costs of the action. The real interest of the case lay less in the disgusting revelations of perversion to which it gave publicity, than in the political issue behind it. Herr Harden, whose vigorous pen was often employed by the late Prince Bismarck, had charged Prince Eulenburg and Counts Moltke, Hohenau, and Lynar, with Herr von Tschirschky, and the French diplomatist M. Lecomte as accessory members, with forming a "round table" or camarilla, which surrounded the Emperor, influenced his thinking, and made and unmade Chancellors. That vague revelation produced no effect, and he then went on to accuse all the friends of perverted instincts, and some of them of criminal practices. These articles, brought to the Kaiser's notice by the Crown Prince, led to the prompt disgrace of all four officers. But of the four, Count Moltke alone, undoubtedly the least guilty of them, took any action to defend his honour. The others refused to attend the Court as witnesses, and the case against them may be considered as having gone by default.

* * *

PRINCE BUELOW was originally a protégé of Prince Eulenburg, but they quarrelled during the Moroccan affair. Prince Eulenburg, through a newspaper which often acted as his organ, announced, last November, that Prince Bülow would probably be succeeded shortly by one of the Moltkes as Chancellor. Prince Bülow, realising that the fate of Bismarck and Caprivi, whom Prince Eulenburg had destroyed, was reserved for him, turned to the Bismarckian group for aid. Herr Basermann, the National Liberal leader, began to fulminate against "personal rule," and Herr Harden exposed the Eulenburg Camarilla. How little outraged morality had to do with the campaign we may judge from the fact that Prince Bülow was originally an ally of Prince Eulenburg, and that Herr Harden boasts that all the disgusting facts had been in his possession for five years. Most of the German Press is dissatisfied with the conduct of the trial, and disgusted at this use of personal accusations to serve political ends. The scandal is by no means at an end. Count Moltke has lodged an appeal, and Prince Bülow is himself prosecuting a journalist who has made like charges against himself. This affair deals only with one of the many personal intrigues of which Count Bülow was the butt, and to an outsider it is difficult to follow the part which Count Posadowsky, Herr Holstein, and Herr von Tschirschky—all now fallen—played in them.

* * *

THERE has been nothing from America quite so sensational as the run on the Knickerbocker Trust, which we described last week. Or perhaps it would be more accurate to say that the run on the Knickerbocker Trust exhausted the descriptive powers of the American reporter. We have just received, however, a copy of the "New York Journal of Commerce" for October 24th, which tells how "Trust Company of America Withstands Big Run." We learn how, from early morn till dewy eve, a crowd such as has not been seen in that district for twenty years surged before the palatial home of the Trust Company of America. "Five hundred were depositors—or ostensibly so; the other thousands came to enjoy the spectacle of a full-blooded 'run' on a financial institution." From Trinity Church all the way to the old Custom House was lined with sightseers. Many mounted the steps of the Treasury Building, from which coign of vantage they could not only watch the proceedings at 37, Wall Street, but also "the stream of important visitors to the financial forum, where J. Pierpont Morgan was in masterful command." The Stock Exchange was swayed by the siege farther along the street; if the enemy, i.e., the alarmed depositors, could be successfully met, then stocks were worth holding; if not, they had better be sold. At the end of the day the citadel had not fallen. Though there has been no single calamity this week so serious as the closing of the Knickerbocker Trust, the news from the States has been anything but reassuring.

* * *

THE Pittsburg Stock Exchange has been closed for days—ever since receivers were appointed for the Westinghouse Companies. From all the great cities, East, South, and West, trouble is reported. On Wednesday the Californian Safe Deposit and Trust Company in San Francisco closed its doors, and on the following day the panic was so great there that the Governor of California proclaimed a legal holiday and intimated that he would do so daily until confidence was restored. This means that he will allow the Banks to remain closed. Reuter states: "It is generally believed that neither all the eighteen banks in the Clearing House nor all the banks outside it will observe the holiday." From a political point of view, the crisis is said to have already injured the reputation of President Roosevelt, who seems to have made a rather foolish speech immediately after the crash began. On the other hand Mr. Cortelyou, Secretary of the Treasury, has won golden opinions. Among the financiers the lead has been taken by Mr. Pierpont Morgan.

* * *

ON Tuesday a body of writers, who may fairly be said to include all living British dramatic authors of repute and distinction, signed a petition to the Prime Minister in favour of the abolition of the office of Censor of Plays. A deputation from this powerful body is shortly to see Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman. The authors were not joined by the managers, who are content with the purely commercial drama, usually trivial, and not seldom indelicate in tone, which flourishes under the present system, and under which responsibility is shifted from their shoulders to those of the Censor, while the author works at his peril. But the movement is important, for it marks the first organised intervention of literary England in the affairs of the stage. The signatories lay stress on the unconstitutional character of the Censorship, and on the absence of publicity or appeal, and they declare that in effect, so far from protecting morality, it has "tended to lower the dramatic tone." They do not bar the intervention of a representative body, but they protest against "arbitrary action by an official answerable neither to Parliament nor to the ordinary law." The memorial is signed by the three greatest names in current English literature—Mr. Meredith, Mr. Swinburne, and Mr. Hardy—and by the acknowledged representatives of nearly every school of modern British drama.

* * *

ON Saturday last, in a thick fog, a railway accident took place at West Hampstead Station, on the Metropolitan Railway, by which three persons were killed and a number of others injured. The accident, which is the first of the sort to happen on the Metropolitan line since the adoption of electric traction, seems to have been due to a want of proper caution on the part of the signalman, though the evidence at the inquiry also points to a defect in the system of signalling. The Board of Trade very properly decided that the inquiry should be held in public, as the accident took place in London, where there are so many of the travelling public, and also because the accident followed so close after the terrible disaster at Shrewsbury.

* * *

THE project of a Channel ferry, as an alternative to the defeated plan of a Channel tunnel, has been revived during the week, and Lord Weardale, heading deputations to Mr. Lloyd George and M. Clemenceau, has been informed by both of them that the idea is unobjectionable, "if feasible." Its essential feature would no doubt be the construction of vessels large enough to carry a train, which would run straight on to the ferry-boat in Dover Harbour, and, on arriving at Calais, steam on to Paris or Basle on the rails of the Northern Company of France without any unshipment of passengers or merchandise. This would imply the gain of about an hour on the journey from London to Paris, and would greatly increase the stream of Continental traffic. But it would give nothing like the enormous impetus to it which a tunnel would create.

* * *

WE commented recently on a case in which a young Bengali student had been judicially flogged for rioting in Calcutta. It was not an isolated case. The "Tribune's" correspondent reports that "the boys concerned in the [recent] disturbances [there] are being condemned to be whipped." Mr. Morley, who told Sir Henry Cotton last session that he was considering the whole subject of public judicial flogging in India, has replied this week to the Humanitarian League that he is still deliberating; but we have complete confidence that he will stop the practice. It is easy to laugh at the political zeal of "boys," but when the Russian police flogged the pupils of high schools in Moscow, the English Press did not laugh: it denounced. Boys who are old enough to care about politics are capable of resentment; and boys become men without losing their memories. In India they mature quickly.

* * *

WE understand that the report in the "Times" of Tuesday last regarding the excommunication of Father Tyrrell is an accurate account of what has happened, and that the modified statements appearing in other journals fall short of the truth. The sentence pronounced is technically known as the lesser excommunication, according to which the person under censure is forbidden to approach the sacraments, though the faithful are still allowed to hold communication with him. By this victory of the party of reaction, the Roman Church is deprived of the services of her greatest master of style and subtlest apologist since Newman. The incident is another event in the obscurantist policy which drove Lamennais and Döllinger out of the Church, persecuted Newman, placed Lord Acton's books upon the Index, and barred out the "Americanist" and now the "Modernist" movements.

* * *

MR. GERALD MASSEY, the poet and Radical writer, died on Tuesday at the age of 79. The present age hardly knew this vigorous and sincere poetic worker, whose best-known lyrics belong to the middle of last century, to the days of Chartism, the Crimean War, and Christian Socialism. His best-remembered work (he came from the people, and worked in a silk factory when he was eight years old) is his defiance of Tsar Nicholas, his "Babe Christabel," his democratic songs, and such easy and appealing pieces of versification as the lines:—

"This world is full of beauty, like other worlds above,
And if we did our duty, it might be full of love."

His long later life illustrated his independence and originality of character—he is said to have been the original of "Felix Holt"—but added little to his once considerable literary fame. He devoted some time to research, and up to the time of his death was engaged on a study of Egyptian mythology, and its bearing on later religious developments.

* * *

With next week's issue of THE NATION there will be issued a Special Literary Supplement.

Politics and Affairs.

THE FOREIGN POLICY OF QUEEN VICTORIA.

EVERY student of the life and reign of Queen Victoria will, we are sure, be grateful to the editors of the letters which she wrote during her early and middle reign for their entirely frank revelation of her character and mental habit. They show, first of all, what it means to a country to be governed not only by a woman, but by one of the most "womanly" of women who ever lived, and secondly, how large is the share of a British constitutional monarch, close-sheltered from all personal responsibility both for words and for acts, in shaping the foreign policy of the people. These letters*, many of which are in style and thought immeasurably superior to the rather vapid domesticity of the Highland Journals, exhibit the Queen in every variety of human relationship, as daughter, niece, lover, wife, mother, friend, woman of feeling, and woman of the world. There are periods during which this inexperienced girl, rich in character, though not in intellect, and linked by many ties to the rulers and ruling families of her time, strikes us as much the most potent personality in the State system of Europe in the middle of last century.

Not that it is possible to say with precision where the Queen's policy, and tendencies of policy, were her own. With all her strong woman's will and tenacity of purpose, she was easily influenced. From the first hour of her reign her oldest adviser, her uncle, the King of the Belgians, an astute, not ill-meaning, but certainly selfish man, hemmed her in with counsellors. It was he who gave her her real Secretary, Baron Stockmar. It was he who promoted the eventful marriage with Prince Albert. It was he who urged, almost commanded, her to retain Melbourne, and it was he who used all his influence, and sometimes used it in vain, to maintain the close relationship with the Orléans dynasty which Louis Philippe's duplicity in the matter of the Spanish marriages destroyed. Later on, the pupil superseded the master. It is clear that many of the ablest State papers and memoranda which appear in these volumes under her name were written not by her, but by the Prince Consort. Stockmar himself dictated almost the words of the famous memorandum on foreign policy which helped to destroy Palmerston, just as Melbourne, though no longer a Minister, most improperly suggested the decisive sentences in which she declared her will on the appointment of the Ladies of the Bed Chamber. Her devotion to Prussia and Austria, her hatred of the Italian movement of liberty, sprang from her family relationships, and Palmerston had reason for his complaint that they "poisoned" her mind against him. Had she had a thorough conception of British constitutionalism she could not have carried on the private correspondence with Melbourne which Stockmar, greatly to his credit, endeavoured to break in a stern, almost impassioned, interview with that charming and not too precise or conscientious personality; nor could she have pursued the embittered warfare with Palmerston and Lord John Russell which the astounding correspondence of 1848-9 and 1859-60 discloses. The Queen was brave almost to rashness, and she was a singularly true, honest, and outspoken woman. Moreover, in the matter of the Crimean War and the dispute with America, she and Prince Albert rendered the country the service of clear-sighted and truth-loving natures. But her attempts to assert the power of the Crown above that of her Constitutional Ministers did, in the nature of things, touch the point of intrigue. It is not pleasant, for example, to find Lord Granville, a Cabinet Minister, writing to Prince Albert in 1860 and describing the doings of the Cabinet in a sense derogatory both to the policy and the personality of his chief. Still worse was Lord Melbourne's advice to the Queen on appointments made by his successor and rival, Peel, and his confession to Stockmar that he was prepared, if necessary, to resist and thwart Peel's policy by means of his underground communications with the Queen. Nor can it be claimed that, with all the Queen's singular and rare gifts of character, her mind was free from impulsive misjudgment and caprice. She leant on Melbourne with almost passionate insistence; she thought him as "perfect" as she afterwards thought Prince Albert. Barely a day could pass without his seeing her and dining with her. There was more excuse for her reliance on this charming and gracious, though faulty, man than for the fascination exercised by two rulers of undeniably sinister character, Nicholas I. and Napoleon III. The visit from Nicholas she thought to be a "great event"—almost a condescension, indeed, from a man whom she describes, in her italicised German style, as "the greatest of all earthly potentates." Her feeling for Napoleon went still further. One visit was enough to convince her that this arch-adventurer, his hands still wet with the blood which he shed in the coup d'état, was calm, gentle, straightforward, charming, sincere. She was confident of her power to "keep him in the right course." And yet, four years later, she spoke of the probability of a "regular crusade" against him, as "the universal disturber of the world." She began by hating Peel, and ended with a warm and well-deserved regard for that admirable, though difficult, nature. She treated Disraeli's earlier communications to her with the good-natured contempt which their pompous insincerity deserved: yet she lived to fall completely under his influence. She was open to argument; she was, indeed, essentially a candid and sincere soul. But she made grave errors. On the whole, it was, we think, fortunate that the foreign policy of England in the middle period of last century was directed by Palmerston and Russell to ends far different from those which she and the Leopold-Stockmar-Coburg combination imagined and devised.

But what were the main characteristics of the foreign policy of Queen Victoria so far as these letters reveal it? They were twofold. The Queen was not only no democrat, she was an anti-democrat, and she accepted the constitutional theory of the responsibility of Ministers to Parliament and to the people with reluctance, and with a woman's instinctive rebellion against an idea that she did not fully understand and a practice that was irksome and restraining to her and to her husband. On the latter point she went very far. Her warfare with Palmerston was sustained week after week, month after month, year after year, and her eager woman's nature overtopped Prince Albert's cool phrases and measured arguments. The Minister himself was far from blameless. He had a reckless, cynical tongue, he was careless of forms, and often loose in written statement, he more than once treated his sensitive and quick-tempered mistress with real disrespect. Both he and Lord John Russell had selfish and, in comparison with the Queen, rather devious characters. But both of them possessed a true feeling for human liberty, and an inherited hatred of oppression. Both knew the British Constitution, and had occasion sharply to remind their Sovereign that there was such a date in English history as 1688. And both of them clearly divined the meaning of the movement for Italian liberty, and were determined to aid its development as a source of strength to liberal Europe, and as a human protest against the secular and spiritual tyranny which it defied. Throughout their ablest and most determined opponent was the Queen. She fought them both, and on the same grounds. Her personal sympathies were first Prussian, and secondly Austrian, and her intimate advisers were of German stock. But, above all, she resented the idea of the right of a nationality to throw off a yoke imposed upon it from without and fixed by European consent, and to assert its will by such means as the plébiscite, the proud record of which adorns many a wall in many a famous town of Italy. For her "the people" had no existence apart from the ruling house. Opinion in the country was strongly pro-Italian; the Queen ignored it. Her letters lump together "Chartists," "rebels," "demagogues," and "agitators." She was horrified at the idea that Cobden should step straight from a public meeting to the Cabinet.

* We publish elsewhere the first instalment of a general review of the character of the letters, by Lord Eversley.

Moreover, she wanted a formal revision of the lines of our foreign policy in the light of the lessons taught by the risings of 1848. "It will," she said to Lord John Russell in that year, "be a calamity for ages to come, if this principle is to become part of the international law, viz., that a people can at any time transfer their allegiance from the Sovereign of one State to that of another by universal suffrage (under momentary excitement)." She denounced the "principle" of Lord Palmerston's policy—that of "Italian Nationality and Independence from a foreign yoke and tyranny." If we maintained such a principle in Lombardy or in Central Italy, how, she asked bluntly, could we meet critics of our Irish policy? "Really," she wrote to her uncle, "it is quite immoral with Ireland quivering in our grasp . . . to force Austria to give up her lawful possessions." She complained that in place of neutrality, Lord Palmerston had "gone a long way in taking up the side of democracy in the fight." She wrote condoling warmly with Pio Nono on his expulsion from Rome, quite ignoring the abuses of government in the Papal States. She bitterly resented Palmerston's proposal to see Kossuth, and stopped the plans for a private interview at his house. The mobbing of the unspeakable Haynau by the draymen of Barclay and Perkins seemed to her a "brutal attack and wanton outrage by a ferocious mob on a distinguished foreigner," and Palmerston's cool reply that the people of England looked on Haynau as "a great moral criminal," and compared him with Mrs. Manning, the murderess, stung her to a vehement retort. Watching for a lapse of etiquette and propriety on the part of the most careless of men, she succeeded at last on a serious question of policy, and used Lord John Russell to procure Palmerston's downfall. Ten years later she worked with equal persistence against Lord John Russell, and was eager and insistent that the peace of Villafranca should not be used to advance the growing Italian kingdom. The Italian disaster at Novara was to her a source of unmixed joy. "I could work myself up to a great excitement about these exploits," she writes to the King of the Belgians, "for there is nothing I admire more than great military exploits and daring." She said nothing warmer of the battle of the Alma.

On the whole, the Queen's policy failed; indeed, it was well for her that it did. For in what position would she have been placed if, on the Italian question, Palmerston and Russell had resigned on the ground that the Queen, though entirely irresponsible, had insisted that British policy should maintain a strong pro-Austrian bias? Considering the sheltered position of the Crown, the Queen went far. She herself hardly pretended to impartiality of view. Starting with a traditional hatred of the Tory Party, she was, in effect, and during the greater part of her reign, the exponent and defender of Tory, or, at least, reactionary views in foreign affairs, and her position was most boldly advanced at the period when the cause of European liberty hung most doubtfully in the balance. Lord Beaconsfield was probably the only Minister with whose foreign policy she was thoroughly in sympathy. She had great moral qualities; a noble candour and deep affectionateness distinguished her from the more shallow and insincere natures that surrounded her. She did not press her views to an extremity; they were, on notable occasions, right and wise. But it is idle to pretend that as a whole they were in harmony with the more generous and enlightened thought and the bolder statesmanship of her age.

THE RAILWAY CRISIS AND ARBITRATION.

A COMPLETE railway strike opens a prospect of national calamity hard to imagine because it transcends experience. Even an incomplete but widespread arrest of railway traffic would soon become an industrial disaster of the first order. If the prospect of such a deadlock has not yet strongly stirred the public apprehension it is because the English imagination is slow to picture utterly novel misfortunes. A general railway strike has never occurred; therefore, say the public, it will not now come about: moreover, it is too dreadful—it can't happen! Nevertheless, it is but sober truth that there is more than a possibility of an industrial conflict breaking out in a few weeks which may throttle commerce and for a space throw back transit in England and Scotland to its condition half a century ago. London may taste the bitterness of semi-blockade: collieries may be shut down and wharves idle: food may go to war prices—at any rate, in urban centres. Railway shareholders and railway servants may suffer—the former, indeed, have been hard hit already—but their self-inflicted losses will be small and their suffering limited compared with the exasperating inconvenience and injury which their civil war will inflict upon an innocent and helpless people. If it were possible to shut directors and railwaymen into an arena and leave them to fight it out, doubtless the entire British middle-class—and not they alone—would hastily isolate the combatants. But as the peculiarity of a railway strike is that it damages all whom it touches, and that it may touch almost everyone, a tranquil neutrality is apt to become suicidal. Therefore, in a position like this, we ask: has the public no rights? In the face of such a national danger does not the Government of the country become by force of circumstances a Committee of Public Safety? Such a committee rightly begins intervention with attempts at peaceful persuasion. But if friendly appeals fail, what then? If ordinary methods of averting civil war are fruitless, ought courageous statesmanship to shrink from extraordinary methods? It would be a novel step for a British Government to interfere with the sacred right of masters and men to suspend industry rather than be reasonable. But then a general railway strike would be a novel thing, and as appalling as novel.

The Government and nation are as fully entitled to insist that railway strikes shall not take place as to declare that highways shall not be blocked or streets barricaded. Railway directors and their servants are under a paramount duty to the people to keep the iron roads of the kingdom at the public's service. And if that premiss be granted, the public is under a very grave obligation to the railway companies and their men to provide both with the machinery for a fair adjustment of their relations. If the public warns Mr. Bell and his Society that a general railway strike is an undurable catastrophe, then the public has no right to abandon Mr. Bell and his men to the tender mercies of titled directors and irritated shareholders. The public must not only ask for fair play to the men but see that the men get it. If it be asked who is competent to judge of what constitutes fair play, we answer—in the last resort, a State tribunal of arbitration. Those who carry on the great industries of England are familiar enough with the awards of arbitrators to know that this is no air-bubble idealism. Intelligent arbitrators are to be secured well able to see their way through industrial disputes and find out a fair modus vivendi neither ruinous to capital nor unjust to labour.

Forcible State intervention in industrial quarrels—even for the purpose of pacific settlement—is so opposed to favourite English theories, that to many its success appears inconceivable. Yet there can be no reasonable doubt that in more than one of our Colonies systematic interference of this kind has proved of great benefit. In Western Australia it has achieved a large measure of success, especially, we believe, in connection with the great gold-fields. In New South Wales it has repeatedly improved industrial conditions, and has well-nigh stamped out sweating. But the best known example of State regulation of industrial disputes is, of course, supplied by New Zealand, for there a very thorough-going system of State arbitration, enacted thirteen years ago, has been in constant use for twelve years. At the present moment the conditions of employment in all the more important industries of the Colony—unless domestic service may be so styled—are regulated by awards of State tribunals, or by agreements made between employers and workmen after conference, and then registered in the Court of Arbitration. These twelve years have been perhaps the most prosperous that the island Colony has ever known. During them the course of industry appears but once to have been interrupted by a strike of any magnitude—and then the disturbance lasted barely a fortnight. The success of the New Zealand law can hardly be better gauged than by the interest and surprise excited by this solitary outbreak. Cable messages were flashed across the world to chronicle its details, and sequelæ. Columns of moralising were penned by writers who jumped to the conclusion that the New Zealand system had broken down. The fact that a number of the strikers were fined, and that a substantial sum in penalties was collected from them, has been quite wrongly assumed to have antagonised the colonial labouring class. Furthermore, various mischiefs have been fancifully attributed to the Arbitration Act—as, for instance, that it has been the cause of the rise in prices which has been noted in New Zealand during the last decade. The "Daily Telegraph," for example, assures its readers that the Arbitration Act has made bread dearer in New Zealand; as though the price of wheat had not risen all the world over, making the loaf dearer in communities which have never heard of an Arbitration Act! Sufficient here to point out that New Zealand, like all prosperous Colonies, prospers mainly because the raw materials and food stuffs which it grows command higher prices than formerly in the world's markets. But these very articles are necessities which the Colonial workpeople must buy like other men. The very cause of prosperity, therefore, levies a toll on the workers' share of it. Nevertheless, the condition of the New Zealand workpeople strikes the ordinary visitor to the Antipodes as happy above what is common: while their employers have admittedly reaped larger profits during the era of arbitration.

Again, we are asked to believe that arbitration has introduced trusts and rings into Arcadian New Zealand; as though combinations and understandings between capitalists were not growing and inevitable features of modern economic development. And on one still more common charge, that the constant use of the arbitration machinery has kept the industries of the Antipodes in a state of perpetual uneasiness and discord, the recent favourable testimony of Sir John Gorst, who studied the question on the spot a year ago, may fairly be taken as conclusive.

The truth is that the New Zealand Arbitration Court has provoked criticism, not by failure, but by its success; it has succeeded almost too well. Its union of moderation with effectual authority has caused it to be incessantly appealed to. The Colonial Parliament which allowed it to be set up experimentally believed that both employers and Trade Unions would be very shy of invoking its aid, and would only turn to it in sheer desperation, after attempting to settle their differences outside. The contrary proved to be the case. Industrial disputants cared less than was expected for the freedom of independent conferences, or even for State Boards of Conciliation. As the law insisted that differences should be settled, and conditions adhered to, they preferred the finality of the Arbitration Court, the awards of which controlled all trade competitors alike. Even when voluntary agreements were made, they were by custom registered in the Court, so as to obtain legal force. Thus the Arbitration Court became overloaded with work, and the delays encountered by suitors there swelled into a chronic and a very real grievance. The success of the Court, moreover, attracted political animosity. That individualists should dislike it was unavoidable; but it has also failed to please the more impatient Socialists. These look but sourly on a system whose main achievement has been to cause private industry to work under labour conditions the general fairness of which cannot be gainsaid.

To English onlookers, however, these local grievances and sectional jealousies may go for nothing. The one thing that counts is that New Zealand has shown that State arbitration may work effectually for many years, may improve the condition of both fair employers and employed, and may avert from a country the recurring nuisance of serious strikes and lock-outs. To the objection that because arbitration may work in a small and young colony it does not therefore follow that it would answer here, the reply is two-fold. First, no one, we suppose, would dream of transplanting any colonial system, whole and unmodified, to this country. The suggestion merely is to apply the principle of State arbitration to one great industry—the railways. In the second place, so far from arbitration being more difficult of application in this railway case than in the colonies, the contrary is likely to be true. The better organised, more responsible, larger, and the more financially solid industrial bodies are, the riper and easier they are for the State to deal with. Were Parliament to provide machinery to bring about meetings in conference between railway companies and societies of railway servants, that would be a beginning. Provision for registering agreements concluded at such conferences, and thereby giving them legal force for moderate periods of time, would be simple enough. And, further, a State Court of Arbitration, to be invoked only when conferences had failed, and to be armed with power to dismiss trivial appeals, would be an authority which, in the last resort, would save the country and the disputants themselves from the inferno of a railway war. We agree with those who say that public opinion should sway railway questions. But public opinion requires machinery to enable it to form a fair, deliberate, and instructed judgment, and then to enforce that judgment upon disputants who refuse to settle their differences peaceably and without injury to the country.

A TEST CASE.

LORD CROMER's speech in the City illustrates one of the standing paradoxes of English politics. Here is one of the great servants of the Government, whose business it is not to initiate policy or determine principles, but to carry out loyally the behests of the Foreign Office whatever party be in power. He is speaking on a non-political occasion, in the presence of Sir Edward Grey and other distinguished Liberals. In the forefront of his speech he puts a declaration of the non-party character of his position. And he ends by making a thoroughly partisan attack on Liberal ideas. We do not speak for the moment of his onslaught on those English Liberals who have championed self-government, free speech, and a free Press in India or Egypt. We are thinking more particularly of his attack on those whom he has been pleased to call "extremists" in Dublin. Lord Cromer takes no notice of the position of his late chief, who is, and has always been, a Home Ruler. So steeped is he, like almost all high officials, in the conservatism of the governing classes that he does not seriously regard democratic ideas, humanitarian feelings, nationalist sympathies as entering into the arena of party politics. To condemn all such leanings as foolishness is clearly in his view to make no party speech whatever. It is merely to give utterance to the views of "all sensible men"—that is, of all who live in the atmosphere of officialdom and high finance. The democrats have not even belligerent rights. They are not regarded as a party. That they happen to be in an overwhelming majority in the House of Commons is a detail. That the Prime Minister is their trusted leader, who did not flinch in the darkest days of their fortunes from braving the wrath of that world which Lord Cromer takes for the universe, is a matter of no significance. That the Cabinet, which it has been Lord Cromer's duty to serve, is full of men who have won support and confidence by giving voice to those sympathies which for him lie outside the pale of serious discussion, is a consideration which evidently does not touch him. He moves untroubled in that serene atmosphere of high statesmanship, in that circle of the great who " . . . lie reclined

On the hills like gods together careless of mankind," gazing with more contempt than pity on the living beings who feel and suffer down below.

It will, of course, always be open for the great officials to treat us Liberals with contempt as long as we on our side are content with political nullity. As long as we acquiesce in the withdrawal of foreign policy from party politics, so long we invite them to ignore and despise us. The question is whether we can permanently acquiesce in the flouting of the sentiments which animate the majority of the party. The Liberal idea in matters of Imperial policy is a very simple one. It is merely that, in dealing with other nations, or with backward races, we are no less bound by the ordinary considerations of fair, just, and humane dealing than in any other relation of life. We are not, in a word, to put off our humanity when we enter upon foreign, colonial, or Indian affairs. This simple rule, to the exposition of which Gladstone devoted all that was best and most brilliant in a long career, which brought about his first breach with Conservatism, and inspired his latest public utterances, was the object of denunciation and derision through the years of reaction which followed on his retirement. Those who stood faithful to it have seen their predictions justified, their efforts crowned with success, their friends and leaders in power. Derided as sentimentalists, they have been shown in the leading case of South Africa to be those who took the longest and soundest view. But of all this high officialism knows nothing. For it the Liberal idea remains the fanaticism of a band of sentimentalists, and this is a doctrine which may be enlarged upon, without suggestion of impropriety, in a non-party speech in the presence of the Foreign Secretary.

This state of feeling cannot indefinitely continue; and it happens that Lord Cromer's own statesmanship provides what is likely to be a test case. We need not here enter into the extent of Lord Cromer's responsibility for the Denshawai affair. He has passed from the active scene, and there is no dispute that the present responsibility for keeping the Denshawai fellahs in prison rests with Sir Edward Grey. We can hardly believe that the curt answer sent by the Foreign Secretary to the petition for the release of the prisoners represents his final attitude; and we can only say that if it does so, a very serious situation will arise. We do not underrate Sir E. Grey's difficulties. The act of justice required of him is doubtless tantamount to an admission of the iniquity of the original sentences, the worst of which, being death sentences, are unfortunately irreversible. But two wrongs do not make a right. No words, no pleadings, however skilful, can undo the effect which the official account in the White Papers of the Denshawai trial must make upon the civilised world. It is one of those rare instances in which an act of official injustice has no plausible argument to defend it. It is a case in which every one of the doubtful points may be freely presented to the side of the executive power, without weakening the attack upon it. Sir Edward Grey cannot defend the Egyptian Government in the hearing of anyone who has read the White Papers. The utmost that can be done in mitigation of the judgment which the world has passed on Denshawai is to plead that the officials acted in a panic, in terror of a Nationalist movement which Lord Cromer now tells us it would be a mistake to take too seriously. Acting under this panic, they came down with sledge-hammer force on a village which had been roused to a riot by the shooting of their pigeons. They treated a blow which their own witnesses showed to be at most a contributory cause of death as evidence of premeditated murder. Instead of instituting a calm, judicial enquiry into the attack on the British officers, for which some punishment was doubtless due, they constituted a special committee, bound by no rules of law, which awarded four hangings and four hundred lashes publicly administered. They still keep in prison those of the delinquents who were not hanged, and among them Mohamed Abd-el-Nebi, who acted under the excitement and provocation of seeing his wife wounded, and, as was at first believed, killed. That the executions were carried out with a barbarity which make it impossible to read the cold official account without a shudder must always remain a blot upon British administration.

But there is one thing that can make it much worse, which is to persist in upholding a wrong, and keeping men who were part sufferers and part wrong-doers any longer in prison. For their share in the riot and what was at worst a brutal assault upon the officers, they have now been more than sufficiently punished. To retain them as prisoners any longer, and to decline, above all, to remit the life sentence on Abd-el-Nebi, is to defy civilised opinion. It is impossible for the numerous Liberal Members of Parliament, who have been prominent in denunciation of such things when the last Government were in power, to let this matter go. Whether we like it or not, it will inevitably be raised again and again till justice be done. We trust that Sir Edward Grey will weigh these matters very carefully. If he owes something to Lord Cromer, and to British authority in Egypt, he owes something more to the honour of the British name and the reputation of British justice. He is also responsible to the men who helped to place him in power and made him a trustee for the principles which they cherish.

THE CAMARILLA AND ABSOLUTISM.

No political scandal, since the Panama affair, has raised larger issues than the painful libel case which was tried last week in Berlin, before a junior magistrate, a butcher, and a milkman. The scene, the procedure, and the sordid details of the evidence made a painful contrast to the real magnitude of a campaign which has dragged down the mighty from their seats and destroyed a Prince who made Chancellors, filled embassies, and played with the chequers of peace and war. For, to an English reader, the trial itself was hardly less astonishing than the revelations to which it gave publicity. It was a formless and irregular debate. The important witnesses were the embittered and divorced wife of the plaintiff and a trooper with a record of embezzlement, who convicted himself of the lowest crimes. The medical expert based all his conclusions on the testimony of the wife; of the evidence, which included the sayings of dead men and conversations reported at second hand, only the merest fraction would have been admitted by an English judge. Fair-minded men remembered that, however little Count Moltke deserved their sympathy, he was the least guilty and the least influential member of a perverted circle. It was against Prince Eulenburg that the public had a grievance, and even that grievance was concerned rather with the political power that he had usurped than with the details of his private life. A clever intriguer, who uses his personal ascendancy over a monarch to thwart Ministers and countermines Parliaments, may be ruined if a political opponent can expose his private vices; but his crime against popular government would have been no less gross if his temperament had been ascetic instead of abnormal. If this little group of friends had consisted of average sensual men instead of perverted aesthetes, their power to-day would be unbroken, and their influence as unconstitutional as ever.

The mob which cheered Herr Harden in the streets saw in him only a tribune of the people, and in Count Moltke a type of a hated military caste. The judgment of intelligent Germans shows less unanimity. The plain fact is, of course, that Herr Harden's legal duel with Count Moltke is simply a move in a long game by which the Bismarckian Party reckons on regaining its influence. The Moltkes, the Hohenaus, the Lynars, were simply the satellites of Prince Philip zu Eulenburg, the arch-enemy of the great Bismarck, and it was on them that Herr Harden, a faithful retainer of the First Chancellor, was avenging an ancient feud. Prince Eulenburg—a Count raised to princely rank by the favour of the Kaiser—is a man of great gifts, and even greater fascination, a poet, a musician, and, despite his sybarite tendencies, a considerable soldier. He dominated the Emperor, who drew from him some of his obscurantist inspirations in art, in religion, and in government. He probably overthrew Bismarck; he certainly overthrew Caprivi; he counterworked Hohenlohe; he first nominated and then opposed Prince Bülow. He was, in short, the power behind the Throne, and his influence depended solely on his gifts as a courtier. But in spite of perverted morals and a reactionary view of life, in spite, even, of his anti-constitutional position, the influence which Prince Eulenburg exerted was not wholly evil. There was a natural antagonism between his aesthetic mysticism and the blood-and-iron materialism of the Bismarckian school. The immediate cause of Herr Harden's attacks was, indeed, the fact—though here it is well to take the statements of both sides with caution—that the Camarilla, which included a French diplomatist, had worked against Prince Bülow for peace and a Franco-German rapprochement in the early stages of the Moroccan conflict. These cross-currents explain the attitude of the German Press. Only the Bismarckian "Cologne Gazette" expresses triumph and unqualified satisfaction.

The Liberal "Vossische Zeitung" is puzzled, critical, and ashamed. The Socialist "Vorwärts," equally hostile to the Camarilla and to Bismarckianism, and contemptuous of the real irrelevancy of the issue, has been asking in a series of pessimistic articles whether the only alternatives before the German people are the public domination of the brutal Bismarckian Junker, or the secret intrigues of the perverted Eulenburg clique. It sees no hope; it refrains from appropriating the weapon which Herr Harden has sharpened, and it knows that a Bismarckian triumph brings constitutional government no nearer.

It is easy to understand the fastidiousness and the despair of German intellectuals, in the face of such a situation as this. They cannot applaud the hero of the day, and they know that the system may survive the victim. While the Emperor claims to rule by divine right, and Ministers are his officials rather than the people's leaders, there will always be room for a secret Camarilla, a "Nebenregierung." Nor can they throw up their hats for German justice, which leaves a Hohenau and a Lynar, guilty of disgusting crimes, at large, while it imprisons Liebknecht, whose only offence was his warfare against war. But a foreigner, judging the affair from a distance, sees the simple fact, which is revealed to the Berlin crowd, and hidden from the intellectuals. It is a gain that the morals and manners of the ruling military caste should be exposed in this merciless and unforgettable fashion. The tailor of Köpenick taught the people to laugh; Count Moltke has caused the laugh to be succeeded by a shudder of disgust. Popular opinion, which judges a class by samples, may fall into exaggeration and injustice. But it is a social and a political gain that the people should realise what barbarism and what corruption is possible in the singularly unlovable ruling class which dominates Prussia, and through Prussia Germany.

The optimists tell us, of course, that the trial is really a proof of the soundness of the German governing class. "Could anything have been finer," they ask, "than Herr Harden's gallant campaign against immorality, and how firmly the Kaiser and the Crown Prince have stamped on what is, after all, a mere excrescence on German life?" Well, we agree that Herr Harden showed a reckless pamphleteer's daring. But when we remember that he had all the facts and documents in his desk for five years, we have a right to doubt whether his motive was a mere love of virtue. The fact is, of course, that the attacks began only when Prince Eulenburg quarrelled, in October of last year, with his nominee, Prince Bülow, and proposed to raise a second member of the Moltke family to his place. It was only then that Herr Bassermann and the Bismarckians opened a campaign against the Kaiser's "personal rule," a campaign which suddenly ceased with Prince Eulenburg's disgrace. The loyal mob may like to think that the Kaiser and the Crown Prince have vindicated German manhood. A little cold reflection may suggest to them, that despite the gratitude he has earned by this service, the Kaiser has shown himself by his twenty years' intimacy with Prince Eulenburg a singularly blind judge of men. The fact is that, as "Vorwärts" puts it, "the Camarilla and Absolutism are inseparable, and to overthrow camarillas is mere Sisyphean-work while Absolutism remains." So long as the power of a Chancellor depends rather on the favour of the Monarch than on the confidence of the Reichstag, the Court remains the real ruler. For the moment we are not at all sure that this scandal has brought responsible government visibly nearer. In the end, however, it must stimulate the process of disillusionment and reflection. The moral effect of this trial—which may not be the last of its kind—must certainly be to undermine personal rule as well as the Prussian "Junker" caste, and to discredit the pretentious theories on which that rule is based.

Life and Letters.

THE CASE AGAINST THE CENSORSHIP.

THE protest against the Censorship of plays, which has been published during the week, signed by no fewer than seventy dramatic authors, is a document which, whatever may result from it, cannot but leave a mark in the history of the drama. It is the prelude to a deputation which the Prime Minister has already consented to receive; and the deputation, whoever its individual members may be, will certainly represent all that is most distinguished in the literature of our time. Among the names appended to the protest are those of George Meredith, Algernon Charles Swinburne, Thomas Hardy, Frederic Harrison, Henry James, W. S. Gilbert, Arthur W. Pinero, William Butler Yeats, H. G. Wells, Henry Arthur Jones, George Bernard Shaw, Israel Zangwill, Gilbert Murray, John Davidson, John Galsworthy, Alfred Sutro, Haddon Chambers, and J. M. Barrie. We have picked out names almost at random, to show that no one school of art or of opinion is represented. The old school, and all the new schools, poetic drama, idyllic drama, and realistic drama, tragedy, comedy, melodrama, and farce, protest, through their leading representatives, against "an office autocratic in procedure, opposed to the spirit of the Constitution, contrary to common justice and to common sense." Not a single dramatist of the first rank has stood aloof from his fellows, and very few of the second rank. One class of playwrights, however—or perhaps we should rather say of theatrical purveyors—is conspicuous by its absence. Captain Basil Hood is the only one of the signatories who has had any connection with the style of entertainment known as "musical comedy." The fact that the librettists of "Gaiety Girls," "Shop Girls," "Girls from Kays," and all their tribe, are the only dramatic authors who feel themselves perfectly comfortable under the tutelage of the Censor, is very significant, and will not, we trust, escape the attention of the Prime Minister.

That a paper signed by such names should be, from the literary point of view, a notable composition, was only to be expected. It compresses into some three hundred words, not, certainly, the whole case against the Censorship, but enough of it to awaken even the man in the street to the anomalous nature of this survival from the days of Tudor autocracy—for Walpole's Act of 1737 did but furbish up an old weapon which had for some time lain neglected in the lumber-room of the royal prerogative. Future generations will find it difficult to believe that, until well into the twentieth century, a self-respecting and respectable class of British citizens, including some men of genius and many men of admirable talent, were exposed to the risk of "having their work and the proceeds of their work destroyed at a pen's stroke, by the arbitrary action of a single official, neither responsible to Parliament nor amenable to Law." The fact that this secret and irresponsible despotism was maintained throughout the nineteenth century affords a measure of the weakness of the English drama during that period. A few cases of individual injustice apart, it cannot be said that, until some twenty or five-and-twenty years ago, the Censorship did very much harm. But as soon as the English drama outgrew its period of inanition and vassalage to France, the Censorship (at any rate as at present constituted) became an intolerable clog upon its best energies. As the passivity of the nineteenth century was a measure of the weakness of the drama, so this remarkable protest is a measure of the new strength which has come to it with a new era and a new reign.

It is interesting, but far from surprising, to note that while the dramatists are practically unanimous in opposing the Censorship, the managers are practically unanimous in supporting it. This fact, too, we trust that the Prime Minister will know how to appreciate. It ought to be illuminating, moreover, to the thousands of excellent people who, without having given much thought to the matter, vaguely conceive the Censorship to be a bulwark of public morality. What can be the motive of the managers? They cannot fear that, were the Censorship abolished, they would be forced to produce immoral plays. Each of them would be perfectly free to conduct his theatre according to the dictates of his conscience and his taste. Not one of them, certainly, has so little faith in his own judgment as to feel that he requires the guidance of a despotic official in determining what is fit and what is unfit for presentation on the stage. What, then, do they fear? Some of them fear a general screwing-up of moral standards, against which they feel that, at present, the Censor effectually protects them; and all of them dread the possibility of officious interference from what they call the "Puritan" party. "L'Empire, c'est la paix" is their motto; or, in the vernacular, "Anything for a quiet life." Even if their fears were well-founded, the obvious reply would be that peace would be too dearly purchased if it meant crushing the life out of our dramatic literature. But we believe that no manager who conducts his theatre reputably need fear the letting loose of so-called "Puritanism." The music-halls are under no Censorship save that which lies in the necessity of having their licenses periodically renewed; have they any reason to complain of "Puritan" tyranny? But the managers may find a still stronger reassurance in the fact—which many people do not realise—that, of the whole English-speaking world, this island is the only spot where any Censorship exists. Ireland is free; Canada, Australia, South Africa are free; the United States are free. From any of these nations do we hear complaints either of licentiousness or of paralysing "Puritanism"? Even the "Comstockery" of the State of New York has entirely failed to restrict the reasonable freedom of the stage. The panic of the managers is wholly visionary, and should do much to open the eyes of those who believe in the Censorship as a necessary guarantee for the morals of the stage. If it is thought, and it probably will be thought, that some supervision of the theatres by a representative body is necessary or wise, we believe that the majority of the authors who have signed the protest would accept the intervention of the County or Town Councils. It has greatly improved the music-halls; why should it have a reverse effect on the theatres?

AN AMERICAN STATESMAN.

THERE is usually something in the career of an American public man, some fighting elemental strain, some suggestion of unhampered spaciousness, that appeals to the convention-ridden Englishman. It may be merely that politics in America being more personal than with us—the politics of ambition as opposed to the politics of ideas—seem more immediately dramatic; or that in a land of ebullient publicity we see more of what is going on behind the scenes; or that the stage over there is really clearer, the career more fully open to talent, the locked doors and blind alleys fewer than amongst ourselves. We seem at any rate to be in closer touch with the actors and near spectators of their failures or successes; and we watch their progress with the certainty of finding, even amid the prosiest surroundings, a note of pronounced individuality in themselves and in their career. Mr. George Bruce Cortelyou, the Secretary of the Treasury, whose handling of the credit crisis in Wall Street has won for him the public and hearty thanks of the President and of the American people, abundantly satisfies this expectancy of freshness. His present position and the steps by which he has reached it, while in one sense unique, are in another so far typical of America as to be impossible outside of it. He is still only forty-five years old, and it is barely sixteen years since he entered the Government service in the extremely modest capacity of stenographer to the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General. There are touches in his youth of that venturesome curiosity which seems to be one of nature's gifts to Americans. The son of a New York business man, he was educated in one of the local public schools, passing thence to a Normal School in Massachusetts. Instead of going to Harvard, he decided to study music. With music he combined shorthand writing and a course in the clinical schools at the New York Hospital. He became a first-rate stenographer, and held a variety of small political posts—political in the sense that he lost them when his party went out—as private secretary to some of the port and post-office officials of New York, and for a while as assistant reporter to the Supreme Court of the State. It was in 1891 that he was appointed to a subordinate clerical post in the office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General. This, too, was not a permanent post but a part, luckily for him an insignificant part, of the spoils that belonged to the victors. It was probably its insignificance that saved Mr. Cortelyou from following the rest of the Republican office-holders into exile when Mr. Cleveland came into power after the election of 1892.

That passion for self-improvement which is at the root of American strength led Mr. Cortelyou to spend his evenings studying law. He became a fully-qualified advocate, but it was chance and his proficiency in shorthand, and not his degree of Master of Laws, that first put him on the high road to distinction. Mr. Cleveland in 1895 found himself in need of a stenographer. The Postmaster-General had heard of Mr. Cortelyou, and at once recommended him. He was promptly transferred to the White House, the first Republican probably who ever found himself in the immediate official entourage of a Democratic President. Mr. Cleveland formed so high an opinion of his secretarial abilities that he recommended him to Mr. McKinley, who at once appointed him chief assistant to his private secretary. Ill-health compelled the private secretary's resignation in 1900, and Mr. Cortelyou stepped into his shoes. Thus it came about that a man who had never served any apprenticeship in "politics," who had never manipulated a machine or bossed a single electoral district, who possessed neither backing nor influence, and whose name was utterly unknown to the vast bulk of his countrymen, became secretary to the President. It is a post scarcely less exhausting and difficult than that of the Presidency itself. Whoever holds it must be prepared to act as a buffer between the Chief Magistrate and the public. Nine times out of ten he is the President's alter ego. On his tact in handling every member of the multitudes who over-run the White House, senators, congressmen, office-seekers, journalists, and casual callers, depends to a very large degree the President's popularity. He has to direct a large clerical staff and a stupendous volume of routine business; to arrange all the details of the President's journeyings and engagements; to act not merely as his secretary but as his eyes and ears in all matters of political moment; to judge men quickly and accurately; to refuse requests and information without offending; to relieve the President of all possible burdens without seeming in the eyes of a suspicious democracy to be usurping his place or fencing the Chief Magistrate in a regal seclusion. An adequate discharge of all these duties would tax the patience of Job and the wisdom of Solomon. But the reward is great. A secretary with the right capacities becomes a sort of ninth member of the Cabinet, and is at all times far better placed than the official Ministers for influencing the Presidential mind. Throughout the great strain of the Spanish, Philippine, and Boxer wars, and especially during the racking week that followed the assassination of Mr. McKinley, Mr. Cortelyou showed himself a master of his calling. The White House under his administration became as well organised as the most efficient private business. He could work for twelve and fifteen hours a day for months on end; he was never hurried or excited; he met every emergency with a quick understanding, complete self-possession and a capacity for the common-sense decision that became with experience almost an instinct; his reticence, which Mr. Roosevelt has been known to compare with Moltke's, went with so much candour and modesty that, though the last quality Americans like to find in their public men, it never brought him a moment's unpopularity; his unruffled competency, thoroughness, and discretion took on something of the unerringness of a humanised machine.

Mr. Roosevelt had the sense to ask Mr. Cortelyou to remain as his secretary, and Mr. Cortelyou, though not a man of private means, and bombarded by business offers worth from five to eight times as much as his niggardly official salary, had the character to consent. The inevitable promotion was not long delayed. The President created a new Government Department of Commerce and Labour, and appointed Mr. Cortelyou its chief, with a seat in the Cabinet. Though the youngest of the Government offices, there is none that exceeds it in the variety, interest, and importance of its work. A score of scattered bureaus were placed under its jurisdiction, reorganised and simplified. Everything that concerns labour interests throughout the world, lighthouses, coast survey, statistics of foreign and domestic commerce, inspection of merchant vessels and steamboats, the control of immigration, the taking of the census, the supervision of fisheries, weights and measures, all come within its scope. And in addition, two new and vital bureaus were established, one for investigating all the corporations, except the railroads, engaged in inter-state or foreign commerce, and the other for gathering information for the expansion of manufactures. To the administration of this vast Department, with its ten thousand employees, and its yearly expenditure of two million pounds, Mr. Cortelyou brought the same organising faculty and pertinent energy that had won him the confidence of three such dissimilar men as Presidents Cleveland, McKinley, and Roosevelt. He laid the foundations firm and sure, weeded out "politics" and red tape, eliminated the duplication of labour among the old bureaus, and showed in his planning of the mechanism and policy of the new ones that he possessed the rarer faculty of initiative. Mr. Roosevelt, wisely or unwisely, took him away from his Department to make him the Republican campaign manager in the Presidential Election of 1904—a post that had hitherto been filled only by "practical" politicians. It was a one-sided contest, and needed, on the whole, comparatively little management; but Mr. Cortelyou had no difficulty in showing that executive talents, level-headedness, and tact were sufficient, even without an experience of the underworld of politics, to carry it through successfully. The President rewarded his lieutenant by making him Postmaster-General. Here, again, Mr. Cortelyou displayed his turn for rising with absolute adequacy to the requirements of whatever office he may happen to be holding. In March of the present year he was appointed Secretary of the Treasury. It is improbable that six months ago he knew anything about banking and finance. It is more than likely that by now his patient and systematic brain has mastered all the principles and most of the details. He has, at any rate, succeeded in passing a much-needed law, releasing the funds that the Tariff accumulates in the Treasury, and his handling of the Wall Street panic of last week showed decision and calmness. The clumsy currency system of the country may yet find in this quiet and concentrated man the agent of its wholesale reform. He is one of those Americans who make the business of Government seem almost ludicrously easy.

HOW TO MAKE A ROSE GARDEN.

THERE are few more popular functions among flower-lovers than the great shows of the National Rose Society, which have grown greatly in educational value since the beautiful, free-flowering, cluster roses have been made a feature of them. In former days we saw nothing at the shows but long lines of green boxes, filled with blooms that were rarely seen in ordinary gardens, and were useless for making them beautiful. They were prize-winning roses, and nothing more.

The "rosarian," as distinguished from the rose grower, thinks in first prizes and silver cups. He does not contemplate a rose garden as a beautiful creation, sufficient in itself for human satisfaction, but as a something from which a certain number of what he calls "good" flowers can be cut. A "good" flower, of course, is one which, with a little dressing from the skilled fingers of an old exhibiting hand, conforms to the standard that prevails in the show tents. This is desecration, and the rose lover must beware of its malign influence. The rose garden must not be a mere breeding place for silver medals. If prize flowers can be cut from it, well and good; but they must be only a secondary consideration. It must be as much the expression of pure art as a great picture or musical composition. In planning and planting a rose garden, one should no more be dominated by the idea of ultimate money-making than was Richard Wagner when he wrote the music which flows from the lips of Elsa.

At a period of the year when the rose nurseries are gorged with plants awaiting customers, it is worth while for flower lovers to consider whether they cannot attempt a special rose garden. What more delightful an addition to the surroundings of the home? Think of the pillars of ramblers, the arches with their dangling sprays, the glowing beds, the scented paths! Think of the great clusters for the home vases, for the Church!

The famous gardens of the country—Lord Gerard's at Eastwell Park, Mr. Alfred Tate's at Leatherhead, Lord Falmouth's at Mereworth, Mr. H. V. Machin's at Worksop, are surely only the forerunners of a host of others. The Eastwell pleasure is built upon an old kitchen garden. Lord Falmouth's is a specimen of the best work of Dean Hole. The latter is the more interesting, not so much because of its famous designer, but because it is comparatively small, and gives encouragement to those who have not the many acres of places like Eastwell. The rose garden need not be large; it need not entail a heavy sum in construction or upkeep. A delightful design is possible within the compass of a few square rods, and there is many a waste corner that costs the owner as much in the labour entailed in keeping down the weeds which it propagates as it would in maintenance as a rose garden.

That the influence of Dean Hole in gardening is likely to live through his writings, the reception of his recently published biography conclusively proves. But it will live in a more tangible form. Scattered up and down the country there are rose gardens laid out under his personal direction in the days when he held the Deanery of Rochester, and they have formed the model for many others.

To any one who is familiar with his handiwork, the rose gardens which came into being through his influence are recognised as readily as his writings. It needs no notice over the entrance, "Rose garden laid out after Dean Hole's design" to tell the visitor whence they have sprung. They have style; they have character. There are the various main walks, each entered through a rustic arch covered with a selected rose, such as Carmine Pillar or Longworth Rambler, and all converging on a common centre, where is to be found an arbour, pool, or fountain. Round the central object are grouped a series of small beds, each containing only one variety of rose. The by-paths, like the main ones, have arches, each with its Rambler.

The Dean Hole rose garden is a happy combination of the formal and the informal. The stiffness of the beds is relieved by the liberal use of arches. Some rosarians criticise the one-bed-one-variety system, on the ground that the happy effects secured by a judicious blending of colours are lost, but there is much to be said on the other side. The system has undeniable power. Bold groups of such distinctive roses as Grüss an Teplitz, Caroline Testout, Mrs. John Laing, Frau Karl Druschki, and Madame Abel Chatenay—varieties which have great vigour of growth combined with clear and decided colours—produce an effect which no mixing of varieties is capable of producing.

The increase of special rose gardens is due in a very considerable measure to the success of Dean Hole's designs, and it would seem that the time is not far distant when such a "garden within a garden" will form a feature of most large and many small places. It is this, far more than the exhibition rose, that has brought such a great accession of strength to the National Rose Society, and which made the recent autumn show of that flourishing body so triumphant a success.

Without plunging deeply into technicalities, which any of the many excellent books on rose culture will furnish, the writer may be pardoned if he gives suggestions for a simple but beautiful rose garden. Given a square, it may be robbed of its stiffness by forming at each corner a bed which will present a concave outline to the centre of the garden. At each corner of each bed there shall be a pillar, which shall be connected by chains with a series of pillars along each side of the square, completely enclosing the garden. Carmine Pillar, Crimson Rambler, Dorothy Perkins, Hiawatha, Félicité Perpétue, and other beautiful climbing varieties will cover the pillars and ramble along the chains.

The central object of the garden shall be a hexagonal bower, a tall central pillar being connected by light poles with the eight outer pillars. Each pillar will have its rose. A set of eight heart-shaped beds shall surround the bower, the point of each heart facing the centre of the eight bays of the central hexagon. Each of these beds have one selected variety of rose. The design may be completed by four crescent-shaped beds, one at the back of each pair of hearts.

This is by no means a difficult design to follow, and it is a very beautiful one, equally good on a large or a small scale. It combines the formal with the informal in the approved Hole style. It is harmonious, and it provides abundance of scope for the use of the lovely pillar roses which are now so popular.

To many, a beautiful rose garden, with its brilliant pillars, floral chains, and scented sprays is merely an alluring vision. But, with decisive action now, it may become a reality within the space of a few short months.

IN PRAISE OF MUSHROOMS.

OVER the eastern hills there is full sunrise, but here in the valley one is conscious only of a growing life in the great arch of sky momentarily deepening and thrilling with intense colour. And earth as well as heaven is quickening with waxing light. There is a light everywhere; light in the films of mist that billow and break and scatter in the dawn wind, changing from dull body white to iridescent amber. Through a gap in the surrounding hills the breeze comes creeping along the course of the river, and before it the vapours roll and sway in lumbering retreat up the sloping meadows, hanging, like obstinate defeated squadrons, at every hedgerow and clump of trees or bushes. There is light on the drenched grass of the fields and the yellow stubble. Grey in the dusk of dawn, as the day grows, the veil of dew intensifies and cleanses the hues of pasture and reaped land. Light, too, lies on the circle of wood all around us, silvering the stems of birch and ash and elm, reddening those of the firs and cedars, slipping in among the leafage, and showing the first signs of the red ruin of autumn.

In the brisk autumn air, as well as light, are perfume and sound; not the heavy wine-like scents of a summer morning, though the sweetness of the roses is still distinctly perceptible; but a bracing, half bitter, wholly pleasant odour that is born of fading bracken, changing grass and creepers, and the first layer of fallen leaves. From overhead drops the cry of passing rooks, most autumnal of music, and down in the undergrowth of the woods partridges are calling. On the hedges are long yellowing sprays of bryony, patches of frothy clematis, clusters of blackberries, all tints from reddish green to violet brown, dainty blossoms of bramble, bunches of scarlet haws. In the field we are crossing that has not been used this summer for hay, the longer grass is beginning to lose colour and to grow the whitey brown of winter. Above it scabious raises its lavender blossoms, and the cow-parsley, bare of flower and tanned of leaf, rises here and there in miniature forests. Everywhere are nettles of spiders' webs radiant with dewdrops; they are thrown in swaying gauzey bridges from one plant to another; they mesh together the blades of grass; they fly loose in the air and touch your face and hands with the pressure of spirit fingers. Where the ground begins to be broken and to slope sharply downwards, a couple of rabbits, surprised at frisking play, jump off towards their holes, and from under the leaves of burdock by the hedge, the bright eye of a pheasant glimpses us a moment before the bird rises with a whirr.

Tread slowly now and keep your eyes about you. There are mushroomers and mushroomers, and some few of them seem to have a kind of intuition for their spoil; but for the rest of us unendowed with such a sixth sense, it is well to keep a sharp look out and to walk warily. You may all too easily tread on a patch unheeding, and only know your mistake too late for any remedy but ill language. Nor must you ever neglect a spot because it looks unlikely. Half the charm of a discovery lies in its unexpectedness as you light on a little covey of buttons nestling down in the turf of some corner or bankside you had all but passed over. The spirit of emulation leaps into flame to warm your natural zeal. Ten to one your companions have scorned the place before you, or, if not they, some other wayfarer. I don't think a field white with mushrooms ever affords delight equal to one where you must glean the scattered colonies, six here and a dozen yonder, all the result of heedful observation; and I never, for my own part, rejoice in the huge discoloured umbrellas of the giants as I do in the tiny white balls, looking almost like eggs in the grass and coming into your hand at a touch as sweetly and easily as a ripe "pear late basking over a wall." There is always something of romance about the actual and primitive, and what more natural and primitive than the search for your own food-stuffs? Hands and knees down in the grass, what else are you doing than what men and women have been doing since days infinitely antediluvian? Excepting some half-dozen processes, all purely physical and some of them nearly unconscious, there is no action of our daily life can boast a really hoary antiquity. The very wares for sale in a greengrocer's window tell the same story of artificial cultivation and ruined simplicity. A basket of strawberries, for instance: charming in colour and alluring in taste and smell; but in the early year they always suggest to me the stifling sickly air of forcing houses, and in summer tell me of peasant folk bowed and sweating in the sunshine over the labour of plucking them. The only things, indeed, I can contemplate without scenting some taint of the primal curse about them are the great piles of mushrooms and baskets of blackberries and whortles, for I know that in most cases they are there as the result of the happy toil of children and young people abroad in the lanes and fields at sunrise.

"In most cases" I write advisedly, for an exception, and not a very honest one, is under our eyes even now in the form of a tatterdemalion male figure slinking out of sight among the trees of a neighbouring coppice. A great basket is slung to his side. The ruffian! he was probably out before daybreak, and our own very moderate baskets are most likely due to his diligence. He might well seem the last belated reveller of some sabbat nocturne, or other unholy mystery, creeping off among the trunks with the last torn rags of mist and shortening shadows.

Open Questions.

IS SOCIALISM A SPOILS SYSTEM?

WOULD Socialism, total or partial, settle the eternal conflict between capital and labour, or would it merely shift the struggle from the industrial on to the political stage, introducing new elements of danger and corruption into politics while affording no real security for industrial peace? If, for instance, the railways or the mining industry in this country passed into the hands of the State, would not the railwaymen and the miners, who, even under present circumstances, organise in electoral areas where they are strong and use their voting power to secure legislation and administration favourable to their conditions of employment, concentrate all their organised energy upon party politics and Parliamentary government to extort higher wages, shorter hours, and other preferential conditions, without any regard to the interests of the taxpayers? The great mining districts of the North, the Midlands, and of South Wales; such railroad towns as Rugby, Crewe, and Derby would no longer return members of Parliament to assist in the general work of making and administering laws in the general interests of the nation: even the interests of party would yield place to the narrower form of trade individualism, and knots of men would sit in Parliament pledged to devote themselves to the supreme end of securing for the workers in a particular industry a bigger pull upon the public purse in pay, pensions, or other advantages. As Socialism advanced further, politics would more and more degenerate into the cockpit of sectional industrial strife, each national trade seeking to advance itself at the expense of the nation as a whole. Every town would be a Chatham or a Plymouth: the menace offered to-day by organisations of postal employees and school teachers would be far more formidable in the case of large localised trades employing a majority of the workers in whole districts: the House of Commons, and the miners' elective bodies, would be composed chiefly of members pledged to subordinate all other public considerations to the particular economic needs or demands of their constituents. The public good, it is urged, would disappear in favour of a number of competing private goods. Incidentally, the re-alignment of political forces and issues would lend itself to a fiscal policy of Protection, as politics became more and more a game of pulls between groups of producers, each of which would be urgent to maintain the largest volume of employment for its members at the highest rate of pay and would insist on taxing or prohibiting imports which might impair this policy.

That this is a real difficulty there can be no doubt. But is it inherent and inseparable in all forms and degrees of Socialism? In a completely Socialistic State, where all consumers, all taxpayers—in fact, all citizens—were servants of the State, and the entire product of the national activity was divided in payment for public services, fierce political conflicts might well arise between the several services: miners trying to secure higher wages and shorter hours than cotton-workers by superior manipulation of votes, and the like. In a word, trade individualism might be rampant in a nominally Socialist State. Until an ideal of social solidarity was reached the collectivist State would be rent by such dissensions.

But this is not our problem. The Socialism which here concerns us is an extension of the existing industrial functions of the State, where not the entire body of workers, but a large and growing percentage, are public employees. Will they be able to tyrannise over the general body of citizens in the sense of extorting an excessive pay for an insufficient amount of effective service? That they will tend and try to do so may be well admitted. How far will they succeed? Do our post-office employees and our public teachers already get too much and give too little? It is not obvious that they do, or that their trade organisations as an economical and political instrument can and will enable them to do so. "Yes," it may be said, "but it will be very different if, instead of employing some 5 per cent. of the wage-earners, the State employed 20 or 40 per cent.: these would then become the dominant force in party politics and would work the public machine for their private gain."

Now, how much weight is there in this argument? Let us suppose the main steps in "practicable Socialism" to have been taken. One of two things would happen: Either the public services would form separate organisations for their several protection and advancement, or they would federate. In the former event the jealousy of other services would furnish a real, even if not an adequate, check upon the political pull of any single service. If, however, as is, perhaps, more reasonable to suppose, the various public services organised for common pressure on the public purse, seeking to get high wages, short hours, and other advantages for all public employees, would such a policy necessarily bring the State to ruin?

Two checks, or qualifications, must be taken into consideration. In the first place, the conditions of most wage-earners engaged in private competitive industry will leave a large margin for legitimate improvement when an industry passes into public hands. Taking a concrete instance, it would "pay" the State, on taking over the railways, to raise the wages and lower the hours for many, if not most, railway employees: for public safety, longer and more efficient working lives, better homes, and sound provision for old age are more valuable assets from the standpoint of the public than from that of any private company. This economy is of very wide application. It signifies that a large part of the increased expense of the higher wage-bill under public employment would be a public profit, not a loss, a wise social economy, and not a dole.

But would the demands of State employees stop at this or any other point? Probably not. There is, however, another check, viz., the growing unwillingness of the body of free citizens and taxpayers to be "bled" by the organisation of public employees. Even in America the ordinary citizen kicks when the extortion of the "bosses" and their "gangs" passes a certain limit. In proportion as the system of "graft" here imputed to public employees became more formidable and voracious, the organised resentment of the lay public might be expected to express itself more effectively. But it is reasonable to admit that neither of these qualifying circumstances disposes of the danger. If the national government owned and operated the railways and the mines, while the local government similarly enlarged its sphere of operations, there would be a real and a grave risk of abuses such as I have indicated, if politics continued to run upon the lines with which we are familiar.

Such abuses can only be remedied in one of two ways: either the real power must be entrusted to an expert bureaucracy who shall impose conditions of work and pay upon the rank and file of the public services, the State Socialism of Germany, or else our political machinery must be radically changed so as to furnish an adequate protection to the lay majority of citizens against any extortionate proclivities of the public services. The former is, however, no ultimate solution; it merely narrows and intensifies the tyranny, raising a further question which I shall discuss later, viz., the possibility of a popular control over the expert official.

In a nation committed to popular self-government, the sole method of safety lies in correcting the excess of political power vested in small determined minorities under our existing party system. The nature of that excess is very apparent. At present a small, compact group of voters, who set their heart on some particular reform—local veto, anti-vaccination, or what not—can, by forcing candidates to bid for their support, exact pledges and exert an influence on legislation out of all proportion to their numbers. These groups are usually composed of disinterested citizens. How much more keenly and effectively would this power be exercised by local groups of railwaymen, miners, or municipal employees, animated by strong hopes of personal gain and fully conscious of their size and solidarity? It is idle to assume that public spirit, or contentment with the good conditions of public employment, would prevent them from asking for more or from organising to obtain it. Under our present electoral methods a "spoils system" would be inevitable. But this crucial test only discloses the signal deficiency of our democratic machinery. At present a compact minority may make our elective bodies misrepresentative. There are some who, alive to the danger of a large civil service, would disqualify all public servants, curing one disease by its opposite. Such mutilation of representative government is, however, unnecessary. All that is needed is proportionate representation, which will reduce the political strength of public employees to its right dimensions. It is quite proper that these should be represented, as they doubtless would, in Parliament and other electoral bodies, by men chosen chiefly to safeguard their professional interests. These interests form an important factor of the commonwealth and deserve their full share of consideration. Under proportional representation, however, no body of public servants, owning special interests, could impose upon the Government a policy unduly favouring these interests.

One final word: strikes, as a method of securing concessions to labour, would become of necessity a weaker and weaker weapon as this "Socialism" advanced. As employment grew practically permanent, with long terms of contract, wages and other conditions better than those prevailing in the outside labour market, a strike would react more injuriously than now upon the strikers and could only legally occur upon conditions which gave ample time for replacement from outside. For it would, of course, be right and necessary for Government to protect the public interest by a firm enforcement of the labour contract between its employees and itself. I do not contend that these considerations entirely and finally dispose of the danger of public servants using politics for "spoils"; but they certainly reduce the magnitude of this menace.

J. A. H.

Poetry.

VOX MARIUM.

WHENCE comes, O Moon, thy path upon the sea,
Out from the dreamer's land of what shall be,
From out eternity?

Beyond that glimmering path what regions lie,
Through those blanched portals where the seas touch sky,
What land of mystery?

The pallid waters burdened with strange lore
Whisper the ancient secret on this shore,
Will whisper evermore.

We hear their speech, yet do not understand
The murmurous utterance of their distant land
Borne to this alien strand:

And through the hissing spray one voice alone
We recognise, laden with human moan,
The sullen undertone.

Hoarse waters striving to articulate,
To all your voices charged with hints of fate
Our hearts reverberate;
For once it seems we knew the darkened spell,
Dim memories stir, we can—we cannot tell;
You guard your secret well.

Where leads that glimmering path upon the sea?
Into the dreamer's land of what shall be,
Beyond Mortality?
Past the wan margin where the clouds of Death
Bend down to cut the shadowy tide of breath—
What land of mystery?

J. W. FEAVER.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

LORD CROMER has placed in the hands of Messrs. Macmillan, for publication early next year, a work on modern Egypt, the result of his long official connection with the country. The work will be interesting, not only because of Lord Cromer's striking and strongly marked personality, and the solidity of his achievement in Egypt, but from the literary powers which he has shown, not least effectively in a series of the most brilliant reports that have ever adorned a Blue Book.

* * *

WE are also to have a new edition of the "Secret History of the English Occupation of Egypt," by Mr. Wilfrid Scawen Blunt, one of Lord Cromer's most vigorous critics. Sir William Butler has written an introduction, and Mr. Blunt adds a memorandum, in which he deals at some length with the treatment of Egyptian questions by the "Times," and answers the criticisms made on the earlier edition of his work by that journal.

* * *

FROM the New York "Nation" we learn that a memorial volume, containing essays and letters by the late Wendell Phillips Garrison, will be published as soon as the materials can be collected and arranged. Garrison's reputation has been rather overshadowed by that of his friend and chief, E. L. Godkin, the greatest of American journalists, whose "Life" was reviewed some time ago in our columns. But although by no means as brilliant a writer as Godkin, the reviews which he contributed to "The Nation" were almost as remarkable in their own way as Godkin's keen and effective political comment. The coming volume is to be edited by Mr. P. M. Garrison. He will be grateful for the loan of any characteristic letters, and promises to return them with as little delay as possible.

* * *

AMONG Messrs. Constable's announcements is a volume called "Letters from the Raven," containing the correspondence of Lafcadio Hearn with Henry Walkin. The book should prove a brilliant addition to the literature of letter-writing, for Hearn's published letters are marked by great charm and freshness. Mr. Milton Bronner, who edits the volume, tells us the curious fact that "the mere labour of writing was a physical task with Hearn, demanding hours for the composition of a single letter." This is certainly an example of the difficult writing which makes easy reading. Mr. Bronner's general estimate of Hearn is close to the truth. "He seems to have every attribute of a great writer," he says, "save humour. There is hardly a smile in any of his books on Japan. One would say that the author was a man who never knew what gaiety was."

* * *

IN the meantime, English readers have an opportunity of reading some other letters by Hearn addressed to Mr. Osman Edwards, the second instalment of which appears in the current number of "The Albany Review." They deal for the most part with modern French writers, and contain some excellent criticisms. He is enthusiastic about Pierre Loti, for whom he says his feeling "is that of fanatical, furious adoration." "Loti is certainly to my thinking the greatest writer in the world." The following passage is more measured in tone, but shows the same admiration:—

"There is not much heart in Loti; but there is a fine brain; and there is a nervous system so extraordinary that it forces imagination back to the conditions of old Greek life, when men had senses more perfect than now. Very possibly this Julien Viaud has in his veins old blood of Magna Græcia. No other literary man living sees and hears and smell and thrills so finely as he; we are in presence of a being of immeasurably superior organisation—therefore, exceedingly unhappy in this world of the nineteenth century. I doubt whether he has ever loved, or could love in our sense. But I think we must study him as a creature apart."

His other admirations were for Anatole France, the best of whom he re-read every year, and the poets of the Romantic Movement, especially Gautier. His view of the Decadent School of French poetry may be judged from this verdict passed upon a recent anthology:—

"The new poetry is simply rotten! morally and otherwise. I am not prudish; I still think Gautier's 'Musée Secret' (in the 'Souvenirs' of Emile Bergerat) the finest poem of an artistic kind in the French or any other language. But there is in it a splendid something entirely absent from the new poetry—the joy of life. There is no joy in this new world—and scarcely any tenderness: the language is the language of art, but the spirit is of Holbein and the Gothic ages of religious madness. I do not know that poetry ought to be joyous, in a general way; there is beauty in pain and sorrow. Only—is ugliness or pain, without beauty, a subject worthy of poetry? (I am not including subjects of cosmic emotion in the question.) 'Ionica'—a rare English example of exquisite grace and loveliness in melancholy—contains a dozen little pieces, any one of which is worth all the pieces in 'Poètes d'Aujourd'hui'; I think it illustrates what I mean. What has neither joy nor beauty, nor the power of bestirring any great quality or volume of emotion—any cosmic feeling or generous feeling—ought not such a matter to be excluded from poetry proper?"

* * *

THERE is still room for the activities of the Board Schools. Mr. Fisher Unwin, who recently published a finely illustrated edition of "Romola," has received a letter addressed "G. Eliot, Esq., c/o Mr. T. Fisher Unwin, 1, Adelphi Terrace." On opening the envelope it was seen to contain a circular inviting George Eliot to subscribe to a press-cutting agency.

* * *

PROFESSOR VINOGRADOFF is probably the greatest living authority on medieval English history, and scholars are eagerly waiting for the publication of a volume on "English Society in the Eleventh Century," which he has just completed. For some time Professor Vinogradoff held the chair of history in the University of Moscow, but his liberal ideas brought him into collision with the bureaucratic authorities, and he resigned his position and came to England. His studies of "The Growth of the English Manor" and "Villainage in England" are wonderfully learned and suggestive contributions towards the elucidation of one of the most obscure and perplexing problems of English history.

* * *

MR. G. L. GOMME has completed the "Index of Archæological Papers, 1665-1890," upon which he has been engaged for over twenty-five years, and the work will be issued this season by Messrs. Constable. A great deal of valuable work done by the archæological and historical societies has been hitherto extremely difficult of access, through the want of a complete index of their various volumes of "Transactions." Mr. Gomme's work, together with the annual index published by the Congress of Archæological Societies, covers the whole ground, from the first publications in the philosophical transactions of the Royal Society, down to the present time. He is to be heartily congratulated on the completion of his valuable and laborious undertaking.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

- "Coke of Norfolk and His Friends." By A. M. W. Stirling. (Lane, 32s. net.)
- "Life and Letters of Sir Henry Wotton." By L. Pearsall Smith. (Clarendon Press, 25s. net.)
- "The Queen of Letter Writers." By Janet Aldis. (Methuen, 12s. 6d. net.)
- "Lucretius: Epicurean and Poet." By John Masson. (Murray, 12s. net.)
- "Leaves from the Note-books of Lady Dorothy Nevill." Edited by her son, Ralph Nevill. (Macmillan, 15s. net.)
- "The Philosophy of Common Sense." By Frederic Harrison. (Macmillan, 7s. 6d. net.)
- "The France of To-day." By Professor Barrett Wendell. (Constable, 6s. net.)
- "My Memoirs," Vol. II. By Alexandre Dumas. (Methuen, 6s. net.)
- "The Canon and Text of the New Testament." By Professor C. R. Gregory. (T. & T. Clark, 12s. net.)
- "Two-Legs, and Other Stories." By Carl Ewald. Translated from the Danish by A. Teixeira de Mattos. (Methuen, 6s.)
- "La Bourgeoisie française au XVIIe Siècle—Etude Sociale." Par Charles Normand. (Paris: Alcan, 12fr.)
- "Questions et Figures Politiques." Par Raymond Poincaré. (Paris: Fasquelle, 3fr. 50.)
- "L'Ombre du Soir." Nouvelles. Par Renée d'Ulmès. (Paris: Lemerre, 3fr. 50.)
- "Der Amerikaner." Roman. Von Gabriele Reuter. (Berlin: Fischer, M.4.)
- "Donizetti a Roma. Con lettere e documenti inediti." Di Alberto Cametti. (Torino: Bocca, L.6.)

Letters to the Editor.

THE NEW MARRIAGE ACT AND THE BISHOPS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The Bishops have met in camera, after the fashion of a congress of Cardinals, and found lying on the council board a memorial, with nearly ten thousand signatures, expressive of the clerical mind on the question of the new Marriage Act. Curiously enough, that clerical mind was found to be voiced, both as to the wording of the memorial itself, and the covering letter which went with it, by a single layman. It shows that, after all, the genius of Papal power has survived in England, and its mantle, on this occasion, has fallen upon Lord Halifax, and thereby created him a lay Pope. And in order that we may clearly perceive the intention of "clericalism," it is most necessary that we should thoroughly take in the contexts of this address. The memorialists not only express their thanks for the past action of the Primate of All England in the House of Lords in defence of the "Marriage Laws of the Universal Church," but stand in marshalled lines, under the command of their newly appointed lay-head, in readiness, when the word is given, to support steps which the Archbishop is practically asked to take "to assert the right of the Church of England to enforce that law (of the Universal Church) upon its own members."

Who are members of the Church of England? Constitutionally, by right of being the established National Church, all subjects of the King in England and Wales, every member of the State still being, in the eye of the law, a member of the State Church, whose one statutable governing body of laymen is Parliament. But we do not wish, in the face of altered circumstances, to unduly press our legal rights of membership. We are content, for the moment, to accept the truly Catholic test, and to affirm that all baptised Christians are members of the one authorised and legally recognised National Church. Some may be conforming members, others non-conforming; but that is not the point at issue. Hence it follows that not only are the clergy who themselves contract a lawful marriage, who either solemnise such or grant the use of the church of which they are the responsible ministers, but also all persons having any right of membership who contract such a marriage, are to be deprived of their membership and placed under ecclesiastical censure. Parishioners are to be deprived, at the autocratic will of the incumbent, of the use of their parish church, and denied approach to the Lord's Table. So far as the Sacraments of the Church are concerned, they are placed under an interdict carrying with it, whether they be clergy or laity, a spiritual boycott. Lord Halifax's language at the meeting of the English Church Union at Yarmouth leaves no doubt as to the intention of the memorialists of whom he is the accredited Aaron. Indeed, with or without the Bishops, it looks as though the memorialists had committed themselves to close two-thirds of the 14,700 and odd churches in England and Wales against any parishioners who desire such marriage as the new Act makes lawful, and, if so married, to deprive them of their spiritual rights. It is in this direction that the seriousness of the situation lies. It shows also the grievous error in judgment made by the Government when they not only granted liberty of action to the incumbent, but empowered him (if he so willed) to close the parish or district church of which he was minister against those persons who were desirous of taking the benefit of the Act.

It is needless to say that the politic Archbishop has done his best to keep the Ship of the Church off Scylla, and then, to avoid running into Charybdis, his Grace tacks again. All idea (as held by the ten thousand) of marriage with a deceased wife's sister being contrary to divine law is given up. The appeal to Scripture cannot be sustained. Leviticus xviii., 18, has to be given up. The revised version gives the plain meaning of the Hebrew text, which is supported by a continuous flow of ancient versions and commentators from 280 B.C. to 1560 A.D. Jew and Christian, Romanist and Protestant, are of one mind.

Nor, when it is remembered that we are standing on Jewish ground, does the inference from affinity help the objector. According to the Mosaic law, the husband's relations by marriage became the wife's relations, but not her relations his. The "flesh of his flesh" does not comprehend the relations of the wife, who has left her own family and become incorporated into that of her husband. And, as regards Church law, we have to wait till the beginning of the fourth century before we discover that a local Spanish Council undertook to forbid these marriages and to reverse the ancient law of Rome. A learned writer (the late Prebendary McCaul, D.D.), has shown that there is not a Canon of Eastern or Western, Greek or Syrian, Roman or African Council that bears on the subject. It is true that Canon Law in the pre-Reformation Church of England included these marriages as within the forbidden degrees; but then the degrees were extended to the seventh generation (including not only first, but second and third cousins), for the purpose of the money obtained from papal dispensations. Archbishop Parker's Table of Kindred and Affinity (not part of the Prayers proper) merely summarised "our laws" in regard to persons forbidden to marry. The Canons of 1604 were put forth by royal prerogative only, and it is open to question how far they are now binding on the laity. At any rate, they only hold good till superseded by subsequent Canons or provisions of an Act of Parliament. In the matter of marriage with a deceased wife's sister, Canon 99 has been thus superseded. As to the setting up of the law of the State Church against that of the State, the Bishop of Hereford gave wholesome warning to his Diocesan Conference. And the Archbishop of Canterbury himself has declined to take up the position of the memorialists, and will enforce nothing, leaving his clergy the freedom which the Act gives them to decide either way. His Grace further throws his protecting shield over any responsible minister who either performs the marriage now legalised or allows the church of which he is incumbent to be used for that purpose. It looks as if the Bishop of Exeter will have to do the same in the case of the Vicar of Dartmouth.

At all events, it is highly desirable that the vast majority of the laity who approve the new Act should raise their voices against the tyranny of a "clericalism" that seeks to make of no effect in the Established Church an Act of Parliament which they have demanded for many years past. Is it, also, too much to ask that the majority of the clergy will bear in mind the attitude of the Archbishop they memorialised towards a clerical brother who has decided otherwise? "I shall," his Grace says, "in no way regard him as disloyal or disrespectful because of the decision to which he has come." Such a one is of the company of such great Churchmen as Dean Hook and Dean Vaughan, and of such a distinguished son of the faith as William Ewart Gladstone.—Yours &c.,

October 28th, 1907.

J. F. W.

"IRELAND AND LIBERALISM."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—“A Protestant Elector,” under above heading, says that during the past century Dublin Castle policy and the attitude of the Protestant gentry have had the natural effect of driving the people into the arms of the priests, “who have thus obtained over the uneducated peasantry a domination that all educated Irishmen of any creed must regard as pernicious.” Surely, in matters of morals and religion, it is right that the people should be advised and guided by their clergy. Is such guidance pernicious? But the suggestion that the people are dominated in political and social matters by the clergy is so opposed to all the facts of history that I ask leave to offer some evidence to the contrary.

The Roman Catholic hierarchy are, of course, unanimous when they meet in council and promulgate manifestos, just as any other board or the Cabinet is. The majority decides. But, as individuals, in matters outside faith and doctrine, they are not so. When Archbishop McCabe denounced the Ladies' Land League, Archbishop Croke replied that “his Grace's political likings and dislikings carry very little weight or significance.”

But, as to the influence of the hierarchy generally, in 1799 the Archbishop of Cashel, asked to use his influence to procure signatures in favour of the Union, wrote to a brother Archbishop, “you know how little influence we have over them in political matters." The Archbishop of Tuam wrote at the same time that if he signed the resolutions, "I would draw down upon myself the censure of a large portion of the inhabitants of this diocese."

O'Connell said that while he would accept his faith from Rome, he would no more take his politics from there than from Stamboul. This sentiment has been repeated over and over during recent times by political leaders when their action has been condemned by ecclesiastics. A committee of the House of Commons was told by Richard Sheil in 1825 that "if a priest at an election directed the people not to vote for any man who would not support reform, the people would not listen to him"; and, "if there were two candidates, a Protestant and a Catholic, and the priest made a strong appeal in favour of the Catholic, it would be unavailing."

This has been borne out by the whole history of the modern national movement. Protestant Home Rulers opposed by the clergy have been elected by overwhelmingly Catholic constituencies, as in Kerry and in Tipperary, where their opponents had the support of both the Catholic clergy and the landlords.

Many Catholic constituencies are at present represented by Protestants, and the rejection of a candidate on account of his religious belief, if acceptable in other respects, is a thing unknown.

The Land League movement was condemned in its inception by Archbishop McHale; the clergy were enjoined to warn their flocks against the leaders described as unknown strollers seeking to mount to place and preferment on the shoulders of the people. Clerical opposition was soon silenced by a large meeting close to the Archbishop's residence, and in spite of the condemnation of the League by Archbishop McCabe of Dublin, the League established its headquarters there, and soon became a power in the land. The first Land League meeting was held to denounce a priest who, as executor to his brother, was supposed to be acting harshly to his tenants.

There is no indication of priestly dominance in these occurrences or in the long list of Protestants—Fitzgerald, Tone, Emmett, Martin, Mitchell, Davis, and others, down to Parnell—whose names are held in honour, whose writings are eagerly read, whose memory is preserved in monuments, street names, statues, and every other way in which they can be honoured.

From the point of view of some Protestants, any influence exercised by the Catholic clergy is pernicious, but what I claim is that the history of the last hundred years shows that their political influence as priests has been small, and did not depend on their clerical calling, and that it is opposed to all the facts of history to say that the clergy have directed or dominated an uneducated peasantry in such matters, or are likely to do so in future.

"Protestant Elector" does not explain what the perniciousness of the clergy's influence consists in, nor what is the wrong channel into which every Irish stream of thought has been turned, nor what he means by the generous and statesmanlike policy he enjoins on English Liberals. These are vague and empty phrases. One thing educated and uneducated electors have learnt, viz., that no more trust can be placed in Liberal than in Conservative promises, and that from neither of the great English parties can generous or statesmanlike policy be expected.—Yours, &c.,

October 28th, 1907. A NON-CATHOLIC ELECTOR.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The letter signed "A Protestant elector," cannot be very clear to people who desire a settlement of the Irish difficulty. It is all very well to say, that "a true Nationalism must prefer Ireland not only to England, but also to Rome." We know very well that the Clerical party over here are looking to one result at the General Election. They are expecting the help of the Irish vote in the House of Commons in smashing a fair settlement of the Education question. The alliance between Mr. Balfour and the Irish Party on Education did a great deal towards the result of the General Election of 1906. In opposition to the statement that "it is absolutely essential to a successful Nationalist policy that it should detach itself entirely from the current controversies of English life," I venture to say that it was never more necessary for Mr. Redmond to understand the difficulties in which British Liberal Nonconformists find themselves. If Mr. Redmond desires support from the rising labour forces, he must understand that a secular solution is considered the only fair and logical issue of the controversy. And if the time has not arrived for that, it must be fatal to the Home Rule cause to advocate denominationalism in defiance of Liberalism. We Nonconformists are looking to France, as a model for dealing with questions of Church and State. The fate of Home Rule depends on the degree of cynical indifference shown by the Irish Catholics in Parliament to English Protestantism.—Yours, &c., X.

Leamington, October 26th, 1907.

"THE CENSORSHIP OF PLAYS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your last week's issue Mr. Gilbert Murray, in his interesting article, "A Defence of Unlicensed Playing," includes Tolstoy's "Power of Darkness" among the list of plays forbidden by the Censor. May I, with your kind permission, be allowed to say that this play was licensed by the Censor before its production by the Incorporated Stage Society in December, 1904.

The plays produced by the Society, for which the Censor refused a license, are:—

"Mrs. Warren's Profession." By Bernard Shaw.

"Monna Vanna." By Maurice Maeterlinck.

"Les Trois Filles de M. Dupont." By Brieux.

"Maternité." By Brieux.

"Les Hanneçons." By Brieux.

The forthcoming production of the Society is Mr. Granville Barker's "Waste." It is notorious that this play has also been refused a license by the Censor.—Yours, &c.,

FREDERICK WELLEN.

The Incorporated Stage Society.

9, Arundel Street, Strand,

October 30th, 1907.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In my article on the Censorship last week I stated that an audience in Dublin "showed in an effective way" its disapproval of Mr. Pinero's play "The Gay Lord Quex." This seems, on investigation, not to have been the case. I was misled by the story—a long and most entertaining story—of an Irish gentleman who professed to have been one of the rioters on the occasion; but further inquiries in Dublin show me that other people who were present at the performances of "Lord Quex" are not aware of any heroic disturbance having taken place. I tender my apologies both to Mr. Pinero and to the population of Dublin.—Yours, &c.,

GILBERT MURRAY.

131, Banbury Road, Oxford,

October 25th, 1907.

WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As one of those who are in favour of a limited Bill for women's suffrage, may I point out that the writer of your review on "The Case for Women's Suffrage" is not fair or quite accurate when he classes all such supporters as "champions of a middle-class suffrage"? He is not fair, because, as he might have gathered from the essays he criticises, our willingness to accept a small measure of enfranchisement is based upon our determination to keep the matter within the limits of practical politics, and not upon any desire to "enfranchise the rich and well-to-do"; and he is not accurate, because even the limited Bill would enfranchise a large proportion of working women—both professional and wage-earning women. It is true that no poor married woman would benefit under it, unless she were a widow—and widows form a large class among working women—but then, no married woman benefits under the Qualification of Women (Borough and County Councils) Bill, recently passed by a Government that claims to be too democratic to extend the franchise within similar limitations. The disability of marriage is only one of the results of the political outlawry of women, which, being an unnatural element in the State, has caused a slight to be placed upon the very woman who ought to be first among women. Our point is that neither this nor any similar anomaly can be satisfactorily removed until the sex disability is removed; so we concentrate our efforts upon what we believe to be the simplest way of removing the sex disability. Is not this the course of procedure adopted by the Government in the Qualification of Women Bill? No reasonable person supposes that marriage will be allowed to remain a disqualification for sitting upon the Councils. If, however, the Government prefers to skip the intermediate stage in dealing with women's suffrage, let it by all means bring in a measure to enfranchise all women. So far, it has shown no sign of wishing to do this.

May I also suggest to your reviewer that women who ask for the franchise on the same terms as it is or may be granted to men, cannot exactly be said to "ignore the injustices between classes in their attempt to remedy injustices between sexes," though women may well retort that they would not be voteless now if our legislators, in remedying injustices between classes, had not hitherto ignored injustices between sexes. The hypothetical limitation of the franchise to bachelors and rich married men is, by the way, not a fair analogy; for at no time in our history have all men lacked political rights. If no men had votes, I think the most democratic among them would hesitate to postpone the enfranchisement of his sex until the whole of it stood to gain votes, but would rather remove the sex disability, as he has removed the class disability, by degrees. Your reviewer admits as much when he says that "every Reform Bill has gone further than people at the time thought possible." That is our contention in a nutshell. If we ask for less than we want, we may get more than we ask; by asking too much we should probably get nothing. But that, Sir, is not the same thing as saying that we advocate a middle-class suffrage, unless you are prepared to admit that the present male suffrage is a middle-class one. You might as well say that a temperance reformer advocates drunkenness because he accepts a moderate measure of temperance reform.—Yours, &c.,

October 21st, 1907.

EVELYN SHARP.

[Our point was that this partial Suffrage Bill, by enfranchising a comparatively large proportion of propertied women and a comparatively small proportion of unpropertied women, would weight the total strength of the classes in issues where they were at conflict with the masses.—Editor, THE NATION.]

"SOCIALISM IN LIBERALISM."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I find in my previous letter the assertion that the Liberal Party is definitely committed to anti-destitutionism. This is probably due to a slip of the pen on my part. It is the Labour Party which, by its Unemployed Bill, is definitely committed to the establishment of universal security against destitution. The Liberal Party is committed only to old age pensions, a measure which is the far less important part of the anti-destitution programme. In favour of the formal adoption of this programme in its entirety by the Liberal Party, I beg leave to urge the following considerations:—

1. Justice is the rule of saving the greater hardship of one man in preference to the lesser hardship of any other man, while destitution is a hardship greater than any of the hardships which are unfortunately involved in its elimination. At the same time, it is true that the number of persons suffering from destitution is much smaller than that of those who will be taxed in order to find the cost of universal security against destitution, and the question arises whether an aggregate of several lesser hardships can ever outweigh one solidly greater hardship; whether it is just to torture one man in order to save thousands, or millions, or billions, or, indeed, any number of men from, say, toothache. If we reject the principle of aggregation, then destitutionism stands without further ado condemned as contrary to justice. If we accept aggregation as a sound principle, there still remains the consideration that insecurity against destitution is the cause of a great mass of hardships, fear of destitution for most families, dread of social upheaval for the remaining families, and, above all, the mutual rancour which grows on men as they come to know that their fellows will stand by and let them and theirs sink into destitution, with all the mutually inflicted injuries flowing from such rancour. In order to defend destitutionism, it is thus necessary not only to accept the principle of aggregation, but also to maintain that this mass of hardships is exceeded by the sum of hardships involved in such increased taxation, as is involved in the elimination of destitution. Another way of defending destitutionism is to contend that it is just to save one man from a lesser hardship at the cost of a greater hardship to another. Now, if Liberalism becomes definitely anti-destitutionist in character, Conservatism is sure to champion openly the destitutionist policy now pursued, using the above-mentioned methods of defence singly or jointly. As a matter of consequence, the stigma of destitutionism will cling for many years to Conservatives; for after the establishment of security against destitution some Conservatives will attempt to administer anti-destitutionist legislation in the spirit of a destitutionist poor law, while all Conservatives will be justly suspected of such a design because the official Conservative position will be that the anti-destitution programme is but a poor law in disguise. During the ensuing weakness of Conservative interests, Liberalism will be able to remove one by one the remnants of feudal and clerical domination.

2. The absence of security against destitution is the cause of a fundamental inequality in bargaining between labour-buyers and labour-vendors. The risk of destitution is so much more urgent for labour-vendors that labour-buyers have an excessive bargaining advantage which no factory legislation can ever remove. To organise all labour-vendors into one sole labour-buying corporation may indeed remove the oppressive hardships flowing from this advantage, but this is a remedy which Liberalism cannot adopt. Another remedy, at once surer of effect and of far easier execution, is to turn the State into a mutual insurance society against destitution, and thus eliminate the risk of destitution altogether, for labour-buyers and labour-vendors alike. For this remedy organised labour is ripe; witness the resolutions of the Bath Congress asserting the urgency of both parts of the anti-destitution programme, which, moreover, Liberalism may adopt with complete safety.

The adoption may perhaps cause the defection of some Whigs from the Liberal camp. However, this defection, in any case inevitable, will be more, far more, than compensated by the genuine alliance which will then become possible between Liberalism and Labour, an alliance which is impossible as long as Liberalism has not been thoroughly purged from the taint of destitutionism. Even extreme Collectivists will find it very difficult to oppose such an alliance while the allied parties are engaged in the task of enacting and administering anti-destitution laws, and of defending these laws against attempts at circumvention on the part of Conservatives, the natural defenders of destitutionism as long as defence is possible. What will happen when destitutionism has been, as it will before long be, branded with the kind of infamy that now clings to the advocacy of slavery or torture, when all good Conservatives are, in profession at least, zealous defenders of the birthright of British subjects to security against destitution, this is a question with which anti-destitutionists need not concern themselves at present. New issues will arise and be fought out, we may reasonably expect, with less bitterness than the chief issue of our times will be fought out with, for the conversion of the State into a mutual insurance society against destitution as well as against slavery and torture will greatly reduce mutual rancour among men.

To test the position of parties, and force Tories and Whigs to show their hand, some Radical or Labour member favoured by the ballot ought, at the beginning of next session, to bring forward a suitably worded resolution to the effect that, in the belief of the House of Commons, the time has come for the British State to secure all its members against the risk of destitution as completely as they are already secured by law against torture and slavery.—Yours, &c.,

O. E. POST.

38, Holywell Street, Oxford,
October 21st, 1907.

Reviews.

LETTERS OF QUEEN VICTORIA, 1837-1861.*

THIS most interesting work, containing selections from the stupendous mass of correspondence of the late Queen, which up to 1861 only—that is, for little more than one-third of her reign—is said to fill between five and six hundred volumes, is not to be regarded as a biography, still less as a history of her reign. It supplies a mass of material for a more complete record of the Queen's Life, and a full appreciation of her character, when the time comes for the publication of the residue of her correspondence.

The letters here selected are mainly political. Most of them are of a formal character, written in the third person, as is the stiff convention between Sovereigns and their Ministers. The exceptions, very grateful to the reader, are those which passed between the Queen and her uncle Leopold, King of the Belgians. There are no letters to her mother, the Duchess of Kent, or to her eldest daughter after marriage to the Crown Prince of Germany, or to any of her intimate friends, such as the Duchess of Sutherland. There are indications that many letters have been purposely withheld, for political or other reasons. Lord Esher, it may be presumed, was associated with Mr. Benson as editor for this purpose. In the case of Lord Melbourne, the intimate correspondence with whom, after he ceased to be Prime Minister, was open to grave constitutional objection, and is the more interesting on that account, there are no fewer than sixty letters on his part, every one of which purports to be an answer to one from the Queen; only five of the Queen's letters are printed, and these are of little interest. Some of Lord Melbourne's letters, with flashes of cynical humour, are good reading; but many of them are mere twaddle, which might well have been omitted. They seem to be inserted only for the purpose of showing that there was no political indiscretion on his part. The question naturally arises whether the Queen's letters were of the same character, or whether she commented in them on her new Ministers or their policy. No explanation is afforded for not printing them.

So, again, in the correspondence with Leopold there are many gaps. Some of his letters, as printed, are in answer to those of the Queen, which are not given, and vice versa, many of hers, in answer to those of her uncle, which are withheld. No explanation is given. There is, for instance, an early letter of Leopold to the Queen in 1838, in which he says: "I wish very much you would speak to Melbourne on the subject of what might be done to keep for the Crown what little influence it may still possess." The answer to this letter is not given. It seems unlikely that the Queen neglected to act on this suggestion, and to consult with Melbourne, or that she failed to report the result to her uncle. Another illustration of this reserve is to be found in 1850, when the Queen, in a letter to Lord Palmerston, complained that letters addressed to her from abroad, and forwarded in the official Foreign Office bag, had been opened. In very peremptory terms she insisted that this must cease. There is no answer given on the part of Palmerston to this serious complaint. There must have been many letters coming to the Queen from the numerous relatives in Germany, of herself and the Prince, and from other Royalties. It may be presumed that they were full of complaints of Palmerston's policy. It would be interesting to know who were the writers and the nature of their charges; but not one of these letters are printed. There are two letters given from Lady Normanby, the wife of the British Ambassador at Paris, to her brother-in-law, Colonel Phipps, the Queen's private secretary. They were written immediately after the coup d'état of Louis Napoleon. They complain, in very indignant terms, of Palmerston's correspondence with the Ambassador. They were evidently intended to be shown to the Queen—a backstairs procedure of a very reprehensible kind. They gave the first intimation to the Queen that Palmerston had informed the French Ambassador in London that he approved of the coup d'état, which a few days later was the cause of his dismissal. They were conveyed to England by a friend, with the intimation that neither by the ordinary post nor in the official bag were they safe from being read by the Foreign Office, thus confirming the complaints of the Queen I have already alluded to. They are printed apparently for the purpose of accentuating the case against Lord Palmerston.

Whatever the extent and object of the reservations I have referred to, the letters which are given contain matter of the greatest interest. They do not, indeed, lead to any new views of the history of the time. They amplify and confirm those already formed. They show at every stage the great qualities of the Queen, her patriotism, courage, and tact, her devotion to public business, her independence of political parties, the purity of her family life, her deep sympathy with the sorrows of others, and the broadness of her religious views.

Among other topics, two seem to me to stand out conspicuously as of permanent interest—the one, the gradual development of the Queen as a constitutional Sovereign, the other, the long battle between her and Lord Palmerston and Lord John Russell in relation to despatches on foreign affairs. On the first of these, the correspondence shows how much the Queen owed in her early days to her uncle Leopold, to Baron Stockmar, and to Lord Melbourne. Foremost of these was undoubtedly Leopold. His letters to the Queen are full of sage advice, and of maxims of kingcraft. They must have been supplementary to much more of the same kind given orally in his numerous visits to England. Writing to the Queen a few weeks before her accession to the throne, he said:—

"The fundamental rule is to be courageous, firm, and honest, as you have been till now. . . . Be no man's tool. . . . The great thing for you is not to be hurried into important measures, and to gain time. A new reign is always a time of hope: everybody is disposed to seek something for his own wishes and prospects. The policy of a new sovereign must therefore be to act in such a manner as to hurt as little as possible the amour propre of people, to let circumstances and the force of things bring about the disappointments which no human power could prevent coming sooner or later."

And again, a few days after her accession:—

"Whenever a question is of some importance it should not be discussed on the day when it is submitted to you. Whenever it is not an urgent one, I make it a rule not to let any question be forced upon my immediate decision. It is really not doing oneself justice to le décider sur le pouce. I always have the papers with me some little time before I decide."

Later, again:—

"A rule I cannot sufficiently recommend is never to permit people to speak on subjects concerning yourself or your affairs without your having desired them to do so. The moment a person behaves improperly on this subject change the conversation, and make him feel that he has made a mistake."

"In politics a great rule ought to be to rule with the things one knows already, and not to jump into something entirely new, of which no one can do more than guess the consequences."

"The heart and not the head is the safest guide in a position such as yours."

"All trades must be learnt nowadays, and the trade of a constitutional monarch, to do it well, is a most difficult one."

"In such a colossal machinery as the British Empire a Ministerial crisis shakes the whole world."

Apart from any advice which she received, the Queen seems to have had an intuitive sense of the duties and position of a constitutional monarch. Nothing is more remarkable than the ease and aplomb with which, while still in her teens, she assumed the position of head of the State, identified herself with the nation, treated the highest Ministers as her servants, and insisted on the full recognition of her prerogative. Even before her accession she wrote to Leopold:—

"I never showed myself openly to belong to any party, and do not belong to any party. The administration will be well received by me the more so as I have confidence in them, and, in particular, in Lord Melbourne, who is a straightforward, honest, clever, and good man."

Within two years of her accession, and before her marriage, we find her rating the Prime Minister for not having kept her informed of Ministerial arrangements:—

"The Queen," she wrote to Lord Melbourne, "has been a good deal annoyed this evening at Normanby's telling her that John Russell was coming to town next Monday in order to change offices with him. Lord Melbourne never told the Queen that this was definitely settled; on the contrary, he said it could remain in our hands, to use Lord Melbourne's own words, and only be settled during the Vacation; considering all that the Queen has said on the subject to Lord Melbourne, and considering the great confidence the Queen had in Lord Melbourne, she thinks and feels he ought to have told her that this was settled, and not let the Queen be the last person to hear what is settled and done in her own name; Lord Melbourne will excuse the Queen's being a little eager about this, but it has happened once before that she learned from other people what had been decided on."

*"The Letters of Queen Victoria: A Selection from Her Majesty's Correspondence, 1837-1861." Edited by A. C. Benson and Viscount Esher. Murray, 3 vols., 63s. net.

Writing again, after her engagement to Prince Albert and before her marriage, she said:—

"I have received to-day an ungracious letter from Uncle Leopold. He appears to me to be nettled because I no longer ask for his advice, but dear uncle is given to believe that he must rule the roost everywhere. However, that is not a necessity."

Even before this, in 1838, within a year of her accession, we find her writing with the greatest tact to Leopold an answer to a letter from him with reference to the questions still in dispute between Belgium and Holland, expressing the hope that she would occasionally express to her Ministers, and particularly to "good Lord Melbourne," her wish that as far as compatible with the interests of her own domains, her Government would take the lead in such measures as might be favourable to her country. Her reply is conceived in the best possible spirit, without committing herself or her Government:—

"You may be assured, my beloved uncle, that both Lord Melbourne and Lord Palmerston are most anxious at all times for the prosperity and welfare of Belgium, and are consequently most desirous of seeing this difficult question brought to a conclusion which may be satisfactory to you. Allow me once more, therefore, dearest uncle, to beseech you to use your powerful influence over your subjects and to strive to moderate their excited feelings on these matters. Your situation is a very difficult one and nobody feels more for you than I do."

Again, as an illustration of her deep interest in public affairs, we find the Queen writing to her husband within a year after their marriage, in answer, apparently, to a wish he had expressed as to going to Windsor:—

"You forget, my dearest love, that I am the Sovereign, and that business can stop or wait for nobody. Parliament is sitting, or something occurs almost every day for which I may be required, and it is quite impossible for me to be absent from London. . . . I am never easy a moment if I am not on the spot to see and hear what is going on."

It is, I think, impossible to distinguish between her views and her conduct before and after marriage. It is true that Prince Albert by degrees assumed a more active part, and relieved her of much work, but there was evidently no difference whatever between them. They were one and indivisible. They had both been trained under the same masters, Leopold and Stockmar; they had the same notions as to the royal prerogative, the same determination that everything should be done in the name of the sovereign; that they should be kept informed of everything, and that every despatch to foreign Governments should be submitted to the Queen—that is, to both, for approval, before being issued.

In 1841, two years after marriage, the Queen, writing to Leopold, said:—

"My dearest angel is indeed a great comfort to me. He takes the greatest interest in what goes on, feeling with and for me, and yet abstains, as he ought, from biasing me either way, though we talk much on the subject and his judgment is, as you say, good and mild."

The greater part which Prince Albert took in interviews with Ministers is best evidenced by what occurred in 1846. It appears that the Prince had written a long memorandum of a recent conversation between the Queen, himself, and Sir Robert Peel. Peel, when it was shown to him, was annoyed, and said that if he knew that what he said would be committed to paper he would speak differently, and give his opinion with all the circumspection and reserve which a Minister ought to employ when he gave responsible advice. He viewed the existence of such a paper with much uneasiness. It might cause great embarrassment to the Queen with some future Minister. The conversation ended by the Prince burning the paper. Nevertheless, on numerous future occasions, the Prince appears to have written long memoranda as to interviews with Ministers, giving précis of their conversations.

We find many indications as to the views and contentions of the Queen as to her powers in the appointment of Ministers. In 1851, on the dismissal of Lord Palmerston, we have it on the authority of a memorandum of Prince Albert that Lord John Russell told the Queen that the subject had been discussed by the Cabinet, and that his action had been unanimously approved. The Cabinet, he said, then proceeded to discuss the successor to Palmerston, and Lord John Russell stated that in his view Lord Granville was the person whom he would best like to see fill the post of Foreign Secretary. The Cabinet, however, considered that the post should be offered in the first place to Lord Clarendon. The Queen on this interrupted Lord John, and protested against the Cabinet's taking upon itself the appointment of its own members, which, she said, rested entirely with the Prime Minister, and with the Sovereign, under whose approval the former constituted her Government. Lord John replied that he thought Lord Clarendon would not accept the offer, and therefore there would be little danger in satisfying the desires of the Cabinet. We find other instances of the Queen claiming a chief voice in the appointment of Ministers. Thus in 1848, on the defeat of Peel's Government, and the appointment of Lord John Russell as Prime Minister, he recommended Mr. Cobden for admission to the Cabinet; but the Queen objected. She thought he ought not to be admitted at once to the Cabinet without passing through some inferior position in the Government. She did not like rewarding an agitator in this way. Lord John Russell gave way, and offer was not then made to Cobden.

In the same way, when Lord Derby resigned in 1852, he discussed with the Queen and Prince Albert the question of his successor, and advised that Lord Aberdeen should be offered the post of Prime Minister. The Prince interrupted him, saying that the responsibility of choosing a new Minister rested with the Queen alone. It seems that the Queen claimed the absolute right of conferring all the honours of the Crown, or, rather, an absolute veto on proposals made by her Ministers. She negatived the proposal to make Bright a Privy Councillor. She also claimed a veto, subject only to the decision of the Cabinet, of any appointment. Thus she refused to appoint Sir James Hudson as an associate with Lord Aberdeen at the Congress of Paris after the Crimean War. Palmerston and Russell were in favour of this, but, on appeal to the Cabinet, the Queen's view carried the day. She vetoed the appointment of Sir Henry Layard as Under-Secretary of State, but had eventually to give way. She claimed, above all, the right of having every despatch to a foreign Government submitted to her before being issued. I must defer, however, till next week dealing with this matter.

EVERSLEY.

(To be concluded.)

THE RELIGION OF A LAYMAN.*

HAPPY is the house that has a philosopher to its head. In the succession of wise men who have been masters of Balliol, Dr. Caird will not take the least place. Layman though he be, his studies in Christianity have been very deep, and his faith is the stronger, his religion the quicker, for the philosophic basis on which they rest. In the present volume he shows that the most profound problems of life can be presented in a simple form. Nor does he attain simplicity by that easy road which avoids the thorns of difficulty and leads only to the desert. Addressing an audience of undergraduates, he sets before them in a plain form the questions which occupy their minds. There are some young men who have no desire to think, who have got a desire to get some catchwords or formulæ which may serve them in place of thought. Such men will get little profit from Dr. Caird's book, or indeed from any other. In Balliol the ecclesiastical mind will not discover the hermetic seal which is its sole aim. The true function of the teacher is to instruct not in the results but in the method and spirit of thought. For the mind there is no such process as vicarious digestion, and Dr. Caird does not pander to those who suppose that there is. They who seek wholesome food will find it here, and many thrive on it.

The main line of modern thought follows the doctrine of evolution. To the man in the street the word perhaps presents little more than one side of a generalisation of

*"Lay Sermons and Addresses." Delivered in the Hall of Balliol College, Oxford, by Edward Caird, LL.D., D.C.L., late Master. Maclehose, 6s. net.

Darwin's, and that side imperfectly understood. In fact, it is the only light in which we can see the process of the ages and gain some knowledge of our own generation from the study of the generations that are gone. Man cannot start again with a clean sheet, and any revolution that should make this its object would inevitably defeat itself. Christianity, says Dr. Caird, was the greatest of all awakenings of mankind to the true meaning of life.

"It is the more remarkable that Jesus Christ, who is in one sense the greatest revolutionist the world ever saw, should so constantly present spiritual life to us, not as the inroad upon our being of something entirely new, but simply as an awakening to something that was always there; not as a sudden revolutionary change by which the link between the past and present was snapped, but simply as a further development and manifestation of a principle which was working in human life and history from its first beginning. Thus, while St. Paul, though not without a thought of the progress from the old dispensation to the new, dwells by preference on the difference of the Law and the Gospel, Christ dwells by preference on their unity and connexion. He declares that He Himself came not to destroy the Law and the prophets, but to fulfil them; and He presents His commands, not as a substitute for what was said by them of old time, but simply as deepening, widening, reinterpreting the old letter, till the spirit that was half concealed in it becomes revealed."

So far it is likely that Dr. Caird will find few to disagree with him. It is otherwise when he further points out that the process still continues. The Church of Rome is likely to divide, though it be without a complete schism, into the thinkers who follow it and the authorities who gainsay this doctrine. Even in our own High Churchmen the doctrine of evolution finds supporters, however reluctant, however unwilling to see the full meaning of what they hold, to admit the conclusions to which it must logically carry them. Among educated and intelligent laymen there is a large majority, among all laymen perhaps not a minority, on the same side. It is true that theirs is not the voice which is heard loudest at Church Congresses. Such men are apt to shrink from idle contentions, to feel that disputandi pruritus is ecclesiae scabies. To them the temper and the methods of the modern curate, still more of the ecclesiastical layman, seem to savour little of the things that are Christ's. Indeed, when Lord Halifax calls upon his obsequious followers to apply a spiritual boycott to a benficed clerk, we look in vain for the spirit of the Galilean. When this boycott is applied only because the clerk is ready to obey a law which has been approved by a large majority of Churchmen in our Houses of Parliament, we may well ask whether Lord Halifax and his following are not within perilous distance of what Plato calls "the lie in the soul," of the inability to distinguish between right and wrong. This is the school which will not dance to Dr. Caird's pipe. Neither would they hearken though one rose from the dead.

In several of his sermons Dr. Caird lays some stress on the idea of nationality as a religious principle. It may be said that this idea is not prominent either in the New Testament or in the history of the early Church. It is needless to point out the temporary circumstances which made such a prominence impossible. The restoration of a Jewish kingdom, even had it been humanly possible, would not have given a second birth to the world. The purification of the Roman Empire could not have been accomplished by political means. Hence no such attempt was made by the founder of Christianity. Still less would it have seemed reasonable to his immediate followers, who believed themselves to be living in the last days. Those who hold that the Church cannot err must be asked to listen to the divine who, in the English Church, carried the High Church doctrine to its highest point. Charles Leslie, the nonjuror, the reasoner who, in Dr. Johnson's view, could not be reasoned against, points out that the Church at its beginning was under the greatest of all errors, for it believed that He who had been crucified upon Calvary was indeed dead beyond the power of resurrection, and the Church itself, in fact, nay, even in form, came to recognise its errors. Dr. Caird points out one matter in which the change was conspicuous.

"The passion of cosmopolitan charity which animated the early Church and kindled a pure flame of zeal in the hearts of saints and martyrs could not really regenerate the life of the modern world or fill the new civilisation with its idealising power except by consecrating and giving its sanction to that natural and historical process by which the nations of Europe have gradually organised themselves, each with its own peculiar instincts and traditions, each interested with a special task in the complex work of human progress. Thus our Christianity, with its universal gospel of love and its enthusiasm of humanity, may be said both to spring from national life and to reproduce it from itself in a higher form."

In a few clear phrases Dr. Caird points out the real meaning and force of patriotism. Not for the first time in our history the word has of late years been prostituted to base uses, until many of us must have been ready to cry out with the stern old Tory, whose commendation of Leslie we have quoted, that patriotism is the last refuge of a scoundrel. It is not the least merit of Dr. Caird's work that he lays his finger on misuses of words which both spring from and lead to confusion of thought. We will end with a passage which may show the right way to distinguish, and there are many wrong ways in vogue, between the sacred and the profane.

"Christ indeed sought to break down all divisions between men, or to make them secondary to their unity; but the worst of all these divisions is the division between the Church and the world, which must arise when any element of human nature is regarded as common or unclean. In this sense we may say that Christ died upon the cross to assert the principle that there is no passion or affection within us which may not be purified and turned into a vehicle of the divine life; no natural relation of men, domestic or national, which may not be filled with the divine spirit. It was natural that the early Church should think mainly of the new tie of brotherhood, which it was seeking to establish among men, and should let all other narrower bonds or relationships fall into the background. And it was equally natural that it should give special prominence to the new ideas of self-sacrifice, patience, endurance of wrong, and should even exalt the martyr's crown as the only manifestation of courage. But if this were the whole lesson of Christianity, it would not have healed the divisions of the ancient world, or reconciled man with God, the human with the divine."

THE JOURNALS OF A SCHOLAR.*

THIS is one of that fortunate class of book, which gives us the personal record of a great writer, formerly known only by his accomplished work, and shows him to us as a man, brave, kindly, lovable, and, in the case of Gregorovius, full of the nobler kind of patriotism, and of the nobler kind of cosmopolitan sympathy. English readers must be grateful to Mrs. Hamilton for opening to them these pages. It is the autobiographical daily record of the twenty years spent by the German scholar in Rome, during which he wrote his great work ("The City of Rome in the Middle Ages"), and established his enduring fame. The period of his residence in Rome coincided with the great events that freed and united Italy, and ended the medieval priest-rule of the Popes over the centre of the Peninsula and the city of Rome. How heartily this student of the Middle Ages wished the last relics of medieval rule swept away, how fully this patriotic German took the cause of Italy to his own heart, may be read with advantage by those who think that antiquarian studies involve reactionary views, or that a burning enthusiasm for the freedom, unity, and power of one's own country, prevents sympathy with other nations, and a desire to see them also strong and free.

The Journal, which begins with his removal to Italy in 1852, opens under a cloud of gloom, the present sad, the future uncertain, the success of his ambitious undertaking most doubtful:—

"Left the town of Königsberg on April 2nd, 1852. On the previous day my eldest brother Rudolf had lost his youngest son Richard, a splendid boy of thirteen. . . . The weather had become very hot. I had previously imagined that all the inspiring influences of my life would expand in Italy, awaking within me a wealth of new ideas; but my mind remained dormant, and this state of blank inertia greatly troubled me. I doubted whether I was capable of producing anything that would live. I almost despaired of my future." (p. 1-2.)

The Journal ends with his departure, in July, 1874, with the laurels he had won, his long twenty years' work accomplished:—

"My resolve is fixed; shall go back and join my brother and sister again in Germany. My mission is accomplished. I was an envoy here—in the most modest guise, yet, perhaps,

* "The Roman Journals of Ferdinand Gregorovius, 1852-1874." Translated from the 2nd German Edition by Mrs. Gustavus W. Hamilton, Translator of "The History of the City of Rome in the Middle Ages." Bell. 10s. 6d. net.

in a higher sense than a diplomatic Minister. Can say of myself what Flavius Blondus said of himself, 'I created that which did not exist'; threw light on eleven dark centuries in the city, and gave the Romans the history of their Middle Ages. This is my monument here. Can therefore go away with a mind at ease. . . . Nevertheless, it is appalling that all the most intimate and vital part of my own life should now become a thing of the past. Often waken from my sleep at night, roused and distracted by the terrifying thought that I shall leave Rome. And no one here believes it possible! It is a sudden severance, like that of a tree uprooted by a storm.

"On coming down from the Capitol yesterday, it seemed as if buildings, monuments, and stones called me aloud by name." (p. 458.)

He loved the records of medieval Rome, written in stone and parchment; but he did not love the remnants of that system incarnated in the men who ruled the city until September 20th, 1870. "The air," he writes, during the famous Council that declared the Infallibility,

"is morally poisoned. Am disgusted at the sight of this idolatry, of these old and new idols, and this perpetual condition of falsehood, hypocrisy, and the crassest superstition. Could almost despair of mankind, not alone on account of the priests, who are obliged to continue their handiwork, but on account of their vassals.

"Lord Acton has gone away." (p. 368.)

His sympathy with the desire of Italy for union and freedom was intense. Italy and his own beloved Germany were, as he saw, in the same case, striving each for unity and freedom against the Clerical power which then had for its instrument the French and Austrian armies. "May the New Year" (1861), "be friendly to me! May it bestow freedom on Italy, and the strength of union on my native country!" This two-fold prayer is the key to the sentiment of the whole book.

On June 7th, 1860, he writes:—

"The whole of Sicily is free except Messina. . . . However we may regard Garibaldi's expedition, it will always remain one of the most attractive acts of heroism.

"The 'Siècle' asserts that it is now time to annex the Rhine. War is at our doors. I trust, however, to the immensely increased moral vigour of the German people; and Prussia has a free constitution—it is no longer the country of the dandified squirearchy of 1805." (p. 90.)

And this double prayer, for Italy and Germany together, was answered. In 1866 Moltke struck his blow, and the world saw

"proud Austria rammed to wreck,
Where Chlum drove deep in smoky jets"; and Venice was thereby added to the new Italian Kingdom. Then, in 1870, just three months after that despairing cry of Gregorovius against the horror of Papal Rome during the Infallibility Council, the last act of the drama was unrolled, and Clerical France and its armies went the way of Austria, under the blow of the same iron hand. So Germany was made, and Italy won her capital.

"To-day," writes Gregorovius, when Victor Emmanuel entered Rome,

"is the close of the thousand years' dominion of the Papacy in Rome.

"Had we Germans not shattered the French power, Victor Emmanuel would not have entered Rome to-day. The Italian nation, ruled so long by our ancient emperors of the Holy Roman Empire, received its new future, in conformity with the continuity of history, at the hand of the new German national kingdom." (p. 404.)

His anxiety for country drew Gregorovius north of the Alps during the last great struggle. His was the true German patriotism of Arminius, as portrayed by Matthew Arnold in "Friendship's Garland"; it was not the debased "pan-German" currency, somewhat too common at the present day among our Teutonic friends. Gregorovius knew no feeling of brutal rage, for his love of his country was moral and intellectual, and his heart was not closed to sympathy with Frenchmen. "To-day," he writes at Munich, on August 10th, 1870, "saw a company of eight hundred French prisoners at the railway station. . . . Saw only one officer; the others, about twenty, kept hidden. Was told that they were sitting on the floors, in order that they might not be seen. So passes all earthly grandeur! Thought of the French friends, and especially of Ampère, who is happy, because dead.

"Several people of the lower class went to the carriages and handed the prisoners provisions and cigars. Watched one woman with a large basket on her arm, out of which, going backwards and forwards, she indefatigably handed bread. One of the prisoners wiped his eyes." (p. 374-5.)

He did not hate Frenchmen, he did not hate France, but he desired the overthrow of the policy which had, for ten years past, been using France to deny to Germany and Italy the right to be nations.

And so Victor Emmanuel entered Rome. In 1874 Gregorovius published the last volume of his great work, which was thereupon put upon the Index by the now powerless occupants of the Vatican. "Went to St. Peter's," he writes,

"where I read the decree posted up on the first marble column of the outer entrance. The honoured Cathedral suddenly acquired a personal relation to myself. Never before did I traverse it in such an exalted frame of mind. Reflected on all my efforts, my troubles and joys, on my great enthusiasm; on all, in fact, that I had put into my work; and thanked the good genius that seemed to have watched over it, allowing me to finish it undisturbed, and that at the same moment that the papal power fell to pieces in Rome. Had the priests laid the 'History' under the interdict when the first volume appeared, my work could not have existed to-day, for every library in Rome would have been closed against me. . . . My work is finished and circulated throughout the world; the Pope now provides it with an advertisement." p. 449-50.)

One point we note with pleasure in his Journal of 1860, when the Papal States (except the districts close round Rome) were set free. "The lower clergy are favourable to the national cause, even in the States of the Church. . . . Priests with banners lead the processions." Though not invariably, this was often the case in 1860. In Sicily it was practically universal.

TOM MORRIS.*

NEARLY half a century ago Tom Morris, maker of golf gear and professional player, was appointed by the Royal and Ancient Club green-keeper at St. Andrews. He has been famous ever since. He bears his eighty-six years lightly, and is still to be seen upon the links. He is revered by all who know him personally and by thousands who know him otherwise. It seems impossible to write or to speak about him in anything like moderate terms. Hark to Dr. Tulloch, a favourite chaplain of Queen Victoria, who wrote a Life of Her Majesty and one of the Prince Consort. "Well pleased, dear Old Tom, will they be to know that on these links of St. Andrews you are alive for evermore, and that your memory will never be forgotten. Well pleased, too, shall I be if in the course of time my memory may be linked, in however small a way, with your immortal one—as he who, amid labours and honours not a few, valued by the many perhaps more than by himself, is happy in having found the leisure and the opportunity to be the humble chronicler of deeds so great as yours, and of a life so true, so honest, so noble, and so loving as your own." Even after reading the book before us, a detached observer of the world's affairs may well be puzzled by the widespread idolatry with which Tom Morris is esteemed. It is true that he won the Open Championship four times, which is more than anyone else has done; but, apart from this, as far as you can perceive on superficial study, Tom is no more than a respectable citizen. He has a subtle humour, which flashes as the gentle wild-fire on a summer night; but all educated Scots have that. He has indomitable courage in the management of life; but that is no rarity either in the North or in the South.

Why, then, do we worship Tom? Why, after a time of exile, do we run to bring ourselves to his remembrance whenever we catch sight of him on the links? Why, on such an occasion, did one of His Majesty's Judges gravely stop a properly quarrelsome game and beg us to take His Honour to be presented? Why does Lord Roberts make haste to pay his respects to Old Tom whenever he is finished with a war? Why do Princes of the Blood treat him with a deferential affection such as many an ordinary notable yearns for in vain? It is not easy to tell. Some part of Tom's privilege may be attributable to the accident of birth. He is a St. Andrews man, and St. Andrews is a peculiar place. For many generations the little city has had among its residents a larger than ordinary proportion of ecclesiasts, dons, and men of current letters.

* "The Life of Tom Morris. With Glimpses of St. Andrews and its Golfing Celebrities." By W. W. Tulloch, D.D. Twenty-seven illustrations. T. Werner Laurie. 10s. 6d. net.

These have formed a coterie which elevated the city and the consciousness of their own importance. That the quantitatively great world outside Fife might know all about them, it was necessary that they should have a sounding board. Who better for this purpose than Tom Morris? Would not the barbarians beyond the Tay on the one hand and the Forth on the other be most beneficently affected by the spectacle of scholars, essayists, philosophers, eminent clergymen, and other intellectuals derogating their own significance by exalting the horn of Tom? Still, that does not suffice to explain. As every expansive trader knows, the most extravagant advertising will not be permanently successful unless the thing advertised is in itself meritorious. The praises bestowed upon Tom have not been in excess of his deserts. 'Tis when we come to the analysis of these that we find ourselves at a loss. Why was Mr. Gladstone venerated by all who knew him well, including unregenerate savages such as Lord Salisbury and Mr. Frederick Greenwood, and by at least half of those who knew him only by hearsay? If anyone can tell us that, we shall be able to tell why Tom is among the immortals.

Until then we must be content on remarking that Tom is one of those men in whom mankind instinctively perceive a preternatural sagacity which is both moral and intellectual. The gift, for the moment at least, defies the analytical imagination. It is that any man who was good at a sport or pastime involving skill of eye and hand is, on that account, likely to be talented in relation to higher matters of the mind. The proposition becomes self-evident when you realise that every really great man was primarily a man who found leisure to gratify the instinct for some sport or pastime. Were not Shakespeare and Sir Walter good all-round men at field sports? Is not Mr. Andrew Lang in the same class? Was not Lord Salisbury an amateur chemist? Did not Mr. Herbert Spencer find his most effective stimulant in angling. Think, on the other hand, of those intellectuals who, whilst the most strenuous of people, make a hash of their ambitions. Are not all of them persons whose leisure is spent in talking or writing shop? There's a moral for you. There, too, is the secret of Hegel and Tom Morris.

THE CENSORSHIP OF ROME.*

THE title of this work, to which the excommunication of Father Tyrrell gives point, serves to indicate its importance to every student of history. The tendency of the story is to show the growing emancipation of the world's intellect from the spiritual bondage in which it was held by the Church—the story of the Renaissance, in short, not as writers on art have told it, nor writers on literature generally, but as it is revealed in these records of the attempts on the part of the Church to stop the publication of unorthodox works altogether, or by process of expurgation to make them appear as if their authors were its servants.

The "Indexes" herein referred to are the expurgatorial lists which, under the authority of the Church of Rome, were issued from 1526 to 1900 A.D., and the following are only a few of the names which appear in the latest of them.

Lord Acton.	Dumas, father and son—
Joseph Addison—"Remarks on Italy."	"Love Fables."
Peter Bayle—Opera Omnia.	Gibbon—"Decline and Fall."
Jeremy Bentham—Four works.	Goldsmith—"History of England."
Beranger—"Chansons."	Grotius—Opera Omnia.
Thomas Browne—"Religio Medici."	Hallam—His principal works.
Erasmus Darwin—"Zöonomia."	Lord Herbert of Cherbury.
Diderot—"Encyclopædia."	Thomas Hobbes.
	Victor Hugo.

* "The Censorship of the Church of Rome, and its Influence upon the Production and Distribution of Literature." By George Haven Putnam, Litt.D. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Andrew Lang—"Myth, Ritual, Religion."	H. A. Taine—"English Literature."
J. S. Mill.	Rd. Whately—"Elements of Logic."
Renan—Opera Omnia.	Voltaire—Opera Omnia.
Samuel Richardson—"Pamela."	Zola—Opera Omnia.

There we have samples enough, and indeed, as the author says, "there is something almost pathetic in the long series of attempts made by popes, councils, bishops, congregations, and inquisitors, to protect the souls of the faithful against the baneful influence of the ever-increasing tide of literature that was pouring forth from the various centres, so much of which was calculated to lead men astray from the true doctrines, and to bring them into risk of everlasting perdition."

We have anticipated somewhat by taking names from so late a list, but in the earliest there are equally striking anomalies, and the first would resemble the last but for the fact that the proportion of theological works to others was enormously large when the nations of Europe were younger. There was scribbling, especially among theologians, from the earliest years of the Christian era, but the censorship of the Press with which the author is chiefly concerned, dates from the invention of printing.

"In 1559 the responsibility for the censorship of literature was first directly assumed by the Papal Authority, through the publication of the 'Index of Authors and Prohibited Books,' which was the first of a series of Indices aggregating up to 1899, forty-two altogether." But the "Tridentine Index" of the Council of Trent (1564) constituted the most authoritative guide that up to that date had been issued. Its lists formed the basis of all subsequent indexes, and its rules were adopted by all later censors.

With regard to the work of that Council, the late Mr. Freeman said that while it reformed some abuses within its own body, it only widened the breach with Rome. True this applies in particular to the attempts of the Council of Trent to limit the issue of books, for outside the domain of the Church its authority was not acknowledged, and though there was censorship in Protestant countries, it was under another authority.

"Such censorship as came into action in England proved to be more important in connection with political literature than with works on religion or theology. In 1664 the Long Parliament enacted certain regulations for the control of printing, which provided that "no book, pamphlet, or paper shall be hereafter printed, unless the same be first approved and licensed by censors that shall be hereafter appointed."

In conclusion, it may be well to direct the reader's attention to the value those indexes have for the man of letters, whose religion is his own secret. "The record of the index," says Mr. Putnam, "is also to be considered as an important contribution to the history of literature," and quotes in support of this view the opinions of older writers. The treatise (1627) by Thomas James, librarian of the Bodleian, on the "Index Generalis Librorum Prohibitorum" was addressed particularly to its curators, "to whom it should serve as a guide concerning the books which it was particularly desirable to collect and to preserve"; only the curators, he said, must be sure to secure the earlier and unexpurgated editions!

In 1629 Sir Edwin Sandys, in "Europæ Speculum" said: "This Papacy brought forth the Indices Expurgatorii, whereof I suppose they are now not a little ashamed, they having by misfortune fallen into their adversaries' hand, from whom they desired by all means to conceal them." To the same effect Bishop Barlow: "In these Indices we are directed to the book, chapter and line, where anything is spoken against any superstition or error of Rome, so that he who has the said Indices cannot want testimony against Rome."

This statement must suffice to give an idea of the scope of a work which has long been wanted, and criticism of it must be left to the few who could pretend to the author's knowledge. A conception can hardly be formed of the amount of labour it has required, and there is not a student of history, as it is dealt with here, who will not recognise the value of Mr. Putnam's book.

¶ One of the chief difficulties of collectors of Japanese objets d'art is the difficulty which frequently occurs in recognising the myth or legend dealt with in Prints, Netsuke, Tsuba, &c., all of which have their origin in the legendary lore of the Mongolian race. Mr. HENRI L. JOLY'S LEGEND IN JAPANESE ART is a work which no collector can afford to be without. Turning from a Print or Netsuke the collector is able at once to identify the myth illustrated, so simple is the method of classification adopted. The book contains a description of the Historical Episodes, Legendary Characters, Folk-Lore, Myths, Religious Symbolism, illustrated in the art of Old Japan, and contains upwards of 700 Illustrations, 16 Full-Page Colour Plates, and 500 Pages of Text. The price is four guineas net, and it will be ready on November 6. One of the best-known Collectors in this country, who has had an opportunity of examining an advance copy, characterizes the book A GREAT WORK.

¶ Another important art book, and one which is practically the result of fifty years' study, is HUBERT AND JOHN VAN EYCK: THEIR LIFE AND WORK, by W. H. JAMES WEALE. Not only does it contain an infinite amount of original research, but indeed leaves little or nothing for the future biographer-critic to tell. Mr. WEALE discovered Gerard David and disentangled his principal works from Memlinc's, with which they were then confused. The book contains 41 Photogravure and 95 other Reproductions. Ready November 14.

¶ At a period when the office of Censor is occupying the attention not only of the public, but of the Government, an unbiased opinion from abroad will be of peculiar interest to all who are interested in theatrical matters. The recent startling development of dramatic art, a development which has taken us from ROBERTSON and TAYLOR to WILDE and SHAW—from 'Caste' to 'Man and Superman,' is a matter almost of international interest. Dr. MARIO BORSA'S great book THE ENGLISH STAGE OF TO-DAY has been excellently translated by Mr. SELWYN BRINTON, and will probably be considered a standard work for very many years to come. The price is 7s. 6d. net. Ready November 6.

¶ On November 14 I propose publishing a fascinating book, by S. BARING-GOULD, entitled DEVONSHIRE CHARACTERS AND STRANGE EVENTS. The work will contain 58 Illustrations, including many Portraits from unique paintings, and 62 chapters dealing with subjects so varied as 'Wife Sales,' 'White Witches,' 'Pirates,' 'Smugglers,' 'Jack Russell,' 'Dr. Budd of Plymouth,' 'Rear-Admiral Sir Edward Chichester,' 'Prout,' and 'Haydon.' Many of the strange, daring characters in this Collection are not to be found in any other place, not even in Prince's 'Worthies,' to which famous volume it practically becomes an indispensable supplement. It is even more, for many of the subjects dealt with in its 832 octavo pages are events rather than worthies. It is claimed that Mr. Baring-Gould has far exceeded all past records in producing an entertaining volume. The price will be 21s. net.

¶ Hitherto no illustrated edition of THE POEMS OF SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE has appeared. The new edition I have prepared has been carefully edited and annotated for the press by the Poet's Grandson, E. H. COLERIDGE, who also contributes an Introduction. The feature of this volume is a series of upwards of 100 Illustrations by a new artist, GERALD METCALFE. There are over 500 pages of text of what may be called THE edition of Coleridge. The price is 10s. 6d. net.

¶ On November 6 will be issued THE HEART OF GAMBETTA, from the French of FRANCIS LAUR, in which is narrated the influence of MADemoiselle Léonie Léon upon the destinies of an unhappy country through her unflinching love and comradeship for the statesman who may be said to have saved France. The book contains many dramatic and touching episodes of the devotion of the lovers, and brilliant side-lights are thrown upon that period so critical to France. The question of GAMBETTA'S interview with BISMARCK, the subject of the recent controversy, is thoroughly dealt with, and a special feature of the English Version will be Mr. JOHN MACDONALD'S remarkable Introduction. There are Portraits and other Illustrations, and the price is 7s. 6d. net.

¶ Following on the publication of EMILIA PARDO BAZAN'S powerful novel THE SON OF THE BONDWOMAN, I announce another story which a reader, to whom I first sent it, decided that was a work of a famous novelist sent to me under a nom de guerre. The author, however, is E. W. DE GUERIN, and the title of the book is THE MALICE OF THE STARS, and the price 6s.

¶ THE ISLE OF PURBECK by IDA WOODWARD, with 36 Coloured Illustrations by JOHN W. G. BOND, which I announced a fortnight ago, will be ready on November 6. Price 21s. net.

JOHN LANE.

THE BODLEY HEAD,

LONDON & NEW YORK.

THE METHOD OF MR. ANTHONY HOPE.*

By his admirable "Dolly Dialogues" Mr. Anthony Hope first caught the public ear; by "Rupert of Hentzau" he extended his conquest, over the wide suburbs to the far provinces; and in "Quisanté" and "A Servant of the Public" he showed us to what finer uses he could put his talent. By "A Servant of the Public" he did not, indeed, increase his popularity, which was a good sign, for, in matters artistic, the public is a good servant but a bad master. If the pure artist be always a little suspect of the public, it is that his work necessarily tends to disturb its equanimity by disclosing new standpoints and disturbing current valuations. And in "A Servant of the Public" the author showed signs of breaking out of the ranks of the popular favourites whose work rests on the basis of accepting and emphasising the tastes and outlook of the majority. Popularity, it may be added, is quite an impossible achievement for those distinguished artists who have neither the instinct nor the ability of interesting the plain man in himself. Imagine Mr. Henry James or Mr. Conrad, for example, becoming popular! Fame may, of course, bring popularity without the author's being in any sense a popular favourite with his readers. But, after reading "Tales of Two People," it is clear to us that Mr. Anthony Hope does not intend to pass the cross roads and venture down the narrow path which leads to distinction—and, incidentally, to the tailing off of one's supporters. He has chosen his part, and it is on the basis of his popular appeal to the majority that we must accept him.

Mr. Anthony Hope, in fact, has legitimately earned his popular place by crystallising and personifying in his heroes a definite frame of mind in the modern Englishman, which has never been put in black and white so completely before. The hero of his novels is ever the quiet and unobtrusive young Englishman who, while he is too diffident to take himself seriously, always turns up trumps at the crisis by his power of effacing himself for the benefit of others—not infrequently for the gracious eyes of a Princess in distress. The modern Englishman's conception of "good form," to hold oneself in reserve and not to show oneself an ass, along with his belief in practical action and his carefully guarded ideals, all that this frame of mind implies is so dexterously wrought by Mr. Anthony Hope into the living presentment of his matter-of-fact cautious Englishmen, that his heroes stand as the type of hundreds of thousands of his countrymen in the middle class. It is a national habit of mind along with a class ideal that Mr. Anthony Hope portrays in "Rupert of Hentzau," and the secret of his popularity is simply that the ordinary commonplace Englishman sees himself, his own reserve, his own outlook, his own aspirations, and his own delight in his own limitations, expressed in a portrait of which he can cordially approve. Whether they be barristers, stockbrokers, parsons, bank clerks, or soldiers, Mr. Anthony Hope's readers are bound to be satisfied with his heroes' morals and manners; and to have established this agreement by a series of novels that are clever, entertaining, and picturesque should surely be recognised as an instinctive feat deserving of the widest popularity.

There remains, of course, the point of art. And the art of Mr. Anthony Hope's best stories is not, well, remarkable. It is neat and well bred, and, after all, the art that finds favour in the drawing-rooms and is much in request at the libraries is that which knows its place. The old quarrel between the public at large and the artist is that the latter, following nature and revealing her, is apt to be disconcerting. And Mr. Anthony Hope, like nearly all popular favourites, allows nature about as much discretion as she is allowed at a dinner party. The story is well turned, the manner kindly, and the narrator, with the light touch of the skilful host, feels how uncomfortable it would be if one of his guests were to startle the others. After all, art must know its place. There is, moreover, an art of drawing-room comedy, discreet and gentlemanly in its irony, and where Mr. Anthony Hope's originality and charming touch have found successful expression is in stories such as "What Was Expected of Miss Constantine," in the volume before us. The beautiful Miss Constantine is expected to marry the brilliant Valentine Hare, the Under-Secretary for the Colonies, who has birth, beauty, and brains, "shop-window brains," as the irreverent declare. Miss Constantine detects the false metal in the man and throws herself away on Oliver Kirby, a nobody in the Colonial Office, who has, however, a splendidly open and candid mind. On subjects such as this we have Mr. Anthony Hope at his best, for it is in the shades of humorous understanding, or misunderstanding, between the sexes that his quality is disclosed. And, here again, he always reproduces instinctively and admirably the frame of mind in which the modern Englishman prefers to approach woman. He likes to laugh at her and feel her incomprehensible with one side of his nature, and to idealise her with the other. The natural separation between the sexes, so much more marked, in most aspects, in the Teutonic than in the Latin races, is bridged after a fashion, here, by the Englishman's instinct of chivalry. And Mr. Anthony Hope's heroes are all instinctively and daringly chivalrous, even while they are chaffing their masculine friends for their individual infatuations. It is the Englishman's carefully guarded idealism breaking out through the matter-of-fact surface of his practical life that our author hits off with a neat effectiveness, always pleasing. And it is by following this sure instinct of his that Mr. Anthony Hope arrived at fashioning in the person of his ideal Princess a bewitching, candid, gracious, dainty creature, an image of the eternal feminine that directly and exactly corresponds to the image which every true Englishman, whether he be a bank clerk or a barrister, carries within his breast. This ideal heroine satisfies our sense of chivalry, our idea of devotion, our demand for daintiness, our worship of "blood," and she plays upon the whole gamut of our secret desires and yearnings for the woman our finer instincts are in search of.

In the clever little story, "Mr. Thistleton's Princess," Mr. Anthony Hope hits off with much dexterity this double-sidedness in the ordinary Englishman's nature, and while he scores off his snobbishness, latent or active, he contrives to satisfy our deepest sense of "good form," which, again, is inseparable from his desire "not to make an ass of himself." The Princess Vera of Bavaria comes to stay at the Manor House, Southam Parva, where she is entertained by her solicitor, Mr. Thistleton, who has "taken up her claim" against the Royal House of Bavaria. But Mr. Thistleton's legal missives are met with a crushing silence, and the Princess's money being quickly exhausted, she descends with rapid steps the social scale in Southam Parva, passing from "Her Royal Highness" to "The Countess Vera," then to "Poor Countess Vera," then to "Fräulein Friedenburg," and then to "Fräulein," as the humble governess in the Thistleton household! She is penniless, has nowhere to go, and moreover, owes Mr. Thistleton two hundred pounds. The hero, the quiet, unobtrusive narrator, a typical young Englishman, who has the good sense not to take himself seriously, of course, acts the part of patient, loyal, and discreet friend to the Princess in her distress, and does not commit the faux pas of proposing to her after the vulgarian, Charley Miles, has reluctantly admitted that he had "better not invite her to become Mrs. Charley Miles!" Naturally, there is a revolution in Bavaria, and the Princess Vera, by the help of her English friend, departs post haste to her own country, where she soon ascends the throne instead of taking a new situation as nursery governess to a Mrs. Perkyns of Maida Hill. This story well illustrates the sort of half-way house Mr. Anthony Hope occupies to-day between the artists and the fashionable favourites. If he could have brought himself to shock our feeling for the purple, if he did not accept and emphasise the tastes and outlook of the majority of his countrymen he might—but let us be grateful that he has given us "The Dolly Dialogues" and "A Servant of the Public."

* "Tales of Two People." By Anthony Hope. (Methuen) 6s.

OCCULTISM and COMMON-SENSE

The Westminster Gazette

is now publishing a series of twelve articles which are the result of an inquiry by an impartial investigator into the phenomena usually called "psychical." The subject will be dealt with on the following plan:

Science and the "Supernatural"—The Induced Hypnotic Trance—Phantasms of the Living—Dreams—Hallucinations—Phantasms of the Dead.

* * * The series began October 21st, and three articles are appearing weekly. The twelve papers containing them will be sent to any address inland by post for 1s. 6d.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE, Tudor Street, London, E.C.

MR. R. B. HALDANE AND "PUBLIC OPINION."

THE Right Hon. R. B. Haldane, M.P., Secretary for War, has addressed the following letter to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION:—

WAR OFFICE, 1st October, 1907.

Dear Mr. Parker,

I think that in the new form of "Public Opinion" under your editorship, you do well to make prominent what is concrete and living in the shape of the opinions maturely formed of men who are trying to do the work of the nation and of journalists the standard of whose criticism is high. What interests people is that which is expressed in a concrete form and has in it the touch of humanity. The views of strenuous spirits and the criticisms of really competent critics given in their own words comply with this condition. Your paper will succeed if it can only keep up to this standard, and I think you have brought it on to the right lines.

Yours faithfully,

R. B. HALDANE.

Percy L. Parker, Esq.,

Office of "Public Opinion,"

Temple House, Tallis Street, E.C.

PUBLIC OPINION.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF CURRENT THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY.

TWOPENCE WEEKLY.

Post free to any part of the World, 13/- Yearly, or 10/10 for the United Kingdom.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. By Post, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAIL.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

"Quotations, sir, is a good thing; there is a community of mind in it; classical quotation is the parole of literary men all over the world."—Dr. JOHNSON.

STOKES' CYCLOPÆDIA OF FAMILIAR QUOTATIONS.

773 pages, cloth, 3/6 net; half-mor., 7/6 net.

Containing 5,000 Selections from 600 Authors. With a Complete General Index and an Index of Authors.

Compiled by ELFORD EVELEIGH TREFFRY.

This Volume will prove of immense value to Clergymen, Teachers, Public Speakers, Literary Men, and Readers generally. Commercial men, too, will be wise to study its pages, as a suitable extract will often prove an effective advertisement, nor is an apt quotation to be despised as a happy method of clinching a business transaction.

Prospectus, with Specimen Pages, &c., post free.

W. & R. CHAMBERS, Ltd., London and Edinburgh.

BOOKS ON SOCIALISM.

COMPLETE SET, POST FREE, 1/-

- | | |
|---|-----|
| 1. "An Exposure of Socialism"... | 2d. |
| 2. "Thou Shalt Not Steal"... | 1d. |
| 3. "The Crime of Poverty"... | 2d. |
| 4. "Individualism and Socialism"... | 1d. |
| 5. "The Problem of Wealth"... | 1d. |
| 6. "The Story of My Dictatorship": (An Exposure of Popular Fallacies) | 6d. |

To L. V. Publication Department,
376-77, Strand, London, W.C.

Enclosed please find Postal Order for One Shilling, for which send the above books to CUT THIS OUT.

THE INQUIRER

ONE PENNY WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF LIBERAL RELIGION

Special Articles of Interest to Liberal Thinkers and Workers.
Reviews of Important Books and Magazines.

News of Churches and Societies.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS:

6/6 per year, to all parts of the World.

SPECIMEN COPY FREE ON APPLICATION.

Published every Friday at

3, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

ALMOST the only fault in Mr. Street's gossip volume, "The Ghosts of Piccadilly" (Constable, 10s. 6d. net), is that the author is a trifle too conscious of his style. However, the reader who strolls along Piccadilly under Mr. Street's guidance can hardly fail of entertainment. After a brief discussion of the origin of the name—the most likely explanation is that it came from the nickname given to a barber's shop and gaming-house which existed at the top of the Haymarket in the beginning of the seventeenth century—Mr. Street takes his reader along Piccadilly, pouring out a stream of anecdote about the notabilities who have lived in the various houses. The plan is an excellent one, for Piccadilly is rich in associations, and Mr. Street's knowledge of the memoirs of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries enables him to retail his gossip with the allusiveness and ease of a contemporary. We meet in his pages the great Lord Clarendon; Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire, for whom Mr. Street has a special liking; "Old Q"; Beau Brummel; Lady Ashburton, of course with Carlyle in attendance; Byron, Macaulay, the Palmerstons, George Selwyn, Nelson, Lady Hamilton, the Duke of Wellington, and a crowd of others. Mr. Street is at his best when writing of Byron and Sir Walter Scott. Of Macaulay he does not conceal his dislike, which is a pity, for Macaulay as a breakfast-out would have given him some good anecdotes. The book is, indeed, much more than a mere collection of good stories. Mr. Street has a keen eye for character, and now and then he sums up the subject under discussion in a telling sentence, as when he describes George Selwyn as "a graver ghost than the general for Piccadilly, even in his earlier days when he lived there—a benevolent figure, greatly loved, full of humour, and yet having about him withal a faint, vague, intangible suggestion of the sinister."

* * *

MESSRS. PUTNAM have published "Madame de Staël to Benjamin Constant" (5s. net.), a small volume containing a number of new letters by Madame de Staël, together with other documents from the papers left by Madame Charlotte de Constant. The letters belong to the period when the devotion of "the inconstant Constant" was beginning to decline. They have been made use of, we believe, by Mr. Francis Gribble in his book, "Madame de Staël and Her Lovers," published early this year, and they add little to the picture there painted of Constant's disloyalty, and Madame de Staël's vain efforts to win him back. The editor, a great-granddaughter of Madame de Constant, has interwoven the letters in a narrative in which she gives short biographical accounts of the persons mentioned in the correspondence. The book contains a number of interesting portraits.

* * *

SIR GEORGE OTTO TREVELYAN has edited and arranged a selection of "Marginal Notes by Lord Macaulay" (Longmans, 2s. net), chosen from the comments made by Macaulay upon the margins of the books he read. The habit of defacing books in this way is a reprehensible one, but when the annotator is a Coleridge, a Sainte-Beuve, or a Macaulay, it becomes a splendid sin. The notes chosen by Sir George Trevelyan deal with Anna Seward, Shakespeare, Cicero, and Plato. A special interest attaches to the criticisms of Anna Seward from the fact that Mr. E. V. Lucas has just made her the subject of a lengthy biography. Macaulay's comments upon her letters are severe. Writing of the Inferno, Miss Seward observes that "the plan is most clumsily arranged: Virgil, and the three talking quadrupeds, as guides!" "What can she mean?" said Macaulay. "She must allude to the panther, the lion, and the she-wolf in the First Canto. But they are not guides and they do not talk." Speaking of her habit of describing her sonnets as "centennial" because there were a hundred of them, he exclaims, "Was ever such pedantry found in company with such ignorance?" The notes on Shakespeare and Cicero are deeply interesting, and show the thorough way in which Macaulay faced every difficulty, textual or otherwise, in the works of his favourite authors.

* * *

"OVER-SEA BRITAIN" by Mr. E. F. Knight (Murray, 6s. net), is the first volume of a work in which the author aims at giving, in a moderate compass, a comprehensive account of the British possessions beyond the seas, "to explain what the British Empire is; how it came to be; the history of its growth; the physical, political, and commercial geography of its various parts." Mr. Knight is a famous war correspondent, and he has travelled in most of the countries of which he writes, so that his facts are, in many cases, the result of direct observation. The present volume deals with the Mediterranean, British Africa, and British America, leaving Australia and India for a second part. The book must have entailed great labour, and is most conscientiously done. It is, of course, impossible to deal with the vast array of facts and statistics which it contains, but we can recommend it as a useful gazetteer of the British Colonies. The point of view taken up by Mr. Knight is frankly Imperialistic, though this bias is mainly confined to his introductory chapter.

* * *

A NUMBER of readers will remember the name, at least, of "Amy Herbert," though perhaps few will now be sufficiently interested in it to read "The Autobiography of Elizabeth M. Sewell," edited by her niece, Miss Eleanor Sewell, and recently published by Messrs. Longman (4s. 6d. net.). Miss Sewell enjoyed a great reputation in the middle of last century as a writer of High Church novels, something in the style of Miss Yonge's "Heir of Redclyffe." She came under the influence of the Tractarian movement through her brother, William Sewell, the eccentric Head Master of Radley. Her earliest book, "Stories on the Lord's Prayer," appeared in 1840, but she first became prominent by "Amy Herbert," the opening volume of a series intended to inculcate Anglo-Catholic principles. In middle age Miss Sewell took up the occupation of teaching, and had a successful school for girls in the Isle of Wight. She died in August, 1906, at the age of ninety-one. The autobiography gives us the picture of a sheltered but courageous and deeply religious life. A winning feature in Miss Sewell's character is the absence of any feeling of vexation or pique when the public ceased to take an interest in her books.

* * *

MESSRS. JACK begin their new series, "The Romance of Empire," with a volume on "Canada" (6s. net), by Mr. Beckles Willson. Mr. Beckles Willson, who is a Canadian, has both enthusiasm and knowledge. His graphic pictures of the stirring events in Canadian history, from the time when Cartier unfurled the flag of the lilies up to the American war of 1812, are certain to be enjoyed by the boys for whom the series is primarily intended. We are apt to forget the heroic deeds and thrilling struggles which went to the winning of this portion of our Empire, but no boy who reads the book can remain unmoved by the stories so well told by Mr. Willson. More mature readers will perhaps complain that the colours are laid on a trifle crudely, but it certainly fulfils the purpose for which it is intended. The book is illustrated in colour from drawings by Mr. Henry Sandham.

* * *

A VOLUME of "Dramatic, Lyrical, and Idyllic Poems," by Mr. Thomas Tilston (Simpkin, Marshall & Co.), shows a certain amount of facility in rhyme and metre, but lacks any note of distinction. Mr. Tilston is at his best in lyrical verse. We have read his poem called "Hope" with pleasure. The longer poems in the collection do not come up to the same standard.

Ah, fill the Pipe:—what boots it to repeat
How Time is flying underneath our Feet:
Unborn To-morrow and dead Yesterday,
Why fret about them if to-day be sweet!

Omar-Khayyám (modernised).

A Pipe of

PLAYER'S NAVY MIXTURE

makes

Yesterday a pleasant memory,
To-day a time of sweet enjoyment,
and its anticipation
Tomorrow brings peace of mind and contentment.

SOLD IN TWO STRENGTHS:

MILD, 5d.
per oz.

MEDIUM, 4½d.
per oz.

JOHN PLAYER & SONS, Nottingham, will forward Testing Samples post free to applicants mentioning this paper.

0443

GUNN SECTIONAL BOOKCASE

THE "GUNN" is a Real Home for Books. It Affords Protection from Dust and Damp, and is Easily Adaptable to the Growing Needs of the Book-lover. Handsome Appearance. First-class Material, and Excellent Workmanship throughout.

THE "GUNN"

IS THE BEST PROCURABLE.

Write for Descriptive Booklet
No. 16, giving illustrations of the Various Styles with Full Particulars and Prices, sent Post Free on Application.

Wm. ANGUS & Co., Ltd.,
53, Paul St., Finsbury, London, E.C.

MAPLE & CO

ARE SPECIALISTS
FOR COMFORTABLE

CLUB & LOUNGE CHAIRS & SETTEES

Inspection invited, or Illustrated
Catalogue of Chairs sent free

LARGEST STOCK IN THE WORLD

LONDON

PARIS

BUENOS AIRES

BORD'S PIANOS

Illustrated
Lists of the
"BORD"

Pianos will be sent free, showing prices and rates of hire of the various Models, on the THREE YEARS' SYSTEM, from 15s. per month. Second-hand, from 10s. 6d. per month.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

The "BECHSTEIN" Pianos may also be had on the same system, at advantageous prices and terms.

LIBERAL DISCOUNT FOR CASH.

CHAS. STILES & CO.,

74 and 76, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

PIANOS EXCHANGED.

A LIQUID
FOOD

A genuine high-class beverage of absolute purity, having the greatest strength and the finest flavour. Made under ideal conditions of labour in an English Factory, amidst pure and healthful surroundings, where the health and well-being of the workers receive the constant care of the firm.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

WHAT PUBLISHERS READ.

THE NOVEMBER Book Monthly,
NOW READY, SIXPENCE NET,
HAS A SERIES OF LETTERS
FROM OUR LEADING PUBLISHERS ON WHAT THEY READ WHEN THEY ARE NOT ACCEPTING OR REJECTING MERE MANUSCRIPTS

Order the "BOOK MONTHLY," from your Bookseller, your News-agent, or from the Publishers, SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

The Week in the City.

THE AMERICAN CRISIS.

It is quite as difficult as it was last week to gauge the financial situation, but it is still certainly critical. Advices from America point to a continuance of severe stringency there. All over the States depositors have taken alarm, in some cases no doubt justifiably, for the banks and trust companies have been playing a dangerously speculative game for a very long time, and some of them must be quite unsound. Mr. Cortelyou has distinguished himself, and has undoubtedly done much to relieve the situation in New York, but the gravity of the crisis is thrown into clear light by the difficulty of importing gold. Of the large engagements notified at the beginning of the week, several have been cancelled owing to the want of funds or credit, and to the loss involved in importation with the exchange unfavourable. The Americans actually had to pay 78 shillings for the gold purchased in the open market on Monday.

The best opinion in the City is that the financial misery throughout the States will last for a long time. The trust failure in San Francisco on Thursday, and the proclamation of a legal holiday by the Governor of California, were bad symptoms, like the closing of the Pittsburg Stock Exchange, and the difficulties experienced in providing credit and cash for moving the crops. Some people expect that the collapse of speculation in wheat will bring about a welcome fall of prices, and certainly the want of money may bring forward grain more rapidly than had been anticipated. But if the world's crop deficiency turns out to be serious, the fall in prices can only be temporary. From the London point of view the best features this week have been the comparative steadiness of Consols, and the recovery in home railways owing to the belief gaining ground that Mr. Lloyd George's efforts to prevent a railway strike will be successful. It is to be hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will take advantage of the critical situation to enforce public economy, so that savings may go to the Sinking Fund for the support of national credit. The rise of the bank rate on Thursday to $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. had, of course, been anticipated, as the rate had already been raised unofficially. It would not have been surprising if the directors had gone to 6 per cent., and it is quite possible that the rate may be forced up before next Thursday if America is able to engage the large amounts of coin of which she is so urgently in need.

THE STOCK EXCHANGE.

In the dismal nineteen-day account which finished on Monday, home and American railways were the principal sufferers. London and North-Western dropped 4 to 132, Central London 5 to 59, and Metropolitan $3\frac{1}{2}$ to 33. Among American railroads, Union Pacific lead the movement with a fall of $15\frac{1}{4}$ to 114 $\frac{3}{4}$. Illinois Central dropped 13 to 128, Southern Pacific 12 to 71, and Milwaukee 10 to 110 $\frac{1}{2}$. On Wednesday, American stocks crumbled away still further, but the most sensational feature was a sharp break in Canadian railways. Quite a panic was caused by an unexpected decrease in Trunk earnings. Dealers had looked for an increase of eight or ten thousand pounds, and got a decrease of thirteen thousand pounds for September. Values collapsed at once, the Trunks Ordinary falling $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 19 $\frac{3}{8}$, and the Third Preference $3\frac{3}{4}$ to 64 $\frac{1}{4}$. The September statement of the Canadian Pacific was also discouraging, and the stock fell 6 points, a huge increase in working expenses making a bad impression. There were ugly reports of credit disturbances in Canada. Hudson's Bays also suffered, and the Canadian slump went further on Wednesday, in spite of reassuring statements telegraphed by the Bank of Montreal and the Canadian Bank of Commerce. I have over and over again warned readers of THE NATION against the high prices of the Canadian railways and of the land companies, and have pointed out the difficulties which must result from excessive land speculation. The financial writers and bucket shop agencies have doubtless caused great financial loss to the investing public by urging them to buy Canadian paper at inflated prices, and now, of course, comes the inevitable suffering. But I would point out that there is one bright spot in the gloom. In spite of the close interdependence of Canadian and American credit, Canada has this great advantage over the States that her currency and banking laws are sound. In fact, American bankers have been so impressed by their study of Canadian legislation that they have recommended its adoption, or rather adaptation, by the legislature of the United States. Let us then hope that with this important advantage Canada will emerge from the crisis with much less suffering than the States. The failure of Kessler & Co. in New York on Thursday caused a good deal of despondency in the City, and so did the news of two failures on our own Stock Exchange. One was that of a considerable firm of brokers who had been ruined by a speculating journalist unable to pay differences. Many strange reports and rumours have been flying about. One of the most interesting, and perhaps the most authentic, is that a certain big newspaper proprietor has been turning out big lines of Canadian stock on to the market. This was supposed to explain the heavy falls in Trunks and Canadian Pacific.

THE CHARTERED COMPANY.

The shares of the Chartered Company fell to fifteen shillings on Monday. The financial condition of the Company has led to all sorts of rumours, and many statements have been made which point to the failure of some of the latest ventures. The Broken Hill venture is said to have proved a complete failure, and the railway built at a great cost will be workless.

LUCELLUM.

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company are issuing £700,000 four and a-half per cent. first debenture stock, which stock forms part of an authorised issue of £1,000,000 like stock, equal to two-thirds of the present paid-up capital of the company. The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company was established by Royal Charter granted in 1839, and the stock is created under powers conferred on the company by a subsequent Royal Charter dated March 7th, 1882, and will be secured by a trust deed in favour of trustees giving a first charge by way of floating security upon the entire property and assets of the company, subject only to the existing debentures of the company, which will be paid off and extinguished out of the proceeds of the present issue. The trust deed will contain a provision that the company will not create any general charge upon its property or specifically mortgage any of its ships in priority to this issue. During the present year the new twin-screw mail steamer "Avon," of 11,000 tons, has been placed in the service, and three cargo steamers have been purchased. The new twin-screw mail steamer "Asturias," of 12,200 tons gross register, was launched on September 26th last, and will be delivered by the builders, Messrs. Harland & Wolff, early in January next. The security for the debenture stock has therefore been considerably increased, and will be still further enhanced as more new steamers are constructed. The list opens to-day, and closes on or before next Wednesday.

The List will open on Saturday, the 2nd November, 1907, and close on or before Wednesday, the 6th November, 1907.

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

(Incorporated by Royal Charter, 1839).

Capital Authorised - - - £2,100,000.

Capital issued and fully paid:—

Preferred Stock...	£600,000
Ordinary Stock...	900,000
						£1,500,000

Issue of £700,000 Four-and-a-half per cent. First Debenture Stock.

This Stock forms part of an authorised issue of £1,000,000 like Stock, which is equal to two-thirds of the present paid-up Capital of the Company. The Company was established by Royal Charter granted in 1839, and the Stock is created under Powers conferred on the Company by a subsequent Royal Charter dated 7th March, 1882, and will be secured by a Trust Deed in favour of Trustees giving a first charge by way of floating security upon the entire property and assets of the Company, subject only to the existing Debentures of the Company, which will be paid off and extinguished out of the proceeds of the present issue. The Trust Deed will contain a provision that the Company will not create any general charge upon its property or specifically mortgage any of its ships in priority to this issue. By the Trust Deed the right is reserved to the Company, should it at any time issue any further Capital, of creating and issuing from time to time further Debenture Stock carrying interest at such rate as may be agreed, ranking in all respects pari passu with this Stock to an amount equal to two-thirds of the amount of such further Capital for the time being issued and paid up. The Stock is not redeemable for ten years, but after 1st January, 1918, the whole or any part is redeemable at par at the Company's option at any time on six calendar months' notice to the Stockholders.

ISSUE PRICE £98 PER CENT.

The Instalments are payable as follows:—

- £ 5 per cent. on Application.
- £18 per cent. on Allotment.
- £25 per cent. on 2nd December, 1907.
- £25 per cent. on 2nd January, 1908.
- £25 per cent. on 3rd February, 1908.

£98

The Stock will be issued and will be transferable in any amount not involving a fraction of £1.

Interest on the Stock will be payable half-yearly, on 1st January and 1st July in each year, the first payment of interest calculated from the dates for payment of the several instalments will be made on the 1st January, 1908.

Payment in full can be made on allotment, in which case interest on the full amount of Stock allotted will run from the date of payment.

Scrip Certificates will be issued as soon as possible after allotment.

PROSPECTUS.

The Court of Directors of the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company have authorised Messrs. Roberts, Lubbock & Co. and the National Provincial Bank of England, Limited, as Bankers of the Company, to receive applications for £700,000 £4½ per cent. First Debenture Stock of the Company.

The Stock will not be redeemable for ten years, but after 1st January, 1918, the whole or any part will be redeemable at par at the Company's option at any time on six calendar months' notice to the Stockholders.

The proceeds of the present issue of Debenture Stock are required for the redemption of the existing Debenture Debt of the Company, amounting to £500,000, which matures on the 1st January, 1908, and for the general purposes of the Company.

The Company was established by Royal Charter granted in 1839, and its powers have been extended by subsequent Royal Charters dated 30th August, 1851, 7th March, 1882, and 5th July, 1904.

The Company is under Contract with His Majesty's Government for the conveyance of Mails to the West Indies; Central America, and New York, and to Brazil, Uruguay, and Argentina.

The Fleet consists of Forty-seven Steam Vessels, with an approximate aggregate gross registered tonnage of 204,268 tons. There are also Steam Tugs and Launches, and Freehold and Leasehold properties, at home and abroad.

The property of the Company upon which the Debenture Stock will constitute a first floating charge, consisting of the Fleet of Steam Vessels, Premises and Plant at home and abroad, Stocks, Stores, Investments, Book Debts, and cash in hand, stood in the Company's books on 31st December, 1906, at the reduced book value of £3,008,503, inclusive of payments up to that date on account of new Steamers then building.

During the present year, the new Twin-screw Mail Steamer, "Avon," of 11,000 tons, has been placed in the Service, and three cargo steamers have been purchased. The new Twin-screw Mail Steamer, "Asturias," of 12,200 tons gross register, was launched on 26th September last, and will be delivered by the builders, Messrs. Harland & Wolff, early in January next. The security for the Debenture Stock has therefore been considerably increased, and will be still further enhanced as more new Steamers are constructed.

The amount required to pay the annual interest on the present issue is £31,500, being only £11,750 in excess of the annual amount required for interest on the existing Debentures (to be redeemed on 1st January next), and as the profits in 1906 (after payment of Debenture Interest, but before providing for Depreciation and Preference Dividend) amounted to considerably more than £200,000, the interest on the present issue is amply secured.

Holders of Debentures of the Company who may desire to convert all or any of their Debentures into Debenture Stock of this issue, can do so by filling up the Form supplied for the purpose and lodging same with the Company, and they will be entitled to a preferential allotment of Debenture Stock to the same amount as the nominal value of the Debentures held by them.

An Official Quotation on the London Stock Exchange will be applied for in due course.

A Brokerage of 5s. per cent. will be paid by the Company in respect of all allotments made, whether in exchange for the present Debentures or in respect of cash applications, provided the Application Forms bear a Broker's stamp.

Applications for the Debenture Stock should be made on the Form of Application issued with the Prospectus and should be forwarded to the Company's Bankers accompanied by a deposit of 5 per cent. on the amount applied for.

If no allotment is made, the deposit will be returned without deduction, and if a partial allotment only is made, the surplus deposit will be applied towards the amount payable on allotment.

In case of default in payment of any instalment at its due date, all amounts previously paid and any interest payable thereon will be liable to forfeiture.

Transfers of Stock will be accepted on the ordinary Form, and will be registered at the Head Office of the Company.

A copy of the Royal Charter granted 26th September, 1839, and of the further Royal Charters granted in 1851, 1882, and 1904, and of the Draft of the Trust Deed for securing this issue and of a letter to the Company from Messrs. Snell & Swaffield, dated 31st October, 1907, agreeing to guarantee the subscription of the present issue of Debenture Stock, may be seen at the offices of the Company's Solicitors, Messrs. Bristows, Cooke & Carpmal, 1, Copthall-buildings, E.C., on any day while the lists remain open between the hours of 11 a.m. and 4 p.m.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application may be obtained at the offices of the Company, 18 and 57, Moorgate-street, E.C., 32, Cockspur-street, S.W., and at Southampton, Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, and Glasgow, or from the Bankers, or from Messrs. Snell & Swaffield, 5, Copthall-buildings, E.C.

Trustees for the Debenture Stock Holders.

THE MARQUESS OF HAMILTON, M.P.
J. W. PHILIPPS, M.P.

Directors.

OWEN PHILIPPS (Chairman).
ALFRED S. WILLIAMS (Deputy Chairman).
SPENCER HENRY CURTIS.
JAMES HEAD.
JOHN HENRY JELICOE.
WILLIAM C. KENNY.
ARTHUR NEVILLE LUBBOCK.
EDWARD NORTON.
SIR JOSEPH SAVORY, BART.

Bankers.

ROBERTS, LUBBOCK & CO.,
15, Lombard Street, E.C., and
THE NATIONAL PROVINCIAL BANK OF ENGLAND, LTD., 112, Bishopsgate Street Within, E.C., and Southampton.

Brokers.

SNELL & SWAFFIELD, 5, Copthall Buildings, E.C.

Solicitors.

BRISTOWS, COOKE, & CARPMAEL,
1, Copthall Buildings, E.C.

Secretary.

R. L. FORBES.

1st November, 1907.

THIS FORM OF APPLICATION MAY BE USED.

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

(Incorporated by Royal Charter, 1839).

Issue of £700,000 £4½ per cent. First Debenture Stock.

TO THE DIRECTORS OF THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

GENTLEMEN,—Having paid your Bankers the sum of £..... being Five per cent. deposit, I beg to apply for £..... of the above First Debenture Stock, in accordance with the terms of the Prospectus, dated 1st November, 1907, and I hereby agree to accept the same, or any less amount that may be allotted to me, and I undertake to pay the balance as specified, and I request that such Debenture Stock may be registered in the Company's Books in my name as follows:—

Name in full.....

Occupation.....

Address.....

Date.....1907.

Usual Signature.....

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

KINGSLEY HOTEL, Near the British Museum. Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London. THACKERAY HOTEL, Opposite the British Museum. Great Russell Street, London.

These well-appointed and commodious Temperance Hotels will, it is believed, meet the requirements, at moderate charges, of those who desire all the conveniences and advantages of the larger modern Licensed Hotels. These Hotels have Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every floor, spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard, and Smoking Rooms, heated throughout. Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive charge for Bedroom, Attendance Table d'Hôte, Breakfast and Dinner, From 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

Full Tariff and Testimonials on application.

Telegraphic Addresses—

Kingsley Hotel, "Bookcraft, London." Thackeray Hotel, "Thackeray, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curpale. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

ONE & ALL BULBS

The Brand Guarantees
One & All Quality.

ONE & ALL COLLECTIONS OF FLOWERING BULBS AND ROOTS.

Producing a most effective Display.

ESTABLISHED 1867.

ONE & ALL COLLECTION OF BULBS.

No. 1. For the Open Ground. Price 15/- 25 Anemones, finest mixed; 200 Crocus, in four colours; 13 Daffodils, double; 25 Daffodils, single; 24 Tulips, double, finest mixed; 24 Tulips, single; 24 Hyacinths, in three colours; 25 Iris, finest mixed; 25 Jonquils, Major; 25 Narcissus, Pheasant's Eye; 12 Narcissus, Polyanthus, mixed; 12 Narcissus, double white; 24 Ranunculus, finest mixed; 100 Snowdrops, selected; 25 Winter Aconites; 50 Scillas; 12 Allium Neapolitanum.

No. 2. For the Open Ground. Price 7/6. 12 Anemones, finest mixed; 150 Crocus, in four colours; 25 Tulips, double finest, mixed; 25 Tulips, single; 12 Hyacinths, in three colours; 12 Iris, finest mixed; 6 Daffodils, double; 12 Daffodils, single; 12 Narcissus, Pheasant's Eye; 12 Narcissus, double white; 60 Snowdrops, selected; 25 Winter Aconites; 12 Jonquils, single Major; 25 Scillas.

No. 3. For the Open Ground. Price 4/- 25 Snowdrops, selected; 100 Crocus, choice mixed; 25 Tulips, finest mixed; 12 Daffodils, double; 12 Narcissus, finest mixed; 12 Scillas; 12 Iris, finest mixed; 6 Hyacinths, choice mixed.

No. 4. For the Open Ground. Price 2/6. 12 Snowdrops, selected; 50 Crocus, choice mixed; 12 Tulips, finest mixed; 6 Daffodils, double; 6 Narcissus, finest mixed; 6 Scillas; 6 Iris, finest mixed; 3 Hyacinths, choice mixed.

No. 5. For Conservatory and Room Decoration. Price 16/- 24 Hyacinths, choice named; 12 Jonquils, double, sweet scented; 6 Polyanthus, Narcissus; 24 Tulips, named varieties; 100 Crocus, choice named varieties; 6 Early White Roman Hyacinths; 3 Lilium Harrisii; 12 Freesias; 24 Scilla Siberica; 50 Double Snowdrops.

No. 6. For Conservatory and Room Decoration. Price 8/- 12 Hyacinths, choice named; 12 Jonquils, double, sweet scented; 6 Polyanthus, Narcissus; 2 Lilium Harrisii; 18 Tulips, named varieties; 50 Crocus, choice named varieties; 12 Scilla Siberica; 6 Freesias; 25 Snowdrops; 3 Early White Roman Hyacinths.

No. 7. Popular Collection for the Open Ground. Price 1/- Containing 30 or more Bulbs of the following popular kinds—Snowdrops, selected; Crocus, choice mixed; Tulips, finest mixed; Daffodils, double; Narcissus, finest mixed; Scillas; Iris, finest mixed; Hyacinth, choice.

ONE & ALL is the registered Trade Mark of the AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL ASSOCIATION, Ltd. Name and address of nearest local agent, Catalogues and other details post free on application to Edward Owen Greening, Managing Director, Wholesale Seed Warehouses, 92, Long Acre, W.C.

ONE & ALL BULBS

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye. Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

CHINGFORD, ESSEX.

ROYAL FOREST HOTEL. Mr. John Brill.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALDON.

TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill. C. Simons, Manager.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MANCHESTER.

THE PRINCES CAFE. Oxford Street.

THE DEANS GATE HOTEL. Deansgate.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

Boys from this PUBLIC SCHOOL have done well at the Universities.

The School stands in its own grounds of about 45 acres, high above the town and the Thames Valley.

For Honours List, Prospectus, particulars of Scholarships, and other information, apply to the Headmaster, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School.

HASLEMERE, SURREY.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD SCHOOL for GIRLS. Sandy soil; nine acres of ground; nearly 600 ft. above sea level.

Principal: Miss AMY KEMP, Camb. Certif. for Theory and Practice of Teaching (St. George's Training College, Edinburgh); Diploma for the Teaching of German (Berlin); and Miss HELEN T. NEILD, M.A. (Vict.), Classical Tripos (Camb.), Certificated Student of Girton College; 11 years at the Mount School, York.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C. Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery. Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS AT END OF EVERY TERM.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.

A LIBRARY OF PEACE AND WAR.

WITH AN INTRODUCTION

By F. W. HIRST.

1/- NET.

SPEAKER PUBLISHING Co., Ltd.,

14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

FINANCIAL.

PARR'S BANK, LIMITED.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN that the Rate of Interest allowed by this Bank at the Head Office and Metropolitan Branches, on Deposit at seven days' call, is Four per cent. per annum until further notice.

R. W. WHALLEY, General Manager.

Bartholomew Lane, E.C., 31st October, 1907.

LECTURES.

Lectures on Art and Architecture

FOR EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS AND SCHOOLS,

By ERNEST RADFORD, LL.M., CANTAB., formerly Secretary of the Arts and Crafts Exhibition.

Mr. Radford has recently Lectured for the Education Department of the London County Council.

For terms and particulars of Courses and Single Lectures kindly apply to the Lecturer, 1, Portland Villas, Hampstead, N.W.

TYPEWRITING.—Typewriting of every description.

High-class work, reasonable charges, prompt, accurate.

E. G. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

BOOKSELLERS.

SPECIAL NOTICE TO LARGE BIBLE BUYERS,
CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS, SCHOOLS, &c.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.,

are offering 5,000 BIBLES also VICTORIAN PRAYER BOOKS
at HALF-PRICE.

ILLUSTRATED BIBLES from 1s.

LISTS SENT POST FREE.

TELEPHONE: CENTRAL 329.

A. LIONEL ISAACS, 5, Pall Mall, S.W.
(CARLTON HOTEL BUILDING).

Choice Books.
Rare Autographs and MSS.
Pictures and Prints.

CATALOGUES ISSUED.

TELEPHONE: 1784 CENTRAL.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

(And at READING.)

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—Neale's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

BLACKIE & SON'S NEW BOOKS

THE LIFE OF HENTY. GEORGE HENTY:

The Story of an Active Life.
By G. MANVILLE FENN.
Illustrated, crown 8vo, cloth elegant, 7s. 6d. net.

A NEW ANTHOLOGY.

THE CALL OF THE HOMELAND:

A Collection of English Verse.
Selected and Arranged by R. P. SCOTT, LL.D., and KATHARINE T. WALLAS.
Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, gilt top, 4s. 6d. net.

BENARES: the Sacred City

Sketches of Hindoo Life and Religion.

By E. B. HAVELL, A.R.C.A.,
Principal of the Government School of Art, Calcutta.
With many illustrations, large demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net.
"The volume will be a revelation of wonders to many students. It should interest the duller. To the apprehensive it will bring food and stimulant to the thought and imagination."—Scotsman.

TWO NEW BOOKS

By CAPTAIN F. S. BRERETON. WITH WOLSELEY TO KUMASI.

A Story of the Ashantee War. Illustrated by GORDON BROWNE, R.I. Large crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 6s.

JONES OF THE 64th, A Story of Assaye. Illustrated by W. RAINEY, R.I. Large crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 5s.

The above are two of the most thrilling stories of adventure that Captain Brereton has ever written, and will add still further to the reputation of this boys' favourite author.

By ROBERT M. MACDONALD.

THE GREAT WHITE CHIEF: a Story of Adventure in Unknown New Guinea. Illustrated by W. RAINEY, R.I. Large crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 6s.

Also many New Volumes by DAVID KER, WALTER RHODES, Dr. GORDON STABLES, &c., in our 3s. 6d., 3s., 2s. 6d., and 2s. Series for Boys.

BLACKIE'S CHILDREN'S ANNUAL

FOURTH YEAR
OF ISSUE.

A handsome volume of 192 pages, with over 150 illustrations, including 40 Full-Page Pictures in Full Colour by the best Artists. Picture boards, cloth back, 3s. 6d.; cloth, gilt edges, 5s.

NEW BOOKS FOR GIRLS.

By BESSIE MARCHANT.

SISTERS OF SILVER CREEK: a Story of Western Canada. Illustrated by ROBERT HOPE. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 5s.

By BESSIE MARCHANT.

NO ORDINARY GIRL: a Story of Central America.

Illustrated by FRANCES EWAN. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 3s. 6d.

AND MANY OTHER NEW VOLUMES.

NEW BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

THE STORY OF THE WEATHERCOCK.

Stories for Children. By EVELYN SHARP. With 16 Coloured Plates and the Text fully illustrated with Black-and-White Drawings by CHARLES ROBINSON. Large 4to, cloth, full gilt and gilt edges, 6s. net.

HEROIC LEGENDS. The Best of the Old Legends

Retold by AGNES GROZIER HEPPERTSON. Illustrated with 16 beautifully Coloured Plates by HELEN STRATTON. Square 8vo, cloth elegant, full gilt and gilt edges, 6s. net.

SAMBO AND SUSANNA. A Picture-Book for

Little Folk. With 24 Full-Page Pictures in Full Colour by ETHEL PARKINSON, and Verses by MAY BYRON. Picture boards, cloth back, 3s. 6d.

RED LETTER LIBRARY.

Messrs. BLACKIE & SON have pleasure in announcing that they are about to make the following important additions to their Red Letter Library:—

Title.	Introduction by
HOOD'S SELECT POEMS -	- Sir F. C. BURNAND
RUSKIN'S SESAME AND LILIES, and	- ALICE MEYNELL
UNTO THIS LAST	- EDMUND GOSSE
LEIGH HUNT'S IMAGINATION AND FANCY	- A. T. QUILLER-ROUCH
KINGLAKE'S EOTHEN
1s. 6d. net, cloth, gilt top; 2s. 6d. net, leather, gilt top.

A Set of Catalogues, beautifully printed in Colours, will be sent post-free on receipt of postcard.

BLACKIE & SON, Limited, 50, Old Bailey, London, E.C.

A NEW BOOK BY THE AUTHOR OF "IN SEARCH OF EL DORADO."

IN THE LAND OF PEARL & GOLD.

A Pioneer's Wanderings in the Back-Blocks and Pearl-grounds of Australia and New Guinea.

By ALEXANDER MACDONALD, F.R.G.S.
Author of "In Search of El Dorado," "The Lost Explorers," &c.
Fully illustrated, demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

THOMAS CODOLPHIN ROOPER.

Late H.M. Inspector of Schools; a Selection from his Writings.

Edited, with a Memoir, by R. G. TATTON.
Demy 8vo, cloth 7s. 6d. net.

THE

MYTHOLOGY OF THE BRITISH ISLANDS

An Introduction to the Celtic Myth, Legend, Poetry and Romance.

By CHARLES SQUIRE.

Demy 8vo, cloth extra, 12s. 6d. net.

"Well written and lucid, and leaves us with a clear idea of the scope of Celtic mythology. We have no hesitation in recommending it."—Athenaeum.

TWO NEW BOOKS

By ALEXANDER MACDONALD, F.R.G.S.

THE PEARL SEEKERS. A Story of the Southern Seas. Illustrated by E. S. HODGSON. Large crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 6s.

IN QUEST OF THE BLACK OPALS

A Story of Adventure in the Heart of Australia. Illustrated by W. RAINEY, R.I. Large crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 5s.

No boys' writer has come so quickly to the front as Mr. Alexander Macdonald, whose books during the last two seasons have been such noted successes.

By HARRY COLLINGWOOD.

WITH AIRSHIP AND SUBMARINE: a Tale of Adventure. Illustrated by EDWARD S. HODGSON. Large crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 6s.

FOURTH YEAR
OF ISSUE.

By LILIAN F. WEVILL.

BETTY'S FIRST TERM: a School Story. Illustrated by ARTHUR H. BUCKLAND. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 3s. 6d.

By DOROTHEA MOORE.

PAMELA'S HERO: a Tale of the Gordon Riots.

Illustrated by ARTHUR A. DIXON. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

THE RHYME OF A RUN, and other Verse.

Written and Pictured by FLORENCE HARRISON. With 24 Drawings in Full Colour, beautifully reproduced and mounted on grey art paper, and many in outline. Sumptuously bound, 6s. net.

HANS ANDERSEN'S FAIRY TALES. Illustrated by HELEN STRATTON, with about 30 beautifully Coloured Plates, and a large number of Black-and-White Drawings. Large crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 5s.

DOGGY DOGGEREL. Being Nursery Rhymes for

Doggy Times. Written by EMILY WESTRUP, and Pictured by E. KATE WESTRUP. With 24 Full-Page Pictures in Full Colour, and 24 Vignettes in Black and White. Picture boards, cloth back, 2s. 6d.

THE

RED LETTER SHAKESPEARE.

A Handy, Scholarly Edition for the General Reader and the Book-Lover

Edited by E. K. CHAMBERS.

The text is printed in red and black from Caslon old-face type; the Title-page, Decorations, End-papers, and Binding have been designed by Mr. TALWIN MORRIS; and the Volumes are issued in two forms, cloth and limp leather. Printing and binding are executed with the greatest care.

Price, cloth, 1s. net; limp leather, 1s. 6d. net.

The Nation

VOL. II., No. 6.]

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1907.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1½d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK ...	169	System. By Mildred Min-
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		turn Scott and Arnold
The Seven Years' Peace ...	172	Lupton	185
The Use of the Tar-Brush ...	173	A Story of Herbert Spencer.
The Panic and Its Meaning ...	174	By W. L. W.	185
The Growth of Modernism ...	175	Sunday Silent Services. By
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		Charles E. Noverre, J.P. ...	185
A Puritan Document	177	The New Marriage Act. By
The Morals of American		George Whale	186
Commerce	178	Who are Members of the
An Umbrian Realist	179	Church of England? By
Broadland in Winter	180	"Audi Alteram Partem" ...	186
MUSIC:—		"A Test Case." By D. M.
Mme. Tetrazzini and Bel		Mason	186
Canto	181	Conscription. By Lieut.-Col.
PRESENT-DAY PROBLEMS:—		D. Scot Skirving	186
The Ruin of Macedonia. By		THE WORLD OF BOOKS ...	188
C. F. G. Masterman, M.P. ...	182	Books to be Read	188
OPEN QUESTIONS:—		REVIEWS:—
Are Riches the Wages of		Letters of Queen Victoria,
Efficiency? By J. A. H. ...	183	1837-1861. II. By the Rt.
POETRY:—		Hon. Lord Eversley	190
Unrest in Autumn. By Dora		The Friend of Fox	192
Sigerson Shorter	184	Three Plays with Happy
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—		Endings	194
Socialism and a Spoils		The House of Lynch	196
		Books in Brief	198
		THE WEEK IN THE CITY ...	200

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE has brought about a brilliant settlement of the railway dispute, which has been signed by the Committee of railway Chairmen, who conferred with him at the Board of Trade, and by the officers of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants and the two other Trade Unions concerned in the quarrel. It has also been accepted by eleven great railway companies, which do not include the North Eastern, only, we imagine, because the workers on that system have now the alternative of formal recognition of their Union, and of accepting Mr. Lloyd George's scheme. The settlement has been acclaimed by public opinion of all shades, with the exception of a few Trade Unionist and Labour leaders, and by nearly all the great newspapers, including the "Times," which has strongly favoured the directors. The "Standard" and the "Financial Times" criticise it; but neither is an organ of the first importance.

THE settlement is based on a mixed scheme of conciliation and arbitration, originating with each company which accepts the plan. The first statement of the men's complaints of wages and hours of labour—general conditions are not specifically included—will come before the railway officials. If no arrangement is made, there will be a second reference to a Sectional Board of Conciliation, which will cover a railway district, and will consist of representatives of the company and of the men, who will choose their own representatives from the various sections of railway employees. If the Sectional Board fails to settle, a Central Conciliation Board, representing the whole company, and manned by officials and a selection of employees from the local Board, comes into play. Finally, if the Central Board fails, or if its conclusions are rejected by either side, there will be an appeal to a single Arbitrator. This gentleman will be chosen, in default of agreement, by the Speaker of the House of Commons and the Master of the Rolls. No better selections could have been made. The Speaker is a Tory; the Master of the Rolls, when he was a politician, was a Liberal. Both men are models of fairmindedness.

THE Board of Trade will overlook the first election of members of the new Conciliation Boards, and will then leave the matter to the parties interested. Masters and men will contribute half the cost of conciliation and arbitration, so that each will face the other on equal terms. Counsel are excluded from the arbitration proceedings, but no other exception is made, and the men, we imagine, may make use of trade union officials, who, provided they are employees of the company, are not debarred from sitting on the Conciliation Boards. An agreement finally determined will last six years, and then may come to an end only after twelve months' notice. So that Mr. George has not only averted a devastating industrial battle, but has proclaimed a seven years' peace in the railway world. Mr. Bell stated that the King had expressed great interest in the settlement, and early news of its conclusion was conveyed to him at Sandringham.

* * *

THE labour world, on the whole, approves the settlement, though some labour representatives guard themselves against accepting compulsory arbitration, and Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, speaking for the Independent Labour Party, declares that the scheme is a disaster, and that neither the Trade Unions nor his own friends would have accepted it. Mr. Pember Reeves, the High Commissioner for New Zealand, and the author of the New Zealand Arbitration Act, in an interview with a "Daily News" correspondent, praises the settlement, though he points out that "ostensibly" it proceeds on a non-unionist basis, and adds that its success depends on the extent to which Mr. Bell's Society can "permeate" its working. If railway companies refuse to come in, Parliament would have a right to include them. Mr. Reeves regretted that there was no legal compulsion for carrying the Arbitrator's awards into effect, and he would have preferred to leave the appointment of an Arbitrator to the Government, rather than to private citizens. But he thought that the settlement would work, and was "a great step forward" in the cause of industrial arbitration.

* * *

THE financial trouble in America is now a full-blown crisis both of money and trade. There has been established in all parts of the United States a premium on gold and on all State currency. If this continues in spite of gold imports, the only way out of the situation would seem to be a large issue of Government certificates based upon bonds and inconvertible for the present. This would be a terrible blow to the reputation of the Government and to the national pride, and it is hardly likely that the President will authorise it without calling Congress. But the situation may become so strained owing to want of cash for labour payments, &c., that there will be no other course. In London the situation is regarded with increasing anxiety, as is proved by the fact that for the first time since 1873 the Bank Rate has been raised above 6 per cent. Whether even the present 7 per cent. rate will suffice to protect our gold reserves and to maintain them at an adequate amount is at least doubtful. The depreciation of securities is giving anxiety to credit institutions in all parts of the world. So far, however, with the exception of France, Great Britain has suffered least from the panic. Our October trade returns proved great commercial prosperity.

A PUZZLING little episode occurred unexpectedly in the course of the week in connection with the Kaiser's visit to England. It was announced on Wednesday that the Empress, owing to the slight illness of the Princess Adelaide of Sondersburg-Glücksburg, who is suffering from chicken-pox, would not accompany the Kaiser, as she originally intended. A pressing invitation from England induced her, however, to revise this decision, and Thursday's papers contained the news that she will travel with the Kaiser. The Imperial Party, accompanied by Herr von Schön and General von Einem, the Foreign and War Ministers, will reach the Isle of Wight on Sunday, and attend a luncheon in the city on Wednesday next. The Kaiser, whose health is not entirely satisfactory, will spend three weeks in the Isle of Wight after the official visit is concluded. The visit will undoubtedly possess considerable political importance, despite the regrettable absence of Prince Bülow, and we believe that it is the general hope in this country that it may help to promote happier and more cordial relations with Germany. The most interesting comment, so far, has been that of the "Temps," which cordially welcomes the visit, as a proof of the success of the Anglo-French entente cordiale. Its meaning is, of course, that Germany has at length recognised the impregnable solidity of this relationship, and now desires to stand on better terms with both partners. "The entente cordiale," it proceeds, "which would be a formidable instrument of war, has only in view the maintenance of peace. That implies that those who form part of it rejoice at everything calculated to pacify the international atmosphere." The sentiment is excellent, but the statement that the entente is of the nature of a military alliance has never before been made in a quarter so authoritative.

* * *

ON Wednesday, Herr Brand, an anarchist journalist, was tried in Berlin for a criminal libel against Prince Bülow, against whom he had brought charges similar to those made by Herr Harden against Prince Eulenburg and Count Moltke. The case, which was heard with quite unnecessary solemnity, showed that Herr Brand had no shadow of evidence or justification for the statements he had made, and he was sentenced, after he had volunteered an apology and a withdrawal, to eighteen months' imprisonment. This case was a mere episode in the larger scandal, which is about to enter on a fresh phase. Last week's trial was generally felt to have been undignified and unsatisfactory. Count Moltke appealed against the verdict, but to the general surprise, the Public Prosecutor, who had originally refused to proceed against Herr Harden, has intervened, and will appeal against the verdict of the Schöffengericht. This means, of course, a fairer trial, and even greater publicity; but the moral effect can hardly differ from that of the first trial.

* * *

It is difficult to tabulate the results of the municipal elections in the English and Welsh boroughs, but they certainly show considerable Conservative gains. The "Unionists" appear to have won 135 seats, the Liberals and the Labour Party 22 each, and separate Socialist organisations 5. Some, though not all, of the most conspicuous Unionist gains were in Lancashire and Yorkshire, 7 occurring in Leeds and Liverpool, 5 in Bolton, 4 in Manchester, 3 in Salford, but they are fairly distributed over the country. On the whole, the Independent Labour group, which appears as an opponent both of the Liberal and the Conservative parties, and does not seem in any borough to have made common cause with the former, has lost, though it has gained slightly, and chiefly at the expense of the Liberals, in Norwich and elsewhere. The causes of the check to the Progressive cause in politics are various. The "Manchester Guardian" attributes the losses in that city chiefly to the vigorous organisation of the liquor trade. The Irish vote has gone Conservative, chiefly on educational grounds, but the two generally prevailing factors have been the cry for economy in the rates and the anti-Socialist movement promoted by the Conservative leaders, and manipulated by unscrupulous local politicians so as to confound extreme Socialist or Anarchist views with Liberal policy or tendencies. The tactical idea of this campaign appears to have been, as Mr. McKenna put it, to set up the House of Lords, now a trifle in the shade, as the only barrier against "free love, atheism, and highway robbery."

* * *

THE returns of the Duma elections are now almost complete. The elected Deputies number 415, and of the 27 who are still to be elected more than half are likely to belong to the Opposition. The elected members may be classified as follows, excluding three "Independents":

Reactionary Right: 189.

Union of Russian Men, 34.

Monarchists, 40.

"Right" (unclassified), 115.

Conservative Centre: 109.

Octobrists and Moderates, 88.

"Progressives," 21.

Liberal Centre: 73.

Constitutional Democrats, 31.

Polish Nationalists, 42.

Left Wing: 41.

Left, 15.

Extreme Left, 15.

Social Democrats, 11.

The two first groups may be reckoned as Governmental (298), the two latter as Opposition (114). The two Centres, if they were to combine, which is improbable, would be in a minority of the whole house.

* * *

It is impossible to predict what such a Duma will do, but it is significant that a congress of Southern reactionary members has just called for wholesale measures of repression, including the revival of the field courts martial. In such demands the Octobrists would probably vote with the Right. M. Gurko, a former Assistant Minister of the Interior, has been tried for complicity in contract scandals during the Governmental famine relief work, involving a sum of half a million, and condemned to be dismissed the service—a light sentence, judged by Western standards, but still a welcome departure from the lax traditions of the Russian bureaucracy. The price of wheat is rising rapidly, and in the opinion even of such moderate men as the Constitutional Democratic Member, M. Rodicheff, the peasants are on the verge of an outbreak. It is worthy of note that the elected leader of this party, Professor Miliukoff, excluded by a trick from the two former Dumas, has at last succeeded in entering the House, as one of the members for St. Petersburg.

* * *

SIR WILLIAM LYNE, the acting Prime Minister of the Australian Commonwealth, has explained to the House of Representatives the Bill in which the Protectionist Party propose to soften the blow that the new tariff strikes at the interests of consumers and workmen. Following earlier legislation, the new Bill proposes an Excise duty on home products half as high as that imposed on imported manufactured goods. From this duty all Australian manufacturers are to be exempt who can show the Commonwealth authorities a clean bill of health with regard to their treatment of labour. A new State tribunal called the Board of Excise is to be created, with full powers of inspection, and this body is to determine whether, in Trade Union language, each manufacturer keeps a "fair" house. If his labour conditions are up to the Board's standard, the manufacturer will have earned his right to have his goods stamped with the Commonwealth trade-mark and to be exempt from all Excise. This combined policy of Socialism and Protection is the Australian equivalent of the Chamberlainite proposal to combine a high protective tariff with Old-Age Pensions. It is significant that the "Morning Post," which is Protectionist and semi-Socialist, cautiously praises this policy, and the "Pall Mall Gazette" commends Australia's "close and jealous oversight of the worker's welfare." On the other hand, the "Times," reverting to individualism and almost to Free Trade, covers it with ridicule. The Australian example really explodes the new Tory campaign. The extreme severity and anti-English character of the Commonwealth tariff has gone far to destroy the hope of preferences, while the union of Protection with State Socialism alarms the old Tories and discredits the use of the anti-Socialist movement as a weapon against Liberalism.

* * *

MEANWHILE, Mr. Balfour is to be asked, or forced, to declare himself for Tory democracy, coupled with Protection. Sir Frank Gould shows him, in the "Westminster Gazette," as a scared rabbit, halloed and driven into the open by a band of Protectionist beaters, who include Mr. Austen Chamberlain, Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Maxse, of the "National Review," and Sir Howard Vincent. This is a literal description of Mr. Balfour's plight. The Conference of the National Union of Conservative and Constitutional Associations is to be held at Birmingham, the sacred city of Chamberlainism. There, in the Chamberlain citadel, Mr. Balfour is to be forced into the Chamberlain policy. The first resolution on the agenda is to be moved by Mr. Chaplin, who proposes to declare that "the first constructive policy of the Conservative Unionist Party should be the reform of our present fiscal system," on strict protective lines. Mr. F. E. Smith proposes a modified programme of preferences and taxation of foreign goods "for purposes of revenue." But the bulk of the following resolutions are both protective and democratic, i.e., directly anti-Balfourian, for Mr. Balfour, if anything, is an anti-democrat, and has at least declared himself an anti-protectionist. Even Socialism, Mr. Goulding suggests, can only be met by a "constructive policy," especially by old-age pensions. The Central Committee also declares that Socialism must be dealt with by "impressing on the working-men that Social Reform is, and has always been, one of the chief objects of our party."

* * *

MR. HEARST'S irruptive personality, and sensational tactics have been checked at the American elections, whose chief interest for the outside world is their bearing on the Presidential contest. In New York and elsewhere Mr. Hearst and his cohort of newspapers "fused" with the Republican organisation against Tammany, whose aid he sought last year when he stood for the Governorship. His campaign was fought on anti-Trust lines, but in alliance with the party which he denounced as dominated by the Trusts. Tammany seems to have beaten this strange combination to the ground, and to have regained its old ascendancy. Mr. Hearst's rivals in the newspaper world declare that he is completely discredited. But he is a destructive force in American politics, and should he ally himself with Mr. Bryan, he and the anti-Trust policy may bring a Democratic President into power.

* * *

THE sensational voyage of the "Lusitania," laden with gold, to New York, appears to have been also the quickest on record, in spite of the rough weather. She crossed the Atlantic in 4 days, 19 hours, 10 minutes—42 minutes less than she took to complete her best voyage in October. It appears that the Mauretania is even a faster vessel than her consort, and a four days' passage to New York may soon be regarded as normal.

WE do not know why statesmen rarely think it necessary to be accurate when they appeal to history. Mr. Lyttelton, after kindly admitting last week that "certain things can be done by municipalities," committed himself to the strange statement that these were "such things as our forefathers did not think possible." Mr. Lyttelton cannot have been referring to the mere fact that electricity, steam power, telephones, and the discoveries of modern science were not known to our ancestors. And it is equally difficult to believe that he did not know that all that these discoveries represented to our ancestors, and much more, was quietly and as a matter of ordinary routine, "done by municipalities." Let him turn to such an easily accessible book as Mrs. Green's "Town Life in the Fifteenth Century," and he will find example after example. In Mr. Gomme's recently published "Governance of London," he will see how the London municipality dealt with every phase of citizen needs, including many which have now been transferred to the domain of private enterprise. Let him consider how the Lord Mayor of London dealt with the question of "the extreme dearth of provision" in 1796, and how, in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries the proper provision of corn for the citizen was one of the common trading enterprises of the towns, and he probably will not wish to repeat this absurdity.

* * *

THERE is certainly nothing funereal about the pictures in the autumn exhibition of the New English Art Club. The illusion of sunlight, or at any rate daylight, reigns supreme. Mr. Sargent leads the way with a figure group in a landscape, "The Fountain," a canvas palpitating with southern sunshine, and his two other pictures, the cool but brilliant "Moraine" and "The Brook," are hardly less masterful expositions of light and air. Mr. Wilson Steer, in his "Grand Place, Montreuil," Mr. Fred Brown in both his pictures of the same town, and Miss Alice Fanner, who is more emphatically "pleinairistic" in her studies of the Thames, follow the same track, and Mr. Henry Tonks strikes an even more intense note of brightness in his medley of rose and white, "The Birdcage." The average merit is high, in spite of the fact that several members of the "old guard" do not contribute; and most of the works, whatever their individual imperfections may be, convey a pleasing sense of vitality and seriousness of aim. As usual, there are several admirable drawings, and a few which are difficult to understand. Mr. Muirhead Bone's landscapes in pen and wash on brown paper, the water-colours of Mr. A. W. Rich, and one drawing, "The Riverside," by Mr. A. E. John, may be remarked among those that combine fine art with complete intelligibility.

* * *

THE autumn exhibition of the Royal Society of British Artists, which was opened to the public last week, is exceptional in that it is devoted to cabinet pictures. The departure, however, does not seem materially to have affected the character of the show, or to have altered the balance of ability, as displayed in its immediate predecessors. We find, in fact, that landscapes are still the dominant feature, to the exclusion of figure work of any importance, and that the leading artists continue to lead, while the rear-guard stragglers preserve their usual position a very long way behind. The influence of Mr. East's taste and practice is seen in the central gallery, where, as usual, the pick of oil-painting is to be found; for here the canvases are almost universally low in tone; the principal exceptions being those of Mr. Dewhurst, the exponent of the Monet method, Mr. W. B. Thompson, a recent convert to the same persuasion, and Mr. Foottet, the exponent of himself.

* * *

[The Index to Volume I. of THE NATION is now ready and can be had free on application to the Manager.]

Politics and Affairs.

THE SEVEN YEARS' PEACE.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE, in his settlement of the dispute between the British railway directors and the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, has won a victory such as few modern statesmen are able to achieve. He had to deal with a powerful and singularly obdurate mass of opinion in the world of politics and capital on the one side, and with a determined and steadily growing movement of Labour on the other. The railway directors with whom he dealt were practically all strong Conservatives; the railway men were certainly not all sympathetic to Liberalism. His success as a diplomatist has been that, using a device familiar to students of Napoleon's battles, he has suddenly turned the face of the controversy, and yet has given it a solution with which both parties express content. That, in itself, is a brilliant tactical feat, and it will go to the credit of his party and his Government that Liberalism can bring to the service of British industry and British labour an intelligence and an alertness of method which were conspicuously wanting to the rule of Mr. George's predecessor at the Board of Trade. But we do Mr. Lloyd George no disservice when we say that he had behind him a power that neither the directors nor the servants of the railway companies could resist, when a man of energy and readiness of mind employed it. We may well pay a tribute to the moderation of view and temper which has facilitated the settlement. But Mr. George's strength lay largely in his ability to say to the directors and to the railway servants, "There can be no strike. The country will not have it, and the Government and Parliament are bound, as its representatives, to stop it and ensure a settlement. If you, the directors, will not recognise the Unions directly, you must recognise them indirectly; if you will not have formal recognition, you must have conciliation; conciliation implies arbitration; and if you cannot set up a scheme of arbitration for yourselves, the State will do it for you. And if you, the railway-men, can get the right of representation, you must not look too minutely at the way in which you secure it." To the State and its care for the interests of the community as a whole both parties in the dispute have come. The true line of development in our Colonies and in our own leading industries has been taken, and the iron roads of the kingdom have been kept open at a very critical period for British industry.

These are important and far-reaching results, and the country, the railway shareholders, and the workmen may well be congratulated on securing them. What is their precise bearing on the dispute? It is not unnatural to say that, so far as the formal recognition of Trade Unionism is concerned, the victory lies with the railway directors. The terms of settlement do not proceed on the lines of Australian Arbitration—that is to say through a continuous recognition of the Trade Unions. They do not mention the Amalgamated Society, and Mr. Bell, whose faultless demeanour and admirable methods have secured a substantial improvement of the conditions of the entire body of railway servants, Unionist and non-Unionist, will not himself have access either to the Sectional or the General Conciliation Boards. On the other hand, the principle of "collective bargaining," which is the basis of Trade Unionism, is not only to be recognised, but forms the framework of the scheme. The railway servants, divided into sections, are freely to choose their representatives on the Boards. Can it be doubted that when the elections for the two kinds of Boards take place their choice will largely fall on Trade Unionists and even on Trade Unionist officials? Organisation and special knowledge will tell, and, as a matter of fact, the local secretaries of Mr. Bell's Union, and also the general executive, so far as it consists of railway servants, will all be eligible to sit. The men can appoint their Chairmen at the Boards. They will unite with the companies in paying the cost of the new organisation, so that they become equal parties with the railway directors in the conduct of these informal suits. They will have a regular right of examination of their grievances, and, finally, the power of calling for a decision upon them. And it is clear that in the event of arbitration they can be represented by a skilled agent outside the companies' service. The men are free to choose their own pleaders and advisers, counsel being alone and very wisely excluded. We do not see that the Arbitrator can refuse the assistance of Mr. Bell, and a final settlement of a railway dispute would naturally follow, in the main, the lines which obtain in the case, let us say, of the cotton trade, save that in its earlier stages the Union, quâ Union, does not come in. We understand, indeed, that the Committee of Chairmen had in view Mr. Bell's admission to the Arbitrator's Court during the negotiations with Mr. Lloyd George.

On the whole, therefore, it is fair to say that, in substance, if not in form, Mr. George's settlement gives to Trade Unionism precisely the force which its numbers entitle it to wield in the general body of railway servants, and which is reconcileable with the claims of discipline. It will also possess the prestige of having supplied both the generalship and the fighting line in the battle. But in spite of these very considerable advantages, if the Lloyd George settlement had been devoid of the element of arbitration, we would certainly have said that it was a bad one for the men, for the decision of matters raised at the Conciliation Boards would have rested with the directors, and from it there could have been no appeal. Now the men have on their side not only the general spirit of amity and reasonableness that so often presides over a conference table, not only the sense of sitting on equal terms with their employers, but also the definite protection of law. The choice of an Arbitrator is given over, should the two sides fail to agree on a name, to two men of singularly fair minds and calm judgments, namely, the present Speaker and the Master of the Rolls. The railway servants, indeed, have gained three points. They now know that their complaints will be attended to instead of being merely shelved. They know that they can freely discuss them with the heads of their company over a table in the light of day, and, as an Arbitrator always gives something, they may also feel that there exists a definite security for a steady improvement of their lot. This strikes us as something better, more tangible, than the abstract right of "recognition." That would merely imply the power of stating grievances. The Lloyd George settlement carries with it a regular machinery for adjusting them. If we were railway directors we should feel that this sense of security on the part of the men was a very considerable asset, and that the seven years' peace which the Treaty secures afforded a breathing space of which wise superintendents of the great railway business would gladly avail themselves. The scheme would be strengthened by a machinery for enforcing the decrees of the Arbitration Court, but this, we imagine, the State can always provide.

These seem to us to be the immediate morals of this notable action of the State, which is approved, with one or two insignificant exceptions, by the entire Press, Conservative as well as Liberal, as a fair and proper intervention of the governing power. There are some less obvious considerations, which we hope will be borne in mind. The work of Mr. George happily undoes the impression of almost complete impotence on the part of the Board of Trade, which Mr. Gerald Balfour's failure in the Penrhyn business set up. We have probably seen the last of Penrhynism. The Conciliation Act has been set on its legs again, or rather, it has been furnished with a new set of limbs, much nimbler than the old. Furthermore, the prestige of Liberalism, as a force both of progress and of mediation, has been enhanced. The workmen know what it would mean for them if, following very bad counsels, they heedlessly contributed to bringing back the Tories to power. The source of strength for Mr. George in his negotiations with the railway directors was his knowledge that a democratic Parliament, with a Liberal-Labour majority of about 250 votes, was ready to back him in bringing in an Arbitration Bill, and that the House of Lords could not have resisted its passage. Such a Parliament was not brought into being by chance. It rests, no doubt, on Free Trade, but its main strength is the informal understanding between serious Progressive Liberalism and the Labour Party. So long as this view holds, Toryism, and especially Mr. Balfour's type of Toryism, will not come back to power. But the Labour Party would be unwise either to discredit Liberalism or to act as if it could dispense with a sympathetic middle-class Party, or could even replace it. It can do neither. The truth is that British democracy needs a vigorous medium force, such as Liberalism of the right sort supplies. The general public need it also, for, if we are not mistaken, the problem of the railways, one of the most acute and complicated in British industry, having once been opened, cannot be allowed to rest without a full solution. The workers have attained their status; now arise the grievances of the trader, the crux of through rates, the multiplication of officials, which weights the chief competing companies and drags down their earning power. Mr. George has saved the country from a railway strike; he has now to save the railways from themselves, and to make them the ally instead of the enemy of British trade.

THE USE OF THE TAR-BRUSH.

It is always difficult to determine the bearing of municipal elections on general politics. The constituency is not the same, and in municipal politics the voting of women ratepayers has probably a reactionary tendency. Nor, of course, are the issues the same. Men with the most foolish and perverse views of great national questions, which they only misapprehend through the medium of the daily Press, may be thoroughly sensible and practical in dealing with the parish pump, whose cranky handle is plain for all to see. Nearly everybody is a Progressive in things that he really understands, and everybody is either a Tory or a blind revolutionary in matters beyond his comprehension. In any case, neither the electors nor the elected, neither the constituency nor the issue is the same in municipal and in national politics, and hence it is that in London, for example, the long Conservative regime coincided with a persistent Progressive majority, and just when, through the advent of a Liberal Government to office, the Progressives obtained at last a fair field, London swung round and put the Moderates in power by an unexampled majority. But without attaching undue weight to the Conservative successes at the municipal elections, we cannot blind ourselves to the fact that they do disclose a certain trend of general opinion, and do bear witness to the success—at any rate the temporary success—of the astute tactics whereby the Conservative Press has with one accord united in a campaign against Socialism. The methods of the campaign are perhaps such as to do more honour to the head than to the heart of the campaigners. They consist in dipping the brush in the blackest tar that can be found in the whole world of Socialism, and then drawing it freely, not only over all Socialists, but over anyone who has ever been seen talking to a Socialist. For example, one or two Socialists do not believe in God. Then all Socialism is Atheism, and Liberalism coquets with Atheism. Some Socialists are critical of the present marriage law. Therefore Socialism is another word for Free Love, and Liberalism is a first step to the disintegration of the family. To any one who takes this for caricature, we commend the following paragraphs, taken from the address of a certain Mr. G. M. Chamberlin to the Conservative electors of Norwich, who apparently act under his enlightened leadership:—

"Broadly speaking, Socialism demands the doing away with the Army and the Navy, the repudiation of the National Debt, the abolition of the Throne, the destruction of home life, the separation of mother from child, and the negation of God.

"The Liberal Party to-day is powerless to combat this evil; for party purposes it has coquetted with these extremists, and is locally to a reprehensible extent responsible for its rapid growth.

"It is to the Conservative Party, the party of Preservation, that the electors must look to fight and defeat this evil, imperially and locally."

Doubtless Mr. Chamberlin believes all these things about Socialism. He and thousands of others with him take these statements from a Press which has ceased to regard the distinction between truth and falsehood as relevant to the conduct of business, and they do not dream of testing such assertions by enquiry into the facts. They do not even ask themselves whether it is intrinsically probable that a large and increasing section of their fellow-countrymen should hold this entire body of extreme ideas, nor, if so, whether it is probable that the party in power, representing the great majority of the electors, should, as they allege, coquet with them. The mere word Socialism throws them off their intellectual balance. The word is for our mob-psychology the equivalent of the Pro-Boer of seven years ago.

The implied logic of the anti-Socialist campaign is an interesting study. On analysis it seems to rest on a new axiom, for which the Press-campaigners may take credit to themselves. "People who agree in one thing will agree in any other"—this seems to be the cardinal assumption of this new logic. Hence the process of disparagement becomes extraordinarily easy. For example here is A, who disbelieves in God, and who calls himself a Socialist. Here again is B, who is also a Socialist. Clearly B agrees with A. But A does not believe in God, therefore B does not believe in God. It does not matter that B is perhaps a High Church clergyman of extreme zeal and piety. The logic is inexorable. He agrees with A, and A is an Atheist. By the same logic B, being a Socialist, is in favour, among other things, of Old Age Pensions, and C, an advanced Liberal, is also for Old Age Pensions. Therefore C agrees with B. But B is a Socialist. Therefore C is also a Socialist. And it has already been shown that a Socialist is an Atheist. Therefore an advanced Liberal is an Atheist. Which was to be proved. Corollary:—By the same argument it may be proved that any Free Trader is an Atheist, an advocate of Free Love, and bent on separating the mother from the child.

Now, whether a campaign which in logic rests on nothing much better than the sorites which we have set out will succeed with the English people remains to be seen. Probably such misrepresentations get their way at first, and are seen through when people have had time for a little cool reflection. But that there is a real reaction in municipal politics is hardly in dispute. It showed itself only too plainly in London last autumn, and again this spring. The cry of the middle-class householder is still to keep down the rates, and as long as the rating system remains unreformed, the weight of the middle class, which, by its position, should be preponderantly Progressive and Liberal, will be in the main thrown into the scale of cheap administration at all costs. A reform of the rating system which will place a proper share of municipal burdens on the owners of site-values is the best bulwark which Liberalism can raise against this particular form of reaction. For the rest, its business is to go forward undeterred in the path of Social Reform. Many of the things which it will have to do will be called, and may fairly enough be called, Socialistic. For Socialism is so loose a name that it can be applied to all action by the State, and to all measures designed for the relief of poverty or for the equalisation of opportunity. But people who are frightened by this bogey of the word, nevertheless, like the thing well enough when they see it in the concrete. The rose by another name smells, in this case, a great deal sweeter. Only the other day we saw an excellent Conservative member putting forward as a means of combating Socialism a list of Socialistic measures so extreme and so numerous that Mr. Keir Hardie might have paled at the thought of propounding them to the House of Commons. The English people—not the Scottish—are frightened by abstract terms and general principles, as men are frightened by anything which they do not understand. The Press has succeeded in working upon this alarm and creating an excited state of mind in which people see the Social Revolution and the guillotine behind a measure for giving lunches to school children. The business of the Liberal Party is to press steadily forward undeterred by the scare, unmoved from the course of social amelioration marked out by its leader in his great speech before the General Election, and to rely on temperate argument, cool reflection, and the working experience of the measures which it carries, to allay unreal alarms and confute a dishonest agitation.

THE PANIC AND ITS MEANING.

WHAT is the meaning of the American panic? Whence did it come, and whither is it going? Is it merely the result of bad currency laws, or is it due to bad banking, or to over-trading? Or is it Wall Street that has done the mischief? What is the actual area of the disturbance, and is it likely to spread beyond the borders of the United States? These and a host of other questions crowd upon the mind as we read telegram after telegram with records of "runs," and suspensions, and failures, and reassuring statements, and cheerful prophecies. Since the theatrical run on the Knickerbocker Trust the situation (to the newspaper reader) has always been "well in hand," and Mr. Pierpont Morgan, with the patriotic aid of Mr. Harriman and Mr. Rockefeller, has saved the country two or three times a week. It is astonishing how many favourable factors have been at work. There has been the Treasury relief afforded by Mr. Cortelyou, the financier's pool for doling out money at 20 per cent. to Wall Street, the all-night sittings of semi-respectable magnates at Mr. Morgan's house, the Clearing House Committees with their certificates in lieu of cash, the decent and circumspect conduct of the Yellow Press, and the brilliant flash of silence contributed by the President of the Republic. But even this last great gift has been offered in vain on the altar of sentiment. "All will be well if Roosevelt will be silent" was the general cry of Wall Street last week. He has been silent for several days, but all is not well. Perhaps we may infer from this circumstance, following the law of logic known as concomitant variations, that the great panic which has already closed so many banks and Trust companies, which is shutting down factories and business houses in all parts of the United States, is not the work of President Roosevelt, though, doubtless, his jingo policy and huge programme of naval expenditure have added to the public nervousness and detracted from the public credit. The weak side of Mr. Roosevelt's denunciations of the Trusts has been not their tendency to alarm investors who ought not to be alarmed, but their failure to deter rogues who ought to be deterred.

We do not propose to attempt an answer to all the questions we have put. That would require a volume, and the volume could not be written until the panic was over and all the facts collected. But we have enough material to confirm the opinion freely expressed in the last few days that the crisis is in many respects a reproduction (on an even larger scale) of the great panic which swept through the States in the autumn of 1873. We know how that arose after a period of feverish activity following on the War between North and South. The capital destroyed required several painful years of stress and strain to replace. The renewed activity of trade and agriculture attracted capital from England, and, as capital poured in, the demands of promoters increased. There was speculation and speculation. More capital than the world could safely spare was fixed in railway construction, and we read of enormous quantities of railway bonds being floated on the Eastern market. The rate of interest had also been rising year by year. In the summer of 1873, a Granger agitation at the West frightened investors from the railway securities, and brought distress both upon the new railroad enterprises and upon the bankers who were negotiating railway securities. On September 8th, the New York Warehouse and Security Co. failed, followed by two or three banking firms with railroad enterprises on their hands.

Then a run for legal tenders began at New York, where a certain arbitrary and artificial preference or premium had been established for them. On September 18th, Jay Cooke & Co. failed in consequence of a crisis in the affairs of the Northern Pacific Railroad, for which they were negotiating bonds, and to which they had made advances. A run for deposits thereupon began in the country towns, although without excitement or panic. The country banks called in their deposits from the redemption cities, and the latter from New York. The New York bankers called for it from Wall Street, where it was in use. Rates for money rapidly advanced and prices fell. On the 20th the Union Trust Co. and two or three other banks and Trust companies suspended payment. The Stock Exchange was thrown into a panic and prices collapsed, falls of twenty or thirty per cent. occurring in a few days. The New York Stock Exchange was closed for ten days as the only means of arresting the panic. This was followed on the 22nd by the closing of the Gold Exchange, and on the 20th the Associated Banks had pooled their stock of greenbacks and issued certificates at seven per cent. good at the Clearing-house, which were to be loaned for 75 per cent. of the value of the securities deposited. The amount of the Clearing-house certificates issued between that date and January 14th, 1874, at New York, was $26.5 millions; at Philadelphia, $6.7 millions. The remainder of the story may be told in the words of an American authority:—

"The President and Secretary of the Treasury were in New York on Sunday, the 21st, and refused to use any part of the $44 millions of the withdrawn greenbacks, but they ordered bonds to be bought by the Assistant Treasurer, with his cash in hand. This produced the same result, for before January 1st, over $26 millions of the withdrawn greenbacks were issued. The amount of bonds purchased was $12 millions. The situation was one really of a suspension of paper payments in New York City. There had been no panic amongst the merchants, nor outside of New York, except among some savings bank depositors. Nevertheless, the shock to credit was very deep; speculation was completely arrested; industry was checked; hours of labour and wages were reduced; and a liquidation was commenced, which lasted five or six years. The number of bankruptcies in 1873 was 5,183; liabilities $228.1 millions. The failures in 1874 were 5,830; liabilities $155.2 millions."

The most superficial observer will notice the close similarity between the antecedents of the 1873 panic and of the present one. War and excessive expenditure on railways, Stock Exchange gambling, bad currency, and worse banking—there is the whole story. Perhaps the only important difference so far is that whereas the 1873 panic began in the country and ended in New York, this one has begun in New York and spread over the States. We are inclined to think that in the present panic moral causes have had a greater share. President Roosevelt's attack on the Trusts has merely been the politician's echo of public dismay at the way in which the great rogues of business and finance have been plundering the people. It is notorious that certain railway and other magnates have been using Trust funds to assist their own Stock Exchange speculations; it is notorious that they have obtained the control of banks and Trust Companies engaged in banking for the same criminal purposes. That such roguery should prosper unpunished, defying public opinion, and even the law, was a proof of widespread corruption, and as the situation went slowly from bad to worse, it is no wonder that the public took alarm and began to withdraw deposits.

This was the beginning of the end, and the end, of course, was the suspension of cash payments by the issue of clearing-house certificates. This is the last desperate remedy, the bankruptcy of the banking system. How serious the crisis is may be judged from the fact that Chicago, which has never before made use of this miserable expedient, has now been forced to adopt it; and we should fear that the issues of these certificates will be on a larger scale than ever before. Great difficulties and hardships are, of course, being felt by trade and agriculture. In many places the crops, for want of the necessary credits, cannot be moved. In large industrial centres great business undertakings have come to a standstill. The effect of all this is bound to extend to Europe. The exports of gold to America are making money dearer than ever, and the situation in Germany is especially critical. Our own trade remains undoubtedly good. But it can hardly escape the general depression. Happily there is no reason for anticipating a banking crisis here, for most of the causes which operated in the United States are fortunately absent. But it is bad enough to be saddled with a seven per cent. bank rate (for the first time since 1873) at the beginning of winter.

THE GROWTH OF MODERNISM.

EXCOMMUNICATION is a dramatic proceeding, and the virtual expulsion of Father Tyrrell from the Roman Catholic Church by the ban of Pope Pius X. arouses a certain interest even in a country so deeply steeped in Protestantism as ours. It is no doubt a wrench for Mr. Tyrrell to find himself forcibly severed from a communion to which he is deeply attached, and which he has served so long. But it may be a satisfaction for him to reflect that the ideas he has planted in the heart of the Roman system will not perish because he has been thrust out of it. Ideas must be encountered by other ideas and not by force. As far as the vast mass of his fellow countrymen are concerned, papal excommunications have no terrors for them, and most of them, so far from looking upon Mr. Tyrrell as an object of pity, will regard his forcible emancipation as a fortunate thing for him. Henceforth, he will be able to speak his mind and deliver his message without the fear of obscure Italian cardinals before his eyes. And so far as his message is a faithful presentment of the reality of things, neither the Roman nor any other form of ecclesiastical organisation will prevent it from finding a lodgment in the human heart. The Church Catholic, according to the most authoritative conception of it in the synoptic documents is a kingdom infinitely wider than the Roman obedience. This Church, whenever Mr. Tyrrell feels constrained to speak, will be willing to listen to him, regardless of the opinions or anathemas of popes and cardinals.

Apart from its personal aspects, Mr. Tyrrell's excommunication is merely a fresh incident in the great struggle between Modernism and Medievalism which is now taking place in all sections of the Christian Church. For weal or woe, Modernism, as it is called, imperceptibly but surely and inevitably, has forced its way into the holy of holies, into the very centre of the Christian faith. Almost all the great leaders of the German Church, from Schleiermacher to Ritschl and Harnack, are men with the modern attitude of mind. In French Protestantism Modernism has produced brilliant representatives like Scherer, Réville, and Sabatier. At the present day the Scottish churches are penetrated with the spirit of Modernism, the late Master of Balliol representing one particular type of it, while the late Robertson Smith and his successors represent another. In England the minds of men move slowly. Ideas among us are often regarded as novelties when they have become commonplaces with the rest of Europe. But, even in England, Modernism has effected an entrance into the religious life of the nation both in the Church of England and among the Nonconformists. In Nonconformist circles it is rapidly gaining ground. In the English Church it has been less fortunate. No institution is so completely the creature of the State as the English Church. Its leaders are what the State chooses to make them. For the last twenty years we have had the State dominated by reactionary parties, and these reactionary parties, as is natural, have officered the Church with people of their own type. But Modernism, in spite of political and ecclesiastical reaction, is making headway in the Church of England, and is forcing the Medievalists to recognise its power. All the portents betoken the approach of a grim struggle between the forces of Medievalism and Modernism in the English Church. The Modernists are growing in numbers, they are strong in influence, they are inspired by the conviction that the spirit which has swept away medievalism in every other sphere of life will also sweep it out of its last stronghold in the Church.

It used to be the boast of the Roman Church that while every other ecclesiastical communion was rent or threatened by divisions, it alone stood forth as the great exemplar of unity and solidarity. This claim has never had any solid foundation in fact; it is now entirely shattered. In no organised church is there at the present moment such a fierce conflict between the modern and the medieval principle as in the Church of Rome. The importance of this conflict is manifest in its widespread character. It is not a mere sporadic outbreak confined to one country; its ramifications extend to every part of the Roman world where intelligence prevails. In the free and untraditional atmosphere of the United States, Modernism, in spite of papal admonitions, is steadily supplanting medieval ideals. In Germany the aim of enlightened Catholics is to reconcile Catholicism and Culture. In Italy, the younger generation of priests, supported by many of the educated laity, are working with admirable fervour and enthusiasm for a renovated and liberalised Catholicism. The Pope may fulminate against them, but they are not dismayed. They have already answered the Encyclical in which their ideas are condemned. They declare in a book which they have just published, entitled "The Programme of the Modernists," that they remain "unmoved beneath the violent accusations which the Supreme Authority of the Church has brought against them." In their view the Medievalists have reduced the Church to a mere institution existing for the sake of self-preservation. It is no longer inspired by the ideals and spirit of its Founder. It is stationary or decadent, bent only on defending a past which can never be revived. The Italian Modernists tell the Pope that the Church must speak with a new language which men of the present day can understand. The decrees of the Council of Trent, in this respect like the various confessions of Reformation times, are framed in the phraseology of medieval scholasticism, and cannot be adjusted to the mental furniture of the modern mind. The faith must be re-stated in the terms of modern thought. It must be re-interpreted so as to come home to the mind and conscience of the people. If religion can only speak in the formulas of the past, it is destined ultimately to become a thing of the past.

It is startling to hear language of this kind finding eloquent utterance in the most conservative church in Christendom. It is still more remarkable that it should proceed from Italy. Manifestations of this kind are a proof that a new spirit is at work in the Roman Church—a spirit which instinctively feels that Rome must reform or perish. In Catholic France the same spirit prevails, and finds expression in modernists' volumes, which are widely and eagerly read. A recent book by Professor Le Roy, entitled "Dogma and Criticism" is an excellent summary of the French attitude of mind. In this work M. Le Roy insists that it is fatal to the truths of Christianity to identify them with the philosophical and metaphysical forms in which they have been traditionally expressed. The creeds and confessions of Christendom were framed in the philosophy of the age in which they arose. The early creeds were framed in the terms of Greek contemporary thought; the confessions of the Roman and Protestant Churches were drawn up in the terminology of the Middle Ages. The Christian faith must not, in the view of the Modernists, be identified with the metaphysics of an extinct civilisation or with the scholasticism of semi-barbarous times. The only value which creeds and confessions possess is the religious elements in them, and these elements must be separated from the dead matter of the past and re-expressed in the living language of to-day.

Life and Letters.

A PURITAN DOCUMENT.

AMID the flood of modernism that has poured over all the Churches one sometimes wonders whether here and there may still be found oases of the hard-shell Puritanism which stood forth so conspicuously in the spiritual life of the early nineteenth century. Alike in doctrine and in practice, the evangelical Churches of to-day have shifted a good deal from their old moorings. There are doubtless little groups of elderly people who still formally maintain the old attitude towards the Bible as the single, supreme, and all-sufficing guide of life alike in matters spiritual and mundane, a final and detailed declaration of the will of God to man, who prayerfully seek guidance in temporal perplexities by a literal interpretation of its text, and are disposed to read even the minor events of contemporary history in the light of Scriptural prophecy. But so remote is all this from the main stream of the spiritual life of the people to-day that a halo of quite antiquarian interest surrounds for most of us the story of the early religious austerities of the Clapham sect, in which Macaulay spent his boyhood, or the tight presbyterian upbringing of John Ruskin, and the not less distinctive puritanism which underlay the agnostic education inflicted by James Mill on his young son. Yet we know that even among persons of education and social standing little Calvinistic sects arose, compared with which the religious tenets of Zachary Macaulay or Mrs. Ruskin were liberal to laxity. Of the Sandemanians, William Godwin, himself bred in the faith, said that whereas the Calvinists doomed to perdition nine-tenths of their fellow-Christians, the Sandemanians dedicated to the same fate nine out of ten Calvinists. Yet this sect commanded the adhesion of so great a man of science as Michael Faraday. Could such a case be possible in England to-day? We doubt it, and the reasons for our doubt are presented in one of the most curious and impressive spiritual documents given to this age.

There lives to-day among us a well-known literary man, whose identity is thinly veiled in the autobiographic study he presents ("Father and Son: A Study of Two Temperaments." Heinemann) and whose early years were lived amid the fullest rigour of the intensest form of cultivated Calvinism. His father was a distinguished naturalist of the pre-Darwinian era, his mother a learned woman with a distinct literary gift, the writer of volumes of acceptable poetry. Both had withdrawn themselves from the more conventional forms of Protestantism in which they had been reared, and, dispensing with pastor or ritual, joined with a few other extreme Calvinists to form "the brethren," to whom the descriptive title "Plymouth" was afterwards applied.

With a vivid and convincing memory the writer tells the outer and the inner story of his early years, a solitary child with parents absorbed in a dull passion for a joyless spirituality, bounded by hard and almost mechanical conceptions of "grace," and a divine dispensation in which every trouble or mishap was a "visitation," and every good external thing an "uncovenanted mercy." Their one recreation lay in interpreting the "prophecies": society, even of the Saints, they steadfastly eschewed, and they watched over their little son, devoted from infancy to a holy life, with a deadly solicitude. Here was a boy of eager, active, imaginative mind, forbidden to read Scott's novels or Shakespeare's plays, because they were "not true," and nurtured upon Newton's "Thoughts on the Apocalypse." Even at a later period, when subtle inroads had been made on these early austerities, "My father prayed aloud with great fervour that it might be revealed to me, by the voice of God, whether it was or was not the Lord's will that I should attend the Browns' party." What was a sensitive, well-trained, but human boy to do in such a case? "The Lord says I may go to the Browns." Yet mark how retribution took him at the Browns. For recitations were the vogue, and after one boy had rendered "Casabianca," and a little girl had given "We are Seven," he stood up at call and began a favourite passage from Blair's "Grave."

"If death were nothing and nought after death—

If when men died at once they ceased to be—

Returning to the barren Womb of Nothing,

Whence first they sprang, then might the debauchee"—

"'Thank you, dear; that will do nicely!' interrupted the lady with the curls."

The progress of the story, the struggle for moral liberation in the boy, is set forth with a strength and delicacy which will secure for this book a distinguished place in the spiritual literature of our time. The writer has managed to convey the truth that even these oppressively austere parents contained in the very nature they imparted to the boy fragments of liberty and even levity which might have made them human. Indeed, the understream of tender parental affection is everywhere apparent, and its frustration in the chill of Calvinist practices strikes a powerfully pathetic note. It would be easy to stir amusement and indignation by a recital of the monstrosities to which the logic of this Puritanism led its devotees. But without quenching these emotions in the reader the author has achieved the higher and better end of arousing and maintaining sympathy with the striking and heroic character which a creed so repulsive in its main aspect was able to support. Such fortitude, such utter submission to a higher will, as is conveyed in the slow passing of the mother in her mortal malady, is assuredly the finest confrontation of the enemy, save one, possible for man. That one is the calm, unreflective acceptance of death as a simple fact in the course of nature which, as Whitman shows, may come when we have ceased to worry about our souls and to busy our brains about insolubles. Meanwhile, such a triumphantly spiritual attitude must win that admiration which in an age of hesitation and of torpor attaches to all who have powerful convictions and the courage of them. Such attitudes are two. There is the spiritual socialism of a Catholic Church, where the individual soul, nay, the entire generation, is subject to the absolute authority of a single central will, a perennial fount of living inspiration: there is the individualism of that extreme Protestantism which throws on each soul the full obligation of its separate dealings with the Eternal Spirit. That there is something unsufficing and inhuman in the fierce absorption in the saving of our private soul is the very spirit of that modern humanism which, far more than textual criticisms or scientific doubt, has broken the ancient moulds of Puritanism.

The significance of "Father and Son" is that it exhibits this criticism dramatically in a life story of surpassing interest. We see how the new Humanism, sown unseen in the secluded and protected garden of this young soul, grows until it comes to master and uproot the authority of the father and the imitative spirituality imposed in childhood.

The primary object of the book is not, however, autobiography; that is rather incidental to the process, though the delicacy and the pathos of its workmanship gives it often the dominating interest. The unfolding and liberation of the boy are the means of exhibiting the temperament of the father, and through him the nature of an entire phase in the religious life of our people.

In not a few biographies of the last generation, in a few works of true fiction, notably those of "Mark Rutherford," we have interesting glimpses of Puritan survivals in the social atmosphere in which they lived. But nowhere have we so full and firm a portraiture of latter-day "Saints" with a commentary contained within the portraiture itself. As one reads through the story to its end, with the sigh of relief with which it is set down, there comes the recognition of a "great deliverance." Never again, one is fain to believe, in this land, at any rate, will the tender soul of a young child be bound under such spiritual irons. Endeavouring to assess the import of the changes in the outer and inner conditions of a generation, we are disposed to think that greater than all gains in material well-being, in the command over nature which science has brought, in the extension of knowledge and of intellectual education to large masses of the people, is the rescue of the souls of our children from the blighting superstition which is read in terrible distinctness in the frontispiece of this remarkable book.

For there can be no doubt that even in the stricter evangelical communities of to-day the old puritanical bonds both of creed and conduct are perishing. Sunday reading is no longer rigidly defined; even the barrier between sacred and secular music is becoming blurred; Sabbath demeanour and behaviour even in religious families are not what they were. Through a score of secret avenues of art, literature, recreation, and social intercourse, the cold gloom of the older Sunday has been warmed and brightened for young people. The bicycle, the adult school, and the Pleasant Sunday Afternoons have done far more than "the higher criticism," or any sort of rationalistic propaganda in this work of liberation. The old rooted antagonism dramatised in our history three centuries ago by Puritan v. Cavalier has not indeed yet disappeared, finding its last representatives, as one of our most brilliant social analysts suggests, in the modern music-hall and the Salvation Army, "the hooligan howl" and "the hooligan whine." It is the work of modern humanism not to destroy but to reconcile. Though the dogmatic literalism, the mechanical logic, and the ascetic practices of the older Puritanism have yielded much to the influence of sweetness and light flowing from sources of freer culture, they still furnish invaluable elements of stiffening and austerity in the national character. Indeed, the conflict between spiritual earnestness and the powers of wordliness, license, and indifference still continues unabated, though the arena of struggle has shifted so as to give larger place to social than to individual salvation, and to enforcing upon the spiritually-minded the claims of justice and good order in the scheme of earthly life as the best preparation for another. So far as the character of a people is represented by purpose, temper, and valuations, the character of our people remains puritanical au fond, a puritanism sweetened and hedonised by alien forces of "disinterested culture," but one that has rather absorbed and assimilated into its own system these ingredients than has simply fused with them. The supreme testimony to this judgment is furnished by our consistent refusal, as a nation, to treat art, literature, and the drama as seriously as science, politics, and business.

THE MORALS OF AMERICAN COMMERCE.

It looks as though some at least of the truisms that Mr. Roosevelt has tried to impress on the business men of America were at length being grasped. For six years he has dinned it into them that the plutocracy, to preserve anything, must surrender something; that in seeking to regulate capital he is not capital's enemy, but its friend; and that the Federal supervision of the big corporations is a policy conceived as much in the interests of the "magnates" as of the people. These seem very elementary propositions, but it is only within the last few days—and then only as the result of a financial panic—that he has been able to win for them any acceptance among the captains of American industry. Their conversion has an undoubted air of suddenness; but it is reluctant, and may, therefore, be sincere. It may even in time lead them on to admit, if not as a rule of conduct in "high finance," at any rate as an interesting and quite arguable theory, that honesty may after all be the best policy. This, more than any other, has been Mr. Roosevelt's chosen text. His insistence on its eternal verity has threatened at times to become itself eternal. The fact is highly significant. Mr. Roosevelt knows his countrymen far better than most preachers know their congregations, and it is not without reason and justification that he has selected honesty as the main theme of his discourses.

A strong and emancipated people, scattered over three million square miles of a continent that surpasses all others in its varied productivity, and freed from the discipline of external pressure, cannot but develop a peculiar commercial morality. All new countries that have suddenly bounded into prosperity, and whose interests pour themselves with hardly a distraction into the channels of trade, are bound to evolve a disconcerting and highly industrialised code of ethics. This is what has happened in the United States, and circumstances have made it exceptionally difficult for Americans to escape from it and to pass into a more rational and responsible state of mind. They are, however, seeking an outlet, and if it cannot be found they will be tempted to force one. That pervasive social unrest which every visitor to the United States these days is quickly made conscious of, is partly a political and partly an economic movement. But beyond everything else it is a moral movement; just as its protagonist in the White House is far more of a moralist than he is a statesman or an economist. Mr. Roosevelt's policy, like Mr. Roosevelt himself, is complex only in its scope and variety. Its essence is simple. Its source, its motive power, and its objective are one and the same. History may not be Justice as often as Schiller imagined, but, so far as Mr. Roosevelt can shape it, it will be nothing else. To see justice prevail, and, where possible, to make it prevail between man and man, class and class, nation and nation—that is his ultimate ambition. He has no Trust policy, no railway policy, no specific policy of any kind that is not referable to, and does not spring from, a moral conviction. "Right thou feeblest, rush to do," is his, as it was Emerson's, reading of "freedom's secret"; and every step he takes is an essay in practical idealism, or, in other words, an act of faith. And in this he interprets and reinforces the aspirations of his countrymen. What we are witnessing in America is a democracy girding itself to wrest its liberties from the grip of a plutocracy, the first determined effort of the American people to bring organised wealth to some sense of its obligations. The past year or two have shown how little at present those obligations are recognised. Graft and corruption in city after city, State after State; four exposures of the methods of professional finance, each one of them as iniquitous as any we have ever known on the London Stock Exchange; the insurance scandals; the revelations of the Beef Trust and the Standard Oil Company; and now an inquiry not less fruitful into the railways of the country, into the New York traction companies and into the Trust banks, seem at last to have broken down the too patient tolerance of the people.

What it comes to is that the American character, in its business relations, is on trial. The passion for wealth, operating on a country that is inordinately free from the complex conventions, restraints, distractions, and hypocrisies of older civilisations, has unquestionably dimmed the moral and fiduciary sense. America is altogether too prolific of men who occupy great commercial positions without a suspicion that they owe responsibility to the State, to their fellow-citizens, or, indeed, to anything but their own pockets. These men, in the ordinary meaning of the word, are not to be classed as "bad." The officers and directors of the insurance companies, for instance, were men not only of very great ability but of unblemished private character and with a high code of personal honesty. And yet it was proved that in their official capacities they violated many of the elementary obligations of trusteeship, came to look upon the premiums of the policy-holders as though they were their own, wasted them in excessive salaries, employed them in supporting subsidiary corporations for their own enrichment and in corrupting legislatures, and contributed from them to the campaign funds of political parties. And, what was most significant was their inability to realise, when these charges were brought home to them, that they had done anything wrong. That, indeed, is the phenomenon that really needs explanation. What causes honest Americans to do dishonest things is their acceptance of the commercialised code of ethics which they find in everyday practice around them. Why that code of ethics should differentiate more in America than in any other country from the standards of common rectitude recognised by common people, it would need a history of the American past and a prolonged analysis of American conditions to make clear. But the mere fact of its establishment as a guide to conduct renders compliance with it, on the part of otherwise upright and scrupulous men, an easy and almost insensible process. Upright and scrupulous men, in obedience to the code of their day, used to hold slaves, used to kill or be killed by a friend, used to build churches out of the proceeds of lotteries. So long as these practices were regarded as normal and proper, they were indulged in by men of irreproachable character. Directly public opinion came to condemn them, and to enact its condemnation in laws, the same men who bought and owned slaves and fought duels grew equally clear-sighted, and changed their ways. The present code of "high finance" in America works very much as the slavery code and the code duello of other days, hypnotising men of principle into unconscious compromise with its provisions; and not until public opinion declines to distinguish, with its present liberality, between corporate dishonesty and ordinary dishonesty, between what is right for a man to do as a director, and wrong for him to do as an individual, can any lasting improvement be looked for.

The obliqueness of vision which capital too often displays in America, and which Mr. Roosevelt is seeking to rectify, has consequences that we in England can hardly realise. In England, for instance, a railway is a railway. In America it may be anything that its Wall-Street directors care to make it. Very few of the American companies confine themselves to their legitimate business as common carriers; they branch out into a multitude of industrial enterprises. They acquire vast holdings in corporations engaged in the coal, oil, steel, lumber, ice, meat, live-stock, iron, and similar trades. They favour these corporations with special rates and rebates, and thus enable them to crush out competition. In this way a many-linked community of interests is built up for the purpose of fleecing the very public that has paid the cost of its erection. Nor is that all. Capitalism in America has long ceased to confine itself to mere industrialism, and a Trust that controls a railway or a staple product controls also legislatures and municipalities, newspapers, and the courts. No one sees how an influence that is entrenched and operative simultaneously at a hundred different points can be shaken off—no one, that is, except the Socialists, who are still but an insignificant power in the land. Parties that exist merely because they have existed, and that serve no more useful purpose than that of a screen for predatory intriguers; a systematic pillage of the people under the forms of democracy by the bosses and their allies, the "captains of industry"; a dehumanised wage-system, a tyrannising and unscrupulous capitalism, and a blind popular unrest—what convulsion is it that these portents foreshadow?

AN UMBRIAN REALIST.

THE great walls of the Palazzo del Municipio in Perugia happen in these autumn months to have held a specially collected exhibition of the works of masters of the Umbrian school. Among them, taken from the churches and galleries of neighbouring towns in the lovely hills and valleys in that delectable spot, is a series of pictures by Niccolò of Foligno, which are made attractive because a whole room is given up to them, and to an example or two of the painting of his master, or supposed master, Benozzo Gozzoli, with whose gay and tender art every visitor to Florence and Pisa is, or should be, familiar. Niccolò da Foligno, or Niccolò Alunno, as Vasari wrongly calls him, is a little in the shade, receiving only a few rays from the nimbus of glory that encircles the more famous of the Umbrian masters. Vasari treats him very curtly, Crowe and Cavalcaselle are singularly cold; no great body of his work exists, either in his native Foligno, or at Assisi, or at Perugia itself. Our own National Gallery happens to contain a rather small, but very characteristic, triptych from his hand, much less elaborate than the larger altarpieces to be seen at Perugia. But he is best seen in a variety of examples, which display with freedom his many curious, and apparently contradictory, habits of mind and ways of artistry, his grotesqueness, his tendency to caricature, his irrelevant humour, his piety, his sadness, his emotional sincerity, his occasional gaiety and love of pure beauty of form and colour—beauty of landscape, of the human face, of attitude, gesture, adornment, and attire. It is indeed the combination of these qualities in the same picture which strikes the casual eye; so much so, that the painter seems to be less an artist than a quaint mixture of a crying and laughing philosopher, a temperament sensitive to the misery of the Cross, but conscious, too, of its exaltation, alive to the cruelty and grimness of the human world in which he lived, and its exquisite natural setting, to the absurdity of monks and their devotion, but not always able to give these thoughts and impressions the unity to which only the greatest minds can attain. He has clearly many technical gifts; some of the smaller figures in the predellas are delightfully painted; the groups of angels recall Gozzoli's charming touch, but are more human; the modelling is excellent and careful, the expression animated, the colouring harsh and tender by turns; the landscapes, shut in with pale stretches of luminous sky, grey-blue in tint, though rather dim and melancholy, are nearly always pleasing. Yet the general effect of his work is gloomy. The careful anatomy of his nude figures—long and lean "as is the ribb'd seasand"—tends to lines of almost Byzantine stiffness. His Madonnas are aged women, full of the sorrow rather than the delight of motherhood. No vision of power sits on the worn features of the Saviour—they are drawn to an intense expression of moral, and still more of physical, suffering. But the prevailing "note" of this painter's work is something that does not appear in any other member of his school, and is conspicuously absent from Perugino, namely, a certain simplicity and energy of emotion. Niccolò has little of the powers of composition, the gift of representing energy in action, of his great contemporary Signorelli. And he has an amusing, but in the end rather irritating, triviality. Instances of this appear in nearly every picture. Thus the prophet Zachariah in a predella jerks his thumb over his shoulder at the enthroned Mother and Child, much as a London policeman favours you with a curt direction to the nearest restaurant. St. Paul hooks his finger round his nose as he lights on a favourite passage in the sacred page. One monk counts on his fingers; another holds the Gospel up to the eyes of a stout short-sighted brother in spectacles. One of the sons of Zebedee, sleeping in the Garden, visibly snores. The infant Jesus, on his mother's lap, surrounded by adoring figures, grasps a bunch of cherries offered him by an angel, and looks baby-like into his mother's face to see whether it smiles consent.

But behind and in spite of this humoristic absurdity, Niccolò can sometimes impress you with the artistic aim which governs his work—the desire, namely, to tell the story of the divine tragedy just as it affected the spectators of it, natural and supernatural. These two kinds of lookers-on are hardly differentiated from each other. Both of them grieve alike, with an equal ecstasy of uncontrolled emotion. One angel at the entombment dries his eyes with a handkerchief, another covers his face with his hands, in an abandonment of impassioned weeping. In the picture in the Umbrian Room in the National Gallery—which instantly distinguishes itself from nearly every other work in the hall by its sadness and greyiness of atmosphere—the angels who catch in vessels the blood that streams from the wounds of the Crucified do not control their sorrow. One hides his eyes; another averts his face; the third presses his hands to his ears as if to shut out the sound of the cry of desolation. Nothing of the sweet lackadaisical composure of Perugino here; no divine acquiescence in an appointed plan of salvation. The ministrant angels suffer no less than the pale, aged mother, and the lean St. Francis—whom Niccolò paints continually with scant red hair and beard, and sharp, unlovely features—clinging despairingly to the foot of the Cross. Yet the painter can exhibit dignity and restraint. Nothing can be finer than the Pietà at the head of the large triptych in the exhibition at Perugia. The mother, who embraces her beloved disciple who kisses with sad reverence the hand of his dead Master, are of the true household of grief.

But on the whole Niccolò's love of drama, devoid as it is of the serener qualities of Italian art, tends to a rather crude realism, and also to caricature. His angels, who form a crown of glory for the Madonna enthroned in the melancholy sky, are not Fra Angelico's mystic beings, withdrawn from earth into the divine companionship, but types of boyhood and girlhood such as ran about the streets of Foligno and Assisi. Now and then the painter succeeds in impressing on their simple faces an expression of rapt adoration and love; again, they are quite commonplace. His saints, too, are usually very human. His S. Felicissimo is a dandy, worthy of Carpaccio. His curls cluster neatly round his little cap, and his red tunic and black hose, his long tan-coloured boots, topped with crimson, become his smiling face and straight young limbs. St. Francis, whom he frequently paints, is always sad. And the painter's tendency to describe violent action is shown in his delightful picture of St. George, a beautiful youth, who, for all his engaging sadness of face, stamps with energy on the dragon writhing at his feet.

But the most unqualified piece of realism that the Niccolò da Foligno Room at Perugia contains, is the painter's martyrdom of St. Bartholomew. That indeed is nominally the subject of the picture, and St. Bartholomew's face, livid with mortal pain, is invested with the conventional halo. But the story is simply that of a traveller waylaid and flayed alive by a band of fifteenth century ruffians. The types are nearly all grotesque. They are not unlike Cruikshank's, and, indeed, there are three figures that would stand very well for Mr. William Sikes, Mr. Noah Claypole, and Miss Nancy. The hardest ruffian of all, his bloody knife in his teeth, has just stripped the saint's left arm from shoulder to elbow, and his fellow, fiercely urged by the leader of the band, makes an opening cut into the right wrist. A crowd of peasant women, with coarse, sullen faces, look indifferently on. Probably the painter has seen something like it; the streets of Perugia had run red with blood in his days, and Niccolò's abrupt passage from rude fun to sadness, his tendency to depict, in his representations of the Passion, a misery in which the creatures of heaven and earth mingle their tears and grieve together as without hope, not unfitly image the fierce, thoughtless, but strangely attractive world in which he lived.

BROADLAND IN WINTER.

THE Norfolk Broads are well known to most of us as they appear in summer, when a more or less cloudless sky paints their waters blue, when there is scarce wind to make a whisper in the long wall of sedges, when the halcyon, a living azurite, dashes after its prey, or hovers, as some say, to fascinate little fish with its flame-coloured breast. Not much before June do holiday-makers seek the Broads, to speed over their watery vastness in foreign yacht or red-sailed wherry, better adapted to local uses. They find the meadows knee-deep in grass and vivid flowers, trees full-foliaged, reeds blue-green from the high tide of their sap, water lilies covering the water with tumbled leaves and opening rich cups of blossom. By the time the August tide of visitors is at its height, land-locked waters like Fritton are not only choked with larger herbage, but crowded almost to the consistency of pea soup by countless tiny animal, vegetable, and border-line atoms swimming free in it. The angler grumbles because the rivers are one jam of natural food; the yachtsman runs some risk of getting becalmed in the middle of Wroxham or Oulton.

When the swallows have departed and the hooded crows have come back Broadland begins to put on a totally new aspect. The luxuriance of summer is first checked, then killed and cut away by nipping wind and wave. Fecundity abdicates, and, by gigantic slaughter and competition, life microscopic, small and large, is by painful stages brought down towards a mid-winter level. Superfluous animalculæ are packed into small creatures; superfluous small things into big ones; and the remainder go prowling about in the keen, clean atmosphere, whether aerial or aqueous, ravening, but enjoying life as lotus-eaters cannot do.

Broadland awakes to new and tumultuous life when great flocks of lapwings and golden plover struggle over the North Sea, to rest, dead beat, on the flats nearest to the sea, when countless small birds from the Continent come in for the winter, aptly mixed with the Norway bunting called "snow flake," when thousands of black-backed gulls, in immature and adult plumage, perch on the ronds, when, every day, the great "V's" and "W's" of ducks and geese waver across the sky, and late solitudes become populous with sheld-ducks, scaup, widgeon, pochard, golden eye, and countless other refugees from the "north wind that blows." It is then that the natives of Breydon and Oulton take down their fowling-pieces, re-ship their carronades, and launch their flat-bottomed boats for a cruise strictly on their own account. There are no longer open-handed tourists to enable one to earn an artificial living. Existence is once more based on first principles, and Norfolk is once more a pristine land in which the hunter lives precisely by what he catches.

That native naturalist of the Broads, Mr. Arthur Patterson, always has more to tell us about their winter aspect than of summer days. He has given us before a few pages of his somewhat wintry boyhood, glimpses of a naturalist's life that would amply repay the attention of a Smiles. If Broadland were not Broadland we might imagine that the struggles of his youth had endeared him to the harsher aspects of nature. But the plain fact is that winter is Breydon's season, and not to know her then is not to know her at her best. Certainly, in Mr. Patterson's latest book, "Wild Life on a Norfolk Estuary" (Methuen), his wintry pictures are the most entrancing. All the tales of his Breydoners are of wild-fowl, icily, and not seldom perilously, hunted, for Norfolk's rare visitants, so many of which Mr. Patterson has reported, very often come down to us on pitiless northern weather.

It is in winter that the wind-driven tide comes in from the North Sea, as though Neptune were annually reminded of the realm he has lost since the Romans administered an archipelago where now continuous land stretches from Norfolk to the coast. Much has been snatched from him by the forces of nature, but all along Breydon the tides chafe against man-built walls and are often for hours together high above the level of the fields within. Sometimes there is no perceptible ebb, one tide coming in on the top of another. In quite recent years more or less significant breaches have been made, and Mr. Patterson predicts, like many an old Breydoner in whom some dim wish may be suspected of being father to the thought, that some day Horsey will give way. The fact is, however, that in the still open parts of Breydon shallows and banks are growing annually more extensive, and the whole of Norfolk is no doubt being gradually raised yet further beyond the reach of the sea.

Life becomes adventurous on Breydon when the thick sea fogs roll over the flats, bringing sudden night at any hour of the day. In a few minutes the puntsman has lost his bearings. The tide may have drifted him beyond the drain he was making for or it may have taken him within it; he may be in the fairway or he may be on some mud flat that will hold him, as soon as the water falls a few inches, for a cold and miserable five or six hours. If he is wise, he anchors while he is yet fairly certain of his position. The notes of perplexed fowl come to him through the fog, and if a titlark flies overhead, its wings sound in the dense air almost as loud as the pinions of a duck. He is perhaps companioned within a yard or two by some bird that he would give his eyes to see at such close quarters. In otherwise clear weather heavy rain sometimes falls so thickly that the birds disappear at a space of a few yards, and the gentle cry of dunlins can be heard on all sides without one of them coming in sight. Picturesque as are the flying scuds, dashing the glum mirror of the Broads into white spray with their passing feet, we like better the open weather of the most bitter frost. Even the hardened Breydoner cannot stand the rain long, making for any shelter when once it has been made clear that it must be wet for a few hours on end. But when the tide runs up to the sound of tinkling ice, when the dead reeds are held fast with a frozen sheet daily stretching further over the deeps, when the boat's prow and the oars to the gunwale are thickly enamelled with frozen splashes, and the beard is hung with icicles, the gunner goes with chest bare to the diaphragm, and rejoices that he is alive.

The hardest work on Breydon is when the water is thus full of "slub." But it is then that the inland broads are sheets of ice and their winter denizens have been driven down to the still open water. The change of the tide or a sudden breeze will pack the loose particles of ice round one's boat, the contact freezing them into a sheet to which the ice-axe must be taken or a long imprisonment faced. Or a field of more apparent drift-ice may move down on some solid objective, which may be a boat, or even a moored yacht, and in a few minutes pile it yards high. At last Breydon itself freezes. Water-fowl float in safety in lakes surrounded by ice, seldom, though sometimes, molested by resourceful punts-men, who, at considerable risk, use their boat as a sledge and thus bridge the new defence. For the tides swell under the skin of ice, making it groan and crack into long fissures, and it is only a man both bold and knowing that takes a hand when Neptune and Boreas are fighting for the mastery. When the end comes and open water sweeps up and down Breydon once more we learn that the depths also have been frozen, and in the "stock ice" that comes up from the bottom are sometimes thousands of dead crabs, and for at least one season the chief pest of the eel-fisher is almost non-existent. So fares the winter through; and when in early May the cheerful cry of the whimbrel is heard, we feel as we did last year and the year before—that spring, after all, is the best of all seasons in Broadland.

Music.

MME. TETRAZZINI AND BEL CANTO.

"It was lost, the bel canto—but I found it in a dream—I, and nobody else," said Du Maurier's Svengali. Most of those who were present at Covent Garden last Saturday, when Mme. Tetrassini made her first appearance here, found it in reality. Bel canto means everything and nothing. In these modern days it is generally applied to singers of the Italian and French schools, who can accomplish a run or a roulade and do not shout. The term has come to mean something directly opposed to Wagnerian methods of singing. It is also used to distinguish the dramatic from the lyrical style, and it is employed in a still more limited sense of singers such as Patti, Melba, or Selma Kurz, whose voices can perform extraordinary vocal tricks. This virtuoso singing is not the real bel canto which Svengali thought was lost, but is a survival of the vocal gymnastics of the early eighteenth century which inspired Gluck to his reforms, and so annoyed Addison when he heard Italian opera of his day in an English translation. The singers of that time were amazing virtuosi, and made trills and florid ornaments a matter of physical endurance. Operatic arias and even the airs in Handel's oratorios were embellished with elaborate cadenzas, written by the composer or invented by the singer, just as a modern violin concerto is decorated with difficult cadenzas made by the player himself or by a professor of the violin. That mechanical singing was not the bel canto which made demure Fanny D'Arblay palpitate with excitement. Her divine Pacchiarotti could not have been a mere vocal juggler, for he moved audiences to tears. We look at the music he sang and wonder how he did it. The same kind of stories are told of the earlier singers, Caffarelli and Farinelli (whose beautiful singing cured Philip V. of lethargy). From these old stories of eighteenth-century singers it is clear that the best of them had voices with some more human quality than astonishing agility.

Melba may sing like a nightingale, and Selma Kurz may trill like a canary, but neither moves an audience to tears.

Mme. Tetrassini accomplished that by her singing in Verdi's "La Traviata." As it happens, we are able to contrast two styles of the modern bel canto school. Melba has often sung the part of Violetta in this opera, and we have marvelled at the florid perfection of "Ah, fors è lui," as it came from her lips. Tetrassini sings the same air, and we are conscious of quite as beautiful a voice, but of something else as well. Actually we are moved by the drama of the song. Again, in the scene with her lover's father, this Violetta makes the sacrifice seem real, and when in the end she dies, the inappropriate character of the music is not felt. The audience was spell-bound, whereas Melba's Violetta is never taken seriously. What is the secret of this wonderful new singer? What kind of art is music, if from the lips of one it should seem a series of beautiful vocal embroideries, and from another an utterance which expresses pathos, suffering, and sincere emotion? In modern opera, such as Wagner's "Tristan," no two singers can make such a difference by their art. The difference between the Isolde of Mme. Litvinne and the Isolde of Ternina is great, but it is a difference of degree, and not of kind. The character of the music remains the same, whereas Tetrassini makes a dramatic work of art of what other singers have employed as a medium for the display of their voices. The explanation is not to be found in the fact that Tetrassini is an actress by nature. Indeed, a great actress might make this opera appear even more ridiculous than it is, by emphasising the disparity between the drama and the music. It is rather that the vocal writing of these old operas was designed with the sole object of giving the singers full opportunities for their art. The absurd guitar accompaniment is merely a support to the voice, and does not condition the singing by expressing more emotion than the human voice can express, as in a modern music-drama. If analysed as pure music, the airs in "La Traviata" mean nothing, or are even inappropriate to the feeling of the scene, but coupled with the action of the opera, and sung by a woman who can act with her voice, they gain a new significance. The old-fashioned composer relied on this, just as the old-fashioned dramatist shaped all his scenes for the vital art of the actor. The truth is, the human voice is a most subtle and sensitive instrument, and it is just as possible for a singer to give a special emotional character to a commonplace piece of musical embellishment, as it is for the speaker to give meaning to a commonplace phrase by his tone of voice. The curious thing is that a specialist in singing would dismiss Tetrassini as the possessor of a beautiful and fascinating soprano leggero voice. He would not hear all that her audience hears. She would be classed as an operatic artist who can sing such old-fashioned stuff as "Norma" or "Lucia"; as a star-singer who attracts the public because she has a beautiful voice and no more. If that specialist became a musical historian he would mislead posterity into imagining that such a singer as Tetrassini was a vocal gymnast. Others writing of her would relate how they were moved to tears by her performance in "La Traviata," and a student of the future, endeavouring to reconcile the two accounts in the light of the music itself, might be inclined to manufacture a theory that pure beauty of sound has a curious effect on the nerve centres.

The explanation is simple enough if we remember that the singing voice is just as capable of subtle inflections of meaning as the speaking voice. The trouble is that so few singers produce their voices naturally enough to make use of those inflections, and also that few singers have any first-hand emotion to express. The art of singing is not progressing in the human quality which was the secret of Mario, of Sims Reeves, and of Jean de Reszke. In Wagnerian music-drama it is not possible for a singer to have full scope for this subtlety of inflection. Even Ternina, amazing artist as she was, could not detach herself from the complex musical machinery except for brief moments, when Wagner allows the voice to speak for itself. Jean de Reszke did wonderful things with the music of Tristan, but he had to surrender to the demands of Wagner's musical style. That singers should be thus imprisoned after being allowed a freedom which had become licentious was natural enough, but it may well be asked if their fetters are not too heavy upon them. When you feel the magic of a singer such as Tetrazzini you must wonder why composers of opera have thrown away so powerful a weapon, and why they have not understood that in building up emotional climaxes of absolute music they have banished from the voice the accent of sincere and unforced feeling. There must be some aesthetic mistake in an art which does not make better use of its material. It is not right that a Ternina should destroy her voice and her nerves in singing music which demands more than a voice can give; it is not right that a Tetrazzini is compelled to sing the trash of Donizetti, Bellini, and Verdi, or, at the best, the stucco-Wagner of Puccini. The bel canto should have its place in modern opera; the most beautiful qualities of the human voice should be given full expression.

Present-Day Problems.

THE RUIN OF MACEDONIA.

WHEN I visited Bulgaria, a cartoon had recently appeared in a popular newspaper. The one picture exhibited the French Fleet bombarding Casa Blanca. "Seven Christians have been killed," ran the legend; "we must bombard the town and occupy the territory." The other showed the European Concert contemplating the dead bodies of Macedonian peasants. "Seven thousand Christians have been killed," was the announcement. "We must address another note to the Sultan."

At Salonica and Constantinople, in official and diplomatic circles, there still seems cherished some faint hope that the so-called "Reforms" are gradually to evolve order out of the present chaos, security out of the prevailing violence. Immediately the traveller gets away up country, and remote from the beaten track, he finds this qualified optimism vanishes. The universal testimony—from the European officers, from Consuls, from missionaries, even from the more enlightened Turkish officials who see and deplore the inevitable end—is of a steadily increasing disorder and despair. The years of "the Reform" have been far worse than the years of the "Insurrection." That hurricane of repression slew its thousands: the "Reform" is slaying its tens of thousands. Two hundred a month of promiscuous murder—men and women and children—is the estimate of Sir Edward Grey last summer. I should judge it an estimate in deficiency rather than in excess. I have before me the official figures for two districts only, out of the many into which the country is divided. That of Monastir shows eleven hundred murders last year, something approaching seven hundred in the first eight months of this. That of Uskub shows a slightly lower figure. Probably another 50 per cent. must be added—so say the officers—for murders which pass unheeded and unreported. It is a Society almost unparalleled in Europe. Parts of Russia may reveal some similar statistics; but there the innocent are mostly left alone, or only killed by accident. Revolutionaries kill officials, and are killed by them. But in Macedonia it is rarely the guilty who suffer. The harmless peasant working in the fields, his wife and sleeping children, form the staple material of the massacred. If a band kills a Turk there will be reprisals. If an Exarchist village is converted—by murder—to the Patriarchal supremacy, it is very sure that retaliation will follow. But the reprisals will descend promiscuously upon any peasants who happen to provide material for slaughter, and the "conversion" will probably operate on a community who know nothing of the causes of their disturbance.

Bands of brigands, equipped in Athens, out of money provided by subscriptions from all the Mediterranean Greek world, are devastating Southern and Western Macedonia. At present these are responsible for far the greater proportion of the murders in these districts. In the North the Serbs, though in lesser degree, and with less ferocious methods, are also engaged in similar work. Both are making war on the native population—the Bulgarian population—who are equipping scanty bands, less efficiently organised, in reply. In the towns, Mussulman "murder committees" arrange for the quiet removal of too independent Christian citizens, and for the general preservation of the Mussulman ascendancy. The Turkish troops are let loose, when occasion demands it, upon suspected Christian villages, to outrage, plunder, and slay. I saw the report of such an incident in the neighbourhood of Monastir, just before we arrived, with a list of houses sacked and of women outraged. The commonly accepted opinion—how true or false it is impossible to discover—was that the official Turkish policy favoured the work of the Greek bands. Occasionally, for a few weeks, the troops are stirred up to rigorous action against them. The normal method is that of acquiescence, so long as no Turk is attacked; and that compact appears to be loyally observed. The fact would appear to be that there are two parties at Yildiz, advocating two divergent policies. The one sees Europe scandalised by present conditions, and, fearing European intervention, and the eventual loss of Macedonia if tranquillity is not restored, urges the active suppression of these brigands. The other, reckoning upon the apathy and indifference of Europe, would encourage the Greek element (which they heartily despise) to annihilate the Bulgarian element (of which they are in salutary fear). And according as the advice of the one or the other dominates the mind of the Sultan, is there active military effort or quiet indifference at the murders, outrages, and massacres.

As to the Reforms, they have slipped down into a mere phantom of even the very moderate programme once elaborated by the European Concert. The original Murszteg scheme of four years ago promised an international gendarmerie of European officers and non-commissioned officers, with a mixed force of Turks and Christians under them. The Turks (of the rank and file) are there; the Christians have mostly disappeared. One officer told me that he had started with the original proportion, and now had one Christian left, which he was endeavouring to keep "as a curiosity." And the officers—or a proportion of them—are there. But no non-commissioned officers have arrived; the Turkish system is self-contained, complete, from the inspector-general to the humblest policeman; the Christian officers are politely left outside. They ride about the country seeing things which they revolt against, but which they cannot remedy; they send reports home to their Governments, of which only the English are published; they are filled with disgust and anger and bitterness at the whole grotesque humbug of it all. "What good are they there?" That is what the Turkish officials were asking us. That is what they themselves were asking us. In Salonica, in the official view, there is some supposed benefit in the mere presence of trained European observers, whose existence there (in this theory) will restrain the worst excesses of Turkish soldiers and Turkish Government. Against such a hope there is the real possibility of impunity being learnt in the knowledge that excesses may be committed in the actual presence of the Europeans—with no punishment or intervention. One officer told us that the very peasants were now turning against them; finding that the hopes they had entertained of protection were proving altogether empty, and thinking that the officers themselves had taken service in a system which is giving them security neither of life nor labour.

The reason for not pressing for real control was given by our Ambassador at Constantinople as being the impossibility of Moslem troops being commanded by Christians. Up country that reply excites nothing but derision. Every officer with whom I talked is quite willing to make the experiment, and quite convinced that it could be made with success. They praise the Turkish policeman, the rank and file of the gendarmes, with whom they could be on the best of terms if preserved from outside influence. They regard this answer as part of the diplomatic game which they so heartily despise.

The English at Drama have a comparatively easy task, and seem to be doing it well; though even there "it is all pleasant fooling," I was told of the Reform, "and will come to nothing." The French at Serres were less hopeful, and had noticed a retrograde movement amongst the Turkish troops. The Italians at Monastir had the most desperate problem, and one and all were vocal in complaint. Many of them had been at the work of organising the international gendarmerie in Crete, and were disgusted at the futility of their powers here, compared with the real reforms effected there. "The European Comedy" was the commonly accepted term for the so-called Reform. I mentioned this to one of the Austrian officers in the Uskub district. "It is not a comedy," he declared, "it is a farce." In the train by which we left Turkey we had as companion an officer—a stranger—who had been visiting the country. "The Reforms," he explained, with a wave of the hand, "the Reforms are all a fiction." The so-called reorganisation of the gendarmerie had been "putting a new wheel into a watch that would not go."

And if the gendarmerie scheme has broken down, the International Finance Commission is not in much better plight. It obtained recognition only by the Mitylene demonstration, and "recognition" under present conditions is all that it is likely to obtain. Its scheme of Judicial Reform is at present shelved for the alternative Turkish scheme. Its criticisms of the Macedonian Budget are destined to be received with polite and amiable obstruction. In three Cazas the appointment of new inspectors and the elimination of the tax farmer seems likely to give relief to the unfortunate peasants from one of their first and most pressing evils; but what are three amongst so many? While the Ascendency remains, while no kind of independent authority exists except that centralising at Yildiz, while army, police, judiciary, and the whole machinery of Government remain altogether outside any interference from any representatives responsible to Europe, no kind of permanent amelioration can come to these unfortunate populations.

Widespread disappointment and wonder exists to-day in the Near East at the apparent inaction of Sir Edward Grey and the English Government. It was equally manifest in Bulgaria, in Constantinople, in Servia, in Macedonia. Perhaps the coming into power of a party in England which once acknowledged Gladstone as leader excited hopes which were too extravagant. For the spirit of Gladstone and the memory of his work seem to abide in the Balkans to-day, far more fresh and alive than in the cities of his own land. But apart from these high hopes, there is open assertion that Lord Lansdowne exhibited a far more effective activity in pressing forward the work of Reform. Four years ago he had proposed a Christian governor-general responsible to the Powers. Nearly three years ago he had advocated a "Commission for the effective control of the administration of finance and justice," with "administrative and executive powers." Either of these proposals would have settled the Macedonian question. What has become of them to-day? During the two years of Sir Edward Grey's control at the Foreign Office, English leadership in this matter has been quietly abandoned. Even the increase of the Turkish Customs—a favourable opportunity for wringing concessions from the Sultan—was allowed to pass without extracting any effective return in the advancement of Reform. This paralysis of England—in a Government which is supposed to be more favourable than the Government which it had replaced—seems to be exciting bewilderment and despair. All with whom we talked—the statesmen of the little nations as well as the representatives of the Macedonians; even certain Turkish officials—protested the high part that England could yet play in the Near East; dreaded, beyond all things, the withdrawal of England's influence. "England is disinterested," was the universal expression; "England stands for humanity." And the dominant fear was of a falling back upon the "mandatory powers"; the shifting of responsibility for reform upon the two empires whose contradictory ambitions are in the main responsible for the failure to solve the problem of Macedonian anarchy.

"Your Sir Edward Grey desires peace," said a high Government official to me at Vienna. "Your new British Government desires peace." Are the interested parties playing upon England's desire for peace, as a means for ensuring England's inaction?

But the nation which has let itself be reckoned as so fearful of war as no longer to be reckonable, is the nation which beyond all others is most likely to hasten the very disaster which it is seeking to avoid.

C. F. G. MASTERMAN.

Open Questions.

ARE RICHES THE WAGES OF EFFICIENCY?

If a heavy burden of taxation is put upon the possessing classes, while large, profitable fields of industry are closed to private enterprise and others are shorn of their lucrative character by the restrictions and exactions of the State or the Trade Unions, will not the springs of industrial progress dry up?

For the history of industry appears to sustain the view that the great increase of wealth is due to the brains of the few rather than to the hands of the many. The ordinary working man works no harder and no better to-day than he did a century ago: as an individual he is no more productive and cannot claim as his right any considerable share of the enormous increment of modern wealth. That increment is due almost entirely to improved methods of industry, attributable to the initiative, inventiveness, judgment, mental and moral energy, industry, responsibility, and organising power of a small number of men—employers, capitalists, and men of science. The entire human work of industry may be placed in two categories: first, the creative energy of mind given out by these masters in devising and applying new mechanical or other scientific methods, discovering, educating, and satisfying new human wants, ordering the natural and human factors of industry so as to secure the gains of co-operative division of labour; second, the "imitative" or merely repetitive action of "base mechanics" or other labourers whose continued energy is needed to enable the creative work to fructify. The increment of wealth, due to the creative energy of the few, belongs by right to them: they may "concede"—as, indeed, they have—some portion to improve the material position of the workers; but any attempt to extort from them a larger share of the fruits of their superior intelligence and energy will stifle the incentives to further progress and "kill the goose that lays the golden eggs."

This main defence of the present economic order, popularised here by Mr. W. H. Mallock, contains great superficial strength, and Socialists have acted foolishly in not according it the serious discussion it deserves. Everyone knows cases where a single act of skilled judgment, not merely in the region of mechanical invention, but in finance or business method, the selection of new "lines" of goods, development of new markets, &c., has multiplied manifold the actual value of a business, adding by what appears a brief act of calculation or contrivance a product greater than is represented by the year's labour of a thousand ordinary workers.

This case for the superior and exclusive productivity of the few is, however, often stated too arrogantly, and some important qualifications are required.

1. The antithesis between creative and mechanical, or imitative, is made too absolute. Not one of the productive qualities claimed for the "captain of industry" is really confined to him: even in the most rigorously mechanised business a troop of managers, foremen, buyers, and other skilled persons give out considerable powers of initiative, judgment, and responsibility, while a closer inspection detects no single sub-divided function of "routine" labour from which all elements of such human rational character have been eliminated. Labour from which such qualities have really disappeared is done by machinery. The difference, therefore, between employer and employed, as regards "creative" energy, is of degree and not of kind: throughout the entire business organism many minds are continually giving out the same "sorts" of mental productivity as the "heroic" view of industry claims for the exclusive function of the master-mind.

2. Then the history of nearly all inventions shows two things: first, that the "successful" invention is only the final term of a long series of inventions, the contribution of the final inventor being usually of far less intrinsic importance than some of the earlier steps. Such inventor cannot rightly claim as "his" more than a fraction of the increased productivity which accrues.

Secondly, the person who reaps the gain of an invention is seldom the inventor; most commonly he is the business man with an "eye" for profitable inventions. This, in itself a skilled and serviceable faculty, doubtless deserves encouragement; but the whole gain of the invention is no reasonable measure of such encouragement.

This qualification is equally applicable to other sorts of industrial improvements. Innumerable persons contribute to the experimental stages; the few who put such experiments upon a "paying" basis cannot rightly claim the whole of the gain for themselves. That the present industrial order enables them to take it is a manifest injustice and a "waste."

3. A great, though immeasurable, proportion of the brains of the master-class is not productive of an increased aggregate of wealth, but operates only to secure by superior competition a larger share of business and of profit for a particular firm. If it be admitted that such successful competition normally involves some superior power of production as its basis (an assumption often notoriously false), there is no relation whatever between the amount of that superiority and the gain which accrues thereto.

4. Regarded as a defence for the current distribution of wealth, this "heroic" view of industry is also signally defective in so much as many recipients of great wealth notoriously perform none of these "creative" functions, while many poor or ill-paid persons do perform them.

But when all these qualifications or misapplications of the theory are admitted, it may still be contended that the substance of this theory remains as a solid defence for the retention of the present high remuneration of the capitalist and directing classes.

In dealing with this claim, the Socialist, especially the working-class Socialist, often commits the grave intellectual and tactical mistake of denying the full importance of these individual acts of mind as prime causative factors in the production of wealth. Rightly contending that the "value" given to these acts is "socially determined" on the productive side by the entire co-operation of all the active members of the industrial community under the protection and active assistance of the State, on the consumptive side by the existence of a growing progressive community with new needs and new desires, they endeavour, by this emphasis upon the part played by society, to disparage the importance of the individual will and the individual incentive in industry.

The real reply to Mr. Mallock is surely this: "We fully acknowledge the important part played by individual initiative and enterprise in industry; our object is to economise the incentives of such action by a better apportionment and public use of wealth, so as to evoke the maximum of this individual productivity from the largest number of individuals." Agreed that an adequate incentive of personal gain must be secured to all inventors, organisers, and directors of industry, the real issue relates to the economical application of such incentives.

If a Rothschild can show: first, that the work of financial direction he does is socially useful, secondly, that its utility is one hundred times as great as that of a clerk in his office or an engine-driver, and, thirdly, that if he is not paid this price neither he nor any other will do this work, then he should, in any well-ordered "Socialistic" State, be paid this price. But to assume that his work is socially useful, that it is worth as much as that of ten thousand clerks or engine-drivers, and that he will not take less, on the sole ground that he is able now to get this large income, is fatuous reasoning. What social reformers have to do is to show that in the present industrial order competition does not so act as to apportion incomes even roughly in accordance with the social utility of the services rendered; secondly, to attain some sort of reasonable measure of the pecuniary incentives requisite to support the higher sorts of individual effort; thirdly, to procure such reforms of industrial structure as shall apply economically these right incentives.

I am well aware that incentives may change, and that, with the development of a better social and industrial order a large amount of the sort of high mental energy now paid so exorbitantly may be got cheaply, or even gratuitously. But it is a grave error for present-day reformers either to disparage individual initiative and skill or to ignore the necessity of applying whatever differential rates of income may be required to maintain these qualities. Because the defenders of a plutocracy have exaggerated the social value of direction and organisation and made preposterous demands for payment, that is no justification for undue depreciation of these qualities. The equalisation of educational and other opportunities will go far to reduce these rents of individual ability; but so long as they exist they must be duly recognised in any system of taxation or other policy for equalising wealth.

The great waste of the present system is that it contains no adequate machinery for adjusting individual payment to individual services. Monopoly or defective competition enables many efficient to get far more than their efficiency is worth to society, and many inefficient to get high wages for a hypothetical efficiency which they do not possess. Such plethora of payment, whether it takes formal shape as rent, excessive interest, profit, or salary, acts as the reverse of an economic incentive: it drugs the intelligence, saps the personal energy of the recipient, and damages the quality of any work he does.

Social reform, whether applied through politics or not, consists in a thoughtful endeavour to discover and apply the minimum incentive for maximum personal efficiency. In so far as this is consistent with an equalisation of incomes, it is a double levelling process, levelling up and down; but when the nature of any personal effort involves a higher scale of payment, adequate provision for such discrimination must be made. But the assumption that present methods or amounts of discrimination are either just, necessary, or consistent with true social efficiency will be found unwarranted on any calm analysis of the existing methods of distribution of wealth.

J.A.H.

Poetry.

UNREST IN AUTUMN.

BESIDE my window sighs the last lone rose,
Saying, "Alas! farewell! Youth's all but dead."
Like some sweet spirit waiting for the close,
Her perfume hovers round her drooping head.

There sings a bird the yellow leaves among,
Saying "Good-bye! The world is fair to roam.
Here Winter comes; the last glad song is sung.
Art thou content to linger still at home?"

Beside my chair one came in hot unrest,
Crying "Farewell! The waters call for me,
Out on the waves—thou knowest no life so blest,"
—And I was born beside a troubled sea.

One came to sigh, and whisper of the heights,
Saying "Good-bye! For in my heart there trills
A hunter's joys, to thee unknown delights,"
—And I did play upon the purple hills.

Blown to my window see the white rose break,
And falling cry, "Too late, my hours are told."
Still trills the bird, "How wide the world to seek."
Ah, God! Ah, God! And I am growing old.

DORA SIGERSON SHORTER.

Letters to the Editor.

"SOCIALISM AND A SPOILS SYSTEM."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In his article, "Is Socialism a Spoils System?" in your last number, "J. A. H." raises objections to the practical working of Socialism, which he seems unable to answer wholly to his own satisfaction.

May I suggest that his chief difficulty, namely, that employees of all sorts will unite to extract higher wages than the public purse can afford, seems to be due to an assumption that is not necessary to the Socialist theory?

Why should the wages of all industries be paid for from a common budget? When the State is a producer, it will pay wages from the wealth it has itself produced, and not as now in the case of school-teachers and other non-producing public servants, from the proceeds of taxation. And the wealth produced by any given industry will automatically limit the wages in that industry.

A system of separate book-keeping for each trade or section of a trade would obviate the difficulty, both as regards the public purse and that of other trades.

Is it not also to be hoped that, when industry is more democratically organised, with some sort of representation for employees on the Boards of Managers, all possibility of strikes will be removed? The strike is a necessary weapon under present despotic and anarchical conditions. It will surely become as archaic as the duel when production has been brought under the rule of democratic law.—Yours, &c.,

MILDRED MINTURN SCOTT.

Finkenhübelweg, 20, Berne, Switzerland,
November 4th, 1907.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Though travelling in Spain I have THE NATION always forwarded to me.

I was much interested to read the letter of Mr. William G. Dounie, of Lanark. He says the Socialists have "clear and definite aims." That, of course, must be true, but unfortunately for me I have never been able to learn exactly what those aims are. It is probably my own fault, but it is not that I have not tried. I have read several books written by Socialists, and several Fabian pamphlets; I have heard speeches and lectures on Socialism, and have the honour of counting several earnest Socialists among my intimate political friends. I have the highest respect for them; but I have never heard or read any distinct or definite description of Socialism as advocated by Socialists. I gather that some of them desire that every machine used for the production of any material must belong to the Government. So that a man might not own privately a cornmill or a sewing machine, but he might own a piano or a fiddle. I gather no man is to be allowed to produce anything of material value for his own benefit, but he must hand over whatever he produces to the Government officials for distribution.

I gather that the whole industrial community is to be directed by Government officials, from the King downwards, through his Ministers and officers of various degrees, down to the humblest scavengers and vendors of newspapers; and that each person (except the King) will be under the orders of some superior person, and will have to do such work upon such days as he may be ordered to do.

I gather that no person will receive more of this world's material goods than any other person—the Prime Minister will get no more than the scavenger; or if there is any distinction in the amount of pay, then the scavenger will get more, because he has a less pleasant occupation.

I do not quite understand how the lazy man or woman is to be made to work, or how the over-anxious man is to be restrained from excessive work. In many respects this scheme has elements that might be paralleled in days gone by. I should be glad if Mr. Dounie would give us precisely his scheme.—Yours, &c.,

ARNOLD LUPTON.

Madrid, October 24th, 1907.

A STORY OF HERBERT SPENCER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Herbert Spencer's devotion to angling, touched upon in the current number of THE NATION, led to a strange incident. One evening two Highlanders, strolling into their village hotel, saw displayed in the hall a splendid basket of trout. "Who had caught the fish?" they asked. "Mr. Herbert Spencer, a gentleman from England," the landlord answered. "What with?" "With worm," the landlord believed. He had seen Mr. Spencer digging in the garden early in the morning. Mr. Spencer had just recently come in from the river, and was now in the billiard-room. The two Highlanders had been fishing all day with fly, and had not been nearly so successful. They thought they should try worm next day; but, alas, they had no worm tackle, and none was to be had in the village. They decided that one of them should go and ask the Englishman for the means of sport. Into the billiard-room one went then. "Maister Spencer," he said, "we ha'e seen your troots. Wull ye kindly gi'e me, for mysel' an' freen, two bait hooks?" "Bait hooks" being a phrase practically unknown south of the Humber, the philosopher was at a loss, and silent, trying to puzzle out the meaning of the request. "Wull ye gi'e me two bait hooks?" the Highlander repeated, in louder tone, and even with some indignation. "My good man," said the philosopher, "I have no bait hooks." The Gael retired, and, rejoining his companion, remarked, "Maister Herbert Spencer is a dawmed leear."—Yours, &c.,

Tayside, November 6th, 1907.

W. L. W.

SUNDAY SILENT SERVICES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Am I wrong in singling you out for a public service which many have long desired to see effected but which all recognise will bring obloquy in its promotion? We have for some time sought a journal of sufficient influence and independence to brave the earlier days of puritanical outcry but to persevere until we poor benighted residents in London have our letters on a Sunday. Such a service would later bring its own reward, and the lasting gratitude of rich and poor, high and low. It is happily not a class question, and its withholding even on religious grounds cannot be defended. A morning's delivery, such as I believe obtains in all other towns in the civilised world, cannot possibly interfere with a proper Sunday observance a bit more than the cooking of one's dinner or similar household duties which cannot be set aside even on a Sunday. It is surely a serious matter depriving anyone for a single day of correspondence. Affairs of vital importance cannot be shelved just because the Sunday intervenes. Most busy people employ their Sunday afternoons or evenings for their intimate correspondence, and vice versa they would equally appreciate having their own letters on the same day. Consider those who have sick ones away, and where every post brings intelligence of progress or otherwise.

Is the Sunday really a holiday in such cases? Numberless instances could be given of the positive hardships this day of silence imposes. It is one of the most needless and irritating of restrictions, and its continuance in the foremost city in the universe is fairly astounding. It might mean some addition to the staff of the postal authorities, but I venture to think that after a time it would be found that the extra postage would pay for it. Can anyone imagine for one moment the great railway companies suspending their service on a Sunday? Such a movement, or the want of it, would properly be opposed by Parliament. It would, however, be but a logical corollary, and defended on like grounds. It would be said, of course, "How should we be able to reach our dying ones?" for they cannot be expected to put off such trifles for the reason that their dear ones lived in London and might be engaged in religious observances.

We are hoping, Sir, for your enlightened assistance in this crying injustice, and we feel that we shall not appeal in vain. Why does Mr. Henniker Heaton fold his arms when so great a postal reform seems so imperative and practicable?—Yours, &c.,

CHARLES E. NOVERRE, J.P.

19, Serjeants Inn, Temple, E.C.

THE NEW MARRIAGE ACT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—On this anniversary of the old Gunpowder Plot I read almost two columns occupied by "J.F.W.'s" discovery of a new plot. There are doors to be slammed, it seems, and not this time at a Colonial Conference, but at some ten thousand parish churches. The bridegroom and his deceased wife's sister are to be shut out for their natural lives. Is it not rather probable that the ten thousand priests may for the most part prove Vicars of Bray? May not the pillar of fire which, although tardily, of late, and suddenly, illumined the pathway of the Archbishop, shine also for the valiant ten thousand? May not they, when facing the legal and political consequences, see that Leviticus, and Councils of Spain and Syria, never meant what we had always been taught by our spiritual guides, or are no longer binding, or are of no practical importance? I fear that "J.F.W." (who only ventures on initials) is trying to make our flesh creep. Many people are—as Church attendance testifies—quite indifferent as to the closing of church doors. Can it be that "J.F.W." is moving about in a world not realised? Does he remember the recent resolution of the House of Commons in favour not of church reform but of disestablishment? If the ten thousand do really act as he anticipates, good will come of it. Most Liberals will then gladly obey the exhortation of "J.F.W." to "raise their voices." But, doubtless, it will only be to demand that the churlish priests shall no longer be part of the civil service, i.e., of an established church. That establishment itself seems to some of us already dangerous and unnecessary, and we note that it is not tolerated by the vast majority of English-speaking communities.—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE WHALE.

Blackheath, S.E.,

November 5th, 1907.

WHO ARE MEMBERS OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Will you allow me to call attention to a point that is often missed in discussions on this subject?

Your correspondent, "J.F.W.," only says what has been said by the Church from the beginning when he claims that all baptised persons are members of the Christian Church in virtue of their baptism. But baptism is a spiritual act admitting to a spiritual relationship, independent of human laws or national divisions, and one does not see why he talks about "the legally recognised national Church" in this connection.

But he goes on to assume that whether baptised persons are "conforming or non-conforming," they are equally entitled to claim the privileges of membership. Is there any society that could exist if such a claim were admitted? Would a club member be allowed the use of the club-rooms if he never paid his subscriptions? I thought it was a fundamental principle of Liberalism that privileges involved duties.

From the beginning the Catholic Church has gone on the principle that failure to perform the duties of membership involved loss of the privileges of membership. This principle is recognised in the formularies of the English Church. Those who are admitted into the Church by baptism are not allowed to proceed to the highest of all privileges—the Holy Communion—till they have at Confirmation solemnly taken upon themselves the obligations which were assumed on their behalf by their sponsors at their baptism.

The Church has always been supposed to guide its members on questions of faith and morals. Now, the contention in some quarters is that the Church, on a question of morals, is to submit to a decision of a majority of the House of Commons, as representing the Church laity. Most members of this majority are probably baptised, but two hundred of them belong to religious organisations hostile to the Church of England, and, of the rest, some at least—probably a considerable number—disbelieve the creeds of the Church and recognise no obligation to support its work. How, then, can this majority be accepted as representing the Church of England laity?

This is not a matter in which the clergy are all on one side and the laity all on the other, as most of your correspondents seem to think. There has to be taken into account the existence of a very considerable body of "conforming" lay Churchmen, who will never allow that authority to determine the faith and practice of the Church shall be granted to those who reject her doctrines, refuse her sacraments, and lose no opportunity of depreciating her ministers and her work.—Yours, &c.,

AUDI ALTERAM PARTEM.

"A TEST CASE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In common doubtless with many others, I have read with unfeigned satisfaction your timely article with the above heading, which appeared in your issue of the 2nd inst., and which has reference to Sir Edward Grey's foreign policy in connection with the Denshawai affair.

That policy, I venture to state, in Egypt and elsewhere will, if persisted in, lead to a very serious situation. A few weeks ago I had the honour to propose a resolution at the Scottish Liberal Association at Rothesay with reference to Sir Edward Grey's attitude towards Macedonia. The resolution had previously been passed unanimously by the Tradeston Liberal Association of Glasgow. The Master of Elibank, on behalf of the Government, stated that the resolution, if passed by the Conference, would be practically a vote of censure on the Government. The effect of this intervention was that the previous question was put, and carried by a large majority. There is no doubt that if the members of the Government associate themselves with the action of Sir Edward Grey, any resolutions or criticisms which may be proposed come very near to being a vote of censure on the Government.

It is therefore all the more necessary for members of the Government, who by their silence condone such actions or policy, to consider their own position, and their responsibility to those who placed them in power. Their silence may be due to loyalty to a colleague, but surely there comes a time when the question of principle comes in.

The Denshawai affair, when Parliament meets, may be the test case of such a principle.—Yours, &c.,

D. M. MASON.

CONSCRIPTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I desire to speak with all respect of Lord Roberts as a soldier, but I am not obliged to follow him as a politician; while the mere fact that the National Service League is identified with Lord Milner and others must needs render it suspect. They are still unrepentant, and ready to repeat anywhere their South-African policy. They still stick to their anti-Russian North-West Frontier policy. They would uphold the Irish Union by force, also capital against labour. They are still pro-Turks. They were anti-French yesterday, and may be so again to-morrow. Then as to their second alleged official object, would they also support sweeping reform, social, land-tenure, &c.? Not they.

But, Sir, one must be allowed to be a Radical without being an anti-militarist extremist. In common with, I am sure, other Liberal army men, I resented the language used in your columns about army officers. Moreover, this aids the Jingo in their pose as the only friends of the Army, Whereas the reverse is the truth. For example, although the Dons are mostly bellicose ultra-Imperialists, they opposed the Oxford depôt when first started there. Why? Because of this inveterate idea that a soldier is above all other men a sinner. Not only should the regimental depôt be there, but as far as possible every territorial battalion at home should be in its own regimental district, instead of being more and more herded in isolated standing camps. Then you would hear less of such allegations as the Jingo poet Kipling's, that "barracks do not make plaster saints."—Yours, &c.,

D. SCOT SKIRVING,

Lieut.-Col. (Retired).

[The expression to which our contributor refers was withdrawn editorially in its original form.—Editor, THE NATION.]

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS.THE LIFE OF CHRIST IN RECENT RESEARCH.

By Dr. W. SANDAY. With 2 Photogravure Illustrations from a Picture by W. DYCE. 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

TUDOR AND STUART LIBRARY.

Linen-rag paper, printed with the types given to the University by Dr. Fell, 1660. New Volumes, 5s. net each.

MINOR POEMS OF MICHAEL DRAYTON.

Chosen and Edited by CYRIL BRETT.

SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS AND A LOVER'S COMPLAINT.

With an Introduction by W. H. HADOW.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF SIR HENRY WOTTON.

By LOGAN PEARSALL SMITH. 2 vols, buckram, 25s. net.

THE OXFORD BOOK
OF FRENCH VERSE:*Thirteenth Century to Nineteenth Century.

Chosen and Edited by ST. JOHN LUCAS. Fcap. 8vo, 6s. net; on Oxford India Paper, 7s. 6d. net.

THE RISE OF THE GREEK EPIC:

Being a Course of Lectures delivered at Harvard University by GILBERT MURRAY, M.A., LL.D. 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

A HISTORY OF MUSIC IN ENGLAND.

By ERNEST WALKER. 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

Oxford Library of Translations.HEINE'S BUCH DER LIEDER.

Translated by J. TODHUNTER. Extra fcap. 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net. On Oxford India Paper, 4s. 6d. net.

ANGLO-CHINESE COMMERCE
AND DIPLOMACY:*Mainly in the Nineteenth Century.

By A. J. SARGENT, M.A. 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

PROSPECTUSES ON APPLICATION.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press,
Amen Corner, E.C.

Smith, Elder & Co's. New Books.NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE FOUR FEATHERS,"

Ready on Tuesday next, Crown 8vo, 6s.,

THE BROKEN ROAD.

By A. E. W. MASON.

 A stirring tale of the British Raj in North-West India, and the character study of a native prince, and the effect upon him and his subjects of an education in England.

A Book for Children and their Elders.

READY ON TUESDAY NEXT. Crown 8vo, 6s.

With 28 Illustrations by E. T. REED.

THE UNLUCKY FAMILY

By MRS. HENRY DE LA PASTURE.

Author of "Peter's Mother," "Deborah of Tods," &c.

PROSE IDYLS OF THE WEST RIDING.

By Lady Catherine Milnes Gaskell.

Author of "Spring in a Shropshire Abbey," "Old Shropshire Life," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s. [November 12.]

 Tales of simple life, varying from the serious to the pathetic, and illustrating Yorkshire character.

MODERN GERMANY: Her Political and Economic Problems, her Policy, Foreign and Domestic, her Ambitions, and the Causes of her Success. SECOND VERY

GREATLY ENLARGED EDITION, completely revised and brought up to date. By J. ELLIS BARKER.

Small Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

[November 12.]

READY ON NOVEMBER 16,

The Anniversary of the Relief of Lucknow.
THE TALE OF THE GREAT MUTINY.

New and Considerably Enlarged Edition, including the articles on the Mutiny Cities which Dr. FITCHETT recently contributed to the Cornhill Magazine, and the Diary of the Siege of Lucknow, by an Officer's Wife, which attracted much attention in the Graphic a short time since. By W. H. FITCHETT, B.A., LL.D. Crown 8vo, 6s.

KING EDWARD VI.: an Appreciation.

Attempted by Sir CLEMENTS R. MARKHAM, K.C.B., F.R.S. With 16 Portraits. Small demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The Outlook says:—"Sir Clements Markham conveys in miniature a more vivid picture of Edward VI.'s reign than all the voluminous histories of that troubled period which have heretofore been written."

THE LIFE OF CAVOUR.

By the Hon. EDWARD CADOGAN, Author of "Makers of Modern History." With a Portrait. Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The Athenaeum says:—"Mr. Edward Cadogan dedicates to his mother, the late Lady Cadogan, a book of which that distinguished woman would have been proud."

6/- NOVELS BY POPULAR AUTHORS.MY MERRY ROCKHURST.

By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE.

SIDNEY DARK, in the Daily Express, says:—"A capitally-told story of the early days of Charles II. The final chapters, describing the Plague and Fire of London, are full of movement and interest, and the whole book is excellently good reading."

LAID UP IN LAVENDER.

By STANLEY J. WEYMAN.

The British Weekly says:—"Every one of these short tales contains the substance of a novel. We heartily commend the book to Mr. Weyman's innumerable readers."

HER LADYSHIP.

By KATHARINE TYNAN.

The World says:—"A very clever and amusing version of the ever-charming story of Love the Leveller."

THE AWAKENING OF BITTLESHAM.

By G. F. BRADBY.

The Daily Telegraph says:—"Mr. Bradby has written a masterpiece of fun on the highest level. . . . We must all be thankful to him for so exquisite, so rare, a piece of work as this."

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

WE congratulate the authorities of the British Museum on the general scheme of decoration which, after long years of obscurity, has given the beautiful proportions of the dome of the Reading Room something of the glory that rightly belongs to it. But we cannot felicitate them on their selection of the nineteen greatest representatives of British literature with which they have adorned the panels of this historic students' resort. Here they are:—

Chaucer.	Caxton.	Tindale.
Spenser.	Shakespeare.	Bacon.
Milton.	Locke.	Addison.
Swift.	Pope.	Gibbon.
Wordsworth.	Scott.	Byron.
Carlyle.	Macaulay.	Tennyson.
Browning.

* * *

As a thoroughly representative list this choice will not do at all. Too large stress is laid upon Victorian literature. Neither Tennyson nor Browning is eligible for a place amongst our immortals, and Carlyle's position is by no means established, and may be said to be receding every year. Meanwhile, the most truly representative English writer of that period, one of the most humane and the most popular of all English authors, Charles Dickens, is omitted. Still poorer are the selections of seventeenth and eighteenth century writers. Dryden is a far greater poet than Pope, and by what sound rule is Fielding, the father of the English novel, omitted, and Dr. Johnson, the author of the first great English dictionary and one of the most typical Englishmen who ever lived, denied a place in the great temple of English learning? Still more indefensible is the omission of Bunyan. If the translation of the English Bible is properly regarded as the greatest contribution to our literature, the writing of "The Pilgrim's Progress" may well come second. Many will think that English imaginative writing finds its greatest expression in Blake, and coming again to the list of inclusions, historical students of these later times will have reason to dispute the appearance of Macaulay, a highly gifted rhetorician and verse writer, and little more. Generally speaking, we think that the names of Addison, Pope, and all the four Victorian writers, Carlyle, Tennyson, Macaulay, and Browning, are open to question. And is nothing to be said for Shelley, Coleridge, Darwin, Spencer, and Keats?

* * *

A BOOK of great historical interest is the biography of the first Earl of Sandwich, which is now in preparation. Like his famous secretary, Samuel Pepys, Lord Sandwich kept a voluminous diary, and as he played a prominent part in the affairs of his time, its publication should add something to our knowledge of the Civil War, and the period immediately succeeding the Restoration. At the age of eighteen, Sandwich raised a regiment in Cambridgeshire for the Parliament, and distinguished himself at the battle of Naseby. In the Dutch War he left the army for the navy, and became second in command to Blake. It was he who conveyed Charles II. to England, and he had also the chief share in negotiating the marriage with Catherine of Braganza. On the renewal of hostilities with the Dutch in 1672, he commanded under the Duke of York, and after giving astonishing proofs of his bravery, he was blown up in his ship, when the fleet was surprised in Southwold Bay.

* * *

DR. MARIO BORSA's critical account of "The English Stage of To-day" was, when it appeared in Italy some years ago, welcomed by many critics as the best survey of the modern English drama. It has now been revised and brought up to date, and a translation by Mr. Selwyn Brinton will be published almost immediately by Mr. Lane. The book covers the whole field of contemporary English drama, and examines the work of Barrie, Pinero, H. A. Jones, Wilde, and Bernard Shaw, the last having an entire chapter to himself. Dr. Borsa also discusses the character and temper of the British playgoer, the economics of the theatrical industry, and the influence of the Irish National Theatre upon dramatic art.

MR. MURRAY has in preparation a volume of literary criticism, "Essays on Poets and Poetry, Ancient and Modern," by the President of Magdalen. Among the essays are "Sophocles and the Greek Genius," "Matthew Arnold," "In Memoriam after Fifty Years," "Virgil and Tennyson," "Dante and the Art of Poetry," and "Gray and Dante." All these subjects are, of course, more or less hackneyed, but we may expect them to be treated with freshness and originality by so ripe a scholar and so penetrating a critic as Mr. Warren. More off the beaten track is the vexed question of the art of translation, which is also dealt with.

* * *

ANOTHER volume of essays which is likely to interest students of Scottish life in the eighteenth century is to be issued early next year by Messrs. Black. It contains the collected literary and historical essays of the late Henry Grey Graham, whose history of "The Social Life of Scotland in the Eighteenth Century" is the standard book upon the subject—though Dr. John Watson's posthumous volume is now necessary to supplement it. Graham's "Scottish Men of Letters in the Eighteenth Century" is not so successful. At the same time it contains a great deal of material not easily accessible elsewhere. The coming volume will contain a biographical sketch by Mr. Nigel C. Graham.

* * *

SINCE Mr. William Archer's "Poets of the Younger Generation" appeared half a dozen years ago, we have had no anthology of living English poets. Lovers of poetry who are unable to keep pace with the numberless slim volumes of verse issued each year, will have an opportunity of reading the best work of the singers of to-day in "The Book of Living Poets," which Mr. Walter Jerrold has compiled for Messrs. Alston Rivers. The plan adopted has been to make the book as representative as possible, and every contemporary poet of distinction, from whose pen verse has been recently published, is included.

* * *

PROFESSOR BAKER, of Harvard, whose book on Shakespeare's dramatic art we review in this issue of THE NATION, is this year to give the course of lectures on English literature founded at the Sorbonne by Mr. J. H. Hyde. This is the fourth year of those lectures, which have had a marked success, the previous lecturers being Professor Barrett Wendell, Professor Santayana, and Professor Coolidge, all of Harvard University. Professor Baker's subject is the development of English tragedy and comedy from 1590 to 1800, and he gives the first lecture of the series on December 10th next.

* * *

THE members of the Académie des Goncourt have experienced some difficulty in choosing a successor to J. K. Huysmans. Their first meeting for the purpose was fruitless, but on Friday week last M. Jules Renard obtained a sufficient majority and was elected. This is the first election held by the "Academy of the Ten," and the choice has fallen upon a man of letters who would certainly have won the Goncourts' approval. He was one of the founders of the "Mercure de France," and has written "L'Écornifleur," "La Lanterne Sourde," "Les Bucoliques," and "Poil de Carotte"—the original of the play produced a few years ago by Mr. Forbes Robertson.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"A Life of Bishop Burnett." By T. E. S. Clarke and H. C. Foxcroft. (Cambridge University Press, 15s. net.)

"Letters of Dr. John Brown, with Letters from Ruskin, Thackeray, and Others." Edited by his Son and D. W. Forrest, D.D. (Black, 10s. 6d. net.)

"Venice: Its Individual Growth from the Earliest Beginnings to the Fall of the Republic." By Pompeo Molmenti. Translated by Horatio F. Brown. Part II., The Golden Age. (Murray, 2 vols., 21s. net.)

"The Prolongation of Life. Optimistic Studies." By Elie Metchnikoff. (Heinemann, 12s. 6d. net.)

"James Francis Edward, the Old Chevalier." By Martin Haile. (Dent, 16s. net.)

"Studies in Poetry." By Stopford A. Brooke. (Duckworth, 6s.)

"Partners of Providence." By Charles D. Stewart. (Duckworth, 6s.)

"Pascal et son Temps." Deuxième Partie. Par Fortunat Strowski. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit, 3fr. 50.)

"Sandro Botticelli." Par E. Gebhart. (Paris: Hachette, 3fr. 50.)

"Il Programma dei Modernisti. Riposta all'Enciclica di Pio X. 'Pascendi Dominici Gregis.'" (Roma: L.4.)

From WELLS GARDNER, DARTON & CO.'S LIST.

THE OLD TESTAMENT IN THE

NEW. By the Right Rev. EDGAR C. S. GIBSON, D.D., Bishop of Gloucester. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 3s. 6d.
 "The subject of this book is the unacknowledged influence of the Old Testament upon the New . . . a most interesting book, popular and yet solid, and most readers will find something that is new to them in these pages."—Saturday Review.

TWENTIETH CENTURY LESSONS

FROM THE ANCIENT SAINTS. By C. L. COOPER, With outline illustrations from the Old Masters, imp. 32mo, cloth, 1s.

THE CHURCH HANDBOOK, FOR

MEMBERS OF THE ANGLICAN COMMUNION. By P. VERNON SMITH, LL.D., Chancellor of the Diocese of Manchester. Small crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d. net.

FIFTH EDITION, carefully revised throughout.

THE TRUTH OF CHRISTIANITY.

By Lieut.-Colonel W. H. TURTON. Crown 8vo, cloth, 529 pages, 2s. 6d. net.

"We know of no book which we should lend with more hope of advantage to a person who, without professional training in theology or philosophy, is perplexed by the common arguments against the Christian religion, and fears the verdict of reason is against it."
 —Church Quarterly.

Other Press notices of this excellent volume are too numerous to quote; the Roman Catholic, Nonconformists, Presbyterian, and even the Agnostic Press speak in admiration of Lieutenant-Colonel Turton's fair and candid treatment of his subject.

TWO VOLUMES BY THE

Rt. Rev. A. F. WINNINGTON INGRAM, D.D.

(Lord Bishop of London).

THE CALL OF THE FATHER.

Addresses given in the East London Mission last Lent. This volume contains the Questions asked of, and the Answers given by, the Bishop of London. A Cheap Edition (limited to 25,000 copies), in paper covers, 1s; crown 8vo, cloth boards, on superior paper, 2s. 6d.

A MISSION OF THE SPIRIT

This volume consists of the Addresses given in the North London Mission, together with the Questions asked of, and the Answers given, by the Bishop of London. A Cheap Edition (limited to 25,000 copies), in paper covers, 1s.; crown 8vo, cloth boards, on superior paper, 2s. 6d.

A List of Volumes by the same Author post free on application.

THOUGHTS FOR THE THANK-

FUL. Little Helps to a Habit of Thankfulness. By the Rev. G. H. SHARPE, M.A., Vicar of Perry Barr; Author of "Words for the Weary," now in its fifth Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d.

DARTON'S FINE ART SERIES.

Each volume printed on superfine paper, profusely Illustrated in the best style by Popular Artists, bound in cloth boards, gilt top, 8½ × 5½, price 6s.: calf, 10s. 6d. net.

ANOTHER BOOK OF VERSES FOR CHILDREN.

"A DELIGHTFUL COMPILATION."

—Athenæum.

Selected and Edited by E. V. Lucas. With Coloured Frontispiece and Title-page, besides numerous Black-and-White Illustrations, by Francis D. Bedford. Large crown 8vo, on superfine paper, fancy cloth boards from a design by F. D. BEDFORD, gilt top, 6s.

Mr. E. V. Lucas's
New Volume
for Children.

FORGOTTEN TALES OF LONG AGO.

Selected and Edited with Introduction, by E. V. Lucas. With Coloured Frontispiece and Title-page, besides numerous Black-and-White Illustrations by Francis D. Bedford. Large crown 8vo, printed on superfine paper, cloth, gilt top, 6s.; calf, 10s. 6d.

A WONDER BOOK OF OLD ROMANCE.

READY
NEXT WEEK.

By F. J. Harvey Darton. Illustrated by A. G. Walker, Sculptor. Large crown 8vo, printed on superfine paper, cloth boards, gilt top, 6s.

A List of Volumes in this well-known FINE ART SERIES will be sent POST FREE on application.

THE MERRY TALES OF THE WISE MEN OF GOTHAM.

By F. J. Harvey Darton, Illustrated by Gordon Browne.

These Folk-stories have entranced generations of children, and their old charm is emphasised by the dainty fashion in which they are presented, with delightful humorous pictures in Colour.

Beautifully
Printed in Chromolithography, square cloth
boards, 3s. 6d.

A Children's Book by the Author of "MRS. GREEN."

OTHERLAND.

By EVELYNE E. RYND, Author of "Mrs. Green." With numerous Illustrations by DOROTHY FURNISS. Demy 8vo, Fancy Art Linen Boards, 3s. 6d. [In a few days.]

Uniform in style and price with the following three books by PHÆBE ALLEN: PLAYING AT BOTANY, Third Edition. GARDEN PESTS, JACK AND JILL'S JOURNEY, Second Edition.

WHY-WHY AND TOM CAT.

By "BROWN LINNET." With numerous Illustrations by GORDON BROWNE, R.I. Demy 8vo, printed on superfine paper, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"A real children's book of the best kind, appealing irresistibly to the child's love of animals. Mr. Gordon Browne's illustrations are simply charming."—Morning Leader.

WELLS GARDNER DARTON & CO., Ltd., 3, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C.

Reviews.

THE LETTERS OF QUEEN VICTORIA.*

II.

A REVIEW of this correspondence must lead, I think, to the conclusion that, under the influence of Leopold and Stockmar, the Queen and Prince Albert made continuous and strenuous efforts to recover, as regards foreign affairs at least, some of the influence of the Crown, which had not been exercised since the Revolution of 1688, save by George III., of unhappy memory. Writing to the Queen so early as 1838, Leopold cautiously suggested this.

"Monarchy," he said, "to be carried on requires certain elements, and the occupation of the Sovereign must certainly be to preserve these elements, or, should they have been too much weakened by untoward circumstances, to contrive by every means to strengthen them again. You are too clever not to know, that it is not being called Queen or King, which can be of the least consequence, when to the title there is not also annexed the power indispensable for the exercise of these functions."

We know also from the Life of the Prince Consort how strongly and frequently Baron Stockmar urged the same view on Prince Albert:—

"Since 1830," he wrote, "the executive power has been entirely in the hands of the Ministry, and these being more the servants of the Parliament than of the Crown, it is practically in the hands of the House of Commons. This is a distortion of the fundamental idea of the British Constitution, which could not fail to grow by degrees out of the incapacity of her sovereigns rightly to understand and deal with that position, and out of the encroachments on their privileges by the House of Commons."

Stockmar's ideal of the relation of the British Sovereign to the Ministers and Parliament seems to have been much that which now exists in the German Empire, where the Emperor has practical control over foreign affairs, independent of the Reichstag, and where the system of a Cabinet jointly responsible to the Sovereign and to the representative assembly is not fully developed. During the first Ministry of the Queen little could be done, on account of her youth, in the direction aimed at. We find, however, that quite early in her reign she took great interest in foreign affairs, counselling her Foreign Secretary, at the instance of Leopold, in favour of more friendly relations with France, and suggesting additions to despatches in this sense. In a letter to her uncle in 1840 with reference to the difficulties which had arisen between her Government and that of France on the subject of Egypt and the Porte, she wrote:—

"I have made Palmerston promise to put into the despatch (to the French Government) that it would be a source of great satisfaction to England if this could be the cause of bringing back France to that alliance with the other four Powers, from which we have seen her depart with so much regret. I hope this will have a good effect. My anxiety is great for the return of amity and concord."

There are frequent suggestions in Leopold's letters that the relations of England with France were treated by Palmerston in "an unnecessarily hostile and antagonistic spirit," and the Queen appears to have done her best to inspire a different tone. In other respects there was little interference with Palmerston's conduct of foreign affairs by the Queen, still less by Lord Melbourne.

In 1841 Palmerston was succeeded by Lord Aberdeen in Sir Robert Peel's Government, and an entente cordiale with France was a cardinal point of his policy—much to the content of Leopold. The Queen struck up a great friendship with Louis Philippe, with whom she was connected through the Duchess de Nemours and Leopold's wife. The old King was evidently an adept at flattery. This is brought out in a letter of the Queen to her uncle after a visit of Louis Philippe to Windsor:—

"What an extraordinary man the King is! What a wonderful memory, and how lively and how sagacious. . . . He praises my dearest Albert most highly, and fully appreciates his great qualities and talents, and what gratifies me so much, treats him completely as his equal, calling him 'Mon frère,' and saying to me that my husband was the same as me, which he is; and 'Le Prince Albert c'est pour moi le Roi!' The King is very sad to go, but he is determined, he says, to see me every year."

This was in 1844. The question of the Spanish marriage was already on the tapis. It is now clear that the Queen and Lord Aberdeen were the dupes of the crafty old King, and that Lord Palmerston had been quite justified in thoroughly distrusting him. When his disgraceful policy was accomplished, nothing could exceed the indignation of the Queen. In a letter to Leopold, the King's son-in-law, she denounced his conduct as infamous, and that of Guizot as shabby and dishonest. Later, when Louis Philippe lost his throne and was obliged to fly from France in disguise and seek refuge in England, the Queen evidently thought that he richly deserved this terrible reverse. Writing to Leopold, she said:—

"I do not like to attack the fallen, but the poor King Louis Philippe has brought much of this upon himself by that ill-fated return to a Bourbon policy. . . . Guizot is more to blame. He was the adviser of all this policy. He is no Bourbon, and he ought to have behaved differently."

During the five years of Sir Robert Peel's Government, there was no difference between him and Lord Aberdeen and the Queen as to foreign policy. But we learn, from the Life of Lord Russell, that the Queen expressed her wish to Lord Aberdeen that all drafts of despatches from the Foreign Office to foreign Governments or to British Ministers abroad should be submitted to her for approval before being sent off. Lord Aberdeen undertook that this should be done in all cases in which the exigencies of the situation did not require immediate action. This was undoubtedly a step in the direction of Stockmar's aims. When Palmerston, in 1846, resumed the post of Foreign Secretary in Lord Russell's Government, this rule was carried still further, for the Queen insisted upon all drafts of despatches being submitted to her before being sent off, whatever their urgency, and later, in a memorandum dictated by Stockmar, Palmerston was put under the closest restraint.

The Lives of the Prince Consort and of Russell and Palmerston have long ago made us acquainted with the antagonism which arose between the Queen and Lord Palmerston during this Ministry, but we have not known till now how frequent and bitter were the complaints of the Queen, and how persistent her efforts to drive Palmerston from the Foreign Office. The battle between them turned largely upon the point that drafts of despatches were not submitted to her, or that her suggestions upon them were not acted on, and that the letters were sent in the form objected to; and also on the tone and temper adopted in them to other Powers. But beyond these disputes as to form, there were profound differences of policy; and there were determined efforts of the Queen to impress her own policy upon her Minister.

The correspondence contains frequent illustrations of this. So early as 1848 we find in a memorandum by the Queen of an interview with Lord John Russell that "she had no confidence in Palmerston, that she could hardly go on with him, that his conduct made her seriously anxious and uneasy for the welfare of the country." She ends by saying "she is afraid that some day she might have to tell Lord John that she could no longer put up with Lord Palmerston, which might be disagreeable and awkward." Again, shortly after, she writes to Lord John: "The partiality of Lord Palmerston in this Italian question really surpasses all conception and makes the Queen very uneasy on account of the character of England." Later, on the Greek question, when the Queen had concurred with Lord J. Russell as to some alteration of a despatch; and when the letter had been sent unaltered, she wrote to Palmerston:—

"The Queen must remark upon this sort of proceeding, of which it is not the first instance, and plainly tell Lord Palmerston that this must not occur again. She cannot allow a servant of the Crown and her Minister to act contrary to her orders, and this without her knowledge."

She suggested to the Prime Minister that Palmerston should leave the Foreign Office and be appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland! It is unnecessary to quote further passages. They all point to profound differences of policy and to a determination to get rid of Palmerston.

EVERSLEY.

(To be concluded.)

* The Letters of Queen Victoria: A Selection from Her Majesty's Correspondence, 1837-1861." Edited by A. C. Benson and Viscount Esher. Murray, 3 vols., 63s. net.

THE CONVERT and THE HALO

All readers of fine Novels should ask for THE CONVERT, by ELIZABETH ROBINS, Author of "The Open Question," and for THE HALO, by the Baroness VON HUTTEN, Author of "Pam."

THE WASHBOURNE FAMILY. By JAMES DAVENPORT. With 16 Illustrations, royal 8vo, 21s. net.

THE BUILDERS OF FLORENCE. By J. WOOD BROWN. With over 70 Illustrations by HERBERT RAILTON. Demy 4to, 18s. net.

This fine book treats of the history and associations of the more important of the historic buildings of Florence. In the case of each building, an exact account is given of its architectural development. It is sumptuously produced and admirably illustrated.

THE COMPLETE MOUNTAINEER. By G. D. ABRAHAM. With over 70 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 15s. net.

A SWAN AND HER FRIENDS. By E. V. LUCAS. With 24 Portraits and Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

A narrative of literary Lichfield in the great days of Anna Seward.

THE ENGLISH SPY. By BERNARD BLACKMANTLE. With 72 Coloured Plates by R. CRUIKSHANK, and many Illustrations on Wood, 2 vols. fcap. 8vo, 7s. net. [The Illustrated Pocket Library.]

OLD-AGE PENSIONS. By W. SUTHERLAND. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

In the first part, the principal schemes of old-age pensions that are before the country are indicated. In the second part, the principal elements of an old-age pension scheme are passed under review, free use being made of the experience gained from pension schemes abroad and in the Colonies.

THE MONETARY CRISIS.

A book which will give you an insight into the working of the Money Market and the causes of crises is THE MONEY MARKET, by F. STRAKER. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

AN ARTIST'S REMINISCENCES. By WALTER CRANE.

With 123 Illustrations by the Author. Second Edition. Demy 8vo, 18s. net.

"A record in which we meet all the great figures of the last half century."—Daily News.

A WOMAN'S TREK FROM THE CAPE TO CAIRO.

By MARY HALL. With 64 Illustrations and 2 Maps, demy 8vo, 16s. net.

A PRINCESS OF THE OLD WORLD. By ELEANOR C. PRICE. With 21 Illustrations, 12s. 6d. net.

This volume deals with the life and surroundings of Anne Marie Louise d'Orléans, known as La Grande Mademoiselle. She was a most characteristic and original personage.

PETRARCH AND HIS TIMES. By H. C. HOLLWAY-CALTHORP. With 24 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

WORDSWORTH AND HIS CIRCLE. By D. W. RANNIE.

With 20 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

A study, biographical and critical, drawn from original sources, of the man and poet in his relations to his chief friends and contemporaries.

THE QUEEN OF LETTER WRITERS. By JANET ALDIS. With 20 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

The life of Madame de Sévigné abounds in bright and vivid interest. In her matchless letters we see as in a mirror the piquant, many-coloured life of the seventeenth century in France.

A HISTORY OF MILAN UNDER THE SFORZA.

By CECILIA M. ADY. With 20 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

This is the first volume of a new series of histories of the Italian States. All the volumes are based on original research.

ENGLISH CHILDREN IN THE OLDEN TIME. By ELIZABETH GODFREY. With 32 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"This is a work well worth doing and well done. It is scientific enough to command confidence, and not too scientific to be readable. It is a thoroughly engaging inquiry into the bringing-up of English children in the past."—Spectator.

INDIA IMPRESSIONS: With Some Notes of Ceylon

during a Winter Tour, 1906-7. By WALTER CRANE. With 84 Illustrations by the Author, of which one is in Colour, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

HUGO WOLF. By ERNEST NEWMAN. With 12 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

[The New Library of Music.]

FLORENCE AND NORTHERN TUSCANY. By EDWARD HUTTON, Author of "The Cities of Umbria." With 32 Illustrations, of which 16 are in Colour, by WILLIAM PARKINSON. Crown 8vo, 6s.

GEORGE MEREDITH: NOVELIST, POET, REFORMER.

By MAY STURGE HENDERSON. With a Portrait, crown 8vo, 6s.

A careful study of the novels in chronological order, and of the consistent ideas underlying Meredith's work as novelist, poet, critic, and essayist.

DRAMA AND LIFE. By A. B. WALKLEY. Crown 8vo, 6s.

The volume includes articles on the contemporary stage in London and Paris, together with reviews of plays by the foremost dramatists of the day and causeries on the aesthetics of the theatre, the principles of dramatic criticism, and the construction of the English and French theatres.

AN ENGLISH PROSE MISCELLANY. Selected, with an Introduction by JOHN MASEFIELD. Crown 8vo, 6s.

This anthology includes specimens from representative British writers from 1485 to 1800.

MY MEMOIRS. By ALEXANDRE DUMAS. Translated by

E. M. WALLER. With Portraits, in 6 volumes, with Frontispieces in Photogravure, crown 8vo, 6s. each. Volume II.

THE CRIMES OF URBAIN GRANDIER AND OTHERS.

By ALEXANDRE DUMAS. With 8 Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s.

This is the second volume of a complete translation in four volumes of Dumas' famous collection of Celebrated Crimes.

THE SOUTH-BOUND CAR. By OWEN LLEWELLYN and

L. RAVEN-HILL. With 85 Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s.

A vivacious narrative of the events of a tour by motor in Spain. Mr. Raven-Hill's sketches fully illustrate the incidents, humorous and otherwise.

TWO LEGS, and other Stories. By CARL EWALD. Translated by A. T. DE MATROS. With many Illustrations, large cr. 8vo, 6s.

A book of fairy tales by an exquisite Danish writer.

Messrs. METHUEN'S New Illustrated Announcement List is now ready, and will be sent with their Bulletin to any applicant. They have prepared prospectuses of all their important books and these, too, can be had.

METHUEN & CO., 36, Essex Street, London, W.C.

THE GENTLEST ART. An Anthology of Entertaining

Letters. By E. V. LUCAS. Fcap. 8vo, 5s.

Under the above title Mr. Lucas has brought together some hundreds of familiar letters of great and small writers, arranged like its companion volumes, "The Open Road" and "The Friendly Town." Every letter in his pages is interesting for its matter quite as much as, if not more than, its manner.

CHARACTER AND COMEDY. By E. V. LUCAS.

Second Edition. Fcap. 8vo, 5s.

"As full as all his other work of humour and of observation."

—Spectator.

"Mr. Lucas has the same light touch for all his subjects, grave or gay."—Daily News.

"One of the most charming and humorous little books."—Liverpool Courier.

IN THE FOOTPRINTS OF DANTE. Arranged by

PAGET TOYNBEE, M.A., D.Litt. Small crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

"In the Footprints of Dante" is a collection of some of the most beautiful and most striking passages from the works of Dante. Prose is included as well as verse, and the Latin works are represented as well as the Italian. The extracts are given in the original, and are accompanied by an English translation.

THE POWER OF CONCENTRATION AND HOW TO

ACQUIRE IT. By EUSTACE MILES, M.A., Author of "Life after Life." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Not only are the mental helps in concentration considered, but also the physical—such as breathing, muscular repose, diet, and so on.

SIX SHILLING NOVELS.

SECOND EDITION.

THE CONVERT. By ELIZABETH ROBINS, Author of

"The Open Question."

"Miss Robins has struck a deep and dignified note throughout her book, which is both interesting and artistic."—Tribune.

"It is all brilliantly done, and shows fine powers of observation and description."—Birmingham Post.

THIRD EDITION.

THE HALO. By the BARONESS VON HUTTEN, Author of "Pam."

"The characterisation of the story is extraordinarily clever, and the wit and liveliness of the writing are only equalled by the skilful construction of the plot."—Morning Leader.

"A delightful book, full of humour, but full of real feeling."

—Evening Standard.

SECOND EDITION.

TALES OF TWO PEOPLE. By ANTHONY HOPE. With a Frontispiece by A. H. BUCKLAND.

"Mr. Hope's best qualities are to be found in this collection, the personal touch, the whimsical grace, the delightful repartee."

—Manchester Courier.

THIRD EDITION.

THE SECRET AGENT. By JOSEPH CONRAD.

"A work rich in surprise and suspense, original in conception and treatment, lavishly endowed, in fine, with the singular qualities which have won for Mr. Conrad a unique position amongst the British novelists of to-day."—Spectator.

SECOND EDITION.

MAJOR VIGOUREUX. By "Q."

"Here we find the delightful 'Q,' his merry humour, his West Country breeziness, his fine simplicity, his love of honest romance."

—Tribune.

FOURTH EDITION.

THE BOTOR CHAPERON. By C. N. and A. M.

WILLIAMSON.

"Fiction and travel have never been more happily blended."

—Outlook.

FOURTH EDITION.

A MOTHER'S SON. By Mr. and Mrs. C. B. FRY.

"The whole story is so good, with its air of purity, the friendly benevolence to all men, and its careful character studies, that we should not like to have missed a single page of it."—Westminster Gazette.

SECOND EDITION.

THE NEW RELIGION. By MAARTEN MAARTENS.

"This is a book of medicine and laughter. It is an amusing, well-written novel, full of breathing characters."—Daily Chronicle.

THIRD EDITION.

NAME OF GARLAND. By W. PETT RIDGE.

"The story, with all its humour, has an undertone of real pathos."—Athenæum.

THIRD EDITION.

THE SHEEP AND THE GOATS. By MARY E. MANN.

"Admirably conceived and put together. The whole picture of society in a provincial town is full of life and variety."—Nation.

THE FRIEND OF FOX.*

It would have seemed an astounding thing to Coke's contemporaries that the life of one of the most remarkable and attractive men of the eighteenth century should still remain unwritten at the end of the nineteenth. At one time no fewer than six biographies were in preparation, but they were all set aside to make way for the life which was to be written by Coke's brother-in-law, Thomas Keppel. Unhappily, this biography perished in manuscript, and there disappeared with it most of the records and letters which the other biographers had surrendered in order that the authoritative life should be as complete as possible. There only remains a fragment of the manuscript of Mr. Bacon's biography, and it is chiefly out of this manuscript and the notes preserved by Mr. Keppel that Mrs. Stirling's book has been constructed. Nothing can compensate for the loss of the ample materials which once existed for a full biography, but Mrs. Stirling's indefatigable pains and the splendid accessories which enrich these volumes have provided a book of great interest and charm. Mrs. Stirling is descended from Coke's favourite daughter, and she is therefore in command of all the oral traditions which linger in the great palace that was built and adorned by Coke's predecessor in marsh and desert and set by Coke himself in the midst of the Eden of English agriculture.

Coke was educated, like his friend and leader Fox, at Wandsworth and Eton, but he was four years younger than Fox, and was never at school with him. He was at Eton with Windham, of whom he knew little as a boy, and his chief friend in boyhood seems to have been Rawdon, the future Lord Hastings, who was not at Eton but at Harrow. When he left Eton he received a short letter from Lady Leicester: "Sir,—I understand you have left Eton, and probably intend to go to one of those Schools of Vice, the Universities. If, however, you chuse to travel, I will give you £500 per annum." This unsympathetic but not unjust judgment on the universities was natural enough in the mouth of a woman who had seen all her hopes of handing on the splendours of Holkham to her own children destroyed by the dissolute manners which her son had learnt in those schools. Thomas Coke's father seems to have shared Lady Leicester's fears, and though he left the decision to his son, he rejoiced that that decision took him to Italy and not to Oxford. Before he started on his grand tour, Coke paid a formidable visit to the great and lonely lady who reigned at Holkham, and had never yet set eyes on her successor. The country from Holkham to Houghton, Arthur Young wrote about this time, was one wild sheep walk, and the youth who was one day to be its lord did not see it for the first time with any undue elation. Lady Leicester herself had only one ambition, and that was to outlive Coke's father, not from any personal dislike, but from a certain sporting instinct, which made her say defiantly to Thomas Coke when first she saw him, "Understand, I will live as long as I can." Her ambition was defeated, but only narrowly, for she died in February, 1775, and Wenman Coke died the next year. Thus at twenty-two Thomas Coke found himself Lord of Holkham, with all the magnificent treasures of its manuscripts and its pictures and its sculptures, and its wide, bleak, and unharvested possessions.

Mrs. Stirling's book is called "Coke and His Friends." It is indeed mainly in Coke's friendships, his outward life, his magnificent achievements, his frank and dashing speeches, that we have to look for the revelation of the man. His intimate letters have not survived, and he kept no journal. But the outlines of his character are so simple, the judgment of his contemporaries is so clear and overwhelming, the significance of his friendships is so plain, that we have no difficulty in understanding what kind of man he was. With one break of six years (for he was one of Fox's martyrs) he was in the House of Commons from 1776 to 1832, and though his main interest was not in politics, his political convictions were very definite and binding. He was a thorough-going Whig, an implicit and passionate adherent of the great man whom he described when he left the House of Commons as the greatest statesman that ever lived. To say that Coke was a follower of Fox is only another way of saying that he was opposed to the American War, opposed to the French War, opposed to Pitt's repressive legislation, and opposed to the Union; a supporter of Parliamentary Reform, Catholic Emancipation, and the Abolition of the Slave Trade. He was a good deal wiser than Fox about the Coalition, and Mrs. Stirling has reproduced from Mr. Bacon's unpublished MS. an interesting story of their discussion of that momentous and disastrous act. Coke was still in bed when Fox came to see him, and Fox sat on the edge of his bed while he explained his plans. Coke listened in horror, and when Fox growled out that it was a Coalition in which North was to act on his opinion, not he on North's, Coke said that was the one redeeming feature in an otherwise disgraceful alliance. But Coke stuck to Fox in spite of his just objections to the Coalition, and he took an important part in the remonstrances of the Commons when the King tried to escape the necessity of summoning Fox and North to power. Perhaps it is as well that Coke was out of Parliament from 1784 to 1790, during the years when his party was certainly not seen at its best. He withdrew from the contest in 1784, chiefly apparently on account of the strange conduct of his colleague Astley, who had formerly acted with him and now cut himself adrift, partly because the dissenters withdrew their support in consequence of his refusal to pledge himself to support the Repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts. Coke was chagrined by the demand, as he had voted for Repeal in the late Parliament, and told them if they could not trust him without a pledge they must turn him out. He had the laugh on his side a few years later when the dissenters who had come at the head of the deputation had to confess that they had been grievously disappointed in Mr. Pitt. This was not the only time when Coke showed his independent nature. It fell to him, by the unanimous desire of his party, to take the address of the Commons demanding the recognition of the independence of America to the King, and he scandalised the Court by presenting himself in his top boots, exercising a right which scarcely any knight of the shire had ever exercised before. It was not an improbable story which related how, knowing that only Royalty was allowed to drive six horses in town, he drove past the King's palace with five horses and a donkey as leader. But without a doubt the best thing he ever did in this manner was his famous letter to the Prince of Wales. When that insidious rascal had trapped Fox into a false statement about his marriage in the House of Commons, Fox and his friends dropped him for a year. This was not at all to the taste of the Prince, who wrote to Coke proposing to pay his annual visit to Holkham. Coke replied: "Holkham is open to strangers on Tuesdays."

Coke the politician is less important than Coke the agriculturalist. The changes he made in the countryside were the wonder of a larger world than England, and his fame brought distinguished visitors to Holkham from all countries. It was very soon after he came into his property that Coke began to devote himself to the study of agriculture. In 1778 one of the leases in the parish fell in, and as the tenant refused a renewal of his lease at five shillings an acre, Coke took the farm into his own hands. For the next fifty years he spared no trouble or expense in the transformation of West Norfolk from a country of which Lady Townshend had said that all you could see was a blade of grass and two rabbits fighting for it, into the prosperous domain that he left at his death. Mrs. Stirling tells the story of his encounter with the obstinacy and conservatism of the farmers; his sheep were regarded with suspicion, and one good lady called them "Whiggish sheep"; potatoes were talked of much as Cobbett talked of them in Ireland; and scientific farming was despised as a fad. But Coke's patience won in the end. He showed on his own farm what could be done by marling, drainage, and manure, and the infinite pains he took to reconcile Norfolk to new methods had their reward. His rental mounted up from two to twenty thousand a year, but the prosperity of the country grew still more rapidly, and the poor-house disappeared from Holkham. Under his initiative Southdowns took the place of the Norfolk sheep; heavy stock farms became the fashion, planting was carried out on a large scale, and Norfolk passed from a corn-importing county into one of the chief corn-producing counties of England. In his relations with his tenants, and in his own development of his estates, Coke was a model landlord. He was generous

* "Coke of Norfolk and his Friends." By A. M. W. Stirling. Two vols. John Lane, 32s.

Messrs. Constable's List

THE OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE REVIEW.

No. II. 2/6 net.

The Michaelmas Term Number will be published in a few days, and will contain, among other contributions, an important article by Dr. F. C. S. SCHILLER, entitled "Freedom and Responsibility," being the first chapter of an answer to the statement of determinism laid down by Mr. Robert Blatchford in "Not Guilty: a Defence of the Bottom Dog." Also others by HILAIRE BELLOC, M.P., PROF. PERCY GARDNER, JOHN STUART HILL, CANON THE HON. E. LYTTLETON, J. BUTLER BURKE and many others.

COMPLETE LIST OF CONTENTS:

FREEDOM & RESPONSIBILITY

F. C. S. SCHILLER

Captain John Smith's Travels

COLONEL GORDON McCABE

Haeckel and Haeckelism

J. BUTLER BURKE

More About Biometry

CANON THE HON. E. LYTTLETON

Oxford's Antiquated Machinery

PROFESSOR PERCY GARDNER

On Social Freedom—(Continued)—A Partial Analysis of the Succeeding Portion of the Work

JOHN STUART MILL

The Law's Delays

JOHN POLLOCK

Settlement and Social Reform

W. H. BEVERIDGE

Neglect of Education for Women

I. B. J. SOLLAS

THE PRIEST

HILAIRE BELLOC, M.P.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW:—"The first number of the 'Oxford and Cambridge Review' is admirable, its contents being equally varied and authoritative . . . must appeal strongly to all who retain their interest in Varsity matters."

THE OUTLOOK:—"A remarkable illustration of the new development of University thought. The themes, if we may judge by the first number, are likely to be of much more than Academic interest. The general note, a sort of enlightened conservatism, is set by Mr. Livingstone in the opening article 'Alma Mata' . . . seldom has a new magazine had a finer introduction to cultivated, and, indeed, democratic audiences."

PALL MALL GAZETTE:—"The 'Oxford and Cambridge Review' enters on its career under auspices of high distinction and is evidently conducted with the worthy ambition of appealing in a comprehensive fashion to the intellectual interests of both Universities."

DAILY NEWS:—"This number is rich in promise, and if its high standard is maintained, it certainly ought to secure wide appreciation."

THE WORLD:—"Ablely conducted as it is, it cannot fail to prove of real service to the two great Universities, and seems likely to secure the support of a wider constituency than that to which it directly appeals."

THE TRIBUNE:—"The 'Oxford and Cambridge Review' fills in a worthy manner a vacancy that has long been felt in our periodical literature. . . . The first number contains an excellent array of articles by writers of high standing."

THE GHOSTS OF PICCADILLY.

By G. S. STREET. Author of "The Autobiography of a Boy," "The Trials of the Bantocks," &c. Demy 8vo. Illustrated with 12 Photogravure Plates. 10s. 6d. net.

"He has not done anything so good as 'The Ghosts of Piccadilly.'"—Outlook.

"A very worthy addition to the noble army of books about 'the town.'"—Academy.

"Pleasant gossip about the beaux worthies and men of the world who have haunted the most famous of London thoroughfares."—Westminster Gazette.

WILLIAM BLAKE.

The Poet, the Artist, the Man. With some Contemporary Accounts. By ARTHUR SYMONS. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

"A book which we cannot do without. Complete as a study of Blake's one-sided activity, and a portrait from which nothing has been excluded, in which everything finds a fitting place."—Saturday Review.

"Mr. Symons is to be congratulated upon the conscientious performance of a congenial task."—Daily Graphic.

THE STORY OF A BEAUTIFUL

DUCHESS. Being an account of the life and times of ELIZABETH GUNNING DUCHESS OF HAMILTON AND ARGYLL. By HORACE BLEACKLEY, M.A. Illustrated with Photogravure Portraits. Demy 8vo. Price 21s. net.

SOLDIERS OF FORTUNE: IN CAMP

AND COURT. By ALEXANDER INNES SHAND. Author of "Days of the Past," &c. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

"An excellent example of the rare literary skill which enabled him to produce a thoroughly fresh and interesting book."—Truth.

LEADING AMERICAN SOLDIERS.

By R. M. JOHNSTON, M.A. Cantab. With 13 Portraits. Extra Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

HUMAN BULLETS: A SOLDIER'S

STORY OF PORT ARTHUR. By TADAYOSHI SAKURAI, Lieutenant I.J.A. With an Introduction by Count OKUMA, Edited by ALICE MABEL BACON. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

THE HELPMATE.

By MAY SINCLAIR.

"A novel quite out of the common, and in writing it Miss Sinclair has fulfilled the great promise that one recognised years ago."—Nation.

"A fine, sincere, and fearless novel."—Times.

THE MEASURE OF THE RULE.

By ROBERT BARR.

"We hail such a book as this with delight. It is so human, so natural, so full of the joys and sorrows of masterful youth."—Daily Telegraph.

THE SQUARE PEG.

By W. E. NORRIS.

"If you want to know what happens you must read every page; and the writing is so competent that such a task is easy."—Times.

SECOND EDITION.

THE YOUNGER SET.

By R. W. CHAMBERS.

"We read the story, absorbed and interested."—Tribune.

"A story of absorbing interest; many of the characters are drawn with great subtlety."—Daily Chronicle.

NICOLETE.

By EVELYN SHARP.

WILLIAM JORDAN JUNIOR.

By J. C. SNAITH.

"When we read it, we believe in it, we accept all the poet's intense, absorbed unworldliness; we have read no more remarkable book for a very long time."—Morning Leader.

VALERIE UPTON.

By ANNE DOUGLAS SEDGWICK.

THE THORNTON DEVICE.

By the Hon. Mrs. GROSVENOR.

in the building of cottages and farmhouses, and, unlike most landlords, he did not raise the rents of his tenants in consequence of their own improvements. When one of his tenants reclaimed a bog he wrote to say that "I feel it my duty to grant you a new lease from Michaelmas, 1818, for twenty-one years." He gave his tenants the comparative security of long leases—an important innovation in the habits of the time—and he lived consistently in the spirit of the toast which was drunk at every gathering of his tenants: "Live and let live." Altogether the old order could not present a finer or more spacious example of generous public spirit and enlightened enterprise. Under Coke's regime feudalism was seen on its kindest side; his strong human sympathies, his sense for freedom, his scientific grasp of farming, and his personal virtues all obscured the evils inherent in the system. Of the character of Coke's dealings with his neighbours and dependants we have the best evidence in the language of Cobbett, a far greater man than Mrs. Stirling supposes. In 1821, Cobbett, who had attacked Coke very bitterly, found himself in the course of his rural rides on Coke's estate: "Here, as everywhere else, I hear every creature speak loudly in praise of Mr. Coke. It is well known to my readers that I think nothing of him as a public man; that I think even his good qualities an injury to his country, because they serve the knaves whom he is duped by to dupe the people more effectually; but it would be base in me not to say, that I hear, from men of all parties, and sensible men, too, expressions made use of towards him that affectionate children use towards the best of parents. I have not met with a single exception."

Perhaps the most interesting part of Mrs. Stirling's work is her description of Coke's entertainments and friendships. Some people will find a little too much of Dr. Parr for their taste, but there are some delightful stories of Coke's parties; and notably the account of one boisterous occasion when Coke and his guests fell to discussing the relative bulk of Fox and the French chef in the kitchen. Fox consented to have the question settled by going down forthwith to be weighed against his rival. Coke was the most sociable of men, and he was happiest when his house was full. But he was a good deal stricter than many of his friends; he kept his vow against gambling as carefully as Pitt; and he carried his notions of respectability too far to allow of his ever receiving Mrs. Fox or Lady Holland. Those exclusions fortunately have not prevented Mr. Lane from embellishing the volume with an admirable reproduction of the famous Reynolds picture of the Lady of St. Anne's Hill. The pictures in this charming collection include also a reproduction of the portrait of Coke at the age and in the dress which captivated the wife of the Young Pretender.

THREE PLAYS WITH HAPPY ENDINGS.*

SUCH is the title under which Mr. Hankin has chosen to publish his three plays. Why he should so insist that at the close of each we ought to feel more than usually cheerful will not be immediately obvious to those who saw these plays acted. He has, however, explained himself in a preface which, like all serviceable prefaces, helps the reader to reflect upon what is most characteristic in the writer's art.

My plays, says Mr. Hankin, end happily because a little consideration will convince the spectator that when the curtain drops, the principal characters are so circumstanced that there is a greater probability of their being happy in the future than if they had got what, perhaps, they longed for most. Thus, at the end of "The Return of the Prodigal," Eustace has not changed his nature or married the young lady, but he has extorted an allowance from his indignant father, which will enable him to lead, with a little pinching, a harmless far niente existence in town; thus, in "The Charity That Began At Home," a sudden engagement, born on the girl's side of a desire to help and to make happy and of a warm response towards her kindness and prettiness on the man's, is broken off by him the same evening because he realises their natures are too different to allow them to get on well together as life-companions; and thus, in "The Cassilis Engagement," an ingenuous young country-gentleman is, by the softest of maternal wiles, disentangled from the attractions of a rather vulgar, rather spirited young adventuress.

In none of these plays has anyone got what they desired eagerly and hotly; but, says Mr. Hankin, please look a little a-head before you call them stories of disappointment. Eustace, the languid, humorous, cleverish fellow, will do fairly well on his £250 a year; he will be a pleasant, sympathetic companion to intelligent men; he may even marry a rich sensible widow, who will be content with him as he is; he may stoop, says Mr. Hankin, with a little flicker of resentment, to becoming a dramatic critic. At any rate, he is not to be pitied; he will not go again on his terrible travels. As far as the characters in "The Charity That Began At Home" are concerned, unselfish Margery will marry Hylton, the philanthropist; she is well rid of the engaging hedonist to whom she so rashly promised herself; and Verreker, on his part, will carry his head higher in future for having resisted the temptation of her money and her looks. As for Geoffrey Cassilis, he will marry Mabel, who can ride, and who is a lady; while his delusive flame, Ethel Borridge, will live the life she loves, of champagne suppers and casual connections, till she ends in drunken misery or in over-dressed, over-fed, dyed, massaged, manicured, subsidised, peevish vulgarity. Hers is not a future very cheering to contemplate, it is true; nor is the fate of Eustace's sister cheerful, who is dragged by the ambition of her parents into a social sphere in which she is unlikely to find a husband. But, on the whole, Mr. Hankin is quite justified in claiming that his curtains drop upon situations which promise a normal degree of happiness to the principal characters. Nevertheless, it is straining a point to describe these as happy endings, for the simple reason that at the moment these plays end happiness is not actual but merely in prospect, and at that only discernible to the eye of a somewhat disillusioned prudence.

Walt Whitman has written in his large, magnificent, humourless manner a chant in praise of Prudence. "Manhattan's streets," it begins, "I saunter'd pondering on Time, Space, Reality—on such as these, and abreast of them Prudence. . . ." "The last explanations always remains to be made about Prudence," he goes on, getting more and more mystical, till the world seems a place where it must be the most unnecessary of qualities, "Prudence entirely satisfies the craving and glut of souls; itself only finally satisfies the soul." Mr. Hankin may not ponder such metaphysical entities as Time and Space, though he keeps an attentive watch upon Reality, and it would be truer to say of him that he ponders on Prudence, not abreast of other subjects but foremost and first. He is a dramatist who takes very long views. His plays resemble the favourite form of Chinese poets, "the stop-short," a poem in which the words suddenly stop but the sense goes on, in which the surprise and shock of the conclusion produces a kind of prolonged echo of speculation in the reader's mind. It is the peculiarity of Mr. Hankin's art to lead his characters to a clearing in the tangled forest of their lives and to leave them there, where the spectator can look down the divergent vistas along which each one will go his separate way. His humorous perception rests mainly on contrasts between what is wise and practical to do in a world where it is imprudent to be either too consistent or too uncalculating, and the violent pursuit of either course. Margery Denison and Hylton ("The Charity That Began At Home") attempt to be too consistent in their universal indulgence; Mr. Jackson and Henry ("The Return of the Prodigal") who, afraid to turn Eustace penniless out of the house, are willing to give him £1,000 to take himself off, and yet kick desperately against his practical demand for a small allowance, are either not consistent enough in their harshness or in their indulgence. So it comes about that the characters which Mr. Hankin, with his standard of prudence and his sense of life's complexity, treats with the most indulgent humour are scatter-brained, tender-hearted old ladies like Lady Denison and Mrs. Jackson, whose alternating rash kindness and practical timidity serve them in lieu of deliberate wisdom. Let it be said in conclusion, for the benefit of those who have not seen these plays acted, that they read well and that the salt of Mr. Hankin's wit loses little of its flavour in a book.

* "Three Plays with Happy Endings." By St. John Hankin. French. 3s. 6d.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.

ANNALS OF AN ETON HOUSE. With some Notes on the Evans Family. By Major GAMBIER PARRY, Author of "The Life of Reynell Taylor," "Day Dreams," &c. With Portraits and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

THE LETTERS OF ROBERT SCHUMANN, Musician and Composer, 1810-1856. Translated from the German of Dr. CHARLES STORCK by Miss HANNAH BRYANT. With Portraits. Demy 8vo. 9s. net.

These private letters, addressed chiefly to his mother, his fiancée, (Clara Wieck) and a few intimate friends, are of exceptional interest, not only as illustrating the lives of two such remarkable people as Robert, and his wife, Clara, Schumann, but also for their own literary merit.

PLAGUES AND PLEASURES OF LIFE IN BENGAL. By Lieut.-Col. D. D. CUNNINGHAM, C.I.E., F.R.S., Author of "Some Indian Friends and Acquaintances." With Coloured and Half-Tone Illustrations. Square demy 8vo, 12s. net.

ROUND ABOUT THE NORTH POLE. By W. J. GORDON. With many Woodcuts and other Illustrations by EDWARD WHYMPER. Medium 8vo, 15s. net.

A Cheaper Edition of MR. A. C. BENSON'S BOOKS.

THE HOUSE OF QUIET. An Autobiography. Third Edition, with an introduction. Square demy 8vo, 5s. net.

THE THREAD OF GOLD. A New Edition, with an introduction. Square demy 8vo, 5s. net.

ADMIRAL EDDY. By OLIVER ONIONS. Author of "The Compleat Bachelor," "The Odd Job Man," &c. Square Demy 8vo, 6s.

NEW 6/- NOVELS.

ANCESTORS. By GERTRUDE ATHERTON.

"The story is cleverly told, and the character-studies of the half-dozen people in the book, on whom Miss Atherton concentrates her interest, are extraordinarily close and subtle."—Westminster Gazette.

TOWARD THE DAWN. By HALLIWELL SUTCLIFFE.

"A strong and healthy book, written with well-sustained vigour of style, and rich with shrewd observations of rustic life and with bracing suggestions of the open country, it may be specially recommended to the attention of readers who want to get away from the novels of indoor luxury and over-subtilised psychology."—The Scotsman.

A NURSE'S BEQUEST. By Miss LILLIAS HAMILTON, M.D.

THE MYOPES. By MARMADUKE PICKTHALL.

THE FURNACE. By Miss R. MACAULAY.

DOWLAND CASTLE. By the EARL OF IDDESLEIGH.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

CHAMBERS'S

47, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

339, High Street, Edinburgh.

New Books

— FOR —

Boys & Girls

"The child who has one of Messrs. W. & R. Chambers's books for a present may be sure of wholesome entertainment."

—Daily Telegraph.

Charmingly illustrated and beautifully bound in special cover designs by the leading artists of the day.

CORDON STABLES		A Little Gipsy Lass.	3/6
E. W. GRIERSON		Vivian's Lesson	3/6
J. FINNEMORE		Three School Chums	3/6
M. QUILLER-COUCH		Troublesome Ursula	3/6
L. T. MEADE	A Girl from America	-	6/-
	Three Girls from School	-	5/-
G. M. FENN	The Scamp Family	-	3/6
	Trapped by Malays	-	5/-
MAY BALDWIN	Mysie: A Highland Lassie	-	5/-
	The Follies of Fifi	-	3/6
ANDREW HOME	Well Played	-	5/-
	A Discontented Schoolgirl	-	5/-
RAYMOND JACBERNS	That Imp Marcella	-	3/6

EACH

3s. 6d. NET.

Funny Bunnies.

PARKER, Companion Vol. to "The Browns, a Book of Bears."

EACH

3s. 6d. NET.

Buster Brown's Antics.—

By R. F. OUTCAULT.

Foxy Grandpa's Frolics.

STOKES' CYCLOPEDIA OF FAMILIAR QUOTATIONS.
773 pages, cloth, 3/6 net; half-mor., 7/6 net. Containing 5000
Selections from 600 Authors. With a Complete General Index and an Index of Authors. Compiled by ELFDOR EVELEIGH TREFFRY.

ELKIN MATHEWS' NEW BOOKS.

A Love in Ancient Days.

(A Tale of Romance of the Sixth Century.)
Crown 8vo, 6s. [Immediately.]

By T. H. CROSFIELD. With 8 Illustrations by W. B. WOLLEN, R.I.
Treats of the period when the Saxon and Jutish invaders were gradually winning their way against the Romano-Celtic population along the South Coast of England.

Memories and Music.

(Letters to a Fair Unknown.)
By an Anonymous Writer. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.—[Immediately.]
These letters were written, but never posted, to a lady unknown to the writer, who was a regular visitor to Covent Garden during a recent season, and they deal with the opera of each evening on the lines of the writer's considerable experience of music in many countries.

The Marble Sphinx.

(A Prose Phantasy.)
By ST. JOHN LUCAS. Royal 16mo, 1s. 6d. net. [Just out.]
"It reveals a finely cultivated taste, a rare instinct for beauty, and a mastery of good and graceful English."—Birmingham Post.

The Days of a Year.

By M. D. ASHLEY DODD. Royal 16mo, 2s. 6d. net. [Just out.]
"Contains many a charming word picture and poetic sentiment amidst the statements of actual observations in garden, field and woodland."—Field. [Now Ready.]

The Heir's Comedy.

By ARTHUR DILLON. Royal 16mo, 3s. 6d. net.

Poems by Mary E. Coleridge.

("ANODOS.")
Edited by HENRY NEWBOLT. Fcap. 8vo., 4s. 6d. net. [Immediately.]
(Also a special edition; price on application.)

In addition to over 100 poems, hitherto unpublished, the volume contains the Author's contributions to the leading periodicals and "The Garland of New Poetry," also "Fancy's Following" and "Fancy's Guerdon," characterised by a writer in The Times as "two small but exquisite volumes of verse," published in 1896 and 1898 under a pseudonym.

Thyrsis and Fausta, And other Plays and Poems.

By ROSALIND TRAVERS. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net. [Immediately.]
Miss Travers' first volume, "The Two Arcadias," was praised by such judges as Dr. Garnett and Professor Dowden, the former contributing a preface, in which he called attention to the author's "bright and inventive fancy," and her "deep earnestness and impetuous passion." Professor Dowden, in an article welcoming her as "a new poet," added that she has "a shaping power of imagination, a rare feeling for external nature, a sympathy with human life which is at once stern and tender, and a gift of utterance which is not the mere echo of a master."

London: ELKIN MATHEWS, VIGO STREET, W.

THE HOUSE OF LYNCH.*

THERE are many novelists among us who, so to say, are paid in gold for every few shillings they earn. And there are a few novelists who have written, year after year, stories which, somehow, have never received anything like due recognition, and for which the payment is still deferred. Mr. Leonard Merrick belongs to the latter class, and it is, perhaps, a little ironical that we have here to discuss his talent on the merits of his last novel, "The House of Lynch," instead of that collection of brilliant little contes, "Whispers About Women," which was published last year.

The strength of "Whispers About Women" was that inner unstudied strength of the novelist of whom one can say "he has lived; he knows what life is, and he is not taken in by appearances." And to say that is no scant praise in days when, as Whitman put it, "Somehow or other the real life never seems to get put into the books." The best of the stories in "Whispers About Women," such as the last, "The Call from the Past," makes much the same effect on the reader as the stories of Henry Lawson, that deep, searching, and original Australian humourist, so little known to the large class of English people who are perpetually speeding waves of "Imperial" sentiment overseas, without the slightest attempt to realise what are the actual thoughts and feelings of the Colonial peoples. Apparently careless and unstudied, cynical with regard to human motives, but tolerant and compassionate to human nature, the art of both these writers is based on an unconventional insight, a living freshness of feeling, and a humorous contempt for unrealities which place them among the real Bohemians. But the parallel does not hold further. Their attitude to life is the same, but their artistic methods are widely dissimilar.

One of the most exacting tests of a novelist's power is his capacity for giving his story fresh twists through the characters' unexpected actions. In a measure the force of his art is shown by the shock, the surprise coming upon us when we are not prepared for it. And Mr. Merrick's fecundity is shown in "The House of Lynch" by the reader's never being able to let his imagination run ahead without being disconcerted by the event. The situation is simple. Keith, the English artist, a poor but rising man, on a visit to the States, falls in love with Betty, the daughter of Jordan B. Lynch, "the devastating trust magnate, the debaucher of politics, the infamous multi-millionaire." And Betty brings him to the point by proposing to him. But Keith refuses to touch a penny of Lynch's money; if Betty is to come to him she must come penniless. She refuses, and schemes to bring her lover to her terms, but suddenly throws up the sponge, on a voyage to Europe, and marries Keith a month after landing. The two then settle down to lead "the simple life," in a semi-detached house in St. John's Wood, but housekeeping in Sibella Road wrecks Betty's faith in her own capacity for heroism, and she gets naturally very bored. When her new-born child is taken ill in "Telemachus Mansions," a poky little flat, the millionaire's daughter revolts, and reveals to her husband that she has always, half-consciously, counted on "bringing him round." She says, quite truly, that all their troubles, quarrels, and drifting apart have come from their poverty, and that "the squalor is crushing their love." Keith is inexorable, but he is beaten by circumstances when it is found that a costly surgical operation is necessary to save the child's life. The millionaire, Jordan B. Lynch, is appealed to, and cables his daughter five hundred pounds. What is capitally done in this study of the growing tension between husband and wife, and all the friction and misunderstanding through their different standards of living is that neither realises the struggle going on in the mind of the other. Keith spends all his money on his wife's whims, and works desperately hard, and she suffers, and is femininely petty, while behaving like a spoiled child. We begin by liking Betty, but in the scene where, with an eye to the future, she taunts him with having had to come to her father to help we find her insufferable, and then most femininely mean. It is all done with a light touch, and does not strike particularly deep into character, but it is very human. After a quarrel the two separate, Betty taking the child back to her father and the old atmosphere of New York luxury, and Keith going back to his work and trying to put mother and child out of his life. Betty's speedy disillusionment and longing for her husband are again very neatly done, and the failure of old Lynch's tenderness to compensate for her aching home-sickness develops in her what was quite rudimentary before—ideals. She has learnt her lessons. Though she had been reared in a "world" where no one was expected to utter the truth when it was against his interests, the last two years had shown her that there was another "world," where people esteemed 'cuteness less and honour more. Also she knew instinctively that she would feel worse afterwards than she did now, more contemptuous of herself, more blank.

We need not dwell upon the sequel, which shows us how Betty determines to educate herself to be worthy of Keith till "he's got to come and want me as he never wanted me in all his days; he's got to feel that I'm just the one thing in this world that could make life worth living for him." She returns to England, struggles along on two pounds a week, keeping aloof from Keith, and she finds that peace and joy come to her along with her proper work of looking after her child. The end is a trifle theatrical, as on the sudden death of her father, the devastating trust magnate, she hands over all her millions, of which she is sole heir, to American charities. On hearing the news Keith rushes into her arms, in the last pages, and we have the expected "happy ending."

In some respects "The House of Lynch" is not quite worthy of the author's reputation. We feel—we may be wrong—but we feel that the American scenes are not very close to the life, not actual studies from the life, but are rather the fruit of a slight knowledge and an active imagination. The motive of the story is, again, a trifle cheap, and Keith is not individualised, but is simple a good type of Englishman rather hastily sketched in. But, granted that the social atmospheres are painted thinly and drily, what lifts the story out of the ruck of fiction is a certain artistic distinction in the manner of telling, a certain fundamental brainwork at play behind all the scenes. The author has the rare gift of doing things in a few lines, and he can suggest, as the French school does, in a few lines aspects which the English novelist takes a page to bring before us. He has the rare gift of artistic economy, and so, even if his atmosphere be artificial, his scenes have a reserve force which makes them bite in the memory. "The House of Lynch" is, in short, a good criticism of the society it paints for us, even while we question certain features. Mr. Merrick has undoubtedly a sharp, clear outlook, and a philosophy that is derived from contact with many meaning angles of life. And in these bewildering days of kaleidoscopic social changes, these qualities are specially valuable. Our readers, we suggest, will do well for themselves if they send to the libraries for a list of his books.

SHORT NOTICE.

MISS BEATRICE GRIMSHAW has followed up her book, "From Fiji to the Cannibal Islands," by another pleasant volume of travel, "In the Strange South Seas" (Hutchinson, 16s. net). Starting from San Francisco, she first stopped at Papeete in Tahiti, "the loveliest, sweetest, and wickedest town of all the wide South Seas." From Tahiti she went to Raratonga, and thence made a tour of the islands to New Zealand. The langorous charm of the South Seas is well described in the book. What could be more fascinating, for instance, than a holiday in Raratonga, "where people dine out in evening dress, leave cards and have 'At Home' days, yet where there is no post except the monthly ship mail, there are no telegrams, trains, trams, times, appointments, or engagements of any kind?" It is small wonder that Miss Grimshaw noticed that the faces of the people are free from weariness and strain. The book, which is illustrated from photographs, gives a charming impressionist picture of life in the South Sea Islands.

* "The House of Lynch." By Leonard Merrick. Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.

A SELECTION FROM

James Clarke & Co.'s Autumn List

VIDA ; or, the Iron Lord of Kirktown.

By S. R. CROCKETT, Author of "Kit Kennedy," &c. Large crown 8vo. cloth boards, gilt top. With 4 Illustrations on Art Paper. 6s.

"The Daily Chronicle says: "Mr. Crockett has done nothing better." "Another kindly picture of life in a Scotch town." . . . Mr. Crockett tells a good Story and tells it well."—Daily Telegraph.OUR CITY OF GOD. By J. BRIERLEY, B.A.,

Author of "Ourselves and the Universe," "Studies of the Soul," &c. Large crown 8vo. cloth boards, gilt top. 6s.

"That it will maintain, if it can hardly enhance, an already deservedly high reputation need hardly be said."—Leicester Post.FAITH AND VERIFICATION. With other Studies in Christian Thought and Life. By Principal E. GRIFFITH-JONES, Author of "The Ascent Through Christ," &c. Large crown 8vo. cloth boards, gilt top. With Photogravure Portrait. 5s.

"A very welcome and valuable contribution to the library of religion."—Leicester Post.THOUGHTS FOR LIFE'S JOURNEY.

By GEORGE MATHESON, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E., Author of "Leaves for Quiet Hours," &c. 288 pages, cloth boards, gilt edges, with head band and marker. 3s. 6d. net; leather, 4s. net.

THE GOSPEL OF GRACE. By J. D. JONES,

M.A., B.D., Author of "Christ's Pathway to the Cross," &c. Large crown 8vo. cloth boards, gilt top. 3s. 6d. net.

JESUS AND HIS TEACHING. By

ERICH VON SCHRENCK, Mag. Theol., translated by J. WARSCHAUER, M.A., D. Phil., Author of "The New Evangel," Large crown 8vo. cloth boards, gilt top. 3s. 6d. net.

A VOICE FROM CHINA. By GRIFFITH

JOHN, D.D., Edin., Hankow. Large crown 8vo. cloth boards, gilt top. 3s. 6d.

STORIES OF OLD. Bible Stories Re-

told. By C. D. MICHAEL, Author of "Noble Deeds," &c. 4to. cloth boards, with 8 original Illustrations on Art Paper. 2s. 6d. net.

"We commend the book to Sunday School teachers and young people generally."—Methodist Sunday School Record.PRACTICAL LAY PREACHING AND

SPEAKING TO MEN. By H. JEFFS (Editor of "The Christian World Pulpit"). With Outlines of Sermons and Addresses by leading Preachers and Speakers. Crown 8vo, 256 pages. Cloth boards. 2s. 6d. net.

"The book will be of great service to all who take the platform."—Daily News.THE ROSEBUD ANNUAL FOR 1908.

4 Coloured Plates and one-half of the book in colour. Coloured paper boards, varnished, 3s.; cloth boards, with design in gold and colours, 4s.

"As attractive a budget as one could put into the hands of the youngsters. It has admirable stories, amusing rhymes, and a host of really capital pictures."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

London: JAMES CLARKE & Co., 13 & 14, Fleet St.

And of all Booksellers.

OCCULTISM and COMMON-SENSE

The Westminster Gazette

is now publishing a series of twelve articles which are the result of an inquiry by an impartial investigator into the phenomena usually called "psychical." The subject will be dealt with on the following plan:

Science and the "Supernatural"—The Induced Hypnotic Trance—Phantasms of the Living—Dreams—Hallucinations—Phantasms of the Dead.

 The series began October 21st, and three articles are appearing weekly. The twelve papers containing them will be sent to any address inland by post for 1s. 6d.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE, Tudor Street, London, E.C.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Towards a Social Policy

SUGGESTIONS FOR

CONSTRUCTIVE DOMESTIC REFORM.

By Various Writers.

Representing the conclusions of a Committee consisting of Messrs. C. R. BUXTON, H. C. FAIRFAX-CHOLMELEY, J. L. HAMMOND, F. W. HIRST, L. T. HOBHOUSE, J. A. HOBSON, C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., J. H. MORGAN, and VAUGHAN NASH.

"We must all welcome, therefore, such a volume as the Speaker Office has produced under the title of 'Towards a Social Policy.' It is full of hard thinking and solid information and should be a mine for platform speakers."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The book should be in the hand of everyone who loves his country. It is a lucid and comprehensive statement of the causes of the blight that is falling upon the race, and of the remedies to be applied."—DAILY NEWS.

"'Towards a Social Policy' decidedly 'gives us to think.' Its authors are doing the Liberal Party a notable service."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

"They (the readers) will find within its hundred and twenty odd pages much keen diagnosis of existing evils, much outspoken criticism of the slipshod palliatives with which we have hitherto been content to attempt to meet them, and many bold suggestions—some very bold indeed—as to the direction in which the real remedies are to be found. They may not agree. They cannot fail to be interested."—MORNING LEADER.

Crown 8vo, 1s. net; post free, 1s. 2d.

LONDON: THE SPEAKER PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED,

14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

THE INQUIRER

ONE PENNY WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF LIBERAL RELIGION

Special Articles of Interest to Liberal Thinkers and Workers.

Reviews of Important Books and Magazines.

News of Churches and Societies.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS:

6/6 per year, to all parts of the World.

SPECIMEN COPY FREE ON APPLICATION.

Published every Friday at

3, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

It is likely that if Drayton had written less his name would to-day be more familiar than it is. His works run to fifty or sixty thousand lines, but it would be safe to say that the average reader of poetry knows him only by the fine sonnet beginning "Since there's no help, come let us kiss and part," the noble ballad on the battle of Agincourt, and possibly by the dainty little epic "Nymphidia, or The Court of Fayrie." All these, together with many other pieces of interest, are to be found in "Minor Poems of Michael Drayton," which Mr. Cyril Brett has edited for the "Tudor and Stuart Library" (Clarendon Press, 5s. net). Mr. Brett's aim has been not to make a Drayton anthology, but to form a collection of complete publications, "so designed as to include most of Drayton's best work, especially of his lyrical and 'pastoral' poems." He has given us a volume which every lover of poetry will be glad to possess. The selection has been made with excellent judgment. We share his admiration of the "Nymphals," all of which are reprinted, but some of the sonnets might have been omitted with advantage. However, the book contains as much of Drayton as the general reader will require, and in compiling it Mr. Brett has done a real service to literature. We quote the following excellent appreciation of Drayton from the introduction: "Through all his work runs the same eminently English spirit, the same honesty and clearness of idea, the same solidity of purpose, and not infrequently of execution also; the same enthusiasm characterises all his earlier, and much of his later work: the enthusiasm especially characteristic of Elizabethan England, and shown by Drayton in his passion for England and the English, in his triumphant joy in their splendid past, and his certainty of their future glory. As a poet he lacked imagination and fine fury; he supplied their place by the airiest and clearest of fancies, by the strenuous labour of a great brain illumined by the steady flame of love for his country and for his lady."

* * *

ANOTHER useful reprint is "The Posies," being the first of two volumes of George Gascoigne's complete works, edited by Professor Cunliffe in the admirable series of "Cambridge English Classics" (Cambridge University Press, 4s. 6d. net). Gascoigne was nearly as voluminous a writer as Drayton, and, like him, is now almost forgotten, though with far greater reason. The present volume is a reprint of the 1575 edition of "The Posies," as "corrected, perfected, and augmented by the Authour," together with an appendix of the variant readings of the different quarto editions. The volume comes up to the standard which we now expect from the "Cambridge English Classics," but it is difficult to avoid regretting that so much scholarship and labour have been wasted on a writer who "has not bequeathed to English literature a single work or even a single line which is now read with enjoyment." The "Notes of Instruction Concerning the Making of Verse" are of value since they describe the practice of metrical composition during the years about 1575, when the treatise was written. It is interesting to note that the principle of Chaucer's versification had by then been so completely forgotten that Gascoigne regards Chaucer's metre as determined solely by the accent. As we have said, the volume is edited with extreme care for textual accuracy, and Professor Cunliffe's labours will be of value to students of Elizabethan metres, though few will be found to-day who read Gascoigne for the sake of "human enjoyment."

* * *

ONE difficulty in writing the life of a man such as Sir George Grey, who played a large part in great public questions, is to hold the balance evenly between biography proper and the history of those questions. Professor Henderson has elected to make his book, "Sir George Grey: Pioneer of Empire in Southern Lands" (Dent, 12s. 6d. net), a work of historical research rather than a biography in the usual sense of the word. The result is that Sir George Grey's singularly high, pure, and enlightened personality somehow fails to disengage itself from the crowd of political details. But although this is to be regretted, Professor Henderson's book, which is based upon original documents in New Zealand, South Africa, and South and Western Australia, is a most valuable contribution to colonial history from 1841, when, at the age of twenty-nine, Grey was sent to supersede Gawler as Governor of South Australia, up to his deposition from the Premiership of New Zealand in 1879. It is difficult to write impartially of many of the incidents in Grey's career, but, upon the whole, Professor Henderson succeeds. He has a warm admiration for Grey's character and achievement, but insists upon the unfairness of his attitude towards the Imperial Government and his persistent disobedience to instructions from Downing Street. "Sir George Grey was an autocrat, and it was almost impossible for men of independent judgment to work with him; but he was also the champion of liberal institutions, and seized every opportunity of extending the influence of the people in politics." As long as Sir George Grey worked under conditions that admitted of wide discretionary authority and personal initiative he was in the highest degree successful, but no man was less fitted to carry on the constitutional government of the colonies which was so largely the result of his own labours.

* * *

A CAPITAL book about one of the finest and most famous regiments in existence is "A Soldier of the Legion," by Mr. George Manington (Murray, 10s. 6d. net). Mr. Manington is a born adventurer who, the editors of the volume tell us, "though well under forty years of age, has been a student in France and Germany, a prospective doctor in Paris, a soldier in Algeria and Tonquin, a man of commerce in Indo-China, an interpreter, traveller, and journalist in South China, besides a participator in more fleeting occupations in many lands, including Japan and the Philippines." He was led by a realistic account of the fighting at El-Moungar to join the French Foreign Legion, and the story of his five years' service, told in a plain and unaffected style, makes most interesting reading. He formed a high opinion of both the officers and men, and is justly proud of the military efficiency of the corps. The discipline he describes as not being so severe as is generally thought, and he remarks that he never suffered any real inconvenience from it, most of the offences punished being due to drink, which is an even greater curse in the French army than in any other. What he says about training the infantrymen to perform long marches is particularly interesting. The recruits start on their first march with rifles and side-arms only, and cover a distance of about 12½ miles. This distance is gradually increased, as is also the weight carried, until a man loaded with all his kit, rifle, and bayonet, reserve food for two days, a blanket, an entrenching tool, and 120 rounds of ammunition—a total weight of about 50 pounds—can march nearly twenty-eight miles in ten hours with ease. This, he says, is what can be done by men who have been nine months with the colours—a fine performance considering that it is done under an almost tropical sun. Mr. Manington's experience included fighting in Tonquin, of which he gives a number of moving pictures.

* * *

"MEXICO OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY," by Mr. Percy F. Martin (Arnold, 2 vols., 30s. net), is a combination of history, gazetteer, and guide book. It deals with the different states of Mexico in detail, describing their scenery, climate, industries, and agricultural resources. Mr. Martin's book is much the fullest account we have of modern Mexico, and will doubtless remain for some time the standard book upon that country. But some of the details he gives might well have been omitted, and he might have easily reduced his two volumes to one without injuring the value of his work.

* * *

THE object of "King Edward VI.: An Appreciation," by Sir Clements R. Markham (Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d. net), is to show that in spite of his youth and the close atmosphere of intrigue in which his short life was spent, Edward VI. was by no means a cypher, but had a firm grasp upon affairs of State, and was, towards the close of his life, beginning to make his influence felt. The attempt is hardly a successful one. Sir Clements Markham has no new facts in store, and although we may pity the young king, who was only nine years old when he came to the throne, and died of consumption in his sixteenth year, we still feel that his reign was the reign of Somerset and of Northumberland. It is true that Edward's worst inheritance was the body of second-rate politicians named in his father's will, but the best that can be said of him is that he was a boy of remarkable powers.

Globe-Wernicke Office Furniture.

THE STANDARD FOR COMPARISON.

Offices and Libraries Equipped with Modern Furniture of Unsurpassed
Quality and at Reasonable Prices.

Made in OAK and MAHOGANY.

CASH or DEFERRED
PAYMENTS.

PACKING FREE. Orders of £2 CARRIAGE PAID to any goods station in the BRITISH ISLES. Send for Catalogue No. 188 D, free from

The Globe-Wernicke Co

Office and Library Furnishers, Ltd.

44, HOLBORN VIADUCT, | 82, VICTORIA-STREET,
London, E.C. | London, S.W.

Suction Gas Power.

80% REDUCTION
OF YOUR GAS ENGINE
GAS BILL.

TANGYES Ltd., Birmingham.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

ONE & ALL BULBS

The Brand Guarantees
One & All Quality.

ONE & ALL COLLECTIONS
OF FLOWERING
BULBS AND ROOTS.

Producing a most effective Display.

ESTABLISHED 1867.

ONE & ALL COLLECTION OF BULBS.

No. 1. For the Open Ground. Price 15/- 25 Anemones, finest mixed; 200 Crocus, in four colours; 13 Daffodils, double; 25 Daffodils, single; 24 Tulips, double, finest mixed; 24 Tulips, single; 24 Hyacinths, in three colours; 25 Iris, finest mixed; 25 Jonquils, Major; 25 Narcissus, Pheasant's Eye; 12 Narcissus, Polyanthus, mixed; 12 Narcissus, double white; 24 Ranunculus, finest mixed; 100 Snowdrops, selected; 25 Winter Aconites; 50 Scillas; 12 Allium Neapolitanum.

No. 2. For the Open Ground. Price 7/6. 12 Anemones, finest mixed; 150 Crocus, in four colours; 25 Tulips, double finest, mixed; 25 Tulips, single; 12 Hyacinths, in three colours; 12 Iris, finest mixed; 6 Daffodils, double; 12 Daffodils, single; 12 Narcissus, Pheasant's Eye; 12 Narcissus, double white; 60 Snowdrops, selected; 25 Winter Aconites; 12 Jonquils, single Major; 25 Scillas.

No. 3. For the Open Ground. Price 4/- 25 Snowdrops, selected; 100 Crocus, choice mixed; 25 Tulips, finest mixed; 12 Daffodils, double; 12 Narcissus, finest mixed; 12 Scillas; 12 Iris, finest mixed; 6 Hyacinths, choice mixed.

No. 4. For the Open Ground. Price 2/6. 12 Snowdrops, selected; 50 Crocus, choice mixed; 12 Tulips, finest mixed; 6 Daffodils, double; 6 Narcissus, finest mixed; 6 Scillas; 6 Iris, finest mixed; 3 Hyacinths, choice mixed.

No. 5. For Conservatory and Room Decoration. Price 16/- 24 Hyacinths, choice named; 12 Jonquils, double, sweet scented; 6 Polyanthus, Narcissus; 24 Tulips, named varieties; 100 Crocus, choice named varieties; 6 Early White Roman Hyacinths; 3 Lillium Harrisii; 12 Freesias; 24 Scilla Siberica; 50 Double Snowdrops.

No. 6. For Conservatory and Room Decoration. Price 8/- 12 Hyacinths, choice named; 12 Jonquils, double, sweet scented; 6 Polyanthus, Narcissus; 2 Lillium Harrisii; 18 Tulips, named varieties; 50 Crocus, choice named varieties; 12 Scilla Siberica; 6 Freesias; 25 Snowdrops; 3 Early White Roman Hyacinths.

No. 7. Popular Collection for the Open Ground. Price 1/- Containing 30 or more Bulbs of the following popular kinds—Snowdrops, selected; Crocus, choice mixed; Tulips, finest mixed; Daffodils, double; Narcissus, finest mixed; Scillas; Iris, finest mixed; Hyacinth, choice.

ONE & ALL is the registered Trade Mark of the AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL ASSOCIATION, Ltd. Name and address of nearest local agent, Catalogues and other details post free on application to Edward Owen Greening, Managing Director, Wholesale Seed Warehouses, 92, Long Acre, W.C.

ONE & ALL BULBS

BORD'S PIANOS

Illustrated
Lists of the
"BORD"

Pianos will be sent free, showing prices and rates of hire of the various Models, on the THREE YEARS' SYSTEM, from 15s. per month. Second-hand, from 10s. 6d. per month.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

The "BECHSTEIN" Pianos may also be had on the same system, at advantageous prices and terms.

LIBERAL DISCOUNT FOR CASH.

CHAS. STILES & CO.,

74 and 76, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

PIANOS EXCHANGED.

Rowntree's

ELECT COCOA

best for families

The Week in the City.

THE PANIC AND ITS PROGRESS.

THE sole topic of conversation in the City has again been the American crisis. It is not over; but rather it gets worse and worse, developing, as many observers predicted it would, on the lines of the panic of 1873; and all the optimistic statements issued from time to time in its early stages by Mr. Cortelyou, Mr. Pierpont Morgan, Mr. Rockefeller, the Supervisor of National Banks, and the Inspector of Trust Companies, have been falsified one by one with disconcerting rapidity. A premium on gold and legal money has been established in all the great towns of the United States through resort to the desperate but unavoidable device of Clearing House Certificates; for although these certificates are intended only for use between banks, they lead of necessity to the establishment of a sort of depreciated currency in the form of stamped cheques based not upon gold, but upon these inconvertible certificates. But the most extraordinary feature is the refusal of respectable banks to pay depositors. These institutions do not close their doors, but they suspend payment. We heard of a London bank telegraphing to a bank in California to pay a few thousand pounds to a certain wealthy client, and the answer was: "We can't do so; it is inconvenient." Apparently the best banks will not pay cash except in quite small amounts, and even then, apparently, it is only done at a premium. You pay two or three dollars before your cheque for 100 dollars is cashed. The only end one can see to it all is the summoning of Congress and the issue of a flood of inconvertible greenbacks. Possibly the President will do this on his own authority; but it would be a bold step, for it would be a terrible humiliation to the people of the United States. It is now admitted by the best informed correspondents in New York that the leading financiers themselves no longer pretend to expect any immediate revival of confidence. The suspension of cash payments will last for several weeks, possibly for several months. It seems to be admitted that a good many of the large trust companies are unsound, and there must be very many institutions whose assets after the tremendous collapse in the prices of American securities since the year began would fall far short of their liabilities. It is impossible for London to watch these untoward events without concern. There are many American houses in the City, and our commercial intercourse with America is enormous. The money famine in the United States requires large gold imports, and it is to be feared that it will be a long time before these requirements are satisfied. The rate of withdrawal has been so rapid that the Directors of the Bank of England, after raising the rate to 5½ per cent. on Thursday week, raised it to 6 on Monday. A 7 per cent. rate was looked for in the immediate future, but a good deal of apprehension was removed on Tuesday when it became known that the Bank of France would disgorge three millions, and that the Imperial Bank of Germany had at length reluctantly agreed to allow about a million of gold to be released. The relief, however, was short-lived. On Wednesday the Directors became aware of more enormous demands, and seeing that the American crisis was becoming more acute, they raised the rate to 7 per cent. on Thursday morning. This is the highest rate since 1873, when it had to go to 9 per cent. before the American drain could be stopped. It would not be at all surprising to see a higher rate again next week unless the situation is relieved on the other side by a big issue of inconvertible paper.

THE SITUATION IN AMERICA.

These exports of gold to America are a natural consequence of the collapse of credit. Cash is now required to carry through many commercial transactions which in normal times are performed by credit. The American newspapers, with the exception of those under the control of the financiers, freely recognise that the sudden distrust and alarm of the public, and especially of the small depositors, are perfectly intelligible, and that general confidence can only be restored by the elimination of the suspects from the control of banking institutions. This is one of the steps that are now being taken for the restoration of confidence, and we may be sure that far more will depend upon the thoroughness of this measure than upon the quantity of gold imported. I hear, by the way, that, Chicago is in an even worse plight for money than New York.

THE RAILWAY SETTLEMENT.

Mr. Lloyd George's triumph as Conciliator became known late on Wednesday, and gave a great fillip to the home railway market. On Thursday stocks opened again two or three points higher, but fell back later in the day when the 7 per cent. bank rate fell like a thunderbolt on the House. But the guarantee of undisturbed railways for the next seven years is a boon, the value of which can hardly be over-estimated. The monetary crisis will pass in a few days, or weeks, or months; but the good effects of Mr. George's successful mediation will be lasting. Trade may be set back by dearth of money, but it is a blessing to know that it will not be stopped by a railway block. I hear that a big company in the North is closing its works for want of orders; but, on the other hand, many branches of manufacturing industry are still very active and prosperous. Perhaps the most notable case is that of the Lancashire cotton spinners, who are making bigger profits than ever. The Board of Trade returns for October are wonderfully good. When the American panic and the monetary stringency have brought Stock Exchange securities a little lower, there will be plenty of liquid capital coming forward for investment from the prosperous manufacturers and merchants of Lancashire and the West Riding.

LUCELLUM.

STUDIES IN PICTURES.*

NOR since Mr. Robert Witt's "How to Look at Pictures," have we come across a book as light and stimulating as this. Under the title of "Old Masters Out of Place," Mr. Van Dyke shows us some of the disadvantages of the modern system of picture galleries, and then proceeds to some plain truths concerning restored and repainted masterpieces, copies, and forgeries, themes of the masters, and their workmanship. The second half of this volume is devoted to a general discussion, historical and critical, of figure, portrait, genre, landscape, and marine painting, and he has an excellent chapter on "The Animal in Art." Many of his remarks are worth pondering—particularly those on connoisseurship in the third chapter, on what to look for in that much-misconceived painter, Botticelli, and on the representation of character in a portrait. He has a wide and sound knowledge of the old masters, and this enables him to write intelligently about the moderns. We must, however, frankly disagree with some of his deductions about the latter. For example, to deny the influence of Constable upon the Barbizon school, on the grounds that Constable's "Hay Wain" was exhibited in the Salon in 1824, and that the Barbizon school did not take shape till some years later, savours a little too much of the traditional American disparagement of the Britisher. Constable's influence on French art assuredly did not end with the Salon sensation of 1824, nor even with his death in 1837. Discussing Claude's "classic landscape," Mr. Van Dyke ignores this master's claims as a painter of light. Surely the fact that he "set the sun in heaven" is not an unimportant part of his qualification for fame as a landscape pioneer. Then in regard to the pictorial rendering of animal movement, there is not a word of the manner in which this has been affected by instantaneous photography—a theme which M. de la Sizeranne has worked out exhaustively. It is strange, too, to find even a short and general review of marine painting in the nineteenth century, without so much as a passing mention either of H. W. Mesdag or Henry Moore, neither does the amusing reference to the "tombstone and porcelain sheep" of Verboeckhoven seem complete without the name of the latter's faithful pupil, Thomas Sidney Cooper. However, these "Studies in Later Pictures" are readable enough, and, in the main, suggestive enough to compensate one for any unsympathetic points of view or minor blemishes they may contain.

* "Studies in Pictures: An Introduction to the Famous Galleries." By John C. Van Dyke. With Illustrations. London: T. Werner Laurie. 6s. net.

Restful nights
and wakeful days when you use

Plasmon Cocoa.

CONTAINS NEARLY 70%
NOURISHMENT.

START USING NOW.

MAPLE & CO

ARE SPECIALISTS
FOR COMFORTABLE

CLUB & LOUNGE CHAIRS & SETTEES

Inspection invited, or Illustrated
Catalogue of Chairs sent free

LARGEST STOCK IN THE WORLD

LONDON PARIS BUENOS AIRES

GUNN SECTIONAL BOOKCASE

THE "GUNN" is a Real Home for Books. It affords Protection from Dust and Damp, and is easily adaptable to the Growing Needs of the Book-lover. Handsome Appearance. First-class Material, and Excellent Workmanship throughout.

THE "GUNN"

IS THE BEST PROCURABLE.

Write for Descriptive Booklet No. 16, giving illustrations of the Various Styles with Full Particulars and Prices, sent Post Free on Application.

Wm. ANGUS & Co., Ltd.,
63, Paul St., Finsbury, London, E.C.

Waterman's Ideal Fountain Pen

Incomparably Best!

The position Waterman's Ideal has gained in the esteem of the writing public is that position which is gained by any article which stands as a standard of its type—a commanding lead through sheer merit.

The Waterman Patent Spoon-Feed in itself is sufficient to place Waterman's Ideal far above other fountain pens. Waterman's Ideal does not leak or spurt—it writes steadily all the time, and is absolutely reliable.

Prices 10/6, 15/., 17/6, 21/., and upwards. In Silver and Gold for presentation. Of Stationers, Jewellers, &c. Illustrated Booklet, post free, from L. and C. HARDTMUTH, 12, Golden Lane, London, E.C. (New York—173, Broadway.)

Nervous Disorders

A deficiency of the phosphates causes a lowering of nervous tone, indicated by exhaustion, restlessness, headache or insomnia.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate (Non-Alcoholic)

supplies the nerve cells with health-giving life force, restores strength and induces restful sleep without the use of dangerous drugs.

An Ideal Tonic in Nervous Diseases

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 152 Old Street, London, E. C.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

KINGSLEY HOTEL, Near the British Museum.
Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

THACKERAY HOTEL, Opposite the British Museum.
Great Russell Street, London.

These well-appointed and commodious Temperance Hotels will, it is believed, meet the requirements, at moderate charges, of those who desire all the conveniences and advantages of the larger modern Licensed Hotels. These Hotels have Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every floor, spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard, and Smoking Rooms, heated throughout. Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte, Breakfast and Dinner, From 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

Full Tariff and Testimonials on application.

Telegraphic Addresses—

Kingsley Hotel, "Bookcraft, London." Thackeray Hotel, "Thackeray, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curple. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

BOOKSELLERS.

A SHILLING ILLUSTRATED BIBLE.

This Bible is printed in clear Pearl type, and contains 16 Photographic Views, 16 beautiful Figure Pictures after Collier, Delaroche, Hoffmann, Reynolds, Titian, etc.; 2 beautiful Illuminated Title Pages and Maps; tastefully bound in imitation leather, gilt edges, and round corners, 1s. 3d. post free, or 6 copies for 6s. 6d. post free. Also with references, Scripture Index, and Atlas, 1s. 9d., 6 for 9s. 9d., post free. Catalogues Post Free.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,
53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

A. LIONEL ISAACS, 5, Pall Mall, S.W.
(CARLTON HOTEL BUILDING).

Choice Books.
Rare Autographs and MSS.
Pictures and Prints.

CATALOGUES ISSUED.

TELEPHONE: 1724 CENTRAL.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.
[And at READING.]

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

ARUNDEL CHROMOS.

LARGE number in Stock. Many rare ones.—Send stamp for this month's list (giving size and shape of each). Saint Jude's Depot, Birmingham.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1842.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.
PRICE 8d. By Post, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2.
COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C.,
and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc.
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

CHINGFORD, ESSEX.

ROYAL FOREST HOTEL. Mr. John Brill.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALDON.

TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill. C. Simens, Manager.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MANCHESTER.

THE PRINCES CAFE. Oxford Street.

THE DEANS GATE HOTEL. Deansgate.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

Boys from this PUBLIC SCHOOL have done well at the Universities. The School stands in its own grounds of about 45 acres, high above the town and the Thames Valley. For Honours List, Prospectus, particulars of Scholarships, and other information, apply to the Headmaster, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School.

HASLEMERE, SURREY.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD SCHOOL for GIRLS. Sandy soil; nine acres of ground; nearly 600 ft. above sea level. Principals: Miss AMY KEMP, Camb. Certif. for Theory and Practice of Teaching (St. George's Training College, Edinburgh); Diploma for the Teaching of German (Berlin); and Miss HELEN T. NEILD, M.A. (Vict.), Classical Tripos (Camb.), Certificated Student of Girton College; 11 years at the Mount School, York.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager, R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C. Telegrams: "TRIFORM. LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS. BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery. Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS:—Entries close December 3rd, Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES. Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH.

The next ENTRANCE EXAMINATION will be held at the SCHOOL on DECEMBER 3RD & 4TH.

For particulars of admission on the FOUNDATION apply to the HEADMASTER.

BEFORE SELECTING A SCHOOL OR TUTOR

PARENTS SHOULD OBTAIN A COPY OF

"A Practical Guide to Schools, Tutors, and Educational Homes,"

PUBLISHED BY TRUMAN & KNIGHTLEY,

Containing full particulars (including number of pupils, fees, etc.) of over 1,000 establishments in Great Britain and on the Continent. Price 6d. To be obtained post free from the publishers. Address:—6, Holles Street, Cavendish Square, London, W.

LECTURES.

Lectures on Art and Architecture

FOR EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS AND SCHOOLS,

By ERNEST RADFORD, LL.M., CANTAB., formerly Secretary of the Arts and Crafts Exhibition.

Mr. Radford has recently Lectured for the Education Department of the London County Council.

For terms and particulars of Courses and Single Lectures kindly apply to the Lecturer, 1, Portland Villas, Hampstead, N.W.

MR. BERNARD SHAW'S

FIRST CONTRIBUTION

APPEARED IN

Public Opinion.

Mr. Bernard Shaw's first published contribution appeared in PUBLIC OPINION for April 3rd, 1875. It was a letter concerning Moody and Sankey, and has quite the Shavian manner.

THIS LETTER IS REPRINTED IN

THIS WEEK'S ISSUE (NOV. 8th) OF

PUBLIC OPINION,

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF CURRENT THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY
TWO PENCE WEEKLY.

Post free to any part of the World, 13/- Yearly, or 10/10 for the United Kingdom.

Offices: 30 & 31, Temple House, Tallis Street, London, E.C.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—Neale's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Carl Johans Gade, 41 and 43.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Capetown—Messrs. Gordon and Gotch; Messrs. J. C. Juta and Co.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.	Narrow Column. ½ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ... }	£10 0 0	£5 10 0	£3 0 0	£3 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 10 0	2 10 0	3 0 0
Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:
13 Insertions	8d. per line.
52	6d. ..

NEW ART VOLUMES.

HUBERT & JOHN VAN EYCK.

THEIR LIFE AND WORK. By W. H. JAMES WEALE. With upwards of 60 illustrations. Quarto, 105s. net. The published price of this work will be reduced to Four Guineas net to subscribers whose orders, accompanied by remittance, are received on or before the day of publication. Ready next week.

LEGEND IN JAPANESE ART.

A Description of Historical Episodes, Legendary Characters, Folk-Lore, Myths, Religious Symbolism, Illustrated in the Arts of Old Japan. By HENRI L. JOLY. With upwards of 500 illustrations, including sixteen full-page prints in colour. 4to, 84s. net.

HISTORICAL & BIOGRAPHICAL.

COKE OF NORFOLK

AND HIS FRIENDS. The Life of THOMAS WILLIAM COKE, first Earl of Leicester, of Holkham, containing an account of his Ancestry, Surroundings, Public Services, and Private Friendships, and including many Unpublished Letters from noted men of his day, English and American. By A. M. W. STIRLING. With 20 Photographs and 43 other illustrations reproduced from Contemporary Portraits, Prints, &c. Demy 8vo. Two volumes. 32s. net.

"It is quite impossible to convey any idea . . . of the wealth of anecdote, the human interest, for social and political history in this remarkable book. Coke of Norfolk was an extraordinary man . . . But these volumes amount to more than a biography of one notable personage; they contain a wonderful magazine and storehouse of the anecdotic history of the times.—TRIBUNE."

NAPOLEON AND THE INVASION OF ENGLAND.

THE STORY OF THE GREAT TERROR. By H. F. B. WHEELER and A. M. BROADLEY. With 114 Full-page illustrations, including 8 in Colour, reproduced from an unique collection of contemporary Caricatures, Broad-sides, Songs, &c. Two vols., demy 8vo, 32s. net.

THE HEART OF GAMBETTA.

Translated from the French of FRANCIS LAUR by VIOLETTE MONTAGU. With Portraits and other illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. net.

In THE HEART OF GAMBETTA is narrated the influence of M^{lle}. LEONIE LEON upon the destinies of an unhappy country through her unfaltering love for the statesman who may be said to have saved France. The question of GAMBETTA'S interview with Bismarck, the subject of a recent controversy, is thoroughly dealt with, and a special feature is MR. JOHN MACDONALD'S Introduction.

DEVONSHIRE CHARACTERS

AND STRANGE EVENTS. By S. BARING-GOULD, M.A., Author of "Yorkshire Oddities." Demy 8vo, 21s. net. A fascinating book, by S. BARING-GOULD, containing 58 illustrations, including many Portraits from unique paintings, and 62 chapters dealing with subjects so varied as "Wife Sales," "White Witches," "Pirates," "Smugglers," "Jack Russell," "Dr. Budd of Plymouth," "Rear-Admiral Sir Edward Chichester," "Prout," and "Haydon." Many of the strange, daring characters in this Collection are not to be found in any other place, not even in Prince's "Worthies," to which famous volume it practically becomes an indispensable supplement. Mr. Baring-Gould has far exceeded all past records in producing an entertaining volume.

POETRY AND DRAMA.

NEW POEMS. By STEPHEN PHILLIPS.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

"A remarkable volume, rich in the pure gold of poetry. . . . Mr. Phillips can conjure up in a few virile lines of haunting beauty a picture which makes its own instant appeal, even to the most fastidious of critics."—Standard.

THE ENGLISH STAGE OF TO-DAY.

By DR. MARIO BORSA. Translated from the original Italian and Edited, with Preface, by SELWYN BRINTON, M.A. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

POEMS OF COLERIDGE.

Edited with an Introduction by ERNEST HARTLEY COLERIDGE, and over 100 illustrations by GERALD METCALFE. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

WAGNERIAN ROMANCES. By GERTRUDE HALL. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A NEW COLOUR BOOK.

THE ISLE OF PURBECK.

By IDA WOODWARD. With 36 illustrations in Colour by J. W. G. BOND. Crown 4to, 21s. net.

NEW NOVELS.

OPEN HATCHWAYS.

By the Hon. HENRY COKE, Author of "Tracks of a Rolling Stone." Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE MALICE OF THE STARS.

By E. W. DE GUERIN. Crown 8vo, 6s.

JOHN LANE, The Bodley Head, London & New York.

MESSRS. BELL'S NEW BOOKS.

Post 8vo, with Portrait, 10s. 6d. net.

THE ROMAN JOURNALS OF FERDINAND GREGOROVIVUS (1852-1874).

Edited by FRIEDRICH ALTHAUS. Translated from the Second German Edition by Mrs. GUSTAVUS W. HAMILTON.

"Of the things and the people he saw it is impossible to give even in outline here. Few people, one might imagine, could have written a dull diary of events in Rome between 1852 and 1874; yet few could have combined so vivid an account of the steps in the struggle between old and new with so accurate a judgment of the forces at work and so haunting a spirit of affectionate reverence for the old. He loved Rome, and he understood, if he could not love, the Latin character. To read his journal is to see Papal Rome through keen but reverent eyes."—Times.

READY IMMEDIATELY. Small 4to, Illustrated, 10s. 6d. net.

QUEEN MARY'S BOOK.

A Collection of Poems and Essays by Mary Queen of Scots. Edited by Mrs. STEWART ARBUTHNOT.

Demy 8vo, with 7 Portraits, 15s. net.

THE ELIZABETHAN RELIGIOUS SETTLEMENT.

A Study of Contemporary Documents. By HENRY NORBERT BIRT, O.S.B., Priest at Downside Abbey.

16mo, 2s. 6d. net.

DAILY THOUGHTS FROM HORACE.

Selected and Arranged by the Hon. F. H. WATKINS, I.S.O., Commissioner of Turk's and Caicos Islands.

NEW VOLUME OF THE "BRITISH ARTISTS" SERIES.

Post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

GEORGE MORLAND.

By G. C. WILLIAMSON, Litt.D. With 4 Coloured Plates and 78 other illustrations.

NOW READY.—Post 8vo, 6s. net.

HOW TO COLLECT POSTAGE-STAMPS.

By BERTRAM T. K. SMITH. With 48 Plates, illustrating upwards of 750 specimens.

READY IMMEDIATELY.—Post 8vo, 6s. net.

HOW TO COLLECT CONTINENTAL CHINA.

By C. H. WYLDE. With 40 Plates, and upwards of 600 Facsimiles of Marks.

Crown 4to, 5s. net.

THE PETER PAN PICTURE BOOK.

The Story of Peter Pan retold by DANIEL O'CONNOR, from the Play by J. M. Barrie. With 28 illustrations in Colour by ALICE B. WOODWARD. Also an EDITION DE LUXE, printed on hand-made paper, with the Plates mounted. 10s. 6d. net.

THE ENDYMION SERIES.

NEW AND CHEAPER UNIFORM EDITION.

Post 8vo, 3s. 6d. net each.

"It may justly be claimed for the charming Endymion Series that it is the best illustrated edition of the British poets that has yet appeared."—Studio.

POEMS BY JOHN KEATS. Illustrated and Decorated by ROBERT ANNING BELL. With an Introduction by Professor WALTER RALEIGH, M.A. 4th Edition.

POEMS BY ROBERT BROWNING. Illustrated and Decorated by BYAM SHAW. With an Introduction by RICHARD GARNETT, LL.D., C.B. 3rd Edition.

POEMS BY PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY. Illustrated and Decorated by ROBERT ANNING BELL. With an Introduction by Professor WALTER RALEIGH, M.A.

POEMS BY TENNYSON. Illustrated and Decorated by ELEANOR FORTESCUE BRICKDALE.

ENGLISH LYRICS from Spenser to Milton. Illustrated and Decorated by R. ANNING BELL. Selected. With an Introduction by JOHN DENNIS.

THE POEMS OF EDGAR ALLEN POE. Illustrated and Decorated by W. HEATH ROBINSON. With an Introduction by NOEL WILLIAMS.

London:

GEORGE BELL & SONS, York House, Portugal St., W.C.

The Nation

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1907.

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD'S NEW BOOKS.

A GREAT BOOK OF TRAVEL.

NOTICE.—Lieut. BOYD ALEXANDER'S account of his tremendous Expedition will be ready on Tuesday, November 19th. It is called FROM THE NIGER TO THE NILE, and will be issued in 2 vols. profusely illustrated, large medium 8vo, price 36s. net. Early orders are recommended.

MAGNIFICENT NEW ART VOLUME.

A GALLERY OF PORTRAITS. By Helleu.

Containing first-rate Reproductions of 24 Portraits from Original Etchings by PAUL HELLEU. With Introduction by FREDERICK WEDMORE. Crown folio (20 in. by 15 in.), 25s. net.

 This choice selection of portraits of fair women represents the first attempt to issue the work of this gifted and popular artist in a form which brings it within the reach of people of moderate means. No one who sees them can deny that they have retained the delicacy and charm of the originals.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

THE ELECTION OF ISABEL. THE ELECTION OF ISABEL.

WORLD.—"It would not be easy to name a rival to the entirely admirable example of the writer's talent, which now appeals with complete & propos to public favour by a captivating combination of wit, wisdom, good feeling, good taste, and a truly diverting style."

HIS FIRST LEAVE. HIS FIRST LEAVE.

The New Novel by
L. ALLEN HARKER.

"This tale of yours, of love and strength and beauty, 'His First Leave' (Arnold), is, if I must guess, A man's for love of truth and sense of duty, A woman's for its charm and tenderness."

—Punch to the Author.

THE DESERT VENTURE. A Fine THE DESERT VENTURE. Romance by FRANK SAVILE.

World.—"The story is thrilling from the outset. Mr. Savile has a great power of description, and a strong sense of drama is also among his gifts. The tale of the awful moment when Speedwell 'wiped the slate clean' is instinct with that rare quality."

A LURID PICTURE OF RUSSIA TO-DAY. OUT OF CHAOS. a Personal Story of the Revolution in Russia.

By PRINCE MICHAEL TRUBETZKOI. Translated by E. Livermore. Cloth, 6s.

An English Version of 'Mes Origines.'

MEMOIRS OF MISTRAL. Rendered into English by CONSTANCE MAUD. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

Tribune.—"To many cultivated English readers Miss Maud's translation, together with the included selection of lyrics, will reveal an undiscovered realm of gold."

THE GROWTH OF MODERN NATIONS: a History of the Particularist Form of Society. Translated from the French of HENRI DE TOURVILLE by G. M. LOCH. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

Birmingham Post.—"This is one of those rare books that make a sure and unforgettable contribution to a reader's equipment. The book is remarkable for its scope and range of thought, the masterly boldness of its generalisations, its power of epitomising epochs in history, its logic, its orderly arrangement of ideas, its lucidity, its power to enchain the attention."

Prof. Elton's New Book.

MODERN STUDIES. By OLIVER ELTON, M.A., Professor of English Literature in the University of Liverpool. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Outlook.—"Mr. Elton's studies are full of enlightenment and keen pleasure for those who read great books."

THE MYSTERY OF MARIA STELLA, LADY NEWBOROUGH. By Sir RALPH PAYNE-GALLWEY, Bart. Demy 8vo, with many Illustrations, 7s. 6d. net.

Evening Standard.—"A romantic story, for the truth of which Sir Ralph argues well. Whether one is convinced or not, the book is entertaining."

Daily Mail.—"Altogether a very strange story."

NEW BOOKS OF TRAVEL.

MEXICO OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY. By PERCY F. MARTIN, F.R.G.S. With over 100 Illustrations and Map. 2 vols. demy 8vo, 30s. net.

Morning Post.—"It has the great merit of being at the same time comprehensive and entertaining; it is admirably arranged and beautifully illustrated."

Mr. CHIOZZA MONEY, M.P., in the Daily News.—"Mr. Martin's book is a welcome one, and he has done his work so thoroughly that his pages may be commended to all students of world development."

ACROSS PERSIA. By E. CRAWSHAY WILLIAMS. With Numerous illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

RAILWAY ENTERPRISE IN CHINA: An Account of its origin and development. By P. H. KENT. With Maps, 12s. 6d. net.

Nation.—"Mr. Kent may be warmly congratulated on having produced the standard authority on a subject of immense commercial and financial interest."

OPEN-AIR BOOKS.

MY ROCK GARDEN. By REGINALD FARRER. With numerous Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Evening Standard.—"Even the layman, confused by Mr. Farrer's erudition and technicalities, will confess the charm which invests both text and illustrations in this book of the rock-garden."

A Book for Parents.

AN INTRODUCTION TO CHILD STUDY. By W. B. DRUMMOND, M.B., Author of "The Child: his Nature and Nurture." Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

A Charming Book for Boys and Girls.

THE GOLDEN PORCH: By W. HUTCHINSON. With Illustrations. 5s.

A book of Greek Fairy Tales, on the lines of Hawthorne's "Wonder Book."

Please write for prospectus of these Publications and for the Illustrated Pamphlet "A Winter's Reading," which will be sent post free on application.

London: EDWARD ARNOLD, 41 and 43, Maddox Street, Bond Street, W.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

SECOND IMPRESSION NOW READY.

LEAVES FROM THE NOTE-BOOKS OF LADY DOROTHY NEVILL.

Edited by RALPH NEVILL. With Photogravure Portraits, 8vo, 15s. net.

The DAILY CHRONICLE.—"Here is a jolly volume, and it should encourage many to live long and reach the ripeness and tolerance of this queen among grandmothers. For Lady Dorothy has discovered and practised 'l'art d'être grand-mère.' She has lived long, she has had many interests, she has touched life at every point between the garden and the Cabinet; she has known nearly everybody of importance since Watts painted her portrait as a little maid from school—and such a sweet little maid—in 1844. She has sat and watched the world for all these years with kindly, humorous, and quizzical eyes. And now once again she invites us to sit beside her on the sofa in the corner of the drawing-room and hear her comments on men and matters of the past and the present. . . . Lady Dorothy Nevill is a charming companion, a delightful critic, and her corner on the sofa will always be flanked by eager listeners."

The OBSERVER.—"This is a most amusing work, and a very encyclopædia of racy anecdotes and good things. It is not merely a compendium of Society gossip, the best of which is apt to fatigue; it is an honest retrospect of a long life spent among the best people in England, people who were people, who did things, who left themselves behind them."

The TRIBUNE.—"Lady Dorothy Nevill has done a great service to posterity in handing down reminiscences of such exceptional value, both as to time and experience, and her note-books and scrap-books have provided many a record which would otherwise have been lost for ever."

The STANDARD.—"There is a delightful air of intimacy, good humour, and candour about this new volume of Lady Dorothy Nevill's reminiscences. Indeed if we closed our eyes we could easily imagine that through these pages Lady Dorothy herself was speaking to us—unlocking a precious treasure-house of observation and experiences, and reminding us, personally, with many a quaint jest and quick turn of thought, of days and of people whose steps now sound but faintly in the dusty corridors of years. . . . The volume is peculiarly rich in good stories."

The DAILY MAIL.—"The new volume is full of anecdotes, full of charming memories, charmingly related, and it is safe to say will have a wide sale. . . . This witty and alluring book will find a multitude of readers. One takes leave of its attractive pages with genuine regret."

WILLIAM ALLINGHAM

A Diary Edited by H. ALLINGHAM and D. RADFORD. With Portraits, 8vo, 12s. net.

 With intimate personal recollections of Tennyson, Carlyle, D. G. Rossetti, and other famous men.

The DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"Should take its place as a valuable addition to the literature dealing with the literary life of the second half of the nineteenth century."

COUNTRY LIFE.—"There is scarcely a page on which we do not hit on some interesting reminiscences about one of the great literary men of the day."

The DAILY NEWS.—"There are few journals richer in curiosities of the natural history of the eminent."

The MORNING POST.—"This is a book of real weight and great interest, not only as the product of a most thoughtful and accomplished mind, itself creative in a due and delicate manner, but because it presents to us as in a clear mirror (and not as in a glass darkly) the images of four of the most eminent men of the Victorian Age—Tennyson, Browning, Carlyle, and Rossetti."

The EVENING STANDARD.—"A book which leaves the reader delighted. . . . A diary is usually most skippable, but this must and will be carefully read, inasmuch as almost every line of it is arresting."

OLD SPANISH MASTERS.

Engraved by TIMOTHY COLE. With Historical Notes by CHARLES H. CAFFIN, and Comments by the Engraver. Imperial 8vo, 31s. 6d. net.

EDITION DE LUXE, with the Text printed on Hand-Made Paper, and the Plates printed on Japanese Paper at Hand Press, £10 10s. net.

THE BRUSHWOOD BOY.

By RUDYARD KIPLING. With Illustrations in Colour by F. H. TOWNSEND. 8vo, 6s.

THE POCKET KIPLING.

Scarlet limp leather, 5s. net per vol. Vol. 5.—WEE WILLIE WINKIE.

GRANFORD SERIES.—New Volume.

SILAS MARNER.

By GEORGE ELIOT. With Illustrations in Colour and Black-and-White by HUGH THOMSON. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, with gilt edges, 6s. [Nov. 15.]

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

ARETHUSA. By F. MARION CRAWFORD.

THE STOOPING LADY. By MAURICE HEWLETT.

THE ANGEL OF FORGIVENESS.

By ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY.

THE FRUIT OF THE TREE.

By EDITH WHARTON.

[Shortly.]

THE MAN-EATERS OF TSAVO, And Other East African Adventures.

By Lieut.-Colonel J. H. PATTERSON, D.S.O. With numerous Illustrations, 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

FREDERIC HARRISON.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF COMMON SENSE.

Extra Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

5th and Cheaper Edition.

RAMBLES AND STUDIES IN GREECE

By J. P. MAHAFFY, C.V.O. Globe 8vo, 5s. net. [Tuesday.]

ENGLAND AND GERMANY,

Republished from the Observer.

By AUSTIN HARRISON.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

CONCLUDING VOL. NOW READY.

A HISTORY OF THE INQUISITION OF SPAIN.

By HENRY CHARLES LEA, LL.D. In 4 vols. Vol. IV., 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Previously published, Vols. I., II., and III., 10s. 6d. net each.

A GARDEN OF SHADOWS.

By ETHEL TINDAL ATKINSON. With 8 Illustrations by BYAM SHAW. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

LEXICON TO THE ENGLISH POETICAL WORKS OF MILTON.

By Professor LAURA E. LOCKWOOD, Ph.D. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

J. R. ILLINGWORTH'S NEW BOOK.

THE DOCTRINE OF THE TRINITY.

Apologetically Considered. By J. R. ILLINGWORTH, M.A., D.D. Crown 8vo, 6s.

* * Messrs. Macmillan will be glad to receive applications for their Illustrated List of Recent and Forthcoming Publications, which will be sent regularly to any address.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

The Nation

	INDEX.	PAGE
WORDSWORTH ONCE MORE	- - - - -	207
THE "PLANET KING"	- - - - -	208
THE SWAN OF LICHFIELD	- - - - -	208
THE GROWTH OF SHAKESPEARE'S ART	- - - - -	210
EARLY ENGLISH LYRICS	- - - - -	211
THREE ARAB CITIES	- - - - -	212
THE WANDERING SCHOLAR	- - - - -	214
THE RELIGION OF THE SPIRIT	- - - - -	214
THE WORLD OF THE SIX-SHILLING SHOCKER	- - - - -	216
PETER PAN, HIS BOOK	- - - - -	218

WORDSWORTH ONCE MORE.*

THIS pleasant book does not add to our knowledge, but it gives the kaleidoscope a shake and a turn, and the mirrors produce an interesting pattern. Wordsworth is at the centre, and many of his contemporaries appear in the aspects in which they stood related to him. Mr. Rannie does not create any new combinations of thought or feeling, but he feels once again in a genuine way what many have felt before him; he has a liberal enjoyment of what is excellent in literature; he constructs no startling theories and he chases no brilliant paradoxes. His list of "Principal Authorities" is considerable, but it omits several books of great importance, among them Mr. E. H. Coleridge's "Letters of S. T. Coleridge," and Warton's collection of Southey's Letters. Legouis' "La Jeunesse de Wordsworth" is mentioned, but "La Révolution Française et les Poètes Anglais," by Dr. Charles Cestre, is omitted. Mr. T. Hutchinson's admirable editions of "Lyrical Ballads" and Wordsworth's "Poems" of 1807 should certainly have been included in Mr. Rannie's list.

But the chief thing is that he has an excellent capacity for enjoyment, and that his enjoyment is intelligent and sane. Perhaps in his sympathy with the Romantic movement he is not quite just to the preparatory work of the eighteenth century—and not merely of the romantic part of its literature. It is true that a great literary revolution took place; but even through a revolution the past runs on. Tocqueville showed that in the methods of the French Revolution not a little of the spirit of the Ancien Régime survived, and was operative. Something of the same kind could be shown in the case of every literary revolt. The revolters cannot create the Year One; they carry on a tradition even while opposing it. The eighteenth century had taught English poetry, in its own inadequate way, to muse "on Man, on Nature, and on Human Life." It had greatly widened the scope of poetic meditation. Young's "Night Thoughts" may be often glittering and insincere; but Young in his own way had thought and felt about human life as a whole. Thomson's style may often be rhetorical, and his diction may be artificial; but Thomson had seen wide prospects of sky and earth. Macpherson's Ossian was scorned by the great veracious dalesman; but Macpherson had helped to prepare an audience—slow to distinguish between reality and unreality, but still a startled audience—for Wordsworth. Even Erasmus Darwin with his "vegetable loves" had helped to create a sense of the all-pervading, unceasing life and energy of nature:—

"o'er the wreck, emerging from the storm,
Immortal nature lifts her changeful form,
Mounts from her funeral pyre on wings of flame,
And soars and shines, another and the same!"

Much of eighteenth century poetry was, either professedly or in fact, didactic; and it is by no means to the disadvantage of some of Wordsworth's noblest "trances of thought and mountings of the mind" in "The Excursion," that they rise from substantial, didactic, pedestrian levels. His acquaintance with his poetical predecessors of two or three generations is curiously illustrated by his choice of extracts for Lady Mary Lowther's album, as may be seen in the little volume carefully edited from the MS. by Professor Little-dale. Wordsworth's politics—as declared in his best political writings in prose and verse—were in profound harmony with the wisdom of Edmund Burke, whose person and whose teaching he describes in a memorable passage of the seventh book of "The Prelude." Yes; throughout the revolt of Wordsworth against the utilitarian age of prose some of the most potent influences of the eighteenth century found a transformation indeed, but remained still present.

*"Wordsworth and his Circle." By David Watson Rannie, M.A. Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.

The political conservatism of Wordsworth's elder years, if understood aright, requires no apology. He venerated man, and what is spiritual in man. He lived in an age of great mechanical and industrial progress. He valued every scientific victory over the forces of external nature, but he thought that machinery was made for men and not men for machinery. He was never a Whig, but, as he intimated not very long before his death, a good deal of the Chartist lay within him. He regarded the British constitution and the English Established Church with the idealising eye of a poet; but he looked forward with ardent hope to changes in society much greater than those which were the immediate objects of the political reformers. He anticipated some of the reforming spirit of the present day. He would in many things have approved the quarrel with nineteenth century society which gave birth to the fears and also the hopes of Ruskin, and he would not have disapproved some of the dreams of William Morris. In 1835—in the Postscript to "Yarrow Revisited"—he uttered a condemnation of the laissez faire policy of the utilitarian doctrinaires of the day. He maintained that all persons, whether feeble and old or able-bodied, who cannot find employment or procure wages sufficient to support the body in health and strength, are entitled to State support; he maintained that a Christian Government should stand in loco parentis toward all its subjects, and that the claim of the State to allegiance involves the duty of paternal protection; he was among the early advocates of co-operative industry, in which the workers possess a share of the capital. With both Wordsworth and Southey national education was a matter of the deepest interest; but they did not believe that cramming a child with hard pellets of "useful knowledge" is the only means of education.

It is good to see that Mr. Rannie, with his generous literary sympathies, has found enjoyment in the poetry of Southey. Work which gave pleasure to Coleridge and Landor, to Cardinal Newman and Dean Stanley and Sir Henry Taylor, has in it a virtue which may again make itself felt. Mr. Rannie dwells upon Southey's art and style in his longer poems. Possibly he is not sufficiently an intimate of the man Southey to feel how he has impressed his personal character on such poems as "Thalaba" and "Kehama." The ethical elevation of "Thalaba" comes direct from Southey's own aspiring moral feeling. The fortitude and patience of "Kehama" are reflected from that Stoical philosophy which the writer had taken deeply into his heart. Mr. Rannie says a passing hasty word of Southey's marriage with Caroline Bowles, which he would be the first to regret if he were fully acquainted with the facts. It was a wise and honourable union of two old friends who desired to give each such help and comfort to the other as was possible in their elder years. The writer of this article has had the privilege of reading the unpublished letters of Southey which led up to his marriage; they are grave, dignified, and beautiful in feeling. The mental failure which followed before long defeated a design that might well have been expected to result in much sober happiness and usefulness.

On the identification of persons in Wordsworth's

"Castle of Indolence" stanzas, Mr. Rannie should consult an article by Mr. T. Hutchinson in "The Fortnightly Review," November, 1894. He is almost certainly in error in identifying Wordsworth's Peele Castle with the castle in the Isle of Man.

EDWARD DOWDEN.

THE "PLANET KING."*

SPAIN had, of course, begun to be decadent before the accession, at sixteen years of age, of the sovereign whose melancholy and disastrous reign Major Hume has so admirably described for us. To go no farther back than to the opening of the last decade of Philip II. (the second of the Hapsburg line, under whom the unity of the Peninsula was completed), it was in 1588 that the overweening Spanish designs against England were so utterly undone by the destruction of the grand Armada. Twenty-one years later, in 1609, Philip III. gave the Moors three days in which to clear out of Spain. They went, and with them took—for good and all—the prosperity of the country. The expulsion of the Jews under Ferdinand and Isabella in 1492 (the year of Columbus's discovery of the West Indies) was an act scarcely defensible on economic grounds, but its results were very far indeed from ruining the Peninsula. Ruin and nothing less, however, followed the compulsory exodus of the Moriscos. Trade, manufactures, and agriculture were left to decay and perish. "The resources of Spain, already exhausted," says another historian, "never recovered from this terrible blow."

Dismal enough, therefore, was the prospect faced by the boy King, Philip IV. (so absurdly styled the "Great" and the "Planet King"), when in 1621 he ascended the throne of his father. He did not in the least realise it—long was it before he truly did so—but if he had realised it to the full, would his policy have been different? It is very doubtful. For Major Hume shows us early in his history that the new Philip had been saddled by his immediate predecessor with the mad scheme that had been blindly adhered to for generations, and that he had dutifully accepted it. And what scheme was this? Every student of Spanish history knows it. It was the scheme of religious unity, the most recent fruit of which had been the insanely impolitic expulsion of the Moors. Certain it is that Spain was no longer wealthy enough to face half Europe in arms, to "force orthodoxy on unwilling princes and populations with the resources of ruined Castile alone." Yet Philip IV., when he had been but three years upon the throne, a somewhat brilliant, very indolent, bigoted, good-hearted youth, found himself

"enclosed in the vicious circle which the impossible policy of saddling Spain with the defence and assertion of the Catholic faith throughout the world had imposed upon his doomed house."

With the terrible Richelieu and the European league presently against him, Philip should have abandoned that untenable position in his foreign relations, and devoted his energies to "the concentration of nation resources for the promotion of productive industry and interior economy." This he did not do; and his refusal is justly characterised by Major Hume as "Philip's life tragedy."

Gay and even witty in private among his intimates, a lover of books, music, and pictures (a just, generous, and devoted patron of Velasquez), Philip was fated in the intervals of careless pleasures to a life of wretchedness and remorse; and the end of a reign of forty-five years was the overthrow of the nation, the black despair of the King, and "all quenched in a great wave of tears." What a picture is this that follows:—

"Philip the Great! 'The Planet King,' as the flattering poets called him, this pale, long-faced, sallow young man of twenty-one, who came back to his capital in the spring of 1626 already embittered and disillusioned, confronted by wars and threats of wars on all sides, overwhelmed with poverty, yet inflated with pride; seeking escape from his troubles in the company of poets, painters, actors, and courtesans, and in the buffoonery of distorted dwarfs and half-idiotic monstrosities, whilst the dark heavy man, with the big square head and arrogant mien, led the nation down the slope that ended in inevitable disruption and ruin."

* "The Court of Philip IV.: Spain in Decadence." By Martin Hume. Eveleigh Nash, 18s. net.

The dark, heavy man with the big square head was Olivares, the favourite and Minister; a powerful man enough, but no match for Richelieu. Philip finally broke with and dishonoured him on the loss of Portugal in 1640.

In the interesting preface to this extremely interesting volume, Major Hume tells us how he came to modify the plan of it. He had intended to write a much bigger book, when he discovered that the public taste had undergone a change, and desired something lighter, of the social and familiar sort. So he decided on "a series of pictures chronologically arranged" of the life and surroundings—the Court, in brief—of the King, who consecrated to his very troubled pleasures the hours that his father had bestowed upon his very unfortunate devotions. We incline to the notion that second thoughts were best—for Major Hume, while never neglecting the necessary politics of his subject, has gone far to reconstruct the degenerate but most curious and picturesque society of the period. The ground was more or less virgin, and he has worked it with a skill to which plodding John Dunlop had no pretensions—even had Dunlop been in touch with the seventeenth-century documents that were not in his day available. Anyone in any degree acquainted with the picaresque romances that were of no small service to Cervantes (who published the first part of "Don Quixote" in the year that Philip IV. was born, and who had been but five years dead when Philip came to the throne), will immediately recognise that Major Hume has placed him right in the middle of ancient, ugly, dirty, ill-smelling, intriguing, murderous, and fascinating Madrid. It is a miserable scene if one looks behind it, but every element of what we have been taught to call romance is there.

It was the Augustan age of Spanish literature, but in Philip's reign the stage was perhaps more popular than the novel. The drama celebrated everything in Spanish hopes, passions, ambitions; and in many circles scenes from the Bible were quite as much enjoyed as the lewd and lively comedies of adventure—which showed the brawls and intrigues, the escalading of balconies, the flourishing of sword and dagger, the assassinations in church and theatre, that belonged most literally to the daily life of the town. In the midst of universal poverty, the artisan and workman swagger through the streets in fine garments, the sword displayed at the side; the sham student elbows the beggar at the convent gate for his share of garlic soup; and the fine lady, indecently dressed, apes in the street the manners of the public woman. But the Madrid of this date is nothing if not an artistic capital; and how delightful is the glimpse we have of the young Velasquez exhibiting one of his early masterpieces on the pavement, not as a solicitor of alms, but merely for the pleasure of the pedestrians! In the realm of pure adventure, what scene could be more captivating than the secret entry into Madrid by night of Buckingham and the boy Charles Stuart (the Charles I. that was to be), when Charles comes courting the Infanta: Buckingham in disguise stealing up the stairs of the English ambassador, while the heir to our throne holds the horses in the street? If royal adventures are to seek, what episode surpasses the midnight passage of Philip IV., underground, into the convent of St. Placido, to meet a lovely nun, whom the abbess, in her terror of the Inquisition, has laid out upon a bier with candles at her head and feet?

But the end of it all is dark and sordid. The touch of satiric humour is not wanting. There is not a penny in the palace; the court fool gives a copper to a maid of honour to buy the Queen's sweetmeat for her dessert; the King cannot get an egg to his fish for breakfast. He dies in torment, with a vision of the young France that is climbing the sky above the ruins of historic Spain.

THE SWAN OF LICHFIELD.*

CURIOUS observers of the art of sinking have always given a high place among the dippers of this wonderful species to the Lichfield swan. Her six volumes of Letters and three volumes of Letters and Poems are priceless gems. As we read them we say to ourselves that every syllable of this should be preserved for the benefit of an awestruck posterity. Books on the lights of Lichfield we have had; in 1813 Mr. W. C. Oulton produced "The Beauties of Anna Seward, carefully selected and alphabetically arranged under appropriate heads; and now it is Mr. Lucas who has set himself the task of furnishing us with a careful and accurate presentment of Anna, in her sentiment as she lived. Was it worth while to impale and anatomise this Egeria of some of the worst poets that even the age of prose ever witnessed? Mr. Lucas (who himself propounds this delicate conundrum) is wrong at any rate, surely, in assuming that this particular species of bas bleu is extinct. Molière, Sheridan, Scott, and Thackeray in turn have depicted her admirably, and she is probably quite as much alive at the present day as in the time of the "Précieuses Ridicules." An artist in pointed observation, hating fine writing, and having no great passion for general ideas, Mr. Lucas does not attempt by the aid of the comparative method to discover the kind of milieu specially appropriate to the development of faculties such as those of his heroine. Yet the subject has considerable possibilities. Birds of her feather, as he justly says, flock together, and their natural breeding-places are the provincial academies such as Norwich, Edinburgh, Bath, Plymouth, Keswick, Manchester, Lichfield. Whatever the quality in the atmosphere may be that is so favourable to these quaint aviaries, it is seldom that we get an effect so luxuriant in its ensemble as that offered by the group of Lichfield dilettanti represented by the Swards, and the Sneyds, Thomas Day, R. L. Edgeworth, Dr. Darwin, and their select gossips, Lady Miller, Polwhele, W. Hayley, and Mr. T. S. Whalley, that perfect type and picture, as Wilberforce later described him, of a sensible, well-informed, polished, old, well-beneficed, port wine-drinking, nobleman and gentleman's house frequenting, literary and chess-playing divine. And when you look behind this amiable eighteenth century product, you discover, without any further probing whatsoever, a curate starving upon a pittance and doing the well-nourished divine's work in a fen parish so unhealthy that the bishop of the diocese (Ely), when he conferred the benefice upon his well-connected friend, made the express stipulation that he should never enter into residence!

* "A Swan and her Friends." By E. V. Lucas. Methuen, 12s. 6d. net.

It is most significant that the one contemporary of literary genius that Lichfield produced should fall out of the picture. There was no room for Sam. Johnson in this nest of singing birds, among whom the belles lettres and mutual admiration were so assiduously cultivated. Genius has been not ill defined as belonging to the man whose education is self-originated and transcends the quality of his instruction. The revolt of instructed mediocrity against this intuitive faculty is perennial, and it is just this revolt that is represented by poor Miss Seward. On the one hand, the well-taught miss with a local reputation for cleverness and propriety of sentiment and a provocative provincial coterie behind her, on the other, a careless giant who has achieved a result or two, here and there, and in so doing has dropped a good many of the connecting links, and whose rough calculations cannot be proved by rule of thumb. Thackeray, Flaubert, Borrow, George Eliot, Charlotte Brontë—how many writers have been the victims of this nice quibbling of a starved imagination! We believe, therefore, that Miss Seward is merely a passing phase of a constant element in literary life. Mr. Lucas takes rather a different view. He regards her as a pioneer of a spurious kind of feminism, peculiar to the eighteenth century. Hitherto men had been in charge of the "Aonian" lyre. Miss Seward, an early blue, rose up to dispute the possession, and everyone was delighted. A period of female literary efflorescence (of which she was the Baptist) was at hand. "Surely it was woman's day—the end of the eighteenth century. Women have not—in literature—had such a time since. There are many ladies writing to-day, and writing much better than Miss Seward ever did; but is there one among them with Miss Seward's reputation? I doubt it, and certainly there is none with Hannah More's. It is not that the ladies are less clever, but they are more diffident. . . . The solemn delivery of final opinions on all subjects is a pastime that has gone out among women." Here is a final opinion, at any rate, of the final truth of which we entertain grave doubts; let the feminine champions of to-day make of it what they can!

We shall all agree with the general accuracy of Mr.

Lucas's picture of this elegant "Sappho," enthroned amid amateur bards, and endowed with all the regalia of minor poetry. Her rule extended to all lovers of bad literature. She simply could not resist a bad poet. Her religion was to praise inferiority. And it was the common duty of her court, not only to like the mediocre, but to say why they liked it; not only to dislike the good, but to say why they disliked it. The book, therefore, may be summed up as a new kind of encomium moriae, an exercise in elaborate irony, a thesaurus of all the vicious adornments that are to be avoided at all costs, whether in prose or verse. To castigate this kind of thing is not, perhaps a work of supererogation. Like Flaubert's "Education Sentimentale," it seems at times an almost too elaborate ironical joke upon human banality and ineptitude. The documents are wonderful in their way, no doubt, and Mr. Lucas has dovetailed them together with adroit and surprising strokes of literary skill, though we must admit to having detected signs of hasty work, and although the method of presentation by which the excerpts (which make up four-fifths of the book) are not differentiated typographically from the writer's own comment, does not commend itself to our judgment. When he does put himself into the book the cicerone is charming. The opening scene, for example, is perfectly admirable. Scene: The close, at Lichfield. A summer evening. Enters, a station omnibus from which descend three rural deans, one commercial traveller, and Mr. E. V. Lucas. The deans discuss asparagus and toddle off right, dispersedly. Mr. Lucas is left alone (l.c.). He soliloquises. "Pretty spires, indeed, floating on the water, too, and by Jove! a swan (Mem). So these are Anna's 'ladies of the valley'! Age uncertain: they have hardly turned a hair—or better, a stone. I don't know just what to make of the ruddy tint; not quite the ruddiness of St. Albans, or Wimborne, or even Romsey. Nor red like Worcester, still less white like Salisbury, or grey like Winchester (Mem. for a colour fugue in a book I shall certain write on cathedrals)." Here we have this strenuous literary artist almost unawares, thinking of three things at once, as his avowed practice is, and smoking one of those "enchanted cigarettes," which to most of us are mere delightful dreams, but which he somehow manages to convert, so admirably, into black, and white, and red and silver and gold. Many will turn to this volume with eagerness for the author's deft handicraft in telling the oft-told but always amusing tale of Day and Edgeworth, of Darwin and the Loves of the Triangles, of the Batheaston vase, of Major André, and of the famous "harumfrodite" ladies of Llangollen. Diverting in the extreme is the author's description of how oft he was baffled in his local pursuit of intelligence as to why they were so famous, why they were the ladies of Llangollen. Pioneers, these again, of short jupons and gentlemen's boots! The chapter on the Swan and the Bear is instructive (though the last paragraph, by the way, is a bad lapse from Mr. Lucas at his best), and one cannot fail to be surprised that, greatly though the swan must have hated Ursa Major, she cannot, even from her vantage ground, succeed in bringing off anything more severe than a pin-prick—nothing half so stinging, for instance, as Peter Pindar's—

"Bids ocean labour with tremendous roar,
To heave a cockle-shell upon the shore."

These side shows help to make Anna bearable, and the book readable, even though they divert the author from some typical emanations of the Delphic sibyl. That, for example, in which she compares Polwhele's sonnets with those of Milton, or denounces the coarse and unharmonious strain of Chaucer. Some of her most characteristic epistles, those to Miss Wingfield, are not cited here. It was Miss Wingfield, we think, whom she lectured on "Ossian" ("Do not read 'Ossian' long at once, but take it up often"), to whom she proposed an elaborate refutation of Johnson's criticisms in the "Lives of the Poets," and to whom, when Miss Wingfield reproached herself for long delay in answering, she melted in this exordium. "Your silence excited no cold suspicion of diminished regard. I am not apt to suspect upon trivial circumstances a cessation of attachment which has been voluntarily avowed by characters complexioned like that of dear Miss Wingfield." Miss Seward is an inexhaustible subject, in her own way. But we can go to the well-head for ourselves, when we feel in the mood for it. There are times when the exercise is anything but exhilarating. And for all Mr. Lucas's good intentions and kind efforts to entertain us, we cannot help wondering whether he might not have left such a work as this to inferior hands, whether it was really worth his while. On the other hand, it might, no doubt, be said that if this book had to be "made" (as Malvolio says) no one could have done it so well as Mr. Lucas. He certainly puts an excellent face upon his work. The frontispiece, after Romney, is delightful. We had no idea that the swan was half so agreeable to look on. It may explain a good deal.

THE GROWTH OF SHAKESPEARE'S ART.*

PROFESSOR BAKER's book on the development of Shakespeare as a dramatist is one evidence among many of the alert intelligence with which dramatic literature is being studied at the leading American universities. It is an effort, firstly, to place Shakespeare in his environment; secondly, to trace his growth from the soil in which Fate had planted him, and show what raw materials were converted by the chemistry of his genius into that extraordinary literature, which, garnered in the First Folio, has occupied the minds and the pens of men more, probably, than has the product of any other single brain. This means, of course, that Professor Baker has got far away from the supernatural and unconditioned Shakespeare of the Old Criticism. He is still, in our judgment, a little too much inclined to think that when he has accounted for this or that feature in Shakespeare's practice, he has thereby justified it, and silenced all complaint from the point of view of abstract aesthetics. To show that, given the conditions, Shakespeare could scarcely be expected to do otherwise than he did, is not to show that his course was the ideally right one. We do not mean that Professor Baker habitually, or even frequently, falls into this error, but merely that we could wish he had oftener taken the ideal, in frank opposition to the historical, standpoint.

Mr. Baker's first chapter deals with "The Public of 1590, and Shakespeare's Inheritance in Dramatic Technique." Then we have a long and valuable chapter on "The Stage of Shakespeare." This very complex and as yet imperfectly studied subject cannot be exhausted in a chapter, nor even in a volume. Mr. Baker's treatment of it is sensible, careful, and free from misleading dogmatism. He thus sums up the results at which he has provisionally arrived:—

"From much study of the quartos and folios, and from repeated experience in producing Elizabethan plays, I have no doubt that Shakespeare, during the greater part of his career as a dramatist, could use practically four divisions on his stage: front, inner, back, and upper stage, with three curtains, one in the balcony, another under the balcony, and a third somewhere in front. I would not maintain, however, that this held good for all theatres, nor even for any one theatre throughout its whole history. These possibilities permitted any skilled dramatist an alternation of scenes when he desired, but did not exact it as some writers seem to think."

The doubtful points in this very moderate statement are the curtain "somewhere in front," and the theory of an alternation of deep and shallow scenes, which presupposes such a curtain. So far as our own studies have gone, we find the evidences of its use extremely rare and doubtful; while it is hard to believe that, if it existed at all, it would not be frequently and freely used. But the matter is too complex for even the most summary discussion in this place. We note with satisfaction, however, that Mr. Baker admits the back or "alcove" stage, which is altogether rejected by some of the believers in "somewhere in front."

In his third chapter, Mr. Baker gets to the heart of his subject, and begins with a study of Shakespeare's early experiments in "plotting" and adaptation. It might be wished, perhaps, that he had not sought in "Titus Andronicus," as compared with "Love's Labour Lost" and "The Two Gentlemen of Verona," an evidence of the poet's increasing skill in dramatic story-telling; for the arguments which would acquit Shakespeare of any complicity in this series of horrors are certainly too strong to be disregarded. Even if Professor Baker, personally, is convinced that they are inadequate, it seems a pity to use as a link in a chain of argument a play as to which there can be any reasonable doubt. The argument implies, be it observed, not merely that Shakespeare "wrote up" a scene or two, but that the whole conduct of the action is a sign of his growing skill.

The gist of Professor Baker's doctrine is that Shakespeare soon recognised that the prime necessity of the dramatist's art, at any rate in relation to such a public as that of Elizabethan England, was the power to tell an absorbing story, and to keep the stage occupied with a series of incidents justly arranged and emphasised so as to prevent any slackening of the spectator's attention. His supremacy lay in the gift he possessed for fulfilling this primary condition, and yet leading us, through the sequence of stirring incidents, into the very depths of character. Where, in his mature works, he seems to us to fail as a theatrical story-teller, it is (the critic suggests) sometimes because a particular feature in the story seizes our attention, to the detriment of other features which were equally interesting to the Elizabethans: sometimes because the slow and cumbrous process of modern scene-shifting deprives the incidents of that vivacious rapidity of sequence with which they were originally presented. That this is in essence the right account of the matter we do not doubt; but the fact remains (and Professor Baker does not grapple with it) that even in his best work Shakespeare was very much inclined to over-tell his story—to dwell upon details of such slight importance that they drop away in modern representation, and no one ever dreams of missing them. Take, for instance, in "As You Like It," the short passages at the usurper's court, which appear in modern editions as Act II., Scene 2, and Act III., Scene 1. Experience has amply shown that they are unnecessary—that no audience requires the information conveyed in them; nor can they have had any interest for Elizabethan audiences which they lack for us. Professor Baker would have done well to face the question of the over-copiousness which generally marked Shakespeare's work even in his best period. For our part, though we detest the transposition of scenes in which the modern stage-manager so often indulges, we confess to a conviction that a judicious stage-version of a Shakespearean play is generally a better work of art than the complete text, and would have been so even in Shakespeare's own day. There can be no doubt, indeed, that even in that day the text of many of his plays was largely compressed in representation. It almost seems as though it had been his deliberate method to write a good deal more than could be acted, and then decide by experiment at rehearsal what scenes and speeches were likely to prove effective.

Perhaps the most delicate piece of criticism in Mr. Baker's book is that in which he shows that the distinction between Shakespeare's "Histories" and "Tragedies" is not fundamental, but that tragedy, for him, almost inevitably developed out of history, as soon as "his interest in prince or noble as human being had come to supersede his interest in him as king or ruler." On the other hand, we cannot think that Mr. Baker is quite successful in establishing as a distinction between tragedy and melodrama an "inevitable" interlinking of cause and effect in the higher class of work. He argues, for instance (in opposition to Professor Bradley) that the one point at which "Romeo and Juliet" falls below the tragic level is that at which a mere chance intervenes to prevent Romeo from receiving intelligence of the arrangement between Friar Lawrence and Juliet in regard to the sleeping-potion. "That turn in the play," he says, "is at the will of the dramatist, is melodrama, and it breaks the chain of circumstance necessary for perfect tragedy." We cannot see the distinction between the chance miscarriage of Friar Lawrence's message and any of the other chances on which the action of the play turns—the chance meeting of Romeo, Mercutio, and Tybalt, the chance by which Tybalt kills Mercutio, the chance by which Romeo kills Tybalt, the chance by which Romeo drinks the poison three minutes before the time of Juliet's awakening. These are all chances; there is nothing inevitable in any of them; but they are natural and probable chances as distinct from violently improbable coincidences—and surely that is enough.

* "The Development of Shakespeare as a Dramatist." By George Pierce Baker, Professor of English in Harvard University, Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.

EARLY ENGLISH LYRICS.*

THIS book contains a selection of English lyrics from the earliest period up to the Renaissance. It stops short of Wyatt and Surrey, whom we may take to be the first Renaissance poets in our literature. The choice of poems, we are told in the preface, has been made in most cases on the ground of their literary qualities alone, and they are arranged in four sections, amorous, divine, moral, and trivial. There is an interesting essay on some aspects of the medieval lyric by Mr. Chambers, and there are notes, not enough perhaps for most readers, explaining the meaning of obsolete words or forms, and also general notes at the end of the book. Mr. Chambers in his essay points out that we cannot "trace any direct development of art song out of folk song in England analogous to that which took place in France. Anglo-Saxon poetry, as we have it, is already clear of the folk." It is all literary, epical, religious, or didactic. But "at the Conquest the vernacular goes underground for a couple of centuries, and England becomes, for literary purposes, a province of France." Not until the end of the thirteenth century do we get any English secular lyrics, and then come three pieces in this book—"Sumer is icumen in," "Mirie it is while sumer ilast," and "Fouelès in the frith." Of these, "Sumer is icumen in," is certainly far the best. Indeed, it is probably the best of all our medieval secular lyrics. It is not folk song, Mr. Chambers says, "but a learned composer's adaptation of a reverdie or chant of welcome to the spring." There is no more artful poem in our literature, although the language is simple enough, and we may well wonder how so much metrical skill was possible at the very beginning of our lyrical poetry. There is the same metrical skill in the group of love songs from the beginning of the fourteenth century, of which four are given in this book:—

"Lenten is come with love to towne,
With bloschen and with briddes rounne,
That all this blisse bryngeth,
Dayes-eyès in the dales,
Notes swete of nyte-gales;
Uch foul song singeth."

In fact, art rather than any strong passion or directness of speech is the main characteristic of our love poetry up to Chaucer's time and later. It is all literary, probably based on French models, and most of it written for music and adapted to that purpose with great skill. Some of the poems are in a strange mixture of French, Latin, and English, and these, Mr. Chambers thinks, were written by wandering priests:—

"Sachez bien, pleyasant et beele,
That I am in right good heele,
Laus Christo!
Et mon amour doné vous ay,
And also thine mene night and day,
In Cisto."

Chaucer, of course, was an entirely literary poet, and about as far from folk song as Dryden or Pope. His lyrics are not songs like the earlier ones, but poems intended to be read like Shakespeare's sonnets; and all his followers wrote poems of the same kind, so that English literary poetry drifted further and further from folk song. But in the fifteenth century a new vernacular poetry began in the ballads. Mr. Chambers gives no true ballads, since they are narrative rather than lyric; nor does he discuss them, because they "open up too many serious questions for treatment as a side issue here." There can be little doubt, however, that the ballads put fresh life into English poetry of all kinds, and, above all, into English metres, which in the hands of the literary poets were growing as monotonous as in the eighteenth century, and far more formless. The beautiful "Nut-brown Maid," which, since it is mainly lyrical, is included in this book, shows us how the ballads enriched our poetry, both with new music and new subject matter. It dances about as lightly as the earlier love lyrics that were written for music, and were half music in themselves, and yet it is full of character and human interest. Another thing which shows the ballad influence is the wonderful verse of the fifteenth century:—

"Western wind when w'lt thou blow,
The small rain down can rain?
Christ, if my love were in my arms,
And I in my bed again."

Just before the Renaissance comes Skelton, a poet without a parallel in our literature. He wrote neither folk song nor literary poetry nor ballads, but a kind of glorified doggerel of his own, in which you seem to hear the very tones of his voice. Verse has surely never sounded so like actual speech as in his extraordinary outburst of praise to Mistress Isabel Pennell, which begins like a nursery rhyme:—

"By Saint Mary, my lady,
Your mammy and your daddy
Brought forth a goodly baby."

and then gradually passes into poetry, still like speech but most delicate and serious:—

"Ennewed your colour,
Is like the daisy flower,
After the April shower.

Star of the morning gray,
The blossom on the spray,
The freshest flower of May."

And again:—

"It were an heavenly health,
It were an endless wealth,
A life for God himself,

To hear this nightingale
Among the birds smale,
Warbling in the vale,

'Dug, dug, jug, jug!
Good gear and good luck!
With 'Chuck, chuck, chuck, chuck!'"

In Skelton's verse natural speech asserts itself too violently for the literary taste of the time. He was a strange and isolated figure, the most primitive of all our poets; and the new lyric poetry of the Elizabethans did not grow out of him but out of the literary verse of the Renaissance.

There was more religious lyric poetry than love poetry in medieval England, and it came earlier. "The thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries afford quite a respectable harvest," Mr. Chambers says, and he remarks that "the dominant feature of this poetry is its elegiac quality." Indeed, it is a little depressing to the modern reader, who likes, as a rule, to be comforted in religious verse, and who is separated by the Renaissance from the medieval idea of the utter subordination of this life to another. To us the pleasantest of these religious poems were those which remind us of the Madonnas of Italian primitive painters:—

"This lovely lady sat and sang,
And to her child can say,
'My son, my broder, my fader dere,
Why liest thou thus in hay?
My swetèrid, thus it is betid.
Thogh thou be King veray;
But never-theles I will not cese
To sing, by by, lullay.'"

Then there is a cheerful shepherd's song.

"His name was called Joly Joly Wat,
For he was a good herde's boy,
At hoy!
For in his pipe he made so much joy."

And these things show us that medieval religion was far from being melancholy.

The moral lyrics are usually full of rather obvious reflections about life, often expressed with some spirit, as in this verse:—

"Winteres wether and wommanes' thought,
And lorde's love changeth oft.
This is the sothe, if it be sought,
For service is none eritage."

Women are both attacked and defended in the medieval lyric, nobly defended in "The Nut-brown Maid," and often attacked without much wit in the "trivial" lyrics. There are songs in praise of a bachelor's life, and complaints of

* "Early English Lyrics." Chosen by E. K. Chambers and F. Sidgwick. Bullen, 6s. net.

hen-pecked husbands, quite in the style of modern humorists joking against the grain—

"All that I may swink or swete,
My wife it will both drink and ete;
And I say ought, she will me hete;
Careful is my hart therefor."

And so on. The chief merit of these, as of most medieval lyrics is metrical. They go with a swing of which modern verse, with all its subtlety and enrichment, has not the secret. One can see that they were made to be sung, and often, no doubt, the poet had a tune in his head when he made them. But, after all, poetry was not the great art of the Middle Ages; and they are not to be judged by their verse.

THREE ARAB CITIES.*

It is scarcely necessary to say that Professor Margoliouth's share of the present work is excellently done. Of all kinds of history, Oriental history is the hardest to write. Western history holds together of its own accord. Its events grow out of each other in a more or less rational and comprehensible sequence which the narrative has only to follow to be itself rational and comprehensible. But in Oriental history, and especially in Arab history, there is no sequence or coherence at all. Its events are totally disconnected, proceeding each one from the impulse of the moment, and the result is an unintelligibility which soon gives rise to utter weariness. The individual figures, it is true, are each one extraordinarily fascinating and romantic, and the particular exploits, whether splendid or revolting, are almost sure to be unusual, striking, and picturesque in a high degree. But all this cannot compensate for the lack of connection between events. What engages in history our interest and attention is the consciousness of a hidden stream of tendency, of an intention and purpose under gradual development. This is the string upon which, like beads, the facts of history are strung. We sometimes call it the "thread of the narrative." It is because Arab history has no thread that it is almost impossible to present it in any intelligible form whatever.

To say that Professor Margoliouth entirely surmounts the difficulty would be absurd. You cannot string beads on nothing, or make a consecutive narrative out of unrelated circumstances. But his mastery of his material and practice in dealing with Arab ideas and Arab literature prove of inestimable value. He knows what facts to select, and, which is much more important, what to leave out. The embarras de richesse of glittering incidents, sure to overwhelm an inexperienced writer, is unsparingly thinned out until a certain relief and clearness of effect is obtained. So with a firm hand we are guided through various scenes in the history of Cairo, Jerusalem, and Damascus. The Khitat Taufikiyyah Jaddiah of Ali Pasha Mubarak, the memoirs of the French Archæological Mission at Cairo, the "Arabie History of Modern Egypt," by G. Zaidan, and the architectural works of Herz Bey, are among the authorities from which Professor Margoliouth has drawn material. The latter have proved especially useful. Both in the text and illustrations Arab architecture is extensively noticed, and we find in this connection an anecdote which seems to us worth repeating. The reader has often doubtless felt how faithfully, with what a freakish fidelity, Arab character is embodied in the Arab style of building. The spasmodic, fantastical impulses, the lack of all coherence and continuity of action which we were noting as the main characteristics of Arab history, and which are certainly the most noticeable traits in the Arab himself, in his manner, features, gait, and accents, are the chief characteristics also of his architecture. The piers, columns, and walls of an Arab building are always so ill put together and composed of such a jumble of odds and ends of older styles that they momentarily threaten to dissolve altogether, while the upward portion breaks into all kinds of fantastical arch forms and entanglements of tracery without beginning or end. To a people imbued with the constructive instinct such a mode of building must needs have seemed strange enough, and I had often wondered what the Greeks must have thought of such a style and wished that their criticism had remained to us. What one of them thought Professor Margoliouth has now recorded. Prince Muawiyah, of Damascus, it seems, had built himself a new palace, and, being extremely proud of it, he summoned a Greek envoy, who had recently arrived in the city, to pronounce upon it the judgment of a connoisseur. This turned out to be pretty much what one would have expected. "The upper part," said the Greek, "will do for birds, and the lower for rats." There you have the verdict of a race in which the sense for form was an instinct on the work of a race wholly lacking in that sense, and we believe it would be impossible to notice more bitingly the mingled frivolity and insecurity which characterise the Arab style. The truth is the Arab was far too emotional ever to do himself justice in so intellectual an art as architecture. What he did himself justice in was in the emotional side of art—in colour.

And this brings us to Mr. Tyrwhitt's share in the present work. Mr. Tyrwhitt and Mr. Barratt have provided some sixty-eight drawings of bazaars, mosques, street scenes, and so on, which, reproduced by the three-colour process, supply the Oriental colour element. What are we to say of these? We can say, to begin with, that they are of their kind excellent, that they are quite free from the vulgarity and exaggeration which commonly characterise such prints, and that it is easy to see they are rendered from drawings of real merit. But it is with the quality of the colour we are here particularly concerned. Like all Oriental races, the Arabs have expressed themselves most spontaneously in colour. Colour in the East holds the place that form holds in the West. You have it all round you; you breathe it and live in its presence. This it is that interprets Arab character and renders what is profound, mystical, and emotional in the Arab temperament, and accordingly this is the one thing which it is absolutely necessary to reproduce truly if it is to be reproduced at all. Now on this point, as regards the truth of the colouring of these prints, it is difficult for anyone familiar with the scenes they depict to avoid speaking with a certain decision and emphasis. For the fact is that not only is this not Oriental colouring, but it bears no kind of resemblance to Oriental colouring. Oriental colour is above all things pure and clean. This is probably an aerial effect due to the extreme clearness and purity of the atmosphere. In any case, it matters not what the scene may be, whether it be a gorgeous corner of the carpet bazaar or some reeking and noisome alley given over to flies and filth, the peculiar pure and transparent quality of the colouring remains the same. In the holes of shops dug in the walls, in the clear shadow, the deep tints shine. Out in the sun the colour plays round each thing like the light itself, bathing it in a kind of lustre so that it seems to give off colour. Often has the writer seen the edges of shutters, the edges of the yards of the Nile boats sailing down the river, outlined distinctly in prismatic rays. It is difficult to give an idea of the effect of such colour. We can only say that if the reader ever becomes familiar with the Arab temperament itself, its quivering sensibility and store of emotion, he will recognise the human meaning of such colour quickly enough. The step, the movement, the glance of the dark eye, all seem of one significance with the pure, vibrating colour around. How often must Mr. Tyrwhitt have sighed to himself as he contrasted mentally the radiant and glowing reality with the prints of his sketches as they eventually appeared! For the truth is that this transparency and purity, in which the whole character and mental effect of Oriental colour reside, is exactly what the three-colour process cannot give even a semblance of. The shadows in these reproductions are not luminous, but dull and opaque. The figures and garments and fruit stalls are coloured enough to be sure, but the colour is utterly lacking in purity and transparency, and appears in mere sodden blots. It would be a thankless task to examine these prints in detail. It is enough to say that they testify to the complete inability of process printing to reproduce clear and pure colour. Failing to do this, it fails to give us just what in Oriental colour is distinctive and significant, just what is interpretative of Arab life and character. The Arab has expressed himself

* "Cairo, Jerusalem, and Damascus." By D. S. Margoliouth. With illustrations in colour by W. S. S. Tyrwhitt and R. Barratt. Chatto & Windus. 20s. net.

Literary Notes.

"The Virgin Birth of Christ."

By the Rev. Prof. James Orr.

Mr. Shorter's

"Immortal Memories."

New Novels by J. J. Bell, Mrs. Baillie Reynolds, and Leonard Merrick.

London, November 9th

Professor Orr's important lectures on "THE VIRGIN BIRTH OF CHRIST," have just been published by Hodder & Stoughton. They are a broad yet conservative statement of this great discussion. In his preface, Dr. Orr says:—

"The aim of the lectures is to establish faith in the miracle of the Lord's Incarnation by Birth from the Virgin, to meet objections, and to show the intimate connection of fact and doctrine in this transcendent mystery. The organism of truth is one, and there is much need, in these days of loose ends in thinking, to fortify what may be called the doctrinal conscience by showing how the parts of Divine truth cohere together."

For the preacher there can be no more important volume published this autumn than that containing the Lyman Beecher Lectures on preaching, which were delivered in Yale University this year by Dr. P. T. Forsyth, the Principal of Hackney College. Dr. Forsyth believes that with its preaching Christianity stands or falls, and his new volume, which is entitled "POSITIVE PREACHING AND MODERN MIND," commences with this assertion.

The last series of lectures delivered by the late Dr. John Watson were also primarily intended for preachers. They are an exposition of the place and power of the Bible in preaching, and are especially interesting as explaining the predominant note of Dr. Watson's teaching. It is interesting to note that these lectures, entitled "GOD'S MESSAGE TO THE HUMAN SOUL," appear almost simultaneously with another volume by "Ian Maclaren," on "THE SCOT OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY." Dr. Watson has made his pages as interesting as a historical novel. He has given us a deeply fascinating narrative of the life of the Scottish people in the eighteenth century.

Dr. R. J. Cooke, in his able volume, "THE INCARNATION AND RECENT CRITICISM," reviews the methods and findings of negative criticisms on the Incarnation, the Gospel narratives of the Virgin Birth, and seeks to show the untrustworthy character of rationalistic thought in these and kindred themes.

"IMMORTAL MEMORIES" is the title of a new volume by Clement Shorter. Mr. Shorter writes to the immortal memory of Dr. Samuel Johnson, William Cowper, George Borrow, George Crabbe, and gives us chapters on the literary association of East Anglia, Dr. Johnson's ancestry, the private life of Ferdinand Lassalle, Lord Acton's hundred best books. This is a delightful and fascinating book for the student of literature.

The publication of the "COLLECTED POEMS OF DORA SIGERSON SHORTER," has tempted Mr. Meredith out of his silence and seclusion to write a preface which is neither flattering nor irrelevant, as these tributes often are, but a deserving tribute to her special quality and the Celtic spirit at large. "Mrs. Shorter's writings," says the "Scotsman," "are already too well known to need praising now, and readers who regard the movement to feed the fainting fires of English poetry with old Irish legends and tradition, as the only living monument in the higher regions of the imaginative literature of to-day, always point to the work of this graceful and intellectually interesting singer. Mr. Meredith happily sums up her power by saying that she has 'the gift of metrical narrative.' Her ballads are among the most effective of the modern sort. The lyrical pieces gathered at the close of this volume show how she excels also in the more personal vein. That her work should appear in a collective edition must prove matter for congratulation among all serious lovers of poetry."

We have been waiting long for a full-length novel from the pen of Mr. J. J. Bell, a book which should do full justice to his very remarkable talent. "THOU FOOL," as might be expected from the title, is a story of the mockery of riches. It is from title to closing scene a remarkable book, a story that grips, a story for the times.

The popularity of Madame Albanesi as a novel writer is easily understood. "She has," says the "Queen," "a happy manner of writing about happy people. To read one of her books is to be put in a good temper with yourself and the world in general. Her knowledge, too, of men and women, is extraordinary." This is particularly apparent in her new novel, "LOVE-IN-A-MIST." The story has quite an original theme, and in the delineation of Jane Charlton and her fine lover, Madame Albanesi has scope for those delicate touches, those shrewd suggestions of character, and that sincerity of sincerity which marks all her work.

"Once or twice I have seen it asserted," says a writer in the "Bookman," "that the best novels in our day are being written by women; many of them are, at all events, and Mrs. Baillie Reynolds has written more than one of them." Indeed, we think Mrs. Reynolds has written another of them in her new novel "BROKEN OFF." As the author of "A Dull Girl's Destiny," "The Man Who Won," and other popular books, she has already established her fame as a novelist, and "Broken Off" will add still more to the breadth and height of it.

Mr. Leonard Merrick is an author who is surely coming to his own. Few modern English novelists have received higher praise from the critics than he has, and in "THE HOUSE OF LYNCH" he has written a novel which undoubtedly makes a strong bid for wide popularity. Mr. J. M. Barrie counts Leonard Merrick among the half-dozen best novelists of the day. "A new book by Leonard Merrick," he writes, "is to me one of the events of the year"; while Mr. W. D. Howells places his novels next after Jane Austen's in English fiction, and Hawthorne's in American, and writes that he "can think of no recent fictionist of his own nation who can match with Mr. Merrick."

It is not often that one comes across a work so fresh, so sincere, so intimately personal as "Honor's Patchwork," and a new book, in which Honor's once again takes the public into her confidence, and introduces them to her present circle, is sure of a hearty welcome.

It has just been issued, under the curious title, "WHERE THE WIND SITS."

"The Daily Chronicle" gives high praise to John Oxenham's new romance, "CARLETTE OF SARK." "No one who likes tales of adventure—and who does not?—could wish for a better tale than this. It is of Sark, in the beginning of last century, when naturally adventures were more easily come by than in conventional days like these. The youth who tells the tale, one Philip Carré by name, comes by them far too easily for his liking. He is scarcely out of one peril before he is into another, and quite split-hairbreadth are his escapes from the Terrible Torode of Herm. And it is all on account of Carlette, charming Carlette, the pride of the island, and worth many dangers to win."

Everyone knows what excellent books Mr. Oxenham has written, and this is as good as the best of them.

It would be difficult to mention a book that had given more real pleasure to its thousands of readers than Dr. Henry Van Dyke's delightful holiday book, "Fisherman's Luck." His new volume, "DAYS OFF," will prove just as popular. It is a fresh and altogether delightful expression of life both indoors and out of doors.

In connection with their autumn novels, Hodder & Stoughton have arranged a number of very interesting Literary Competitions. Full particulars of these will gladly be sent on receipt of a postcard, addressed to Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

THE VIRGIN BIRTH OF CHRIST.

By the Rev. Prof. James Orr, M.A.
D.D. 6/-

POSITIVE PREACHING AND MODERN MIND.

By the Rev. P. T. Forsyth, M.A., D.D. 7/6 net.

GOD'S MESSAGE TO THE HUMAN SOUL.

By the Rev. John Watson, D.D. 5/- net.

THE SCOT of the EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

His Religion and His Life. By the Rev. John Watson, D.D. 7/6 net.

THE INCARNATION AND RECENT CRITICISM.

By R. J. Cooke, D.D. 6/-

IMMORTAL MEMORIES.

By Clement Shorter. 6/- net

THE COLLECTED POEMS OF DORA SIGERSON SHORTER.

With an Introduction by George Meredith. 6/- net

THOU FOOL.

By J. J. Bell. 6/-

LOVE-IN-A-MIST.

By Madame Albanesi. 5/-

BROKEN OFF.

By Mrs. Baillie Reynolds. Coloured frontispiece. 6/-

THE HOUSE OF LYNCH.

By Leonard Merrick 6/-

WHERE THE WIND SITS.

By the Author of "Honor's Patchwork." 6/-

CARETTE OF SARK.

By John Oxenham. 16 Illustrations. 6/-

DAYS OFF.

By Henry Van Dyke. 6/-

HODDER & STOUGHTON,
Warwick Square, London, E.C.

in colour right enough, but not in colour of this sort, not in the colour of the three-colour process. The reader will make no sort of acquaintance through this dull medium with the fiery race that has inspired so much of the action of the world; he may make up his mind to that.

THE WANDERING SCHOLAR.*

By this sub-title to his "Memorials of Thomas Davidson," Professor Knight fitly designates the man who has reproduced, more fully than any other in our time, the type of those travelling philosophers of the Renaissance like Giordano Bruno, who wandered from place to place and from country to country, seeking neither wealth nor pleasure, but opportunities of study and of disseminating ideas.

Born and educated in Scotland, Thomas Davidson studied, taught, lectured, and wrote in Canada and the United States, in England, Italy, and Greece. Now we find him living at Athens, and writing about the frieze of the Parthenon; then passing a year at Domodossola in close friendship with the Rosminian brotherhood, translating Rosmini's Psychology, and writing a book on his philosophy. A little later he is living at Chelsea, and gathering together a group of earnest men to form the Fellowship of the New Life, from whose meetings the Fabian Society sprang. Next we hear of him at Boston, the centre of a Philosophical Society, which often met in his rooms, and numbered among its members William James, Dr. W. T. Harris, and G. H. Howison. In 1888 he established the Summer School of Philosophy at the little town of Farmington, Connecticut, but afterwards removed it to his mountain farm, called Glenmore, in the solitudes of the Adirondacks, where, in a large farm kitchen, or round a camp fire in the woods, eager students spent their holidays discussing the problems of philosophy, ethics, or economics. After a lecture delivered two years before his death, in the east side of New York City, to an audience of working people, on "The Task of the Twentieth Century," a man rose to protest against the view that poor and overworked people could acquire knowledge and culture. Davidson vehemently replied that they had all the opportunity they deserved, and that if they only wanted these things badly enough they could get them, adding that he himself would come and help to teach them. This meeting led to the foundation of a Breadwinners' College, where, with a few devoted helpers, Davidson strove to give the poorest an opportunity of sharing in the spiritual inheritance of the race. The strength and weakness of Davidson's philosophy is shown by his reply to the objector. Endowed with unusual vigour of body and mind, his early struggles served but to develop his intellect and strengthen his character. He believed with all his soul in the power of the human will to triumph over circumstances, however adverse, and could not realise that less robust natures might be hopelessly maimed, or even crushed, in the conflict, and require a more favourable environment for their spiritual development. Hence in philosophy and sociology alike, he always remained a pronounced individualist.

Writing to the students of the Breadwinners' College, he says:—"The state is a pure, helpless, inactive abstraction; you and I and our fellows are the only reality that can effect anything. . . . The state is a mere abbreviation for a certain number of individuals acting together in a certain way for a certain purpose. . . . What is true of 'state' is true of 'government,' and all similar terms. When taken for realities they become mere idols, and all reliance on them is practical idolatry and crass superstition," and he adds, "the whole aim of modern philosophy is to clear away these creatures, idols and phantoms that have so long deluded and enslaved us, and to show us that we ourselves are the true reality on which everything depends." With this conception of the sole reality of the individual, it was impossible for him to perceive the organic unity of society, and he was, therefore, always opposed to Socialism, though many of his friends were Socialists, and the Fabian Society, as has been said, owed its origin to his initiative. This theory of the sole reality of the individual is, of course, the essence of Pragmatism, and Davidson numbered William James and Prof. Dewey, the leaders of that school of philosophy, amongst his most intimate friends, but his philosophy was his own, and twenty-five years ago he was enthusiastically advocating its doctrines. Thomas Davidson was one of the few whose intellect, in Schopenhauer's phrase, is no longer the slave of the will; who value ideas for their own sake and not merely for their practical utility, and yet no one was ever more anxious to express his ideas by his life. His wide knowledge and marvellous memory; the enormous vitality and consequent buoyant optimism of the man; the force of a powerful mind seething with ideas, made intercourse with Davidson intensely stimulating and awakening. "What I want to do," he once said, "is to help people to think for themselves, and to think round the circle, not in scraps and bits." The record of his work in founding the Fellowship of the New Life, the Summer Schools, and the Breadwinners' College, the appreciations of William James and other prominent men, and the letters and essays given in this book will make the reader acquainted with a unique and deeply interesting personality whose supreme virtues were a disinterested love of truth, and unflinching intellectual honesty.

THE RELIGION OF THE SPIRIT.*

THE religious consciousness takes two shapes as it represents its object near or distant, friendly or hostile. In the first case we have the religion of the Spirit, or mysticism; in the second, that of authority, of the letter; the various religions fall under one or other head. It is not meant, of course, that either in itself or in its professors religion is either purely mystical or purely authoritative; this is seldom, if ever, so; but that these are the types to which the phenomena respectively tend and which suggest themselves as principles of classification. Each has its justification in experience; each its strong and weak points. The "pectoral" theologian will strike a balance between the two. The points of view are to a great extent temperamental; it is difficult for either to understand or do justice to the other. "The letter killeth," writes a mystic, if ever there were one. Yes; but, human nature being what it is, we cannot dispense with it: Christianity, almost in the first generation, became "the New Law." Mysticism is vague, visionary, subjective, an ignis fatuus, misleading those who follow it. It has been so; it will be so to the end for the unwary; but the Spirit giveth life.

"Without the mystic element religion becomes always an external, and often an empty thing. The Church can never get rid of the mystic spirit, nor should she attempt to do so, for it is, in fact, her life. It is another name for conscience, for freedom, for the rights of the individual soul, for the grace and privilege of direct access to the Redeemer, for the presence of the Divine Spirit in the heart."

Mysticism is often defined per obscurius. It is "the science of spiritual mysteries," says Mr. Scott; and a mystery is "ever a secret, but to the initiated it is an open one." In spite of their New Testament authority, such words as mysteries, initiates, &c., are better avoided—they bring in the notion of Eleusinianism from which it is important to get away. In the New Testament age this importation was a help, in our own it has become a hindrance to the right understanding of the facts. For mysticism is the very antithesis of the sacerdotal cultual religion with which those conceptions associate it—an association which lies at the root of the pronounced anti-mysticism of writers of the Ritschlian school. It connects rather with the interior light. It is the "extension of the frontier of consciousness"; the search for, and discovery of God not without but within. "How can any external revelation help me," asks Eckhart, "unless it be verified by inner experience? The last appeal must always be to the deepest part of my own being."

It is a strange thing to see what trouble we take, most of us, to get away from ourselves. "The world is too much with us": it usurps the sanctuary even; here, in the Holy

* "Memorials of Thomas Davidson—the Wandering Scholar." Edited by William Knight. Unwin, 7s. 6d. net.

* "Aspects of Christian Mysticism." By W. Major Scott, M.A. John Murray. 3s. 6d.

BEST NEW BOOKS.

READ VERNON LEE'S STUDIES OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY IN ITALY. NEW EDITION WITH A NEW PREFACE, A PHOTOGRAVURE FRONTISPIECE, AND 40 OTHER ILLUSTRATIONS, SELECTED BY DR. GUIDO BIAGI. 21s. NET.

A BOOK ATTRACTING A GREAT DEAL OF ATTENTION IS EDWARD STANLEY'S BEFORE AND AFTER WATERLOO. WITH 5 PHOTOGRAVURES, 5 COLOURED PLATES, AND 27 OTHER ILLUSTRATIONS. 14s. NET.

ASK FOR MIRABEAU THE DEMI-GOD: BEING THE TRUE AND ROMANTIC STORY OF HIS LIFE AND ADVENTURES, BY W. R. H. TROWBRIDGE. WITH A PHOTOGRAVURE FRONTISPIECE AND 32 OTHER ILLUSTRATIONS. 15s. NET.

A FASCINATING NEW BIOGRAPHY IS A SISTER OF MARIE ANTOINETTE: THE LIFE STORY OF MARIA CAROLINA, QUEEN OF NAPLES, BY MRS. BEARNE. WITH ABOUT 30 ILLUSTRATIONS. 10s. 6d. NET.

ASK YOUR BOOKSELLER FOR WITH SHELLEY IN ITALY, EDITED BY ANNA BENNESON McMAHAN. WITH 64 ILLUSTRATIONS FROM PHOTOGRAPHS. 5s. NET. UNIFORM WITH WITH BYRON IN ITALY. 5s. NET.

THE BEST BOOK ON THE SPORT OF OLD ENGLAND IS F. W. HACKWOOD'S OLD ENGLISH SPORTS. WITH 6 COLOURED PLATES AND 32 OTHER FULL-PAGE ILLUSTRATIONS. 10s. 6d. NET.

A REALLY CHARMING BOOK FOR CHILDREN IS THE WELSH FAIRY BOOK, EDITED BY W. JENKYN THOMAS. WITH A COLOURED FRONTISPIECE AND 100 OTHER ILLUSTRATIONS. 6s. THE FIRST ENGLISH COLLECTION OF WELSH FAIRY STORIES.

THE MOST FASCINATING NEW CHILDREN'S BOOK IS E. NESBIT'S THE ENCHANTED CASTLE. WITH 48 ILLUSTRATIONS BY H. R. MILLAR. 6s. UNIFORM WITH THE TREASURE SEEKERS, ETC.

PLEASE MAKE A POINT OF ASKING FOR UNWIN'S NEW 6s. NOVELS AT THE LIBRARIES. THE LATEST ARE THE SOUL OF A PRIEST, BY THE DUKE LITTA (3RD IMPRESSION), AND SHE LOVED MUCH, A POWERFUL STORY OF MODERN CITY LIFE, BY A. J. BUCHANAN.

Book-Buyers wishing to see any of these Publications before purchasing them, may, on sending to Mr. Unwin the name of his local bookseller, have the opportunity of so doing.

N.B.—Please write for a copy of Mr. Unwin's New Illustrated List, also for a copy of "M.A.B." Sent post free to any address on application.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, LONDON.

By

"O"

Author of "On the Heels of De Wet."

A SUBALTERN OF HORSE.

Within a setting of high literary merit, the author has unfolded an ingenious plot, brilliant, original, and audacious. The many who read "On the Heels of De Wet" know how well the author could keep his secret and stimulate their interest. There he dealt with events of grim reality; in his new book he now proves himself a master of imaginative fiction. For the sake of a sporting bet "the Sub." of the "Heavy Dragoons" enters the domestic service of a wealthy American family in the West End. The embarrassment of his position and his subsequent adventures is increased by the attractions of the altogether charming and delightful daughters of the house.

A SUBALTERN OF HORSE.

6s.

AND OTHER

BLACKWOOD BOOKS.

TRAVEL BOOKS.

The Marches of Hindustan.

By DAVID FRASER. 150 Illustrations, Sketches and Maps. 21/- net.

Mr. David Fraser is well known as the author of "A Modern Campaign." His "Marches of Hindustan," announced above for immediate publication, is the record of a journey he has just returned from in Thibet, Trans-Himalayan India, Chinese Turkestan, Russian Turkestan, and Persia.

In the Footsteps of Marco Polo.

By MAJOR CLARENCE DALRYMPLE BRUCE. 21/- net.

Major Bruce's account of his journey from Simla to Peking is a delightful narrative of his interesting and valuable experiences. The volume is full of illustrations reproduced from the Author's photographs, and has a specially prepared map.

FICTION.

The Power of the Keys.

By SYDNEY C. GRIER. 6/-

"Politicians and soldiers, nurses and the general reader should make a point of reading this delightful story."—Daily Telegraph.

"... in these stirring descriptions we trace the work of a really great novelist."—Tribune.

"An excellent story, such as the Author's name makes us expect."—Spectator.

The Moon of Bath.

By BETH ELLIS. 6/-

Author of "Madame, Will You Walk," &c.

Thousands have been charmed by this Author's previous work. This book is sure to take its place as one of the most charming books of the year.

"PIP." By IAN HAY.

THE EDDY. By RICCARDO STEPHENS.

NEPENTHES. By FLORENCE HAYLLAR.

THE SCARLET CLOAK. By AUDREY DE HAVEN.

MUGGINS OF THE MODERN SIDE. By EDMUND SELLAR.

W. BLACKWOOD & SONS,
EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

of Holies, the external—a rite, a creed, the priest, asceticism—ousts the legitimate occupant, the soul. Never, indeed, finally or wholly: the attempt breaks down on an interior contradiction. Happily; for its success would mean the closing of the religious sense, the twilight of the Gods would deepen into the night of the universe. "I sought Thee without, but Thou wast within." What we can do, and what is unfortunately too often done, is to transform religion into a hard externalism—to present it as the survival of traditions, formulas, modes of thought and feeling which the world has outgrown. Hence disgust and revolt: the inextinguishable germ of religion resists at once stereotyping and externalisation. This resistance takes unexpected forms. M. Faguet has shown what anti-clericalism means, and, subjective as is his bias, his facts are beyond question. But, odious as its manifestations often are, anti-clericalism is a reaction not against the good but the evil elements in popular religion; it attacks the former obiter only and by a confusion of thought. To take a parallel case: Not long ago a Dublin alderman on a holiday distinguished himself by hauling down the Union Jack. Whatever may be thought of the taste or propriety of the action, it would be a mistake, and a stupid one, to put him down as an anarchist. What he was in antagonism to was not government as such, but what he regarded, perhaps not without reason, as the defects of the government under which he lived. The supporters of order are often its enemies; its opponents, its friends. The same paradox is found in religion—a Dubois, not a Voltaire, is its danger. The crimes and follies of anti-clericalism, from the Feast of the Goddess of Reason onwards, are protests, if we examine them closely, not against Christianity but against the corruptions of Christianity. Remedy abuses in the state, and sedition is powerless; enforce the law of trespass on the clergy, and anti-clericalism of the militant type disappears.

If religion without mysticism is apt to degenerate into a system of propitiation with its attendant evils, mysticism, it must be admitted, tends not unfrequently to obscure certain facts which are prominent in historical religion and have their roots deep in human nature—the transcendence of God, the sense of sin, the need of reconciliation. Hence the suspicion with which it is regarded by theologians; it is an ally, but an ally not to be trusted without reserves. In the great Catholic mystics, it has been noticed, the mystical and the ecclesiastical lie side by side unmediated. The key to their reconciliation lies in symbolism: as this principle, at present little understood, is recognised, the two will be harmonised. In Clement of Alexandria, says Mr. Scott, "the historical facts of the Christian revelation are accorded their due place; but the idea they enshrine is always placed in the forefront. The outward sign is acknowledged, but it is the inner that is regarded." That these facts are symbols is not to say that they are not also events. But the thing symbolised is larger than the symbol; and life gains unity and significance when viewed sub specie aeternitatis. Thus "tradition and scripture itself, Dionysius teaches, are to be read symbolically, for only in this way can their hidden truths be revealed."

If the mystical temper is too living to be unattended by risks—what is strong for good, will, under certain circumstances, be strong also for evil—it is no less true that it alone opens the way of escape from them; it heals the wounds that it inflicts. Two of these may be indicated: the spirit of sect, which makes illumination the privilege of the few, and the inversion which transforms the symbol, the sacrament, Christian or Pagan, into a physical and embodied grace. Pauline and Joannine teaching are at one in insisting on the universality of the inner experience. Its non-recognition is due to a defective analysis of consciousness; we must dig deeper down. And the realisation of the all-embracing character of symbolism corrects misconception of the nature of symbol: there are more than two, or even seven, sacraments; "all things," said Heraclitus, "are full of gods." A picturesque story of this philosopher, preserved by Aristotle in the Metaphysics, gives the concrete side of the thought. His disciples, it tells us, finding him in his laboratory, and shrinking back from the heat and smoke of the furnace, he bade them enter boldly—"for here also there are gods." Then words have their lesson. In our busy modern world it is not only, perhaps not even chiefly, in the retirement of the school or the cloister, but in the press of men, in the senate, the camp, the mart, the populous city quarter, that the mystic, he whose vocation is to the inner life, is to be found.

Mr. Scott's chapters on the great Christian mystics are full of sympathy and insight; that on Peter Sterry, a member of the Westminster Assembly, and preacher to the Council of State under the Protectorate, calling for special note.

THE WORLD OF THE SIX-SHILLING SHOCKER.*

AFTER closing the last of these seven novels, the reader is left in a mood of weirdness and wonder, speculating as to the impression of human life which they would convey—say, to the intelligent Martian. He, or it, would certainly obtain therefrom a vivid and varied picture of the world, and considerable justification for the destructive invasion of a planet where society seems chiefly composed of secret murderers, spies, madmen, and love-sick couples.

(1) Mr. F. Bullen's story of sea life is grim enough in its realism at times, but he keeps within his limits, declining to furnish his young readers—he evidently expects them to be young—with nearly as many desperate adventures as they might desire. He produces a manly, straightforward story, touched here and there with the glamour of the great waters and astir with the gallant hardihood of those that go down to the sea in ships. His conscientious method does not always escape tedium, and the "Call of the Deep" can nowhere lay claim to the magic of the author's earlier descriptions; but, among its companion novels, its simplicity and sincerity make it appear a masterpiece. At least, in these pages the enquiring Martian would become acquainted with human beings.

(2) In "Julian Reval" he would be less fortunate. The exiled Russian prince—a member of the Imperial House—who is a zealous champion of liberty and reform, promises to be a sympathetic personality. When he writes a brilliantly successful book, interest wanes, for the literary success of characters in fiction is monotonous. When he, the enthusiast for a great cause, meekly allows himself to be gradually poisoned by opium administered to him by a woman with "flickering green eyes," he—well, he dies "unhonoured and unwept" by the reader.

(3) The title of "The Fraud" refers presumably to David Belair, the successful novelist, who passes off his own mother as an old family servant and employs another man to write his novels. It apparently does not occur to the author that the high-souled and chivalrous idealist who "devils" for Belair, and incidentally consoles Belair's wife by a spiritual flirtation, is just as much a party to the fraud. In the end, the Fraud confesses, and, having saved his soul, tumbles into a convenient coal-mine, leaving the spiritual flirtation to be transformed into a happy marriage. The Martian would obtain a mixed impression of earthly ethics from Mrs. Coulson Kernahan, but should be grateful for her temperate style.

(4) Mr. Warwick Deeping tells of another spiritual flirtation, which he would dignify by a loftier name, and of the cruel misrepresentation by people of grovelling minds. The early part of the story is keyed as though for tragedy, but, after all, the baseness of the slanderers only succeeds in eliminating an inconvenient wife, that Joan, the pure child of Nature, may come to the arms of her affinity. True, she comes laden with a quite undesired fortune of sixty thousand pounds, but otherwise all is well. Mr. Deeping's style is known by this time; occasionally

* (1) "The Call of the Deep." By Frank J. Bullen. Nisbet & Co. 6s.

(2) "Julian Reval." By P. Laurence Oliphant. Eveleigh Nash. 6s.

(3) "The Fraud." By Mrs. Coulson Kernahan. Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.

(4) "The Slanderers." By Warwick Deeping. Cassell & Co. 6s.

(5) "In the Queen's Service." By Dick Donovan. John Long. 6s.

(6) "Carette of Sark." By John Oxenham. Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.

(7) "The Goal." By May Wayne. Digby Long. 6s.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

Life and Letters of Sir Richard Jebb.

By his wife, CAROLINE JEBB. With a Chapter on Sir Richard Jebb as Scholar and Critic, by Dr. A. W. VERRALL.

Demy 8vo,
Frontispiece,
10s. net.

"Lady Jebb has triumphantly refuted the common opinion that a man's life should never be written by one very near to him, and least of all by his wife. She has written the biography of her illustrious husband in his own spirit."—Times.
"There is ample justification for this comparatively brief and simple account of the one English scholar of these times who will probably rank hereafter with Bentley and Porson."—Westminster Gazette.

Essays and Addresses.

By Sir RICHARD JEBB.

Demy 8vo,
10s. 6d. net.

"The lectures are of great interest to everyone who is thinking about the educational future of the country. They are the utterances of a master in education able and willing to speak so as to be understood by those who are not masters. Whatever view a man leans to in these difficult questions, he will lose nothing by weighing carefully Jebb's temperate plea for a truly liberal and humane ideal in our higher education."—Times.

A Life of Gilbert Burnet, Bishop of SALIS-

BURY. By T. E. S. CLARKE, B.D., and H. C. FOXCROFT. With an Introduction by C. H. FIRTH, Regius Professor of Modern History at Oxford.

Royal 8vo,
15s. net.

Burnet, as Professor Firth points out in the essay on "Burnet as a Historian," which he contributes to this book, has a place to himself in English historical literature midway between the historians proper and the writers of memoirs. He belongs to both groups, for he attempted first to tell the story of the past from written records, and afterwards to tell the story of the age in which he lived from his own reminiscences and the recollections of others. The picture of his varied career and vivacious personality now given will appeal, it is thought, to the general reader as well as serving the historical student.

International Law: Part II.—War. By

JOHN WESTLAKE, K.C., LL.D., Whewell Professor of International Law in the University of Cambridge.

Demy 8vo,
9s. net.

This volume is the sequel to the author's work published in 1904—International Law: Part I. Peace. (Demy 8vo, 9s. net.) Its appearance has been delayed, amongst other reasons, by the imminence of a second Hague Conference, certain to produce important discussions and likely to produce notable amendments of the laws of war. A full account of the work of the Conference on the laws of war has now been included.

The Growth of English Industry and Commerce in Modern Times. By W. CUNNINGHAM, D.D. New Edition, revised throughout. In two parts.

Demy 8vo,
Part I.
The Mercantile System.
10s. net.
Part II.
Laissez Faire,
7s. 6d. net.

A fresh impression of this standard work having been called for within a short time of the publication of the revised and enlarged edition in two separate parts, the author has again revised it and brought it thoroughly up to date. In order to bring the work within the reach of all students it has been decided to publish the new edition at a considerably lower price. The parts, too, can now be purchased separately.

"The book is one of the finest studies in economic history that have yet been produced in this country; it is the result of many years' hard work and original investigation."—Westminster Gazette.

The Crusaders in the East. A Brief

History of the Wars of Islam with the Latins in Syria during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. By W. B. STEVENSON, M.A.

Demy 8vo,
2 maps,
7s. 6d. net.

This book is a history of the political relations between the States which the Crusaders founded and those Moslem States with which they waged war. In the treatment of the subject the Eastern point of view has been emphasised, and the main thread of the narrative is drawn, as far as possible, from the history of the Moslem States. The stress thus laid on the Eastern point of view, and the special attention paid to the chronology of the period are, it is thought, sufficient to justify a new work on the subject.

London: CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE,

Fetter Lane. C. F. Clay, Manager.

Bemrose & Sons' List.

OLD ENGLISH GOLD PLATE.

By E. ALFRED JONES. With numerous illustrations of existing specimens of Old English Gold Plate, which by reason of their great rarity and historic value deserve publication in book form. The examples are from the collections of Plate belonging to His Majesty the King, the Dukes of Devonshire, Newcastle, Norfolk, Portland, and Rutland, the Marquis of Ormonde, the Earls of Craven, Derby, and Yarborough, Earl Spencer, Lord Fitzhardinge, Lord Waleran, Mr. Leopold de Rothschild, the Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge, &c. Royal 4to, buckram, gilt top. Price 21s. net.

"Pictures, descriptions, and introduction make a book that must rank high in the estimation of students of its subject and of the few who are well-off enough to be collectors in this Corinthian field of luxury."—Scotsman.

SOME DORSET MANOR HOUSES.

With their Literary and Historical Associations. By SIDNEY HEATH and W. DE C. PRIDEAUX, with a foreword by R. BOSWORTH SMITH, of Bingham's Melcombe. Illustrated with 40 Drawings by the Author in addition to numerous rubbings of Sepulchral Brasses by W. de Prideaux, reproduced by permission of the Dorset Natural History and Field Club. Dedicated by kind permission to the Most Hon. the Marquess of Salisbury. Royal 4to, buckram, gilt top. Price, 30s. net.

"Dorset is rich in old-world manor houses; and in this large, attractive volume twenty are dealt with in pleasant descriptive and antiquarian chapters, fully illustrated with pen-and-ink drawings by Mr. Heath and rubbings from brasses by W. de C. Prideaux."—Times.

MEMORIALS OF OLD DERBYSHIRE.

Edited by Rev. J. CHARLES COX, LL.D., F.S.A. Dedicated by kind permission to His Grace the Duke of Devonshire, K.G., Lord-Lieutenant of Derbyshire. Beautifully illustrated. Demy 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top. Price 15s. net. Among the contributors will be: JOHN WARD, F.S.A., W. J. ANDREW, F.S.A., Rev. C. HIPKINS, M.A., F.S.A., J. ALFRED GOTCH, F.S.A., G. LE BLANC SMITH, C. E. B. BOWLES, M.A., S. O. ADDY, M.A., AYLMER VALLANCE, F.S.A., Sir GEORGE SITWELL, F.S.A., The Hon. F. STRUTT, and other eminent writers.

LOUIS WAIN'S ANNUAL, 1907.

In coloured wrapper. Price 1s. 112 pp. Containing eight coloured plates, mounted on plate-tinted paper, and a series of satirical cartoons. Among the contributors are: The EARL OF ORKNEY, The Lady EVELYN C. EWART, JOHN STRANGE WINTER, FRANK BULLEN, HELEN MATHERS, COULSON KERNAHAN, Sir DOUGLAS STRAIGHT, W. W. JACOBS, The Lady CATHERINE GASKELL, BART KENNEDY, PETER KEARY, &c., &c.

Complete Catalogue will be sent on Application.

LONDON: BEMROSE & SONS, Ltd.,
4, Snow Hill, E.C.4; and Derby.

Sampson Low, Marston & Co., Ltd.

Please send post card, when Full Illustrated Autumn List will be forwarded.

6/- EACH.

Small quarto, cloth extra (6½ by 9), gilt top, 6/- each

Miss L. M. Alcott's Famous Stories.

New Illustrated Edition.

For many years a better Edition of Miss Alcott's charming stories has been asked for, but hitherto, with the exception of "Jo's Boys," only the cheap Editions have been available. The new Illustrated Editions at Six Shillings, now produced for the first time, have been entirely reset.

LITTLE WOMEN, with Little Women Wedded.

LITTLE MEN.

JO'S BOYS.

EIGHT COUSINS.

ROSE IN BLOOM.

AN OLD-FASHIONED GIRL.

UNDER THE LILACS.

JACK AND JILL.

Small quarto, cloth extra, with coloured frontispiece and other illustrations.

The Advent of Arthur.

6/-

By ENID LEIGH HUNT. In Enid Leigh Hunt, a great-granddaughter of Leigh Hunt, the charming essayist, there has appeared a writer for girls whose due place is in the front rank.

Small quarto, cloth extra, with illustrations, in colour and half-tone.

Life on the Ocean.

6/-

By GEORGE LITTLE. With an Introduction by W. CLARK RUSSELL. The author spent twenty years in the American Merchant Service as boy, mate, or captain.

Small quarto, cloth extra, with coloured frontispiece, and other illustrations.

Sandy Carmichael.

6/-

By CUTCLIFFE J. HYNÉ. In this story of adventure the author has depicted life on two of the Pacific Islands at a time when European influence was not felt, when the islanders were in a state of barbarism and when they were cannibals.

Small quarto, cloth extra, with coloured frontispiece, and other illustrations.

The Secret of the Sandhills.

6/-

By FRANCIS MARLOWE. A book that is certain to become a favourite with boys. It is a tale of adventure, and the brisk movement of the narrative never ceases.

Demy 8vo, cloth extra.

Under North Star and Southern Cross.

6/-

By FRANCIS SINCLAIR. Many readers will remember Mr. Sinclair's "Where the Sun Sets," and in this work he once more places most of his scenes in the Southern Pacific, and reveals the charm and glamour of that marvellous region.

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & Co., Ltd., 100, Southwark Street, S.E.

beautiful in an over-sumptuous fashion, often turgid and rhetorical. On the whole, it is not to be marvelled at that the base world misunderstood the hero of whom he writes: "Romance ran beneath his mundane being like a caverned river gorgeous with subterranean fire," and failed to realise that "His love for her (Joan) was as spiritual as moonlight, clear, calm, and infinitely pure. Even the splendid medieval imagery that gemmed the very thought of her was hallowed to him as with a radiant glow of gold. The wings of angels, brilliant as sun-smitten snow, seemed to breathe and beat above her head."

(5) The Queen of "In the Queen's Service" is Mary Stuart, but Queen and service are alike lost in the welter of villany, madness, and vengeance in which the characters disport themselves. The sixteenth century English of the book is strikingly original, the irate father abusing his daughter's lover as a loafer and being in turn denounced by him as an old screw. From such colloquialisms, however, the style rises to melodramatic heights when the villain is engaged in burning his lady-love's mother alive, and chaining the lady-love herself in an underground dungeon in order to win her affections, when two of the plotters are hurling imprecations at each other, or when the jealous gipsy is strangling her helpless victim by the light of a moon and candle which both obligingly cast crimson rays on the scene. At last, when the dramatis personæ have hissed and gloated, glared and mangled through three hundred pages, the reader draws a breath of relief on receiving the startling information that "Nemesis had been struck" and the last of the wretches laid low in his gore. The hero and heroine, meantime, go on their bridal trip in "one of the Queen's carriages"; and it is to be feared that by proceeding in so brilliantly anachronistic a fashion through the "morass and dense forest" of their native vale, they risked adding yet another unintended tragedy to those heaped up in this amusingly sanguinary book.

(6) "Carette of Sark" figures chiefly in the title and on the picture cover. In the book she is an inconspicuous figure, and most of the story is given up to the thrilling adventures and escapes of the hero, and to long descriptions of Sark scenery. The style is hopelessly out of keeping for a narrative of the year 1800 given in the first person, but, after the writhing melodrama of Dick Donovan, a pleasant, direct tale is likely to be welcomed with pathetically disproportionate enthusiasm. There is little in Mr. Oxenham's latest novel to recall his earlier and stronger work, but one episode and character-sketch, suggested in passing, hold the imagination. There is real dramatic insight in the scene where the hero, escaping from prison, is sheltered by the old Jacobite who feeds "all birds that come my way, for I was caged myself," the mad recluse, whose one business in life is the unceasing curse which is to blight brain and heart of George of Hanover—George III. Save for that grim, significant glimpse, the story goes by conventional ways to an end foreseen.

(7) "Ezekiel was no fool; moreover, he was desperate, and in his hand he held a short but keen-bladed knife. . . . 'Cuss yer!' yelled Ezekiel, and stabbed again. Ah! he had got him this time." Ezekiel's goal was the scullery window, but he had reckoned without Mr. Gilbert—"Henry Gilbert by name"—"out and away the cleverest chap that has been up at Oxford for years," according to his friend Ralph, the son of Squire Ellerton. Ralph had assured his father when asking permission to bring Henry Gilbert home with him for the holidays that there was no danger of his sister Ruth falling in love with him, for he was "as ugly as sin, and by no means a lady's man." But if Ezekiel—"the pious, church-going, respectable Ezekiel"—had reckoned without Mr. Gilbert, Ralph had reckoned without Ezekiel, and his short but keen-bladed knife. Henry Gilbert, without running away, lived to die another day, in fact in the last chapter—Ezekiel having taken "better aim this time, Mr. Spy"—with Ruth's arms about him. Thus was her pride humbled, for poor Mr. Gilbert, when about to propose, had overheard her reflecting on his birth, a thing which caused him more pain than Ezekiel's short but keen-bladed knife. Ralph was more fortunate with his pretty, dark-eyed, dark-haired cousin, Nora. Hearing a frightened scream, Ralph in an instant turned the corner, and there sure enough was Nora, struggling violently while an evil-looking tramp, who had seized both her wrists, was slowly forcing her back towards the bank. The tramp fled on seeing Ralph, leaving Nora raising a tear-stained face, "on which a smile was hovering like a shadowy rainbow after an April shower." There we will have them, though before Nora thrilled beneath his whisper the machinations of Dick Hamilton, a smooth-tongued villain, had to be exposed, a task rendered more easy by Black Ben goring Farmer Dawson to death.

PETER PAN, HIS BOOK.*

MR. BARRIE'S creation of "Peter Pan" may be reckoned among the world's great inventions. The play's popularity was assured from the first; its longevity, if one may judge by revivals, seems equally assured. Like most great inventions, it was an exceedingly simple one. Its ingredients of very human children, pirates, Red Indians, fairies, and a super-canine dog, were the simplest, not to say the most hackneyed, selection from the book of the healthy child's imaginings. The plot consisted of jumbling these elements together in a beautiful inconsequence, and the achievement was in establishing a never-to-be-broken bond between the nursery and Never-never-never-Land. We don't know how it was done, but done it was. However, everybody who saw the play remembers it. Those who have had the misfortune not to see it should lose no time in becoming acquainted with its story as set forth in the "Peter Pan Picture Book," which Mr. Daniel O'Connor has compiled, and Miss Alice Woodward has illustrated, with the permission, of course, of Mr. Barrie. Even those who have witnessed "Peter Pan" across the footlights may find this handsomely got-up volume very useful for refreshing their memories. A child's memory, in particular, is a wayward thing. It is apt to retain outstanding features of special picturesqueness, and to lose grip of the rest. One cannot imagine any child forgetting the Peter Pan of Miss Pauline Chase or Miss Nina Boucicault, or the Captain Hook of Mr. Du Maurier, or Wendy Darling, or the flight through the nursery window, or the house in the tree-tops where Wendy goes once a year to spring-clean for Peter. But some of the subsidiary characters and incidents might slip. The Lost Boys or the personages of Smee and Starkey, the latter interestingly distinct in their degrees of iniquity, might become blurred and vague, and Mr. Darling might disappear altogether. "Peter Pan" is one of these creations which ought to be remembered very carefully in its parts as well as its ensemble. As a flick-up, therefore to memory, the "Peter Pan Picture Book" should prove useful. But, regarded either as an absorbing romance, or as an incentive to go and see the play, or as both, it will prove still more useful to those unfortunate and ill-treated children who have had no opportunity of becoming acquainted with the living incarnations of Peter and his associates.

Mr. O'Connor's text is more than a description of the play. For its reader's mind it is the story of real things as they really happened. It neither extenuates nor explains the improbabilities. It pre-supposes the "belief in fairies" with a firm conviction that should shake the doubts of the most materialistic child ever born. It avoids all moral reflections, except a few which occur to the most primitive mind; no message from the Never-never-never-Land could ever be properly delivered with these troublesome encumbrances. It leaves the symbolism—and what a mine of symbolism there is!—for the grown-ups to discover for themselves. It has only one passage exclusively for the grown-up, and that concerns Mr. Darling, who does not matter. That passage is apropos of the kennel notoriety which was such that "All the half-penny papers had asked him to write the cricket and football news for them, and his picture post-cards were to be seen at every shop-window." We could have spared the laugh if Mr. O'Connor—or was it Mr. Barrie?—could, though it comes at the end of the book, when the whole fascinating adventure of more interesting people than Mr. Darling is firmly engraved on the mind. But one must not grumble at this solitary gambol in the up-to-date, for the book of Peter Pan is as near the ideal as one could wish. To some children, indeed, it will be as good as seeing the play.

* "The Peter Pan Picture Book." By Alice B. Woodward and Daniel O'Connor. George Bell. Price, 5s. net.

SOME "R.T.S." RECENT BOOKS

A WONDERFUL SHILLINGSWORTH.

THE DOUBLE NUMBER OF "THE SUNDAY AT HOME."

It Contains NEW STORIES by AMY LE FEUVRE and DAVID LYALL. 6 Coloured Plates. 7 Complete Stories and a variety of interesting reading for every member of the Household. Just ready, at all Newsagents. Price 1s.

AN ARTISTIC GIFT-BOOK.

A handsome folio (16½ by 12½ inches) bound in white cloth, gilt, gilt top, 16s. net.

THE GOSPEL IN PICTURES.

SCENES IN THE LIFE OF OUR LORD.

Depicted in 24 Original Coloured Pictures by HAROLD COPPING. Each of the twenty-four pictures described by the LORD BISHOP OF DURHAM (Dr. Handley C. G. Moule). Price 16s. net.

The Athenæum says:—"The artist has imagination and religious feeling, is an excellent colourist, and a bold draughtsman. Altogether these pictures seem to us likely to fulfil their purpose, which, as set forth in the Preface, is to 'appeal both to religious conviction and artistic feeling.' The brief expositions of the BISHOP OF DURHAM are eloquent and illuminating. The water colours have been admirably reproduced. Indeed, praise is due to all concerned in the genesis of this sumptuous volume."

The Daily News says:—"The volume makes the Life of Christ more real, and the narrative is easier of comprehension. The pictures are not only faithful reproductions of Palestinian life as seen to-day; they are a re-creation of scenes that might have been enacted nearly 2,000 years ago. They make their appeal to the artistic sense, and to the religious instinct and conviction. Thus they become a great teaching ministry, with a greater power than a sermon, and a keener search than a confessional."

FOR DAWN OR TWILIGHT.

An Anthology selected from the Writings and Sermons of R. F. HORTON, M.A., D.D., and arranged for Daily Use by ALICE TATTON. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

The Tribune says:—"These brief selections of every day of the year will be welcomed in many a manse and home."

The Westminster Gazette says:—"The selection bears evidence throughout of care and sympathy and sound judgment, and friends of the eloquent preacher owe her gratitude."

The Scotsman says:—"It should prove helpful to many readers."

The British Weekly says:—"It will be of great interest to Dr. Horton's many admirers."

THOUGHTS FOR THE SUNDAYS OF THE YEAR.

By the Right Rev. H. C. G. MOULE, Bishop of Durham. With Photogravure Portrait. Cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. (Also padded paste grain, 6s. net.)

THE ASHES OF ROSES, and other Bible Studies.

By the Rev. WILLIAM L. WATKINSON. With Photogravure Portrait. Cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

THE HIGH-PRIESTLY PRAYER.

A Devotional Commentary on the Seventeenth Chapter of St. John. By H. C. G. MOULE, D.D., Bishop of Durham, Author of "Thoughts for the Sundays of the Year," &c. Cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

TALKS ON ST. LUKE'S GOSPEL.

By EUGENE STOCK, Author of "Lessons on the Life of Our Lord." Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

NEW CHEAP EDITION, 3/6.

THE BIBLE HANDBOOK.

An Introduction to the Study of Sacred Scripture. By JOSEPH ANGUS, M.A., D.D. Revised and partly re-written by Rev. S. G. GREEN, D.D. 848 pages. Large crown 8vo. New Cheap Edition, cloth, 3s. 6d.; half morocco, 7s. 6d. net.

The British Weekly says:—"This handbook, of more than 800 pages, contains a mass of information which cannot elsewhere be found in so convenient and compact a form."

The Daily News says:—"In its new form it will be a valuable aid to the Biblical student, and to the intelligent layman who wishes to keep abreast of the latest scholarship in the realm of Biblical interpretation."

JAMES CHALMERS: His Autobiography and Letters.

By RICHARD LOVETT, M.A., Author of "James Gilmour of Mongolia," &c. With Portraits and other Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d., cloth gilt. Prepared in Handsome Binding for Special Presentation. Padded paste grain, 6s. 6d. net.

The Daily News says:—"It is the best missionary biography that has appeared during the last twenty years."

HOME LIFE IN BIRD LAND.

By OLIVER G. PIKE, Author of "Woodland, Field, and Shore." Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, with 4 Coloured Plates and over 80 other Illustrations from Photographs taken direct from Nature by the Author. 6s. net.

The Morning Post says:—"Mr. Oliver G. Pike has given us another delightful book."

The Pall Mall Gazette says:—"It will make a delightful gift."

The Field says:—"It is an entertaining volume."

GRIFFITH JOHN: The Story of Fifty Years in China.

By the Rev. R. WARDLAW THOMPSON, D.D. With Two Photogravure Portraits and other Illustrations. 4th Edition already on sale. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

The British Weekly says:—"It is a fascinating and inspiring volume."

The Manchester Guardian says:—"Readers will find in this book the portrait of a strong, lovable man, of great tenacity of purpose, and wonderful industry. He has in him the stuff of which great soldiers and explorers are made."

The Daily News says:—"It makes a thrilling chapter in the history of missions."

The Christian World says:—"No one can read the story without being inwardly refreshed. The mere adventure side of it is stirring to a degree."

WOODLAND, FIELD AND SHORE.

Wild Nature depicted with Pen and Camera.

By OLIVER G. PIKE, Author of "In Bird-Land with Field-Glass and Camera." With 2 Coloured Plates and 101 Engravings of Birds, Animals, and Insects from Photographs taken direct from Nature by the Author. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

The Spectator says:—"It is a very pretty book."

The Athenæum says:—"It is admirable."

The Amateur Photographer says:—"Every lover of nature should possess it."

NATURE: THROUGH MICROSCOPE AND CAMERA.

By RICHARD KERR, F.G.S., F.R.A.S., Author of "Nature, Curious and Beautiful." Illustrated with 65 Photo-micrographs. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net.

The Westminster Gazette says:—"Mr. Kerr opens up in his latest book a wonderful world of beauty and interest... It will, in the hands of any person of ordinary intelligence, provide an excellent introduction to a charming study."

The Daily Mail says:—"The marvels of the infinitely little are beautifully illustrated in Mr. Kerr's book."

EVERY BOY'S BOOK OF BRITISH NATURAL HISTORY.

A Reliable Guide to British Wild Life and Nature Photography.

By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.R.H.S. With an Introduction by the Right Hon. LORD AVEBURY. Four Edition Now Ready. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

The Athenæum says:—"It should certainly prove sufficient to arouse enthusiasm for a delightful study."

The Glasgow Herald says:—"It is a volume which many a lad will welcome just as heartily as any work of fiction."

FIFTY-TWO NATURE RAMBLES.

A Series of Open-Air Talks for Young People.

By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S., M.B.O.U. With 5 Coloured Plates from Drawings, and 100 other Illustrations from Photographs. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

The Tribune says:—"It is well calculated to awaken and stimulate in growing youngsters a desire to understand the open-air wonders of nature."

The Daily Chronicle says:—"The pictures are really too lovely for description."

BUNYAN'S PILGRIM'S PROGRESS.

From this World to That which is to Come.

With 31 plates, beautifully printed in dupe tone ink. Large crown 8vo, handsome design, cloth gilt, gilt edges, 3s. 6d.

With 31 full-page plates, beautifully printed in dupe tone ink. Large crown 8vo, full gilt, with leather medallion centre, bevelled boards, gilt top, headbands, and silk register. 5s.

With 31 plates, beautifully printed in dupe tone ink. Large crown 8vo. Bound in three-quarter morocco. 6s. 6d. net.

JUST READY.

THE LOST CLUE.

By Mrs. O. F. WALTON, Author of "A Peep Behind the Scenes," "Dr. Forester," &c. With 4 full-page Illustrations by ADOLF THIEDE. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

JUST READY.

THE FORTUNES OF THE FARRELLS.

By JESSIE DE HORNE VAIZBY. With 7 Illustrations by W. H. C. GROOME. Cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

IAN MACLAREN'S NEW BOOK.

ST. JUDE'S

With 11 Illustrations by HAROLD COPPING. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

The British Weekly says:—"In literary power 'St. Jude's' is equal to the best of Dr. Watson's writings. There is a youthful freshness and fragrance in these stories which proves that for the writer the skies of 'Auld Lang Syne' were never dimmed."

MISS GIBERNE'S NEW BOOK FOR CHILDREN.

LITTLE "WHY-BECAUSE."

By AGNES GIBERNE. With 4 Illustrations by DUDLEY TENNANT. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 1s. 6d.

Please ask any Bookseller for a copy of the "R.T.S." New 32-page Illustrated List of Gift-Books.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, LONDON, E.C.; and of all Booksellers.

J. M. DENT & CO.

Messrs. J. M. DENT & Co. will be pleased to send a full list of their Autumn Publications, post free, on application to 10, Aldine House, Bedford Street, London, W.C.

THE OLD VENETIAN PALACES

AND OLD VENETIAN FOLK.

By Thomas Okey.

Author of "Venice and Its Story" (now in its Third Edition). With 50 Illustrations in Colour, and many in line by TREVOR HADDON, R.B.A., and several reproductions from the works of John Ruskin. Quarto, cloth, gilt top. One guinea net. [Prospectus post-free.]

OLD AND NEW JAPAN.

By Clive Holland.

Author of "My Japanese Wife," "Things Seen in Japan," &c. With 50 Illustrations in Colour by MONTAGUE SMYTH. Cloth, 4to. 15s. net. [Prospectus post-free.]
"Conjures up with success almost every aspect—past and present—of Japanese life. . . . Beautifully illustrated."
—Standard.

THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS.

Illustrated by Arthur Rackham.

Containing 24 Illustrations in Colours, attached to specially-made mounts, 12 printed on tinted backgrounds, and about 60 in Black-and-White, each by ARTHUR RACKHAM, A.R.W.S. Uniform in size with "Peter Pan," &c. Buckram, 15s. net. Large-Paper Edition limited to 500 copies, each copy bound in vellum and Signed by ARTHUR RACKHAM, £2 2s. net. NOTE.—The Large-Paper Edition is out of print, and can only be obtained from the Booksellers. [Prospectus post-free.]

"We conceive this partnership of Mr. Rackham and Barham almost an ideal one . . . the illustrator has been able to illuminate the author to quite an uncommon degree. . . . A book like this appears only about once in a season."—Standard.

PALGRAVE'S GOLDEN TREASURY.

Illustrated by R. Anning Bell.

With 25 Illustrations in Colour and numerous decorations by R. ANNING BELL, R.W.S., is the only Illustrated Edition of this work. It has an Introduction by Mr. EDWARD HUTTON, and is published in cloth, 10s. 6d. net; watered silk, 12s. 6d. net; and also in vellum, with the Coloured Illustrations cut out and mounted, £1 1s. net. [Just ready. Prospectus post-free.]

VASARI ON TECHNIQUE.

Translated into English for the first time by LOUISA S. MACLEHOSE. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, and a lengthy Commentary, by Professor G. BALDWIN BROWN. Square demy 8vo, cloth, 15s. net.

[Just ready. Prospectus post-free.]
This volume presents the Introduction to Vasari's "Lives," never before translated out of the Italian into any other European language, in spite of its enormous value to all interested in Art.

JAMES FRANCIS EDWARD,

THE OLD CHEVALIER.

By Martin Haile.

Author of "Mary of Modena, Queen of James II.," to which this volume forms a sequel. Illustrated in Photogravure, cloth, 16s. net. [Just ready. Prospectus post-free.]

By permission of H.M. the King, Mr. Haile has had access to the large collection of Stuart MSS. at Windsor Castle, which throw much new light on the principal historical personages and events of the period.

SIR GEORGE GREY.

By Prof. G. C. Henderson, M.A.

Of Adelaide University. With Numerous Portraits, Illustrations and Maps. Cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

[Prospectus post-free.]
"A remarkable book about a remarkable man."—Daily News.

"Professor Henderson has given us a very lucid and interesting survey of Sir George's life. He speaks with an authority arising from a genuine liberal-minded study of the results of the proconsul's career as a pioneer of Empire."—Westminster Gazette.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

By Henry Bryan Binns.

Author of "A Life of Walt Whitman." With numerous Portraits and other Illustrations, crown 8vo, cloth, 4s. 6d. net. [Just ready. Prospectus post-free.]

This volume presents a striking picture of the development of one whose complex and paradoxical character has always fascinated the student.

DUCKWORTH & Co.

CHARLES G. D. ROBERTS'S

A book of Animal life. With 50 Illustrations, some coloured. 6s. net.

THE HAUNTERS OF THE SILENCES.

ROBERT ELLIOTT'S

"ACT OF GOD."

6s.

PUNCH says: "One of the most remarkable books it has been my good fortune to read for many a year. A fine and powerful piece of work."

A mediaeval romance. With Frontispiece. Cloth, 6s.

DION CLAYTON CALTHROP'S

THE DANCE OF LOVE.CHARLES G. D. STEWART'S
PARTNERS OF PROVIDENCE.

Over 100 quaint Illustrations. 6s.

"Deserves a place very near that pair of immortals, Huckleberry Finn and Tom Sawyer. Altogether one of the best boy's books which have seen light for many a day."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

OWEN VAUGHAN'S

VRONINA : a Welsh Romance.

A new book by the Author of "Old Fireproof." Cloth, 6s.

Owen Rhoscomyl, or Owen Vaughan as he now appears, places his new story in his native country. There is a swing and a go about his work which will ensure him a large number of readers.

JUDSON BOLT'S

A broadly humorous book. Illustrations by Fred Bennett. 336 pages 3s. 6d.

THE PRODIGAL NEPHEW.

A tale full of rollicking humour and broad farce.

Stopford Brooke's new Volume.

STUDIES IN POETRY.

Crown 8vo, 6s. net. With a Photogravure Portrait

William Archer and Granville Barker.

A NATIONAL THEATRE

Schemes and Estimates. Crown quarto, 5s. net.

ETHICS OF REVOLT,

By Dr. GREVILLE MACDONALD.

A book of essays on subjects of present-day interest. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

THE CHRIST FACE IN ART,

By the Rev. J. BURNS,

With 62 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

 An ideal volume for presentation. Very fully illustrated.

FOLKLORE OF THE HOLY-LAND,

By J. E. HANAUER,

With an introduction by Marmaduke Pickthall. Demy 8vo, 8s. net.

A most fascinating and human book, throwing light on the origin of many of the Bible stories. Of interest to the general reader quite as much as to the student.

DUCKWORTH & Co., Covent Garden, LONDON, W.C.

The Nation

VOL. II., No. 7.]

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1907.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE	PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK ... 221	The Ruin of Macedonia. By G. F. Abbott and T. Palmer Newbould ... 239
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—	"Who are the Members of the Church of England?" By the Rev. Bernard J. Snell, H. R. Humphreys and H. J. Bardsley ... 240
The Little Protectionist ... 224	The Birchington Incident in Calcutta. By James Luke ... 241
The Kaiser's Ideas ... 225	A Sunday Post for London. By Francis H. Jones ... 241
The Programme for 1908 ... 226	THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 242
The Persian Parliament ... 227	Books to be Read ... 242
LIFE AND LETTERS:—	REVIEWS:—
Super-wealth ... 229	Letters of Queen Victoria, 1837-1861. III. By the Rt. Hon. Lord Eversley ... 243
Love Letters of a Statesman ... 230	"How to Fish." By the Rt. Hon. Sydney Buxton, M.P. ... 244
Poets as Observers of Nature ... 231	A German Biography of Chatham ... 245
A Day of Rest ... 232	Dean Hole ... 246
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—	The Criminal Classes ... 247
The Character of William II. By Ed. Bernstein ... 233	Ingoldsby ... 248
THE DRAMA:—	Books in Brief ... 250
"The Thief" ... 234	THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 252
SCIENCE:—
A Triumph of Telephotography. By Prof. George M. Minchin ... 235
POETRY:—
At Sea. By "N." ... 236
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
The Censorship of Plays. By G. Bernard Shaw ... 237

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE Prime Minister suffered a sharp attack of illness on Wednesday night, after his speech at Bristol. We are happy to say that the medical report which followed it was most satisfactory, and that Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman only requires a few days' or hours' rest at Bristol before he returns to work. Only a man of iron could have withstood the combined fatigue of Cabinet, with State ceremony in London and Windsor, a long railway journey, and an exhausting speech, all crammed into a few flying hours.

THE Prime Minister dealt with the entire political situation in a vigorous speech at the Colston Banquet at Bristol on Wednesday, emphasising the Liberal case against the Lords with great earnestness, and powerfully re-stating the Free Trade argument. Mr. Balfour was going to the Birmingham Congress to submit to Protection, or more probably to play with it. But the nation could not afford to play with "a little Protection" any more than it could play with a "little contagious disease." As for a broadened system of taxation it was a mere phrase, covering a return to the days when there were 1,799 articles on the British tariff, with a miserable balance from this sum of oppression for old age pensions. As for the Lords, the position was that the Commons had to give way to "500 absolutely irresponsible persons," claiming superior authority, wisdom, and even knowledge of the minds of the electors who had put the Government in power. The defence of this body was to trade on the fears of the community—to pull out the old paste-board dragon of Socialism, paint it afresh, and fit it with new scales and claws. The Prime Minister quoted Lord Rosebery's saying that if property depended on an indefensible institution, he would not give many years' purchase for it. Neither could it depend on a denial to the nation of the right of effective self-government.

MR. BALFOUR's long expected speech at Birmingham on Thursday proved to be in form a surrender to Protection, coupled with reserves which, in the eyes of the "Morning Post," the chief organ of Protection in the Conservative daily Press, go far to destroy its effect, for it declares that by refusing to give a direct answer to Mr. Asquith's challenge as to whether he would tax corn, meat, and butter, he has played into the hands of his opponents. Mr. Balfour, having first declared against the exclusion from the Unionist Party of members having differences with the main body, and declaring that "no precision of doctrine was possible," proceeded to accept the four propositions of the Chaplin resolution. These were that it was necessary to broaden the basis of taxation, to safeguard productive industries from "unfair competition"—the old Balfourian phrase—to strengthen the British position in foreign markets, and to establish Colonial preferences. He proceeded to say that on this latter point his immediate policy would be to summon afresh the Colonial Conference, "and see if we cannot do something" to achieve Imperial unity. As to taxation, his principles were first that the new duties should be "widespread" and "numerous," the second that they should be small, the third that they should not touch raw material, and the fourth that they should not add to the workmen's burden of taxation. Our import system was to be subject to "revision and consideration," and he would exclude no article from taxation. He favoured the policy of social reform, coupling it with the remodelling of the Poor Law, and an attempt to deal with the "mighty problem of the old"; but he opposed the handing over the management of small holdings to county councils, or to a bureaucracy in Edinburgh.

THE reception of the German Emperor and Empress in England has been brilliantly managed, great State and Civic ceremony being blended with a cordiality of speech and bearing to which the King, the London Corporation, the crowds in the streets, and even the newspapers, have contributed. The two significant events of the visit, which opened at Portsmouth on Monday, were the banquet at Windsor, which was attended by nearly all the great officers of State, and the luncheon and the presentation of an address at Guildhall. The language both of the King and the Kaiser in the speeches at Windsor was warm to the point of affection. The King, giving the toast of the Emperor and Empress, declared that he would never forget "the kindness and sympathy shown to me" during the late Queen's dying illness; and the Emperor, after eloquently reviving this family memory, declared it to be his earnest wish that the private tie might be "reflected in the relations of our two countries and thus confirm the peace of the world, the maintenance of which is as much your Majesty's endeavour as it is my own." At Guildhall the Kaiser proclaimed with proper emphasis his devotion to the cause of peace.

"History" (he said), "I venture to hope, will do me the justice that I have pursued this aim unswervingly ever since. The main prop and base for the peace of the world is the maintenance of good relations between our two countries, and I shall further strengthen them as far as lies in my power. The German nation's wishes coincide with mine. The future will then show a bright prospect, and commerce may develop among the nations, who have learnt to trust one another."

It is necessary to add that this language, and indeed the entire visit, has been thoroughly approved in Paris, and we believe it to be a fact that the new diplomatic relations with Germany established by Sir Edward Grey are thoroughly satisfactory.

* * *

THE Prime Minister was the chief guest at the Guildhall Banquet, on November 9th, and appears to have been warmly received in the very Conservative City. He praised Mr. Lloyd George for the gifts of tact, courage, and diplomacy which had saved the community from "incalculable loss, privation, and suffering" through a railway strike, and passed to a very measured review of foreign affairs. He confessed to having been "over-sanguine" of the results of the Hague Conference in stopping the "self-defeating race of armaments," but pleaded that it was impossible for one nation to exceed the general standard of goodwill, foreshadowed the drafting of a body of rules to guide the new International Prize Court, described the Anglo-Russian agreement as an "addition to the securities for the peace of the world," declared of the improving Indian situation that the Government would tolerate all discussion that was not "directly and openly subversive of order," said that any action of the Government in regard to the Congo State must wait on the decision of the Belgian Parliament, and assured the German Emperor of a cordial reception, based on complete goodwill.

* * *

AN interesting exposure of the way in which Nationalist folly begets international ill-will was given at the Banquet by Sir John Fisher, who incidentally declared that our Fleet was "nulli secundus," and that the British people might "sleep quiet in their beds," undisturbed by bogies of invasion. An experienced English journalist, led astray for the moment, had spread the story, on the authority (said Sir John) of some Midshipman Easy of the fleet, that 100,000 German soldiers had been practising embarking in German vessels. This absurdity was naturally swallowed by one of the most egregious gobemouches in British journalism, the anti-German editor of the "National Review." Sir John Fisher stated that one solitary regiment had been so embarked. Even this proved to be beyond the truth. The Berlin correspondent of the "Westminster Gazette," in which the statement first appeared, rehearsed the facts, which were that not a single German soldier was landed, but only a body of seamen, who attacked a couple of regiments formed to oppose them. Precisely similar devices may, of course, be seen at our own naval manœuvres. Yet Mr. Maxse had the assurance to repeat his first charge in the slightly varied form that Germany was devoting her "great talents" to learning how to embark and disembark great bodies of troops.

* * *

MR. MORLEY may be warmly congratulated on his action in releasing Lajpat Rai and Ajit Singh, the two deported agitators. The act of clemency has been received with enthusiasm in Calcutta, where the Hindu priests are leading singing parties through the streets, who invoke blessings on the King's head. Another sign of appeasement is the news of the general victory of the moderate section of native reformers over the extremists, evidence of which is that Mr. Bannerjee, the Calcutta barrister charged with sedition, has apologised for his words, and has been released from trial. Now that the brief, if sharp, period of coercion has passed, Mr. Morley will doubtless feel himself able, in a free atmosphere, to press forward his large schemes of administrative reform.

* * *

THE telegrams from New York make it abundantly clear that the financial panic has now been followed by an industrial crisis of unexampled magnitude. The Carnegie Corporation, the Standard Oil Company, and many great manufacturing establishments in all parts of the States, have dismissed multitudes of workmen, and there will soon be intense destitution and misery. The currency famine resulting from the collapse of credit is so severe that cheques can only be cashed at a discount of 3, 4, or 5 per cent., and now a separate premium is being paid for gold. A correspondent of the "Financial News," whose telegrams have so far been remarkably correct, predicted on Thursday that "if the present conditions continue for another fortnight, widespread disasters in mercantile and industrial centres will be unavoidable." In the circumstances it is most unfortunate that Mr. Pierpont Morgan, whose public spirit was highly praised at the beginning of the crisis, should have used the position he gained to bolster up his huge steel combine by forcing into it one of the few independent concerns. This has accentuated the public distrust, and people are beginning to ask whether any of the magnates who control the banks and corporations are really trustworthy. Deposits have been withdrawn to such an extent that the gold which is being drained from Europe in millions seems to produce little or no effect. Everything points to the United States Government being forced to make a big issue of inconvertible paper.

* * *

THE Third Duma met for the first time on Thursday. The Conservative and reactionary groups, which have never before existed in considerable numbers, will probably be for some time in a state of flux, nor do the preliminary congresses held on the eve of the Duma enable us to predict their course of action. The Octobrists seem anxious to convey the impression that, while they are a Conservative, they are also a Constitutional Party. They decided, though not unanimously, to maintain their independence, and to contract no alliance, either with the reactionaries on the Right, or the Cadets on the Left, who both seek their co-operation.

* * *

OF some of the Octobrists, and especially their leader, M. Alexander Gutchhoff, it is doubtless true that they are in a sense Constitutionalists. But they owe their position in the Duma to M. Stolypin's coup d'état, and to his illegal modification of the franchise, which was a flagrant breach of the Constitution. While they continue to profit by this, they cannot expect other parties to believe in the sincerity of their Constitutionalism. Moreover, though they accept in theory the rights of the citizen, of meeting, printing, &c., they favour in practice the most drastic exceptional laws of repression. Finally (judging from the recent Moscow Zemstvo Congress), they oppose any democratic extension of local self-government, while, as a party of landlords, they oppose compulsory purchase. Clearly, the Cadets could not sink their identity in such a party without sacrificing their Liberalism.

* * *

THE Nasi scandal (our Rome correspondent writes) shows a deplorable condition of disorder, irregularity, and confusion in the organisation of the public offices. It also shows, and this is perhaps the most interesting side of the case, a radical difference of thought, of morality, and of point of view between the north of Italy and some of the southern provinces, including Sicily. Nasi's defence, which seems most natural to the large majority of his fellow islanders, is this: "I am not a thief; I cannot be accused of peculation because I did not put one single penny of Government money in my pocket. I was a Minister of Public Instruction, and as such, as I had already done as Minister of Posts, I spent money for purposes regarding foreign affairs; I destined other funds to different purposes than those established by Parliament; I subventioned papers and subsidised people for the success of my policy; and for all this I assume entire responsibility, which is a political responsibility of which Parliament alone can judge." In this way he tries to justify the most fraudulent excesses which happened under his administration, and by which poor school-teachers received practically nothing from large sums voted by Parliament for their benefit. Other considerable appropriations intended for the furthering of agricultural education were put to other uses, while illicit expenses were rendered possible by swelling the account of Ministerial journeys, or exaggerating the cost of postage. Such conduct, which is strongly condemned in the north and centre of Italy, on the ground that it would lead to the total loss of Parliamentary control over the Ministerial extravagance, is considered as most natural in the south. "What is the use of being a Minister," they exclaim, "if you cannot even spend public money as you think best?"

* * *

WE are glad to hear of the progress of Ruskin College, which now contains fifty-five students, twenty-three of them miners, and has this year largely increased its membership. Lord Curzon visited it on Monday as Chancellor of Oxford University, declared that he desired to "open wide" the door of the University to the democracy, and welcomed the idea of a two years' as against a single year's course for its inmates. We agree that a single year's residence at Oxford does little either for the average undergraduate or for semi-attached institutions like Ruskin College. The question is as to the nature of the tie which ought to exist between this very small outpost of democracy and the main body of the University. Perhaps the best suggestion is that the students of Ruskin College should be allowed to take degrees, but that the examination test, which is clearly barred to men who desire to remain workmen, should be relaxed. The difficulty is that the workman student at Oxford does not start, as he starts in France, from the common primary school, and therefore a full identification with the life of the University becomes almost impossible.

* * *

A GROTESQUE but unpleasant incident has arisen in connection with the greeting of the German Emperor by the Channel Fleet. Its commander, Lord Charles Beresford, had ordered the captains of the vessels to quit their gunnery practice and to paint their ships in the Kaiser's honour. Sir Percy Scott, who commands the first Cruiser Squadron, and whose precept and example have had much to do with the improvement in naval gunnery, appears to have obeyed this order with an ironical reservation, for he made the following signal to the captain of the "Roxburgh":—"Paint-work appears to be more in demand than gunnery, so you had better come in time to look pretty by the 8th instant." This rather unhappy jest was publicly resented. Lord Charles Beresford, after summoning Sir Percy Scott to his flagship, issued an open signal to the fleet, describing the Scott signal as "insolent" and "insubordinate," and ordering it to be expunged from the log of Sir Percy's flagship. The incident shows more than regard for discipline; it exhibits bad feeling between high officers of the fleet, and cannot be dissociated from the campaign which has ranged the commanders of our warships into opposing camps of quarrelsome "experts." Some directors of the Navy talk more like politicians than servants of the Executive, and we cannot help adding that Lord Charles Beresford himself has been a rather conspicuous example of this failing.

* * *

THE Egyptian papers bring reports of a speech delivered by a Russian Mohamedan, Ismail Bey Gasprinski, in support of a Pan-Mohamedan Congress which he proposes to promote at Cairo next autumn. His object is to enquire into the causes of the decadence of the Mohamedan peoples. A Constitutional Democrat in politics, a Liberal in Theology, his answer is, of course, that in ignorance and a too rigid tradition lie the causes of this decline. The Russian Moslems, who now have fifteen newspapers, thirteen Liberal and two Socialist, are moving rapidly towards a renaissance. Of the Persians and the Egyptians the same may be said. The Arabic Press, and, above all, the Egyptian Press, is the chief link between them; and Constantinople, where they dare not assemble, is their chief adversary. It is this movement, essentially tolerant and democratic, which is the real Pan-Islamism. If it is to find its centre in Cairo, it becomes more than ever important for us, as the rulers of so many Mohamedan peoples, to conciliate the influences which may colour it there.

* * *

SIR LEWIS MORRIS, who nearly succeeded Tennyson as Poet Laureate, died, at Carmarthen, on Tuesday, in his 75th year. From Tennyson, indeed, he descended, without that poet's sense of style, and classical grace and delicacy of workmanship. His two best-known poems were his "Songs of Two Worlds," published in 1871, and his "Epic of Hades," dated six years later. The title of the latter was occasionally confused with William Morris's "Earthly Paradise." Sir Lewis also shared with his great contemporary one gift, that of fluency in verse-making. The resemblance went no further, for the spirit of beauty which touched everything that William Morris wrote or wrought, barely visited his namesake. But Sir Lewis doubtless sold his tens of thousands, where the author of "John Ball" sold his thousands. John Bright's usually severe taste in literature acclaimed his work, and for years his popularity as a poet compared with that of the much superior Longfellow. He was a steady Liberal, and he possesses a true title to fame in that he was one of the founders of the noble structure of Welsh intermediate education.

* * *

MR. BERNARD SHAW is our foremost British playwright, and he has a personal right to criticise the Censorship in the unsparing terms of the letter which we publish elsewhere. If the artists and thinkers are driven by the extreme lightness, and the not infrequent lubricity, of our farcical comedies to say that if you license gay presentments of dissipated life you must also license the satirist's unsparing description of its consequences, the moralist cannot deny the force of the argument. But we are afraid some people will be tempted by Mr. Shaw's letter to retort that his view of the play is that it ought to be a kind of diorama of Satan's invisible world revealed. So it sometimes is in the hands of the greatest thinkers and moralists. But this is not its normal sphere, and it is not, we may say, a conspicuous feature of Mr. Shaw's own plays. Freedom does not usually bring abuse in its train, and it is only for rational freedom that the deputation to the Prime Minister will plead.

* * *

THE list of birthday honours has been compiled with the care which marks nearly all this Government's appointments, and most Liberals will note with satisfaction that it includes no Peers. The highest honours awarded are Privy Councillorships and baronetcies. The new Privy Councillors include Sir Charles Tupper—whose long Canadian career lies in the past—Mr. McEwan, the famous Edinburgh brewer, a princely donor to Edinburgh University, and also a man of real though unobtrusive distinction of mind, Mr. George Russell, who sometimes gives up to theology what was meant for literature and wit, and Mr. George Whiteley, the Government's very forcible Chief Whip. There are five baronets, the most notable of whom are Mr. Jeremiah Colman, a prominent member of the great mustard firm, though not the head of it, and Mr. Clifford Cory. The nineteen knights are chiefly political, conspicuous among them Mr. George White, a very representative Nonconformist member of Parliament and an expert Educationalist, Mr. Goddard, and Mr. Compton Rickett. There are two notable exceptions in the persons of Mr. John Hare, an actor of singular refinement of method, and Mr. Santley, perhaps the most truly accomplished singer among his contemporaries. The rewards to civil servants are judicious and timely.

Politics and Affairs.

THE LITTLE PROTECTIONIST.

We are not at all surprised that the Protectionist Press extends a cold welcome to the speech in Birmingham, in which Mr. Balfour formally declares his adherence to their cause. The reason is clear. The further Mr. Balfour goes in lip-service to Protection, the more unconvincingly does he state the case for it, and the larger personal reserves does he make for himself when he enters on considerations of practical policy. Such a method seems to us the worst possible for his country, for his Party, and for himself. He has thoroughly destroyed the Free Trade basis of the Conservative Party. His Birmingham speech accepts the Chaplin resolution, in all its four propositions. He accepts Preferences. He accepts the principle of the protective taxation of imports from foreign countries. He would safeguard British industries from "unfair competition." He would subject to "revision and consideration" the whole vast and complicated mass of imports that pour into this country for the feeding of the people and the sustenance of its industries. At the same time this Protectionist Party is to consist of Free Traders and Protectionists alike. No man is to be excluded on account of his economic faith, for "no precision of doctrine was possible." In other words, Lord Hugh Cecil is to be free to assault Mr. Chamberlain with the amiable rhetoric which is his own; and Mr. Chamberlain's friends are to be equally free to impose the Chamberlainite test on every Conservative candidate and to exclude Lord Hugh Cecil and Lord George Hamilton from Parliament.

Nor, we may add, has Mr. Balfour exhibited any falling-off in his old skill in avoiding the favourite Protectionist formulae. He does not propose to "protect" British industries from foreign competition. He only proposes to assure them against "unfair competition." This again brings us back to Lord Lansdowne's "pistol," and to the mischievous and evasive device of retaliation, which still stops short of the Protectionist tariff. And even in accepting the Chaplin resolution, the Conservative leader is careful to invent an excuse for adopting it en gros by reserving for himself a remarkable freedom of interpretation. Here, indeed, he tangles himself in a thicket of inconsistencies, from which even his ingenuity may find it hard to escape. The Chaplin resolution, says Mr. Balfour, declares for the broadening of the basis of taxation, for the safeguarding of productive industries, for the strengthening of our position in foreign markets, and for Colonial Preference. The policy, he says, good for one purpose, is good for another, and all four objects can be pursued together. This, indeed, is a palpably false proposition. Taxes for revenue are an entirely different instrument from taxes for Protection, and both or either of them may be useless to promote Colonial preferences. But Mr. Balfour expressly leaves open to himself the power of directing the new basis of taxation to revenue purposes alone. "If we had no colonies, and if there were no such thing in existence as commercial treaties, and no industrial phenomenon such as dumping had ever been heard of," he said, we should still have to add to the number of taxes. But beyond this Mr. Balfour's plan is not that which the modern "scientific" Protectionist follows. It is even reconcileable with the fiscal practice of a free trading community like Holland. The imposts he proposes are to be "small" and "numerous" and "widespread." No article of import is to be exempt from them; the whole basis of our import system is to be reconsidered. And apparently the aim is to be the provision of a fund for the working out of measures of social reform, and especially a treatment of the "mighty problem of the old." Mr. Balfour well knows that this is not the fashion in which the modern Protectionist tariff is built up. Neither "five per cent. all round," nor fifty per cent., satisfies the demands of industries whose claim is for a thoroughly protected home market.

Mr. Balfour has, therefore, given his Tory-democratic followers or masters, the form without the substance of what they want. He has, indeed, precisely justified the Prime Minister's anticipatory sketch of the line of evasion that, with the Protectionist pack in full cry behind, this keenly hunted "leader" would follow. He has gone in for a "little Protection." In spite of his protests, he endorses the vexatious absurdities of the old Protectionist tariff, which Peel and Gladstone swept away in the forties, amid the rejoicing of the entire body of British industries, and threatens the nation with a return to 1821, when there were 1,799 articles on the tariff. Everyone and everything is to be taxed, the food we eat, the clothes we wear, the carriages that draw us, the coffins in which we are buried. The machinery of taxation is to be made more intricate in days when trade is a thousand times more complicated than it was in 1842. Every canon of sound taxation is to be violated, taxes are to be collected in the most expensive way, in the most annoying way, with the greatest amount of burden on the individual, and the largest possible interference with trade, and all for what? Not for a high Protectionist system. Not even for a policy of pro-Colonial Protection, for Mr. Balfour still shirks an answer to Mr. Asquith's question as to whether he will tax foreign corn, or butter, or wool, and merely specifies that the workman's contribution must not be increased.

The Balfour programme, therefore, is one of elaborate futility, combining all the unpopularity of Protection with little of its attraction for a convinced and powerful Protectionist Party. He is certainly welcome to go to the country with the cry of "Taxes on everything," for it seems to us clear that the opposition to such a policy will produce the same solid block of middle-class and working-class opposition as overthrew him in 1906. His policy of "social reform" and his acceptance of old age pensions are indeed more creditable than passive reliance on the forces of reaction. But when Mr. Balfour challenges Mr. Asquith to provide a fund for the betterment of the people, he is open to the retort that he makes no such provision himself. Under his scheme all are to be taxed, but the workmen are not to suffer an increase of their present burden. This is an utterly illusory pledge; but if it has any reality, what is to be the source of the fund for social reform? Mr. Balfour knows that it cannot come from the foreigner. It must then proceed from the taxation of the superfluity of wealth. To such a policy, Mr. Balfour is not a convert, and his party would not follow him in it if he were. His speech is, indeed, useless to Protection, and useless to himself. Essentially and primarily the business of a leader is to inspire confidence. This is not Mr. Balfour's gift. The Protectionists may take him with reserves, and as much of his policy as goes their way. The Free Traders will thank him for keeping their party in being, while keeping it more or less under the Protectionist heel. Neither trusts him, both equally believe in their hearts that his sole concern is the party interest, that in the cause of mechanical and superficial unity, which alone this cold and sceptical intellect approves, he will coquet with either of them, and sacrifice either of them, and that his aim at Birmingham, as at Sheffield, is the merely tactical one of persuading each faction in turn that he is at bottom its friend.

THE KAISER'S IDEAS.

THE visit of the Kaiser to these shores, and the ensuing flow of compliment to so distinguished a guest, will, no doubt, give pause to the merely unthinking anti-Germanism of the hour. The attractive personality of the Kaiser must in itself go far to disarm it, for it appeals far more closely to the autocratic conservatism which sustains the feud with Germany than to the liberal and democratic sentiment which discourages it. The Kaiser is, indeed, as Dr. Bernstein describes him elsewhere in the columns of THE NATION, a modern personality, accessible, impressionable, an interesting interpreter of the half-poetic materialism which, in spite of the Liberal revival and the growth of Socialism, still sways the ruling world of to-day. In his governing ideas—militarism, protection, a half-tyrannous, half-paternal bureaucracy, and the maintenance of strictly separated class formations—his mind runs in the same mould as that of Lord Milner and our own neo-Imperialists. His Prusso-German State realises all their political ideals, and his energy, vivacious temperament, and brilliant rhetoric, provide the kind of glamour that a leader and apologist of Imperialism needs. If, therefore, William II. is not popular with this section of British political society, he ought to be. It is the great, and we think overwhelming, party in England which will not hear of war with Germany, and can perceive no fact, even on the distant horizon of politics, powerful enough to induce it, that has most reason to rejoice that the relations of this country with the democratic Government of France are closer than those we maintain with the most persuasive representative of absolutism in Europe.

But it is idle to deny that the Kaiser's personality presents some characteristics that are not only attractive to the world in which we live, but useful and stimulating to it. He is something more than a self-conscious artist, rejoicing in the vigour with which he plays the theatrical rôle of Monarchy. He has faith, which his age wants; he has self-confidence, in which it is singularly lacking; he is an optimist, and shows unconquerable energy and buoyancy in the conduct of life; he has the gift of sonorous and highly descriptive oratory, the geniality of bearing and temperament that people admire to the point of exaggeration in their rulers; the variety of personal interests, the restless, and, at least, superficially inquisitive spirit, that pervade all town civilisation. He would, indeed, be the typical popular Sovereign, were it not for the fact that the bent of these pleasing activities is towards the preservation of some forms of society that are dead or dying, and others that are hurtful. He is no hard-shell reactionary. His mind moves, though capriciously and impulsively, and he would never take the line of the famous Encyclical which proclaimed the iniquity of any traffic with progress. Nor is he a crowned Machiavelli, of the type of his famous ancestor, preaching peace, with the age of gold, and basely plotting to break it. On the contrary, he is impulsively sincere, and even simple, for he maintains principles contrary to each other. He is for the nation in arms, and yet, as he said with perfect truth at Guildhall, he pursues a policy of peace; he talks of war, and continually flashes steel and iron before his people's eyes, but he has been a main instrument in the preservation of the thirty years' tranquillity that Europe has enjoyed. Such a man, who speaks so often, so gushingly, is in many respects the opposite of what British Jingoism proclaim him to be. The Kaiser has never been strong, or successful, in foreign policy. His gift lies rather in his intuitive capacity to interpret and popularise at home the ideas of German absolutism. His real war is not with France, still less with Great Britain; his obvious aim is to keep in being the glittering insignia of German Power, the high spirit and swelling pride that the administrative and warlike triumphs of the sixties and the seventies aroused in German breasts, to add to it the broad basis of a world-commerce, with its modern satellite, a great navy, and at the same time to fasten his throne and its military and sentimental traditions securely on to this imposing fabric. It is not his fault that these ambitions have encountered our own naval policy; they do not threaten it, and can never compete with it. The Kaiser's foes are of his own household. The age is against him, and is too powerful for him. All his cleverness and charm, the suggestion of a firm purpose and a clear, God-given mandate, counterworking the shifting impulses, the "will-lessly wavering" mind of the populace, must be worsted in his struggle with the Time-spirit. Either he will fail, or his successor. The tendency to Imperialism will wear itself out; and the intellectual inheritance of earlier generations, the ideas and characteristics of the best German thought and feeling, will prevail.

The Kaiser's ideas will break down because they are not moral ideas. It is not a moral idea that the German soldier ought, at his command, and in order to preserve the State on the lines which he and his ancestors laid down, to be ready to turn his rifle against the hand that fed him and the breasts that suckled him. It is an immoral idea to set the soldier above the citizen, and to regulate military honour by the duel. It is immoral to treat sovereignty as based on divine right, and it is also absurd. All these assertions produce and maintain a profound alienation between the Kaiser and some millions of the German people, and they react injuriously on European thought and the cause of political liberty. But they are not built to last. The sovereign who speaks of his rule as inspired by "inflexible determination" follows the modern method of compromise, and obeys the modern law of change. William II.'s policy is only half-Bismarckian; his temperament, more refined than that of the Iron Chancellor, impels him to try and moralise and soften the fabric of Prussian militarism. He inveighs against coarseness and luxury, in the army, and in the State, and yet these faults inevitably accompany the rapid growth of German civilisation, based on conquest, and driven along, post-haste, by mechanical science. And he finds it increasingly hard to make Germany rich and to keep her powerful as a military State. The pursuit of commercial aims breaks down Prussian ideas of caste, and weakens the German military system; the sword is not as keenly tempered as it was in 1870. The absolutist Kaiser, who takes in new helpers from new classes, and tacitly acknowledges errors and an unwise choice in counsel and companionship, may even end as a semi-constitutionalist, and live to popularise some form of the essentially Liberal idea of governing by the will of the people.

THE PROGRAMME FOR 1908.

As the autumn campaign advances the lines of work for next session begin little by little to shape themselves, and whatever else may be said, there can be no complaint that the task foreshadowed is too small. As the Prime Minister suggested in his spirited speech at Bristol, the arrears of two sessions, half frustrated as they have been by the House of Lords, have to be wiped off. The work of social reform, virtually suspended for twenty years, has to be opened up in earnest. And all has to be done subject to the impossible constitutional conditions imposed on us by the power of the Second Chamber, and with a view to placing the programme of the Liberal Party speedily before the country. The position is not without its dangers. But they are dangers which can be met by statesmen who will measure coolly the forces with which they have to reckon, who will throw themselves confidently upon the real feeling of the people, and not only on the approval of small groups of enthusiasts. The governing factor of the situation is that, since the failure to challenge the House of Lords at the close of last year, the Commons may propose but the Peers dispose. The Lords can force a quarrel at the time and under the conditions which they choose. All democratic measures have to run their gauntlet, and any one which they think provides a suitable fighting ground will be rejected. The only exceptions to this rule are measures which directly attack the territorial authority or revenues of the Peers themselves, or the political power of the Conservative Party. These, however popular, the Peers are tempted to resist, and these accordingly form the fighting ground most favourable to the Government in the final appeal. On the other hand, measures that distract and divide the Liberal and Labour Parties, or leave the public cold, will be ruthlessly thrown out, to the lessening of the Government's credit, and without chance of success in an appeal to the electors. Mr. Balfour and the Peers will do their utmost to secure that the final struggle shall take place on questions like those of temperance and education, and in that event they count for a second success, like that of 1895. Indeed, there is little doubt that, given a new attempt to impose local veto on a reluctant England, given the alienation of the Catholic vote by a new Education Bill, and the cooling of Nonconformist enthusiasm by an Irish University Bill, the story of the nineties would repeat itself. The House of Lords would stand forth as saviours of society, and the forces of democracy would be paralysed for a generation to come.

We are not for a moment saying that any of these questions can be left out of account. With all of them the Government is pledged to deal. But we do say that in the mode of bringing them forward regard must be had not so much to the situation in the House of Commons as to the position in the country. The Government is pledged to bring in a Licensing Bill, and there is no reasonable doubt that in the matter of licensing it would have the country behind it in urging certain important reforms. It can institute an adequate time limit for compensation, graduate the cost of licences in accordance with the value of the premises, and increase the popular control over public-houses. It can also make an experiment in Local Option in Wales. These are substantially agreed reforms, and they can be carried. When we come to measures which divide the party of progress the case is different. Temperance enthusiasts might succeed in conveying such measures through their third reading in the House of Commons, but there they would stick. Not one public-house would be closed thereby, but the democracy in its coming struggle for power might receive a fatal check. In the matter of temperance, then, it occurs to us that if the Government reckon in advance, as it is time that they should do, with all the forces that they will have to meet, they will keep their proposals within limits which will unite the popular parties. In the matter of the Irish University we may go a step further. The best men of all parties—Mr. Balfour, in particular, on the Unionist side—are agreed on the urgent necessity of opening University education to Irish Catholics. Mr. Birrell will rightly do his utmost to secure the passage of a Bill by consent of both parties. But if this consent is refused he cannot, looking cold facts in the face, make such a measure an integral part of an appeal to Nonconformists when he invites them, as he will soon have to invite them, to rally all their forces in support of the Government in its struggle for the people against the Peers. On the other hand, it seems to us that Mr. McKenna may fairly approach Nonconformist leaders with an equally plain statement of the position as it affects education. He may ask them whether it is well for their prospects that the Government should go into the campaign with a certain loss of twenty seats in Lancashire, or whether it would not be better to make one more attempt at an educational compromise. The only possible condition of such an arrangement would be the complete freedom of the rural schools.

We have spoken of the measures of greatest difficulty for the Government. We pass to those where we conceive their strength to lie. The lapse of time only serves to strengthen confidence in the justice of their Scottish Bills and the strength of the popular forces behind them. The continued insistence on these Bills will secure their position north of the Tweed, and from them a lesson can be learnt for England. The English Land Act is a good one as far as it goes, but no one as yet knows how far that will be. But the more it succeeds the more it will strengthen the case for a new system of rating which will prevent the further enhanced price of land from flowing automatically into the pockets of the landlords. The present rating system is a formidable obstacle to social progress in local government, and is, more than any single cause, the source of the opposition of the middle class to reforms from which in reality they stand to gain, but which only present themselves to their minds as probable occasions for increases of the rates. A reform which would throw the growing cost of local government on to that increasing value of the land which good government has made possible has been carefully thought out by skilled financiers, has been sanctioned by the report of a minority, but of a very weighty minority, of a Royal Commission, and is both politically and socially the step in advance which the circumstances of the time demand. Politically, no better event could be desired than that the Lords should join battle on this issue; socially, none better than that they should allow a fundamental reform of the rating system to become law.

There remains another great measure of economic justice to which the party is now deeply pledged, and to which the Lords can offer no resistance. A sum of two and a-quarter millions was ear-marked by Mr. Asquith in his last Budget as a first contribution to a pension fund. If any doubt remained as to the perseverance of the Government with this great measure it has been set at rest by recent Ministerial utterances. The United Kingdom will come into line next year with the most progressive of its own Colonies and of European nations, with New Zealand and New South Wales, with Denmark and France, by providing for the aged poor on lines which will preserve their independence and keep them free from the taint of pauperism. We have not space for the moment to discuss the details of a Bill which cannot, as was once hoped, be a very short and simple affair, but must occupy a very large part of the coming session. All reformers are agreed in substance that the scheme must be non-contributory. This is not the same thing as a universal scheme, and people recoil from universality on the ground of expense. At the same time, every exception to the universality of the scheme threatens to impair the principle underlying it. This principle is that to the old support is due rather as a right than as a charity. The economic conditions of the time do not admit of the accumulation of sufficient wealth by the mass of the people to make adequate independent provision for old age, and, when past work, members of the industrial classes have for the most part to rely on the support of their relations, or of the poor law. It is held that the responsibility ought rather to fall on the State, which should secure to the aged independence as of right; that those same economic conditions which keep the wages of large classes too low for adequate self-maintenance also keep up great accumulations of wealth in the hands of a small class; and that this fund may fairly be drawn upon for the common good. It is thus not as a measure of charity but as an instalment of economic justice, a redressing of the balance of industrial fortune, that the right of the aged is urged, and in this view the right is in principle one of general application. It would, of course, be impracticable to demand a full-blown system in a single Budget. What we hope to see is a measure, large and generous in itself, framed on lines which will admit of expansion and will justify the claim of the Liberal Party to stand for the redress of grievances and the mitigation of inequalities in the economic as in the political and religious sphere.

THE PERSIAN PARLIAMENT.

THE establishment of a Persian Parliament was something of a portent; its survival for a year and a-half is almost miraculous. The movement, partly secret, partly overt, democratic and revolutionary in its underground roots, clerical on the surface, implied an upheaval so tremendous in the habits and thoughts of an Oriental people that it is amazing that its career has been hitherto so peaceful. It has, indeed, swept aside a clique of ministers and courtiers, cleansed the administration of oppressive governors and princes, made life a little harder for the corrupt and the incompetent, and reduced the Shah to an apologetic constitutional sovereign. But there has been as yet no catastrophe, and hardly any bloodshed: and this is remarkable, because any movement among a people usually inert is apt to develop a passion and a fanaticism which destroy even the objects of their devotion. There was once, so runs the tale, a Persian Dervish, a devout Shiah, who sat down under a tree in the desert and began to make little images of clay. First he made a counterfeit of the Caliph Omar, whom to hate is one half of religion in Persia. Him he smashed as a usurper. Then he made an image of the Ali, whom all Persians venerate as the legitimate successor of the Prophet. But it struck him that Ali's weakness had contributed to Omar's success, and him too he smashed. Coming next to the clay Mahomet he reflected that he, as a prophet, ought to have foreseen Omar's usurpation: and for that neglect he destroyed him also. Last of all there was Allah himself, who must have foreknown and foreordained the usurpation; and in a final access of rage he broke up Allah like the rest. The parable, typical alike of Persian humour and Persian fanaticism, sums up the possibilities that are latent in every passionate movement based on the assertion of a single principle among a simple and unworldly people. The flame of rebellion under an ancient tyranny is apt to be a consuming fire which destroys liberty itself, as the Dervish smashed Allah.

Persia is probably the last of all the countries of the Mohamedan world where one would have expected to see a successful constitutional movement. Turkey, for three-quarters of a century, has been under European influence. The upper classes of Egypt have received for at least two generations a French education; and in India the Moslems, though the least progressive element of the native population, have come under English influence. But Persia had remained isolated and apparently unprogressive, recalcitrant to European influences, and cut off, because of the unorthodoxy of her Mohamedanism, from the movement of thought in Sunni countries. The travellers who have visited her knew for the most part nothing of her language or her spiritual life, and were content to study her either as a mine of antiquities or a field for exploitation and conquest. One book there is—Professor Browne's "A Year Among the Persians"—which does describe with real insight and affection the inner life of the poets, sceptics, and mystics of the South. But even he felt little interest in the northern population, and it is in the north that the new movement has had its origin. The northerners are largely Turkish by race and language, and though they have a greater capacity for action, they are regarded by the true Persians of the south as uncultivated Philistines. In those southern provinces, where poetry and metaphysics are still the only real concerns of a cultivated man, one cannot conceive the success of anything so mundane as a democratic movement. There the real interest of life is in the struggle between orthodoxy, scepticism, and mysticism. The initiated traveller discovers that Babism, crushed out by a ruthless persecution, is still a living and growing cult. A green-turbaned descendant of the Prophet reveals himself in the secrecy of some sequestered garden as a tolerant and enthusiastic Babi, only to be transformed in his cups into a reckless and blaspheming sceptic. It is in the more practical and less intellectual north that democracy has made its conquests. The Turkish race may be capable of fanaticism, but it is not other-worldly. It is the Turco-Persians of the north who have established the Parliament, acting, in all probability, under an influence which has reached them from the seething world of the Russian Caucasus, where Social Democracy has levelled races and creeds. The element which the south, teeming with Babism and scepticism, has contributed is no doubt the anti-clerical impulse which sees in the constitution a means of converting a theocracy into a secular and tolerant State.

The curious diary of the Parliament which "The Times" published on Tuesday shows us in section, as it were, some of the difficulties with which the new movement is wrestling. An anti-clerical newspaper demands the complete secularisation of the law, and the admission of Non-Moslems to the franchise. The clerical party, defeated recently and robbed of some of its profitable rights in the administration of the law of inheritance, demands its suppression, carries its point by a small majority, and complains next day that the defiant paper still appears. The Turkish frontier difficulty occupies another debate. The financial crisis runs through the whole series of discussions. Princes are coerced into subscribing to the new national bank, which is to save Persia from mortgaging her independence to Russian and British syndicates. Salaries, it is decided, shall be paid only to the extent of fifty per cent., and even then "the rich and the undeserving" are to go empty away. A riot breaks out at Shiraz, and its deputies adjourn to the telegraph. Meanwhile, a conflict is proceeding with the throne. A more or less reactionary Ministry has been appointed by the Shah; it is tried for a time, dismissed, and replaced by a Liberal Cabinet, with an Oxford graduate at its head. Evidently despite dissensions, and the threatened defection of the clerical party, the reform movement is still in the ascendant. On Friday last a telegram reported that the people were discussing the deposition of the Shah. On Wednesday we learned that the Shah, deprecatory and almost apologetic, has visited the Parliament in person, and sworn for the fourth time his fidelity to the Constitution. What manner of man he is we can only guess; his actions are rather those of a Louis XVI. than a Nicholas II.

The debates as one reads them in "The Times" make a mingled impression. Some members are obviously educated men, who have studied European history. A few are fanatics. Most of them are probably shrewd but unschooled Orientals, experimenting without precedents in the working of an unfamiliar machine. The obvious commentary on the whole record is that which a Persian member himself made—that the Parliament is transgressing its proper limits by acting as though it were an executive council. That mistake, after all, is one which the Convention made in France, and in some phases of politics it may be inevitable. The first prejudice which the European doctrinaire enunciates in judging the East is to declare that Orientals are necessarily incapable of managing representative institutions. The second prejudice is a counterpart of the first, for when the Parliament visibly exists, the doctrinaire at once assumes that it can succeed only if it minutely reproduces European models. Seated cross-legged on their mats, with their hookahs beside them, these Persian democrats, naïve and inexperienced though they seem to us, will probably prove in the end quick-witted enough to improvise for themselves, without models or precedents, a procedure and a constitution which will suit their needs. If, in the meantime, these debates strike us as simple, and sometimes even slightly humorous, a reader of any imagination will supplement them by two contrasted pictures. Let us call up to ourselves first of all the sort of procedure and the style of argument by which a Kajar Shah, surrounded by his favourites and his toys, would debate these same questions with his venal Ministers, if indeed he ever interrupted the pursuit of his vices to debate them at all. Or if we choose to imagine that Parliament and Shah have both been swept aside, let us ask with what arguments a Russian viceroy, fresh from organising the racial feuds of the Caucasus, or the Jewish massacres of Odessa, or the dragonnades of the Baltic Provinces, would approach the decision of these same problems. The contrast is highly favourable to the Persian Parliament.

The tragedy of this novel chapter of Oriental history lies in the foreboding which oppresses the sympathetic spectator, that the experiment, interesting, even promising though it is, is destined to be interrupted at the first opportunity by Russian intervention. A drastic assertion of his former autocracy by the Shah, followed by a resolute protest from the people, an extension of the Turkish frontier difficulty, a local rising which involved some loss to Europeans, an aggravation of the normal state of bankruptcy—any one of these might serve as the pretext which would set the Cossacks marching southwards. And yet no disturbance is probable in Persia which will even remotely reproduce the anarchy that has raged for three years in Russia itself. Nor is Russian trade likely to suffer any loss under the régime of independence at all comparable to the kind of loss which might take place after annexation—if, for example, the Persians were to boycott Russian as the Bengalis have boycotted English goods. The Persian Press, it is true, talks of resisting the partition foreshadowed in the Anglo-Russian Agreement even at the cost of "weltering in blood." But there are neither resources nor organisation behind the threat. Prudence and astute diplomacy are the best weapons for the weak. England in the glow of 1848, under Palmerston and Russell, would have thought it the climax of dishonour to prepare the dismemberment of a people which was bolder facing its destinies, attempting to throw off the inertia and the corruption of a secular tyranny, and trying, even though it were crudely, to adapt to its own needs the formulae of European Liberalism. In the sixties we would have staked much to save the independence of such a people. To-day one can only hope that at least enough of this spirit survives at the Foreign Office to induce it to use its influence to delay the Russian advance, and to gain for the Persians a breathing space in which to make, as free men, relying on their own resources, the bravest and the most hopeful experiment that the Moslem East has yet essayed.

Life and Letters.

SUPER-WEALTH.

"ENGLAND is a sieve" is the cry of the astonished audience in Mr. Belloc's brochure on the fiscal question. "Poor old England is a sieve." They were filled with horror at the Tariff Reformer's denunciation of the discrepancy between imports and exports, and his vision of the golden sovereigns being drained from this country to pay for these undesirable incursionists. And undoubtedly by similar if less pleasant follies the apostles of Protection have succeeded in shaking belief in England's prosperity. It is still possible in train or street, or places where men assemble, to find observers with an air of sagacity, declaiming upon England's headlong rush towards poverty and the abyss. To all such a serious study of the superfluous wastage of the nation might bring a gratifying reassurance. Statistics present to the reader incredible arrays of figures; so much leaping forward of income-tax returns, unchecked by wars, borrowings, or trade depressions; so many hundreds of millions of the National Income divided amongst people whose individual incomes exceed five thousand a year. Where does it go to? How is it consumed? What asset of permanent value will be left behind as evidence of the super-wealth of the twentieth century? The answers to these questions are not entirely satisfactory. "Waste" is written large over a very substantial proportion of the national expenditure, and that far more in the private than in the public consumption. Mr. Wyndham recently informed a meeting in Scotland that if all the rich men were abolished there would be no one left to give work to the people. That, however, was rather a popular method of combating Socialism, than a serious contribution to political economy. Chauffeurs, gardeners, cooks, and caddies have reasonable cause to tremble: the rest may remain with withers unwrung.

The most obvious necessity for this waste comes from the "speeding up" of living which has taken place in all classes in so marked a fashion within a generation. The whole standard of life has been sensibly raised, not so much in comfort as in ostentation. And the result is something similar to that in the insane competition of armaments which takes place amongst the terrified nations of the world. One year ten huge ironclads confront twenty. A decade after, fifteen huge ironclads of another type have replaced the first: to be confronted again with thirty of the new floating castles. So many millions have been thrown to the scrap heap. The proportion of power has remained unaffected. It is the same in the more determined private competition for supremacy in a social standard. Where one house sufficed, now two are demanded; where a dinner of a certain quality, now a dinner of a superior quality; where certain clothes or dresses or flowers, now more clothes or dresses or flowers. It is waste not because fine clothes and rare flowers and pleasant food are not in themselves desirable, but because by a kind of parallel of the law of diminishing returns in agriculture, additional expenditure in such directions fails to result in correspondent additions of happiness. In many respects indeed the effect is not only negatively worthless but even positively harmful. Modern civilisation in its most highly organised forms has elaborated a system to which the delicate fibre of body and mind is unable to respond. And the result is the appearance (whimsical enough to Carlyle's spectators "beyond the region of the fixed stars") of a society expending half its income in heaping up the material of disease, to which the other half of its income is being laboriously applied for remedy.

But the general effect (to the above-mentioned dispassionate spectators) is of an extravagance of wealth and waste which is only not insolent because it is for the most part unconscious, the sport of blind forces rather than the deliberate defiance of the limits of human endeavour. It is not insolence or—as it might have appeared in the olden days—a determination to rival the fabled immortals, which has charged all our high roads with wandering machines racing with incredible velocity and no apparent aim. A few (such as W. E. Henley) demand "Speed in the face of the Lord." A few others are inflamed with the desire for "driving abroad in furious guise," as in the tortured and bored procession in old Rome, for the "easier and quicker" passing of the "impracticable hours." But nine out of ten who have purchased motor cars have done so either because their neighbours have purchased motor cars or because their neighbours have not purchased motor cars; in a demand for equality with the one, or superiority to the other. When every man of a certain income has purchased a motor-car, when life has become "speeded up" to the motor car level, that definite increase of expenditure will be accepted as normal. But life will be no happier and no richer for such an acceptance; it will merely have become more impossible for those who (for whatever reason) are repudiating the demands of such a standard. And the same is true of the multiplication of meals; of the rise in the price of rent in certain districts of London, for example, because everyone wants to live there; of numberless exactions and extortions which have grown up in a society whose members, "like wealthy men," are "careless how they give."

And mournfully enough this rather dull and drab extravagance of private living is accompanied by a severe scrutiny of any kind of public magnificence, and a resentful criticism of all efforts to stamp the memory of this age upon enduring brick and stone. The London County Council, housed in a few shambling hovels and warrens, proposed a year or two back to devote a few hundred thousand pounds to an "Hôtel de Ville," situate on the banks of the river opposite Westminster. And the opponents of the particular party in power had no difficulty in stirring up the wealthier classes into the fiercest protest against this attempt to leave the future with a permanent memorial of twentieth-century London. The one dignified and conspicuous building of the Victorian age—the Palace at Westminster—remains to-day scamped, truncated, and unfinished, because the nation, in a cold fit of retrenchment, was alarmed at the amount which it had already lavished upon it. Dr. Dill has shown us in the Roman Peace, during the age of the Antonines and after, the people of the Empire turning with enthusiasm to greet communal building; and every city setting itself to such achievements as remain to-day the wonder of the world. There is something of brutality, indeed, as well as something of large achievement in the inadequacy of ends to means: as in the gigantic Pont du Gard, marching in its colossal grandeur over a deep valley in order to conduct a tiny rivulet of water to a second-rate provincial city; or the enormous stone arenas which in every ruined Roman town marks the place of the communal games. But what kind of building will mark for the astonishment of future eyes the super-wealth of the British Peace? The signs are not propitious. A Byzantine Cathedral at Westminster, a Gothic Cathedral at Liverpool, a few town halls and libraries of sober solidity, the white buildings which to-day line Whitehall, and fill the passing stranger with bewilderment at a race "that thus could build" will be the chief legacies of this present generation. The thirteenth century gave us the Cathedrals; the sixteenth gave us the colleges at Oxford and Cambridge and the noblest of English country houses. These tiny Englands, with populations, in the aggregate, less than that of London to-day, and wealth incredibly smaller, have left us possessions that we can admire but cannot equal. "The work which we collective children of God do," complained Matthew Arnold, "our grand centre of life, our city for us to dwell in, is London! London, with its unutterable external hideousness, and with its internal canker of publicæ egestas, privatim opulentia, unequalled in the world." It was this contrast which gave point to a question which otherwise the plain man would put by as absurd: "If England were swallowed up by the sea to-morrow, which of the two, a hundred years hence, would most excite the love, interest, and admiration of mankind, the England of the last twenty years or the England of Elizabeth?"

Public penury, private ostentation—that, perhaps, is the heart of the matter. A nation with the unparalleled wealth of England can afford to spend, and spend royally. Only the end should be conspicuous to all, and the choice deliberate. The spectacle of an unparalleled urban poverty confronts all this waste energy. That spectacle should not, indeed, forbid all luxuries and splendours: but it should judge the less rewarding of them as something tawdry and mean. "Money! money!" cries the hero—a second-grade Government clerk—of a recent novel—"the good that can be done with it in the world! Only a little more: a little more!" It is the passionate cry of unnumbered thousands. Expenditure multiplies its return in human happiness as it is scattered amongst the widest area of population. And the only justification for the present unnatural heaping up of great possessions in the control of the very few is the return in leisure and the cultivation of the arts and the more reputable magnificence of the luxurious life. We have called into life a whole new industry in motor-cars and quick travelling, and established populous cities to minister to our increasing demands for speed. We have converted half the Highlands into deer forests for our sport; and the amount annually spent on golf—on balls and links and tram tickets and service—exceeds the total revenue of many a lesser European municipality. We fling away in ugly white hotels, in uninspired dramatic entertainments, and in elaborate banquets, of which everyone is weary, the price of many poor men's yearly income. Yet we cannot build a new Cathedral. We cannot even preserve the Cathedrals bequeathed to us, and the finest of them are tumbling to pieces for lack of response to the frantic demands for aid. We grumble freely at halfpenny increases in the rates for baths or libraries or pleasure grounds. We assert—there are many of us who honestly believe it—that we cannot afford to set aside twenty-five millions from our astounding annual revenues for the decent maintenance of our aged poor.

LOVE LETTERS OF A STATESMAN.

GAMBETTA's letters to Madame Léonie Léon—or a selection of them—appeared in the "Revue de Paris" less than a year ago. The first knowledge of them by the French public was obtained earlier—in quotations by M. Jaurès in the Chamber of Deputies during the debates on Delcassé's Morocco policy. Only the death of the woman whose love formed the great passion of Gambetta's life rendered possible their publication. After years of grief and sorrow, which never lightened with the passage of time, she died, unnoticed and forgotten in an obscure suburb of Paris, eleven months ago. And now, in the English translation of "The Heart of Gambetta" (by Francis Laur; John Lane), appears the whole narrative of one of the great love stories of the world. It is a correspondence—scanty, indeed, but inspired by such ardour and devotion as few can parallel; not, perhaps, extravagantly described by Mr. Macdonald in the preface to this volume as "a correspondence which, even judged by the necessarily restricted instalment of it now issued, will be recognised as the most beautiful of its kind in print." M. Laur's method hardly bears transplanting across the Channel. It combines a mixture of melodrama and polemic. The polemic is occupied with a chivalrous and often fierce vindication of "Léonie" from the scandal or criticism which may have gathered round her; in the exhibition of how her wise counsel came to assist Gambetta in his political career; and how she tamed and softened the more uncouth manners of this Southern giant; and in the narrative of the true story of the tragedy of Gambetta's death. The melodrama, with its use of the historic present, and its series of "scenes"—now in the Corps Legislatif, now in the park of Versailles, now at the office of the "Republique Française"—is more suited to the warmth and vigour of the South than to the colder and more critical English method. The story itself is sufficiently dramatic, carrying with it all the high elements of passion, of pity, and of death.

It is the story of a strong man's love—concentrated from youth to middle age upon the subject of his affections: impulsive, volcanic, burning like a flame at his heart. It is there, the secret source of inspiration and ardour through all the days of superhuman effort when for a decade this man drew upon his own shoulders the burden of the remaking of his country. Behind those tempestuous struggles for the founding of the Republic, for the unity of the Republican parties, for the restoring of the desolation of the great disasters, is this secret channel of expression, in which the statesman is laying all his fame and energies at the feet of his beloved. The story is built of the elements of romance. It ends in sudden tragedy. The commencement shows a "tall, black-gloved woman, beautiful, though of rather a severe type of beauty, like a Roman woman who somehow had wandered to Paris," attending constantly at the Corps Legislatif and the Assemblée Nationale to applaud his speeches. He notices her, and begs her to meet him; after some refusals, she consents. There is an interview in the Park of Versailles. He is a man of thirty-four, she a woman of twenty-five. She tells him the pitiful story of her life: she and a sister left orphan girls, and penniless, compelled to go out as governesses, both ruined when quite young; "God alone is not enough for the orphan." She refuses to marry him; she is a Catholic, and will not consent to the civil marriage; he will not accept the blasphemy (to him) of the religious ceremonial. She will not "spoil his life" (as she affirms) by dragging him down to her level. But he betroths her with a ring with the emblem: "Hors cet anel point n'est d'amour." And so commences a union which lasts unclouded to the day of his death. "An ideally perfect union," Mr. Macdonald describes it, "which was a marriage in every sense short of ratification by an office clerk and a priest's benediction." She wrote to him every day they were absent, says M. Joseph Reinach: letters full of wise advice concerning the progress of political affairs. He came to lean more and more on her judgment, finding his anti-Catholic feeling tempered and softened by her religious faith: even using her for an interview with Leo XIII. at Rome to discuss the possibility of a friendly separation between Church and State. He advances—in the public career that forms the background of this intimate life—from the position of a noisy agitator to that of practically Dictator of France, and echoes of all the fury and tumult break in upon the protestations of human affection. It is the revelation of a man's soul: of one of the most astonishing of men's souls which ever flared stormily across the arena of human existence, restless from the cradle to the grave.

He exhausts the vocabulary in terms of endearment: "Dear, adorable little one," "my all-beloved," "my dear loved one," "my dear idol." "I place myself at thy feet," he concludes his letters, "I adore thee and embrace thee," "at thy knees," "all to thee and for thee." He cannot find sufficient imagery to express the fire of his devotion. "I love thee as the Greeks must have of old loved their household goddess Minerva": "Remember that I love thee more than life, more than fame": "I adore thee as the saints adore God." While he can "shudder for all that remains of France," while he is staggered by the vision of "a disorganised army, a country more depressed, Europe more servile than ever," he can protest also "My whole being belongs to thee": "I cannot bear to think that the woman on whose head are concentrated all my pride, ambition, love, and passion, can suffer one moment, and suffer for me." He never allowed this private and passionate affection to interfere with his enormous public efforts, never retired into that little "Earthly Paradise" as a refuge from the work demanded of him. They met, but at intervals. She is always spurring him on to renewed energies, combating that nostalgia and depression and disgust which accompanies all such violent public life. Sometimes he is inclined to revolt against all. "I grieve to see another of these mild, beautiful Autumn days pass far from thee," he writes, "ceaselessly calling and never seeing thee. Ah! how some day we shall regret these happy hours of youth, and then it will be too late." Sometimes the thought of his love cheers and consoles in the unending tumult of the controversy. "Love is my viaticum," he confesses. "If, thanks to it, I did not find in the depths of my heart the hope and confidence placed there by thy delicate hand, I should really be inclined to give all this troop of ungrateful idiots and fools the slip and turn hermit somewhere." He turns, as others so tempest-tossed have turned, to solitude and quiet places for healing. "How I love these pleasures, new to me, of solitude," he writes from the country; "this great, beneficent silence, these admirable hiding-places in the woods, those calm, sleepy pools at the foot of scented heaths, and, above all, the delight of collecting one's thoughts, thinking, meditating at one's leisure, without disturbance or brawlings from the outside world."

Sometimes his love carries him into a kind of intoxication or madness. The "Vision Splendid" had revealed itself to this man through the person of a girl who came to him already broken in the world's harsh ways. The passing of youth into middle age intensified rather than softened the fervour of his devotion. It is late in the day when he writes, "I feel like a god, and am, indeed, a god, for gods alone can bestow the gift of perfect love. I sink myself in thy being for all eternity, and I wish for nothing better, nothing beyond this ineffable communion of souls." Returning to Paris from his great triumph at Cahors, his native town, "Nothing can ever come between us," he cries. "The world may crumble away beneath me; as long as I keep one spark of reason, one atom of strength, I shall feel always bound to the thrice-blessed woman who lifted me up and saved me from myself. I love thee with my brain, with my heart, with my senses: I love thee for Eternity." Bewildered and harassed in that short-lived Administration of 1881, when he occupies the supreme position in the politics of France, he is pouring out his soul—tense, nervous, and aflame—in these seventy-two days of delirium. "Thou hast emptied the cup of sorrow," writes the head of the French Ministry to this obscure and unknown woman. "I have personally tasted, calmly, without emotion, all the extremes of happiness, of what men call the joys of power and fame; but they are all as nothing to me without thee, without thy love, without thy presence, without thy revenge against an unjust fate." After the fall of the Ministry-of-all-the-Talents this inspiring affection will provide consolation for all the vicissitudes of fortune. "Surely the strength which passes from thee to me must bring thee happiness and the promise of salvation." "I laugh at all the follies of fate," he defiantly proclaims: "in thee I take refuge as in the Garden of Eden; and thus I glory in life, since life is, and remains, the inevitable condition by which I am allowed to taste such noble pleasures."

Nine months afterwards the "follies of fate" had brought Gambetta to the grave. Léonie had refused to marry him while his star was in the ascendant, even suggesting to him—in advice more comprehensible in France than England—that he should make his political position secure by a political marriage. When he fell from his high place her resistance was withdrawn. They prepare a tiny country cottage—Les Jardies, the ruined cottage of the Secretary of Balzac, bought for three hundred pounds. Here occurs that gun-shot accident which for so long was encompassed in mystery; here afterwards Gambetta's life is muddled away by the contradictory advice of a host of doctors, shirking a simple operation, which might have saved him. He dies on the last night of the year. It is the death of a Titan; faring forth undismayed into the night. To the woman remained the harder task of living. Her religious beliefs forbade suicide. M. Laur, with delicacy and reticence, lifts but a corner of the veil which hides the tragedy of a ruined heart. It is a record of patient endurance: letters of infinite longing, infinite regret. She writes from Rome, where "each stone reminds one of the instability of the things of this world, the ingratitude of mankind, the uncertainty of earthly happiness." Exquisite music can only prove a passing anodyne: "immediately, more powerful than ever, the old memories come back. Time cannot heal such wounds." "The great shadow of death is over everything here," she declares: "teaching one how to suffer, to die, and to hope for better things than life can give." Death, so long desired, came at last. She had arranged everything: the rough coffin of tarred fir—the humblest class of funeral; no flowers. They buried her amongst the poor in a remote suburban cemetery, with a tiny cross alone marking the spot, soon to disappear for ever. "I will love thee above all else in this world," Gambetta had written to her, "and in the next, if there is another. Come to my soul, I await thee: and if thou wilt, I will keep thee there for ever."

POETS AS OBSERVERS OF NATURE.

MR. LANG's book ("Poets' Country." Edited by Andrew Lang. Illustrated by F. S. Walker. Jack.), is really an examination, written by different well-known critics, of the manner in which different poets, such as Shakespeare, Milton, Wordsworth, Shelley, Keats, and Tennyson have treated the facts of nature in their poetry, and in particular of the extent to which they have described the country in which they lived. It is the fashion now to praise poets who are in favour for their minute observation, and many critics assume that records of minute observation are desirable in poetry. Professor Churton Collins, for instance, says of Shakespeare in this book that "as nature fashions in her impartial thoroughness of workmanship, or reveals herself in her infinity of phases, so he depicts. Like hers, his touch is as finished and precise in minutiae as in what is most eminent and impressive;" and he proceeds to give us examples: as, for instance, where Iachimo, in "Cymbeline," says that the mark upon Imogen's left breast is—

"Cinque spotted, like the crimson drops
I' the bottom of a cowslip."

He remarks also that Shakespeare speaks of moss as furred, of violets as blue-veined, of a willow as "show'ring his hoar leaves in the glassy stream," of the mealy wings of a butterfly, of heavy-gaited toads, and of staring owls. Now there is no proof of any very searching observation in any of these instances, except the cowslip passage, and in that case the fact observed is not very happily used. There could be no real likeness between the spots on the mole and the spots on the cowslip, and the comparison is mere ornament, almost inclining one to believe that Shakespeare was eager to make any use he could of a fact which he had lately observed. Indeed, Shakespeare has got the reputation of a minute observer on very easy terms; and so have most of the poets who are commonly praised for minute observation of nature. Nearly all the facts recorded in the passages quoted in the book might have been acquired by a Cockney journalist with a note-book in the course of a week-end in the country. Where the journalist would fall short of the poet would be in his use of these facts. He would not even need a week-end in the country to know that glow-worms give no light in the daytime; but that knowledge would not enable him to say—

"The glowworm shows the matin to be near,
And 'gins to pale his uneffectual fire."

What makes the poetry of these lines is not the observation but the motion, and they delight us not with their information but with their music.

It is doubtful whether poets are ever very minute or exact observers. Wordsworth is often praised for his close study of natural facts, yet he could live to be over thirty without ever having noticed the lesser celandine; while Milton did not know that the nightingale does not sing all the summer. The fact is that men seldom observe any kind of facts very closely except for some particular purpose: and we are all surprised to find how a particular purpose quickens our observation of facts which have been staring us in the face all our lives without our noticing them. But the poet, so far as his poetry is concerned, has no particular motive for close observation of nature facts, since poetry is a means of expressing emotion rather than of conveying information, and the more charged with emotion it is the less likely is it to be a good means of conveying information. The finest passages of description in poetry, especially in lyrical poetry, often seem to us very vivid; but if we analyse them we shall usually find that the poet's appeal is to our emotions rather than to our eyes. He has seen something when in some state of intense emotion, and by communicating the emotion to us he makes us see what he has seen with the same vividness. He communicates his emotion by means of the music of his verse; and the facts which are so musically recorded, although usually few and simple, seem to us to be all the essential facts. Music itself, though it states no facts, can sometimes make vivid pictures for us by its appeal to our emotions; and even the painter makes his picture vivid by the expression of his emotions, in his execution as well as by the representation of fact. It is also emotion that selects facts both in painting and in poetry, and the greater the emotion the more exclusive is the process of selection, as when Shelley says:

"He will watch from dawn to gloom
The lake-reflected sun illumine
The yellow bees in the ivy-bloom."

How few are the facts recorded, and they are facts that anyone might notice; yet how the music seems to make them live for us! William Morris said that Shelley had no eyes; and Mr. Lang, in his book, remarks that in some lines which he quotes Shelley was "rather concerned with his own emotions than with the watery plain under his eyes." But the poet is always more concerned with his own emotions than with phenomena, and he only makes use of phenomena to express emotions which the phenomena may have aroused in him. Morris whom we have just quoted against Shelley, was a poet who did observe minutely, and whose head was stored with facts; yet when he comes to describe he gives us very few of them.

"From township to township, o'er down and by tillage,
Far, far hae we wandered, and long was the day.
But now cometh eve at the end of the village,
Where over the grey wall the church riseth grey."

All that might be seen by a capitalist scorching by in a motor-car; but he could not so feel what he had seen, and therefore he could not sing it into our brains. There is no poem in the language, perhaps, so vivid as the "Ancient Mariner"; and it is vivid not because it is full of minute or exact observation, but because all the facts recorded in it express emotion.

"The moving moon went up the sky,
And nowhere did abide;
Softly she was going up,
And a star or two beside."

or—

"The sun came up upon the left,
Out of the sea came he;
And he shone bright, and on the right
Went down into the sea."

These verses might have been written by a blind man so far as the observation contained in them goes; but they are vivid because the passage of the sun and the moon has stirred certain emotions in the poet, and these are expressed in the description.

Professor Churton Collins quotes two verses from Collins's "Ode to Evening":—

"O nymph reserved, while now the bright-haired sun,
Sits in yon western tent, whose cloudy skirts,
With brede ethereal wove,
O'erhang his wavy bed.

Now air is hushed, save where the weak-eyed bat,
With short, shrill shriek, flits by on leathern wing;
Or where the beetle winds
His small but sullen horn."

And on these he remarks that "whoever is acquainted with the neighbourhood of Chichester, and has wandered along the roads through the fields there when the shades of evening are falling, will have no difficulty in understanding what suggested and what inspired this admirable sketch." But is it only near Chichester that evening could be called a "nymph reserved," or that the sun could be said to sit in a western tent, or that the air is hushed, or the bats weak-eyed or leathern winged, or that stag beetles make their peculiar sound? It would be difficult to give a description less localised than this and yet Professor Collins would have us believe that it is made up of things that must have been observed near Chichester. It is superior to most versified descriptions of the eighteenth century—not in observation, but simply in emotion. Collins had felt the evening as well as seen it, and his feeling has given music to his verse.

The fact is that minute descriptions of nature may be very good practice to a poet, since they may teach him how to make his verse full of matter. Keats knew this and filled his earlier verse with detail, often quite unselected. But as he gained in mastery he selected more and more, and in his masterpiece, "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," there is little enough detail; only all that there is expresses the emotion of the poem. You will find as much detail as you can desire in the descriptive poetry of the eighteenth century; but it is dead detail because it has been only observed, not felt. Poetry at its highest tends to approach to music and to eliminate all facts except those which are essential to the expression of emotion.

A DAY OF REST.

It is not the beginning of the week, nor is it the end; it is not of the week at all. It is a day apart: a day of rest.

In the Big Grey City—the City of the Great Unrest—where the six days pass by unnoted in hurried overlapping endeavour, it is all-important. It is the day on which men need not work; therefore we all welcome it, even the idle rich, and make the most of an unusual leisure, each according to his inclinations.

On this day we motor. The hoot of many horns disturbs the slumbrous quiet of mid-day country calm, as, be-goggled and wrapped up, we travel swiftly from place to place, seeking luncheon and tea in the wayside inns of forgotten country places, and then quickly back to dine. For to-night we dine in crowded restaurants: the dinner is the one event. It is the night of rest, and we need not hurry with our food, for there is nothing after eleven except for the strange gatherings of a selected few; therefore we linger over coffee and the petit verre, while the reverberation of the all-day hum gradually dies away, and our wind-swept faces glow pleasantly in acceptable repose.

For some of us it is a day of earlier rising. We bolt our breakfast or go without to catch an early train, because we want a long day in the restful country. We spend most of it in that Sunday train, which stops at everywhere and in between—that train of rest. We meet it again at night as we hurry on to the crowded platform only just in time. In the frenzied minutes of the regulation stop we pack in, fourteen rest-seekers in one carriage; and the racks are over-filled with varied bundles threatening to fall. We are of all classes: but on the last Sunday train there are no distinctions of class. We must all get home, for to-morrow we must work, so we get in anywhere, for the train is very full. We try to rest in many attitudes of abandonment, and our heads flop as the train starts and stops. In the minutes between sleep and somnolence we see, hazily, others, tired like ourselves: dazed children huddling under a protecting arm; couples sitting close and hand in hand, while the girl's head droops on to his shoulder, and the new hat, which was the pride of the morning, joggles all awry; old ladies with tired eyes, bravely attempting an upright dignity without success. They are all a very long way off, and only the ghost-faces, which peer through the blurred windows from without, are real, because they threaten a disturbance at every stop. Back in London at last, we hurry off to complete our homeward journey, or turn in thankfully near at hand. For we have fed and laughed and played unusually, and are very tired.

Or perchance we take exercise. We shoulder a long, heavy bag and tramp for hours over uneven grass, hitting a small white ball and looking for it so that we may hit it again. What though we do lose heart, swear, and feel it all next week, if we are off our game? This is the day on which we need not toil, so we take pleasure in our pain, though the melancholy of "rotten play" colours our outlook until we can retrieve our self-respect next Sunday. We may be merely despised pedestrians; but we have toe-and-heeled it for miles, until we are glad to sit down and rest the foot which hurt a little for the last few miles. Even a blister is part of the hard-earned glory of fatigue.

Others of us—the respectable ones—stay in London and pay calls. It is our only day. In tall hat and creased trousers we flit from house to house, praying for denials to our inquiries, and timing our last visitations with nice exactitude, so as to get them in and done with before the prescribed hour, when the hostess may sigh and feel released to pursue her own inclinations. Fortified with good intentions, we do many uncongenial things. We balance bits of cake in saucers and hand round plates of food at the same time; we babble nothings and find ourselves pledged to wondrous theses because we have spoken, without thought, for something to say. We sit—when we are not dodging little tables of priceless treasures or racing for the door—on the edge of strange chairs; we lose our gloves. But we are satisfied if only we complete our round. Or we visit relatives, where there are no formalities, only snappy argument, as we discuss the family differences of absent ones. Or, may be, we go to concerts, doing escort to fair ladies, while our hats get brushed the other way by the jostlings of many music-lovers.

Perhaps we spend a quiet day at home. We rise a little later, indolently, and an accusing pile of things to be written, left undone, faces us from the heaped-up table. We do them. We write letters—all the letters we ought to have written during the week, and have not; we sign and send off cheques long since overdue; we tear up letters—all the letters we should have torn up long ago, and papers; we tear them all up. We get zealous: we dig out documents long destined for destruction, and our fingers ache with the continual grip and pull. We tidy. We condemn many things, and in a few hours reduce the accumulation of years, such is our enthusiasm. Meal time comes as an unwelcome interruption to the drastic joy of clearing out and we do not stop until our fingers are ingrained with dust, and we are very weary.

In the streets—the streets so full of people—it is the day of many comings and goings from morning until night; it is the day of interminable tram rides and intricate bus journeys, with many changings and much patient waiting at street corners. It is the day of many outings and walkings out. On this day innumerable hand-maidens, appearing up area steps with the inevitable parcel, sally forth for something more serious than a journey to the post. On this day the streets are loud with the shuffle of many thousand silent couples, tramping for ever to and fro, while the love spark is kindled with the mute magnetism of touch, or extinguished by a sudden awakening during the long silences when they have nothing to say.

It is a day of new experiences and of old. On this day the youth first meets tobacco, and untended children wander far afield; the girl gets her first kiss or her last; and the rising man puts on his first tall hat, the signal of his advancement in the world's affairs.

At night the aimless sauntering becomes a settled trudge, and the faces, shadowed with fatigue, take on something of workaday intent as the people hurry homeward. Weary mothers carry weary babies, asleep or crying peevishly; and the weary father drags along the children who can walk, talking only in exhortations lest they miss the last departing tram. Couples, standing in the shadow of a house, break off the last few words of parting with a hurried kiss, and the man watches while the woman scurries off. Multitudes converge on the railway stations, and at many points of departure are fierce tram-scrambles for a seat. Bright-lighted motor-cars glide or thunder by, showing flashes of loveliness inside. For at the end the one idea is home.

It begins early and ends late, this day of rest. When it is over we are glad to get to bed—and to rest.

Letters from Abroad.

THE CHARACTER OF WILLIAM II.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It may be a matter of controversy whether there is amongst the crowned heads living one with a higher opinion of his station than the present German Emperor. But there can be no dispute that no one has more often and more energetically emphasised the loftiness of his office than the third bearer of the Imperial German crown. "My position I have from God, and to nobody but God am I responsible for the execution of my duties." This is the always-recurring refrain in a great number of his speeches. "The heir of him who, of his own right, became Duke of Prussia, will walk the same ways as his great ancestor, just as the first King said, 'Ex me nata corona,' and his great son established his authority as a rocher de bronze. Thus I represent the kingdom, like my imperial grandfather, by the grace of God." This passage of a speech, delivered in 1894 at Königsberg, is an example of many similar confessions of the political faith of Prussia's King, the German Kaiser.

The speech was addressed to the agrarian nobility, who at that time kicked at the Government because its commercial policy had taken a turn in the direction of Free Trade. William II. took this opposition ill. "An opposition of the Prussian nobles against their King," he said, "is something monstrous; it is only justified when it has the King at its head, as is shown by the history of my house." And William tells the nobles that their first duty is to support the King, that they must "shun the methods of those parties which make opposition a profession." He addresses the teachers in the same spirit: "Only he is called to be a teacher of our youth who faithfully and in full conviction adheres to monarchism and the constitution. Through his privileges and his duties a teacher is, in the first instance, a servant of the State, and this of the present State." And to the recruits of the Guards he says, after they have taken their oath: "You have now sworn allegiance to me. This, children of my Guards, means that you are now my soldiers, that you have now devoted yourselves, soul and body, to me, that you have now only one enemy, to wit, my enemy. With the Socialistic machinations of our times it may happen that—which God may prevent—that I should command you to shoot or thrust down your own relatives, your brethren, nay, your parents. But even then you must obey my command without grumbling."

True, these quotations are taken from speeches that belong to the first decade of William II.'s reign, whilst in later years the utterances of the Kaiser are marked by a certain restraint. But his opinions as regards monarchism have hardly changed. Occasionally the old spirit breaks through again. Even lately a poem, supposed to be the work of a deceased cadet of the Army, has, by the Kaiser's command, been distributed amongst all the cadets, to be "taken to heart" by them. The rhyme—now said to be the work of a priest—suggests that when "the party of overthrow" begins to move, "the cadets" will be, "in arms and array," ready "to shoot for our Emperor."

It would, however, be a mistake to infer from this a burning desire on the part of William II. to come to blows with Social Democracy, though in spite of the remarkable strength of the party and the comparatively high proportion of Socialists in the army the chances in such a conflict, in the ordinary course of events, are on the side of the Government. No doubt William II. hates Social Democracy. Again and again this sentiment breaks forth through his speeches. But we know how in 1890 he shrank from Bismarck's plan of provoking Social Democrats to the shedding of blood. He did not desire to begin his reign by slaying his subjects. And one is justified in believing that a similar feeling still governs him. To give the Kaiser his due, he has according to his lights quite as high a sense of the duties and responsibilities of his office as of its dignities.

William II. is at the same moment one of the most romantic and one of the most modern monarchs of our era. Modern he is in the amplitude of his knowledge and the many-sidedness of his interests. The versatility of his mind has often been made the object of mockery by the satirical papers. But if he is prone to have his say on almost every conceivable subject, he sometimes surprises even professional people by the thoroughness of his insight. A good and strong-willed worker, he has in time acquired a considerable store of positive knowledge. Only with great qualification could Dryden's "everything in turn and nothing long" be applied to him. In many departments of public life he has shown as keen a perseverance in work and purpose as those in whom he sees his implacable enemies—the Social Democrats of his country.

The high view of his position also governs his personal conduct. Not that he is stiff in his intercourse, or rigorously puritanical in his habits. Just the contrary. He is known as a friend of all sorts of sport, a hearty drinker, in the German sense, when in congenial company, and altogether an affable and often singularly gay companion. "Say what you may of him," Prince Bülow lately exclaimed in the Reichstag, "he certainly is not a philistine." It is said, indeed, that he takes a joke at his own expense better than his father, Frederick III., and is more amenable to criticism. In this he preserves the essential spirit of the army, the mixture of feudal and democratic tendencies. Exclusive as are the mass of officers, they cultivate a strong sentiment of fellowship and social equality. Similarly William II. allows considerable familiarity to those who are admitted to his company. With such favoured individuals he uses the familiar "thou" and "thee," amongst them the Hamburg shipowner Herr Wörmann, and Herr Ballin, the head of the big Hamburg-American shipping company.

Herr Ballin is of Jewish descent, and the intimacy of William II. with him has given serious offence to the anti-Semites, who once had put so great hopes on the son of Frederick III. Indeed, William was not of the tribe of the Liberale Kronprinzen. A boy when the great wars were fought which made Prussia the undisputed head of the German confederation, and gave birth to the Prusso-German Empire, a youth when the first Liberal era of the new empire had ended in general disappointment, he was at the time of his accession steeped in anti-Liberal, nationalistic ideas. He had taken part in November, 1887, at the famous conference at Count Waldersee's, where a campaign in favour of bringing the masses back to the Church had been resolved on, and the noted priest and demagogue, Herr Stoecker, might well have hoped that his time was come. The so-called positive wing of the Protestant Church, i.e., the dogmatic orthodoxy, were full of hopes, and for many years the Kaiser was never weary of seasoning his speeches, particularly those to the recruits, with admonitions to be, or to become again, sound believers. That he repeatedly has held religious services himself and has preached on texts from the Bible is well known. A fluent speaker, with a command of striking imagery, he would indeed be a powerful preacher.

But though still a professed believer, he is not to-day the type of Christian he has been. In recent years the theologians of the Delitzsch and Harnack type, i.e., men between the left wing and the centre of the Protestant Church, have had his ear. Lectures on Bible Criticism have become the fashion at the Court. This corresponds with the evolution of the inner policy of the State. William II. is a shrewd observer, and knows well to appreciate the increasing industrialisation of society. He sees that the Prussia of old is fast dying out, and that the towns and industrial centres will in the long run not stand the political predominance of squire and parson. Thus he gives more and more heed to the counsels of the merchant-princes and the captains of industry whilst trying to educate his Prussian squires to a more modern conception of politics. For he cannot do without them. They and the peasantry form an indispensable element of the army, its very foundation, the upholder of its traditions, the cement that secures its cohesion in a crisis.

Here you have the contradiction in William II.'s personality, and the antinomy in his Government. On the one hand he desires to go with the times. He sees all the changes that are proceeding around him, and to a certain degree he grasps their meaning, and tries to adapt his policy to them. On the other hand he wishes to retain the character of an institution of such a formidable complexion as the army of universal conscription. The army is to him still the first interest of the State. His first address when he became King and Kaiser was to the army, the second to the navy, and only the third to the nation at large. "Thus we belong to each other—I and the army—thus we are born to each other, and thus we will indissolubly stick together, may by the will of God be peace or storm." Three years afterwards, we hear him insist that "the soldier and the army, and not Parliamentary resolutions and Parliamentary majorities, have forged together the German Empire," and that his "confidence rests in the army," and we have seen how his thoughts in this respect are unchanged.

The poetry I have mentioned above contains a verse suggesting that the Gallic cock may "goggle and goggle," and Albion enviously bar the road, but "We trust in God and the Emperor." No sane Englishman, I trust, will take this manner of mentioning England seriously. It is evident that it was not the particular line in question but the spirit of the entire poem which induced William II. to order it to be printed for the comrades of the supposed poet. He is no more bent on a warlike enterprise abroad than he thirsts for leading his troops against the inner foe. Thus far his first speech from the throne, where he said that he would not find it compatible with his Christian religion and his duties as Emperor to inflict on the people the sufferings of a war, be it even a victorious one, has not been falsified by his actions. He knows too well the danger of such enterprises to hazard them. On the whole, the difference between his policy and his speeches has always been marked. In speaking he is often carried away by the impetuosity of his temper—only quite recently he has stated that he often suffers from a sleepless night after a speech; in action he is usually cautious and open to advice. It is not easy to gauge his true feelings in regard to England. Apart from some rather wild utterances dating from the time when he was Crown Prince, no offensive words about England are reported of him. In this respect he has been more discreet than his Chancellor, Bülow. But whatever his feelings may be, his policy will for a long time to come be as friendly as may be. His weakness is not a passion for adventure. He is now fast approaching the fifties, and he shows that in many respects his ambitions have cooled. He wants too much to conserve at home to be very eager for changes abroad. His home policy is the great peril of our time. He has kept his word not to encroach on the constitutional rights of the people, but he resists every endeavour to enlarge them in accordance with the growing importance of new classes of society. He is not hunting after a war, but he is continuously set on increasing the military forces on land and sea, and is thus one of the sustainers of the ruinous competition of the nations in regard to armaments. His endeavour to uphold the squirearchy and the peasantry makes him a supporter of Protection, and consequently of one of the causes of continuous friction between the nations. With all his modernity he is a romanticist; with all his sympathy for social reforms he is a foe of modern democracy.

ED. BERNSTEIN.

The Drama.

"THE THIEF."

M. HENRY BERNSTEIN, who has recently succeeded in shocking Paris with his "Sampson," is a dramatist who has found a new recipe for writing modern plays. Sardou's melodrama is vieux jeu; but Sardou understood how to make use of the theatre. Could not his methods be allied to the psychological or problem play? If so audiences would be at once excited and made to discuss a "problem." M. Bernstein succeeded in combining the two elements in his "La Rafale," and he has done the same thing in "Le Voleur," which Mr. George Alexander has produced in an English version at St. James's Theatre. Anyone who knows "La Rafale" need not be told that there is only a semblance of a problem. There is still less in "Le Voleur," or "The Thief," as it is named in English. That a woman may stoop to mean actions, or even to a crime, in order to retain her husband's love, and that husbands (at any rate, French husbands) may be unconscious participants in their wives' backslidings from honour and honesty by insisting on physical attractiveness does not matter, for the real aim of "The Thief" is at one with the aim of the old-fashioned drama of horror. A theatre audience of the respectable will no longer tolerate brutal murders on the stage. If there must be physical horrors in a play, they take place "off," in the manner of the Greeks. But mental horrors are different. You can thrill people just as easily by M. Bernstein's method, and if you be cynical by nature, you will be amused by hearing them applaud your play as great drama. Have no fear of the intellectuals; they do not count in the playhouse! Your play has to stimulate minds made lethargic by dinner, or lazy by a day of strenuous work! If once you understand how stupid a theatre audience can be, you may begin to write a play à la Bernstein. Then you must devise a situation, outrageous if you like (as in "La Rafale" and "Sampson") or surprising (as in "Le Voleur"). Everything must lead up to that situation. Make the characters as life-like as possible as to externals, but take care that their minds only work towards the situation. Then decorate your play with as much "realism" as possible, and work in a "problem." The whole thing must be daring, or people will not talk about it, and your theatre will not be filled night after night.

The great situation of "The Thief" is nothing more than the adaptation of the methods of a juge d'instruction to private life. For half-an-hour a man bullies his wife until she confesses she has committed a series of thefts of which an innocent boy has allowed himself to be accused. On her knees she implores for pardon. She stole that she might decorate herself with finery in order to keep her husband's love. Being a Frenchman, the husband has to admit the force of the extenuating circumstances, but not before the audience has been thrilled. If you are ignorant of M. Bernstein's work you may wonder how the play is to be carried on; but he never hesitates when a theatrical climax has to be prolonged. By dint of creating his characters in the flat, as it were, he is able to manipulate his scenes quite easily. The husband, brought to the point of forgiving his wife, suddenly remembers that her boy admirer has taken the blame of the theft on his own shoulders. That any ordinary man would have wondered from the first why the self-sacrifice was made does not count in the Bernstein theatre. You must accept this psychological lapse just as you must accept the fact that the lady who has been robbed was in the habit of bundling notes and gold into an old bureau with a defective lock, or that the husband, a man of limited means but considerable experience of Parisian life, would not have noticed that his wife wore more expensive clothes than she could possibly afford. In the same way you must believe that the wife is really in love with her husband—not sentimentally in love, but passionately, in spite of the fact that M. Bernstein has only shown her to be a flirt, a liar, and an unsensitive, callous wretch. What woman, except an unimaginative criminal, could calmly let an innocent boy be falsely accused of a crime that will part him from a father he loves; and not a strange boy, but one whom she has known for many years, and the son of her husband's oldest friend!

Mme. Simone le Bargy, who took the part in Paris, may have suggested more of the woman's mental struggle than did Miss Irene Vanbrugh, but in the original play the author makes no suggestions of any sort either by dialogue or by action. Indeed, when the play is carefully examined, it is to be seen that this very blank in the drawing of the character is necessary for the theatrical effect of the husband's brutal inquisition of his wife. If she prepares you in any way for her confession of guilt, M. Bernstein's surprise is discounted. For that very reason he actually leaves his audience in doubt as to the truth of the boy's confession in the first act, and, from any point of view but his own as a manufacturer of "strong situations," mars his drama. It is symptomatic of M. Bernstein's negative character-drawing that his husband never feels a qualm of the genuine terror which would overtake a man if he found he had a wife who had given scarcely a thought to the consequences of her crime. The passionate expression of her love for himself, and the repeated assurance that she had stolen the money because of that love, would surely strike a human being as the most tragic and terrible feature of the whole sordid business.

It is not fair to French playgoers to assume that they accept M. Bernstein and his plays without demur. He is recognised to be a sensation-monger, a kind of Sardou, with a faint dash of Dumas filz, masquerading as a realistic dramatist of life. At the same time, "Le Voleur" must seem less unnatural to French people than "The Thief" seems to English. The big scene between husband and wife would not bear analysis as psychology in whatever language the play was acted; but the emotional hurly-burly of the Latin races when excited makes it more possible. French actors and actresses can carry through such a scene at a white heat of emotion that gives no time for thought; but Miss Vanbrugh, clever as she is, does not suggest the excessive passion of the woman, and Mr. Alexander's methods are too deliberate, too sentimental, and too rhetorical. Then, again, the French delight in inquisitorial examinations. It is part of their legal system, and is no doubt characteristic of their private life. Possibly Frenchmen would consider that the husband had reason for his bullying of the wife into a confession of guilt, and it may seem natural, or not impossible, to them that the friend in whose house both are staying should bring down a detective as a guest, and allow him to play the juge d'instruction to his own son. In a play which pretends to take place in England, such things are not only impossible, but ludicrous. The whole thing becomes an impossible travesty of any kind of life that we know.

Science.

A TRIUMPH OF TELEPHOTOGRAPHY.

WE have received from the "Daily Mirror" a photograph of King Edward VII., which was sent by telegraph to our contemporary from the office of "L'Illustration" in Paris, on the 8th of November. This photograph is the first ever received by telegraph in England, as well as the first ever sent by cable. The likeness to his Majesty is very good, and is, in fact, the best specimen of Telephotography that we have seen. Its production is due to the great improvement in the subject which has recently been effected by Professor Korn of Munich.

Images of objects have been sent successfully along wires—just as verbal messages are—on many occasions during the past generation. Indeed, once it became known that the action of light can, of itself, generate electric currents, and that these currents can, in their turn, affect a photographic plate, it was evident that the sending of pictures by wire was a possibility, and that time, patience, and experiment would solve the problem. The process adopted by Professor Korn is substantially the same as that employed more than twenty-five years ago by Mr. Shelford Bidwell; there are, of course, some modifications, and there is one improvement which minimises a certain imperfection inherent in the method.

If we compare the problem of sending a picture by telegraph with that of sending a verbal message, one great difficulty in the first is at once obvious. In the latter case we have merely to transmit a succession (of separate dots or dashes signifying letters), whereas in the former we have (for complete success) to transmit a simultaneity. This is the aspect in which the problem of transmitting an image telegraphically presented itself to the writer of this article in the year 1876; and, thus regarded, the problem is still unsolved. An attempt to transmit the whole of the picture at once, met with enough success to show that the thing is possible, but very troublesome.

The success of Mr. Shelford Bidwell and Professor Korn in transmitting fairly good pictures along a wire is due to their dealing with the problem quite differently, and assimilating it to that of telegraphing dots and dashes—that is, they do not transmit the whole of a picture at once: they trace it out point by point, and consequently the time taken is very great.

To describe the details of the machinery—although this is singularly simple—is quite impossible, since diagrams and electrical technicalities are required; but it is possible to make the general reader understand something of the main principles involved.

The main agent in the process is a substance called selenium. This substance can be melted at a temperature of about 217 deg. Centigrade—say, roughly, a temperature a little more than twice that of boiling water. When melted, it assumes a pasty condition with a black colour, and it can be spread out as a thin layer on a flat surface. If left to itself, it cools rapidly and remains black. If now it is heated very gradually nearly up to its melting point again, it assumes a brownish-grey colour, and in this state we leave it. This last condition of the substance is very remarkable. In the natural or black state, selenium is so bad a conductor of an electric current that we may call it a non-conductor; but in this brownish-grey modification it conducts—not very well, it is true, but very much better than before; and, further, it now possesses the extraordinary property of becoming a better conductor still if light falls on it. The stronger the light falling on it, the better its conductivity—within certain limits, of course. Now clearly this property indicates its suitability to the transmission of a picture if the lights coming from various parts of the picture can be allowed to fall successively upon it.

This last statement (necessarily vague) will be better understood if we quote a very striking and beautiful experiment shown many years ago to the Physical Society of London by Mr. Shelford Bidwell, which we shall make plain by a simple illustration. Imagine an island in the middle of a river; the flowing stream when it reaches the island divides into two streams, flowing round and reuniting at the other end of the island. Call these two streams the right branch and the left branch. Now, if someone dams, or obstructs partially, the right branch, a greater rush of water will take place in the left; and if the right is made wider, the reverse will happen. In exactly the same way, if a current from an electric battery flows along a wire to a certain point where the wire bifurcates (as the river does at the island) into two wires, which reunite farther on, forming a right branch and a left branch, a certain portion of the current will run in each branch; how much in each depends on the obstruction, or resistance, offered to the current—just as in the case of the two river branches.

Now, Mr. Shelford Bidwell inserted in the right branch an electric glow lamp, and in the left a plate of brownish-grey selenium. The current divided itself between these two branches, and the amount passing through the right was just sufficient to light the lamp, when no light fell on the selenium in the left. Hence the lamp lighted itself; and when its light fell on the selenium in the other branch, the selenium became a better conductor, with the result that more current now flowed through its branch, and less through the lamp's branch—and the lamp went out; but when it did, the selenium (for want of light) rose in resistance, so that now more current passed through the lamp's branch, and the lamp re-lighted, with exactly the same result as before. The case is suggestive of the Kilkenny cats, and we are tempted to say that the lamp was engaged in committing suicide at regular intervals! This behaviour of selenium suggested its employment as a burglar detector; for, in the circuit of a battery containing an electric bell, let a prepared plate of brownish-grey selenium be placed, and let things be so arranged that when the selenium is in the dark its resistance is just great enough to prevent the current from ringing the bell. Now when the burglar examines the room with his bull's-eye lantern, he will doubtless direct its beams inadvertently on the selenium, whose resistance will then be so much reduced that the strength of the electric current will be increased sufficiently to ring the bell. We have actually had quite a different photo-electric arrangement in use for ringing an electric bell when a window shutter was opened, and daylight was admitted to the face of a photo battery in the room; but, no doubt, there would be corresponding advances in scientific theory made by the burglars to protect themselves.

It is possible to imagine many other cases in which the better conductivity of selenium under the action of light would be evidenced. Imagine a telegraph line composed of a properly constructed arrangement of brownish-light selenium—not that such would be remunerative. In this case, the currents passing during the day-time, and especially in bright light, would be considerably greater than those passing at night.

The first practical application of this selenium property was made by Dr. A. Graham Bell, in his photophone, an instrument which enabled the voice to vary the light falling on the selenium resistance, and so enabled the voice of a distant person to be heard in a telephone.

But there is an unfortunate characteristic of this sensitive selenium which prevents its continuous action for a long period—namely, that, in time, the selenium becomes sluggish in its response, lagging behind the impulse which it receives from light; and it is this which, in our opinion, will be found most troublesome in its use for the transmission of pictures. Professor Korn remedies the defect to some extent by a modification of Mr. Bidwell's arrangement—the modification consisting of an ingenious pitting of one selenium resistance against another. Still, something further must be done with selenium if the process is to be satisfactory; for it must be confessed that the pictures transmitted are not yet very artistic, from the photographer's point of view, although they show that great strides have been made.

In our opinion, the problem of telephotography will yet be satisfactorily solved; but at present there are two essentials wanting—clearness and rapidity; and it is doubtful if the complete solution will be found by employing selenium at all.

GEORGE M. MINCHIN.

Poetry.

AT SEA.

O MOUTH that clung, O little hands!

They took him from my heart,
They stitched him up in sacking bands—
O mouth that clung, and little hands!—
And laid him down apart;
A flag was spread to hide the thing—
The little thing that lived in me—
And words were said and a bell did ring,
They pushed it off into the sea—
The little thing that lived in me.

Oh, white and green and greener still,
He sank into the cold!
Down the ship's side he sank, until—
Oh, white and green and greener still!—
He vanished from my hold;
The night comes on, and mothers bear
The babies to their beds again,
Last night—last night a babe was there
Who knows not hunger now nor pain,
And never goes to bed again.

Cold, cold, and dark, and all alone,
He neither sleeps nor cries—
The life that was my own life's own—
The ship moves on, and all alone
Far, far behind he lies.
Last night he lay against my side—
O mouth that clung, and little hands!—
Down through the dark I see him slide,
Or tossed on cold, un pitying sands—
O mouth that clung, O little hands!

N.

Letters to the Editor.

THE CENSORSHIP OF PLAYS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In view of the deputation of playwrights which the Prime Minister is to receive next week, it is perhaps as well to say a word on the practical working of the Censorship. Nothing that can be said on the subject of the political principle involved is likely to be new to Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman. He does not need to be told that the popular theory of leaving the drama in the hands of some man of the world who is also a gentleman of tact and good sense, is just about as reasonable and as creditable to the political competence of those who are satisfied with it as a proposal to leave the whole country in the hands of the King, because he also is a man of the world, with a European reputation for tact and good sense. I have no doubt that many loyal people would think such a suggestion admirable; for nothing is more alarming nowadays than the oblivion into which the political axioms which Liberalism established by three hundred years of struggle have fallen. You cannot look down the correspondence column of a newspaper without finding some unashamed proposal from an ordinary sane gentleman to deal with whatever social evil happens to be the topic of the day, by giving some perfect gentleman autocratic powers to set it right. Such people are too lazy to emigrate to Russia, where their political notions are constitutionally recognized and acted upon very thoroughly (with all the results that might be expected); so they clamour for the Russianising of our English Constitution, and see nothing in the hesitation of the Government to gratify them but flat Anarchism—wherein they find themselves at one with that perfect gentleman the Czar.

At all events, I shall take the obnoxiousness of the Censorship to Liberal principles for granted, and explain how the institution actually works, for the better technical instruction of Ministers, and the disillusion of the visionaries who imagine that Mr. Redford is a kindly, wise, tactful, earthly Providence taking a common-sense view of the wholesomeness of every play presented to him, and arriving at a rough-and-ready but in the main sound conclusion as to whether it should be performed or not.

It sounds very simple. Most hopelessly foolish solutions of social difficulties do sound simple. To begin with, you want a man who will undertake to know, better than Tolstoy or Ibsen or George Meredith or Dickens or Carlyle or Ruskin or Shakespeare or Shelley, what moral truths the world needs to be reminded of—how far the pity and horror of tragedy dare be carried—on what institutions the antiseptic derision of comedy may be allowed to play without destroying anything really vital in them.

Now it is clear without argument that no man who was not a born fool would pretend for the moment to be capable of such a task; and the reason that some Censors have talked as if they were capable of it is that some Censors have been born fools. The Prime Minister would be as much horrified at having such godlike powers attributed to him as Paul and Barnabas were at Lystra when the people sacrificed to them. I am far from sure that Mr. Redford, if we offered him a sacrifice occasionally, would not accept it with complacency; but I may be doing him an injustice. There is, of course, a strong prima facie case against him. When a young gentleman, on such a superhuman task as the above being proposed, springs from his desk in a bank, and says blithely: "Oh, there is no difficulty. Hand Tolstoy and the rest over to me; and I will Censor them all right enough for two guineas a play, and a few hundred a year as a stand-by in case I extinguish the drama altogether." This is, in effect, Mr. Redford's attitude; and, so stated, it certainly seems to reach the limit of flippant folly and conceit. But of course this is not how the situation presented itself to him. He was simply given a post in his Majesty's household, and was naturally very glad to get it. As to the work, it had been done before somehow by an ordinary mortal, and therefore could presumably be done again by another ordinary mortal. That is to say, there must be rules; and when there are rules an official has nothing to do but administer them, just as a judge need not be a Solon: his business is not to make laws, but to see that the laws are obeyed.

Now it is hard on Mr. Redford that we place so much more responsibility on him than on a judge, though we give him a much smaller salary. We ask him not only to administer the law, but to make the law in his private wisdom as he goes along. For he is not bound always by his office rules. Sometimes they become too glaringly old-fashioned for even a Lord Chamberlain to persist in. Sometimes new emergencies arise for which there are no rules; and then Mr. Redford has to legislate for the drama of this unhappy realm out of his own head, which was never made to bear such a strain. On the whole, he is happiest when he has office rules or traditions to fall back on.

What are these rules? First and most intolerable, the infamous rule that dramatic art is too unclean a thing to be allowed to be religious. It may be lewd, and it may be silly; but it must not dare touch anything sacred. The Bible is to be a closed book to it. It may send the black-guard to the drinking bar between every act, and to a worse place at the end of the play; but it must not send him to church or to prayer, or even into the street to do good works.

What would the art of painting be if it had been under this execrable ban since its invention? If no painter had ever been allowed to paint Christ or the Apostles or the Saints or the Virgin—if the great spiritual dynasty of Italian painters from Cimabue and Giotto to Tintoretto had been forbidden to paint anything but Venuses for licentious noblemen, and told if they complained that the restriction did not prevent Jan Steen from being a great artist, where would painting be nowadays? Where would Christianity be? Suppose the art of music had been in the same chains, and Handel had been tethered to Italian opera and forbidden to compose The Messiah! The ignorant and dissolute may imagine that we should still have the operas of Offenbach and the waltzes of Waldteufel. They err to the very depths. Offenbach and Waldteufel made their confectionery of the crumbs they picked up from the bread of life the great Masters made when they were expressing their religion in music. There is no fact on earth better established than that it is only in the effort to express those great waves of the human spirit that pass over the world from time to time that art becomes great, and discovers new enchantments to arrest our attention and change our souls. Had Mr. Redford exercised his functions in Athens, there would have been no Aeschylus, no Sophocles, no Aristophanes, no Euripides. Had he exercised it in Elizabethan England there would have been no Shakespear except the Shakespear of Venus and Adonis. How any author, actor, or manager with a grain of self-respect can dumbly suffer this abominable excommunication—how he can actually pay Mr. Redford compliments and defend his detestable office against the righteous wrath and revolt of its victims, would be amazing if one did not know that the worst effect of making men helots is that they soon learn how lucrative are the arts of slavery, and lose their desire to be free.

Of the remaining taboos (for the whole system is one of taboo) three are of vital consequence, because they explain why it is that Mr. Redford licenses vicious plays, and refuses to license serious and exemplary ones. In the case of a play which came before the Courts in the course of a civil action, the judge expressed his astonishment that the King's Reader of Plays should have certified that it did not "in its general tendency contain anything immoral or otherwise improper for the stage."

But the judge did not understand the situation. The play contained nothing that is taboo at the Lord Chamberlain's Office. Had the author introduced a scene in which the prophet Daniel appeared and rebuked its worst passages, Mr. Redford would at once have refused to license the play. Daniel is taboo. To get him licensed you must change him to Jack Sheppard, or Jane Shore, who are both perfectly in order.

Here are the three great taboos on the question of sex:

1. You must never mention an illegal obstetric operation.
2. You must never mention incest.
3. You must never mention venereal disease.

"And," Mr. Redford will exclaim, "would any gentleman desire to mention them on the public stage?" The reply, which will shock Mr. Redford, is Yes. If gentlemen do not deal energetically with these subjects in public, they will be dealt with by blackguards in private.

"But surely," our noodles will begin, "the theatre is not the proper place——!" Why not? If the theatre is the proper place for the representation of the passions that lead to these things—if the dramatist is actually thrust back on such subjects whenever he attempts to deal with holier matters—if he must exhibit vice without its real consequences (as distinguished from those sham consequences of remorse and forgiveness, or despair and suicide, which not one of the spectators believes to be inevitable or even probable) how is he to avoid corrupting the morals of the nation? The innocent people who write letters to THE NATION in support of the Censorship think, no doubt, that the rule against mentioning these things is only part of a general rule prohibiting all allusion to vice. They mistake. The playwright may wallow in the representation of every sort of vice that dare be mentioned at all without intolerable shame; and Mr. Redford will give him a two guinea certificate of its propriety, provided only that he does not represent it as leading to an illegal operation, or to venereal disease, or to an insoluble doubt as to possible consanguinity between the children of those who practise it: that is to say, to the only retribution that has any deterrent reality for the spectators.

For instance, take the play called Waste, by Mr. Granville Barker, Mr. Redford's latest victim. Consider the position into which the refusal of a licence for that play has put Mr. Barker! The public knows that Mr. Redford has licensed plays so abominable that I myself, when trying to bring the question of the Censorship before the public through the Press, have failed to induce editors to allow me to describe them in their papers. There is also the well-known protest from the judicial bench cited above. The inevitable conclusion drawn by the man in the street is that if Mr. Barker has gone beyond the tolerance that licensed these indescribable and unmentionable plays, he must have produced something quite hideously filthy. But I can tell the story of Waste here without the smallest offence, and, with Mr. Barker's permission, I will.

Waste is a play about the disestablishment of the Church. The hero is an able Parliamentary leader who has crossed the floor of the House from the Radical side to the Conservative, because he has induced the Conservatives to dish the Liberals by dealing with the Church themselves. One can quite conceive Mr. Sidney Webb getting round Mr. Balfour in this way (after all, the Irish Local Government Act passed by the Unionists was not less likely on the face of it) if Mr. Balfour would give Mr. Webb the revenues of the Church for some of his Collectivist projects—which, by the way, is just what the Conservative leader in Waste proposes to do. Mr. Barker has dramatized this amusing and suggestive political situation with real political insight and first-hand knowledge of our political personnel. But the scheme fails in the play through a private indiscretion of the sort that has ruined two political careers and crippled another in our own time. The protagonist becomes the father of the unborn child of a married lady. The lady avoids the birth by an illegal operation which kills her. The scandal makes the hero politically impossible, just as the O'Shea divorce made Parnell politically impossible. The great scheme for disestablishing the Church is wasted. The political services of the man who devised it are wasted. Hence the title Waste.

Mr. Redford does not object to the indiscretion. He does not object to the adultery, or to the illegitimate child. The plays he has licensed are full of such incidents. It is the illegal operation that is taboo. Take Waste, and degrade its fastidiously fine style into the basest bar-loafer's slang; smudge out its high intellectual interest into the most sickening lascivious sentimentality; introduce incidents which could not be described in these columns; but suppress the illegal operation. Mr. Redford will then license it like a lamb. That is how Taboo works.

I have myself had a play prohibited by Mr. Redford. People imagine that he refused to license it because the heroine is a prostitute and a procuress. They are indeed wide of the mark. The licensed drama positively teems with prostitutes and procuresses. One of the most popular melodramas of our time is called The Worst Woman in London. In Mr. Hall Caine's excellent play, The Christian, you may on any night you please see the prostitute, the procuress, and the souteneur, on the stage at the Lyceum Theatre; and you will be none the worse for it. You can also see in many a humble melodrama a brothel on the stage, with its procuress in league with the villain and the bold bad girl whom he has ruined, all set forth as attractively as possible under the protection of the Lord Chamberlain's certificate.

But in my play the consequences of promiscuity are not shirked. I provide the feast (an acridly medicinal one); but I also present the reckoning. The daughter of my heroine meets the son of one of her mother's clients, who falls in love with her. And the two have to face the question, Is he her half-brother? only to find it unanswerable. That is one of the inevitable dilemmas produced by "group marriage." To suppress it is to pack the cards in favor of such arrangements. My refusal to pack them brought me into conflict with the taboo against incest. That is why Mrs. Warren's Profession is forbidden, whilst dozens of plays which present Mrs. Warren as well-dressed, charming, luxuriating in "guilty splendor," and suffering nothing but some fictitious retribution at the end in which nobody believes, because everybody knows it need not happen in real life, teach their cynical lesson to the poor girl in the gallery, and send the young man in the pit into the arms of the best imitation the streets can offer him of the guiltily splendid lady he has been admiring inside.

One more example of the censored play. There is a much more powerful deterrent to prostitution than the doubts as to consanguinity set up between the children of the parties to it. That deterrent is the disease which the libertine transmits to his legitimate offspring, and through it at the moment of birth to his wife. Now that it is idle to threaten people with hell, it is as well that they should know what does really threaten them. Sarah Grand took up this grim question and struck a doughty stroke at the national conscience in her most famous novel, The Heavenly Twins. Had she attempted to do the same thing in a play, Mr. Redford would have suppressed it, and left her under the suspicion of having perpetrated some enormity too dark even for the tolerance of the Censor who licensed The Giddy Goat. Brieux, the sternest of living dramatic moralists, has dealt with the same theme in his Les Avariés, in the most uncomfortably clean-handed, direct, truthful fashion. On the stage the hero's doctor tells him the truth about the state of his health with all a doctor's frankness, and forbids him to get married just then. He marries nevertheless; and his child pays the penalty. Mr. Redford will not license that play. If Brieux had confined himself to representing the scenes in which the man got the disease, and made them as attractive as possible, without any hint of the unpleasant consequences, Mr. Redford would have licensed it without turning a hair. But to mention the penalty! no: that is too disgusting. Besides, the people who make their living by the trade in disease would raise a clamor against such an exposure, in the name of outraged decency.

Ibsen, in his Ghosts, has dealt with the same subject and come under the double taboo; for he not only represents the son as inheriting his father's disease, but points out another by no means improbable result. His father's illegitimate daughter has been taken into the house as a servant by way of making some sort of reparatory provision for her. As she is a pretty girl, the son falls in love with her. Here the possible complication of incest is added to the actual complication of disease. "Horrible!" says the Lord Chamberlain. Ibsen, if alive, would probably ask whether the Lord Chamberlain wished him to make it agreeable. And the Lord Chamberlain would certainly reply that if he could not make it agreeable, he had better not touch it at all.

And there you have the effect of the Censorship in a nutshell. It does not forbid vice: it only insists that it shall be made attractive. It does not forbid you to put the brothel on the stage: it only compels you to advertize its charms, and suppress its penalties. Now it is futile to plead that the stage is not the proper place for the representation and discussion of illegal operations, incest, and venereal disease. If the stage is the proper place for the exhibition and discussion of seduction, adultery, promiscuity, and prostitution, it must be thrown open to all the consequences of these things, or it will demoralize the nation. Either prohibit both, or allow both. The Censorship admits that it cannot prohibit both. To do that would be to wipe the theatre out of existence, and to reduce the adult population to the status of children in the nursery. To allow both would be to allow everything that public opinion will allow: that is, to confess that the Censorship is of no use, and the salaries of its officials a waste of money. Sooner than do this, it buys off the licentious playwrights and managers by licensing their agreeable plays, and suppresses the stern, public-spirited, and intellectually honest writers who insist on drawing the moral. The natural and inevitable result is that the British drama has become an impudent and shallow-hearted propaganda of gaiety in the policeman's sense of that word. And the Censorship, having committed this crime against public morals, points to the lewdness of the plays it has itself not only licensed, but practically dictated, to prove that theatrical managers and dramatic authors are such filthy wretches that they cannot be trusted with the rights and responsibilities which all other artists enjoy.

The "Saturday Review" suggests that Mr. Redford should be removed, and I put in his place. It is just as if the testing of watches at Kew had been complained of, and it were suggested that the Astronomer Royal or Lord Kelvin should be given the job. I am too busy as an author to spend my life reading other people's manuscripts; and the market value of my time is probably ten times that of the King's Reader of Plays. Yet there are people who are suggesting a whole tribunal of eminent men of letters to carry on the Censorship. When they have found the men and found the salaries, it will be time enough to discuss the proposition.

The sensible course is obvious. Abolish the censorship of plays altogether, root and branch. Continue to license theatres from year to year, as much as you like, just as you license public houses or music-halls. License me from year to year as a dramatist if you will, just as you would license me as a motor-car driver. License the managers to manage; and by all means license Mr. Redford to express his opinion of their productions in the "London Gazette" if you value it. But let the play be born and take its chance with the consciences of men just as it came from the conscience of the author. If he shocks you, respect his courage and inspiration, even whilst you stone him. If he shocks you basely and lewdly, or, worse still, pleases you that way, at least do not give yourself a two guinea certificate of propriety under cover of giving it to him.—Yours, &c.,

G. BERNARD SHAW.

November 11th, 1907.

THE RUIN OF MACEDONIA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have read Mr. C. F. G. Masterman's article on "The Ruin of Macedonia" in THE NATION of November 9th, with profound interest. With much that the writer says I am in perfect agreement; but, as one who has been intimately acquainted with Macedonia for many years, and one who began to study its problems long before Mr. Masterman turned his attention to those matters, I hope I shall be permitted to express my dissent from him on a few important points.

First, he tells us that "bands of brigands, equipped in Athens out of money provided by subscriptions from all the Mediterranean Greek world, are devastating Southern and Western Macedonia." The existence of those bands is, of course, a well-known fact: so are the sources of the money by which they are supported. But it is not a correct statement that they are equipped in Athens, or that they are devastating Macedonia. They are equipped in Macedonia itself, where their mission is to protect the Greek or Greco-philic populations which for years, as I know from actual experience and as is abundantly attested by the evidence of British Consuls and journalists, were at the mercy of Bulgarian bands. It was as a protest against the activity of these bands, and after repeated and fruitless appeals for protection, addressed by the Greeks of Macedonia, by the Greek Patriarchate of Constantinople, and by the Greek Government of Athens to the European Powers, that the Greeks in 1903 began, in sheer self-defence, to organise armed forces wherewith to meet their armed assailants. That the movement, begun for self-preservation, may occasionally degenerate into "devastation" and cruel retaliation, is only natural. But the Bulgars have only themselves to thank for it. They certainly have no right to pose now as the victims of a persecution of which they themselves set the example. The methods employed by the Greeks may be deplorable. They are not, however, one-half as deplorable as are those employed by their Bulgarian rivals. As an example of the tactics long adopted by the latter, it is sufficient to mention an occurrence of the other day—the destruction of the village of Rakovo, near Monastir, by a Bulgarian band; a village inhabited by 800 Orthodox Greeks, and numbering 130 houses, all of which, with the exception of ten, were burnt to the ground. Five men and two women perished in the flames—the rest of the people fled horror-stricken, and took refuge in the neighbouring villages. I am quoting the incident from the accounts which appeared in the London Press (see "Bulgarian Raid," in the "Evening News"; "Bulgarian Atrocity," in the "Evening Standard"; "Another Macedonian Outrage," in the "Westminster Gazette," of November 4th).

Now, sir, in the face of such facts, is it fair to charge the Greeks with exceptional "ferocity"? I am far from wishing to defend Greek outrages; I am only anxious, in the interests of historic truth and elementary justice, to establish a truer sense of proportion by proving that the Greek crimes are a retaliation for Bulgarian crimes, and by insisting that the "ferocity" of one side should not be emphasised unduly while that of the other is ignored.

The second point in Mr. Masterman's able article to which I venture to demur is his statement that the Turks despise the Greeks and fear the Bulgars. I do not know, sir, upon what authority Mr. Masterman bases his statement. But I have come into contact, at one time or another, with numerous Turks of all classes—from the highest civil and military officials of the Ottoman Government down to obscure provincial cadis, and even obscure peasants. All these Turks, who, taken collectively, may fairly be regarded as representing the attitude of their nation, have always been unanimous in expressing profound respect for the Greeks, and equally profound contempt for the Bulgars. To the Turk, the Greek belongs to the "royal nation," from which he conquered his Empire, with which he has often fought since, and to which, he says, the Empire must return if Allah sees fit to take it away from the true believers. On the other hand, to the Turk the Bulgar is a "serf," who never ruled, never fought; but who received his freedom, as a gift, at the hands of Russia. It is not the Bulgar, but his Russian patron, that inspires the Turk with fear. Were it not for the fear of Russia, Turkey would have long since shown otherwise than by words the estimate in which she holds the Bulgarian people and the Bulgarian Army.

I have felt impelled to address to you these remarks by my partiality—not for the Greeks, but for fairplay. I sincerely hope that you, actuated by a similar spirit, will allow them to appear in your columns.—Yours, &c.,

G. F. ABBOTT.

233, Temple Chambers, November 12th, 1907.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In his otherwise most useful and valuable contribution to your columns on the question of Macedonia, Mr. Masterman makes one or two statements or suggestions that I venture to think are rather unfortunate and superficial. He suggests that "the native population" of the South, West, and North of Macedonia is Bulgarian; desiring to refer to the "Conversion" process, he uses the hypothesis of an Exarchist village being converted by murder to the Patriarchal supremacy; and he singles out the Greek bands for special condemnation.

Now, to deal with the two latter matters first, whilst we must all disagree in toto with the policy and methods of the bands, it is distinctly unfair and quite impolitic that Greece should be singled out for special condemnation. Imagine yourself a Greek. Rashly, madly, but with a touch of courage that reminds one of an age long past, you attack, in '97, an Empire founded on a religious militarism, and whose standing army is eleven times the size of your own. The Powers frown on you. You are saying things that it is not convenient should be said, and you are behaving as an unruly child. You must be put in the corner. You are told that your fleet must content itself with the pacific bombardment of Prevesa and with the capture of Ashmead-Bartlett, and must refrain from a landing at Salonika which would have turned the whole course of history.

The other States of the Peninsula do not even give you their moral support. You are crushed, humiliated, and for the time impotent. Bulgaria obtains more bérats, and floods Macedonia with bands. At first these bands confine themselves to organising the districts in the North, where the peasantry is sympathetic. But meeting with no resistance, and quite aware of the helplessness of Greece, they attempt to push their propaganda Southwards and Westwards into districts traditionally of Hellenic sympathies. This propaganda is successful—from the Bulgarian point of view; and the number of Exarchist villages increases as the number of Patriarchist villages decreases. (For remember in European Turkey a village may be Patriarchist, or it may be Exarchist, but it cannot be both. Christianity, to be tolerated, must itself be intolerant.) This Bulgar-Exarchist propaganda culminates in an ill-timed and abortive insurrection in 1903; which is suppressed with the usual barbarity. In that suppression you (you are a Greek, remember, for the moment) see no discrimination made between Bulgarian agitators and innocent peasantry, and, indeed, as at Krushevo, you see the whole Greek quarter burnt out whilst, thanks to judicious backsheesh, the Bulgar quarter is spared. Reforms promised by the Powers lose their way in the labyrinths of Turkish evasion. You see your own kith and kin left to the scant mercy of the licensed brigands of Albania, to the barbarities of the Bashi-Bazouks, and to the armed propaganda of the (by this time, desperate and blooded) Slavs of the north. You are only human, a son of Adam; and in 1904 you commence to organise a rival system of armed bands. You have done as the British Consul-General at Salonika prophesied in 1902—you have been driven to retaliate.

Such seems to me to have been the Greek position. It happens, to quote a recent number of the official "Courrier de Sofia," that latterly the Bulgarian propaganda "pour des considérations politiques ou par suite du manque d'hommes et de ressources," has decreased its activity in Macedonia. Instead, its "Correspondenz Bureau" has been wonderfully active, and European public opinion has been educated to believe that the whole cause of trouble in Macedonia is the activity of the Greek bands. The danger of such misinformation is that it diverts attention from the real enemy of a peaceful and prosperous Macedonia, which is the Ottoman yoke. We can admire the individual Turk for his sobriety, patience, obedience, and industry; but it is an utter anomaly that he should continue to be tolerated as a Governing Power in Europe; and with Mr. Masterman's unsparing criticism of the utter futility of the Murszteg programme to render such government tolerable, I humbly but completely associate myself.

As to Mr. Masterman's reference to the native population of the South, West, and North, as though it were solidly Bulgarian, it is surely a slip of the pen. I don't know what test Mr. Masterman has applied, but whether it be of language, religion, racial descent, or—to my mind the only test—the sympathies and wishes of the people themselves, it is equally impossible to maintain such a sweeping statement. If, as Mr. Masterman implies, three-fourths of the area of Macedonia is solely inhabited by people of one race, one language, one religion, and one sympathy, there would be no "problem of Macedonia" confronting us to-day. And if the Bulgarian bands are quite Macedonian in their origin and organisation, how does he account for the presence of at least forty officers of the regular Bulgarian Army with them?—Yours, &c.,

T. PALMER NEWBOULD.

November 12th, 1907.

"WHO ARE THE MEMBERS OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND?"

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent, "Audi Alteram Partem," protests against the statement that all baptised English people are members of the Church of England, whether they "conform" or "non-conform." He declares roundly that there are very many Episcopalians who will "never allow that authority to determine the faith and practice of the Church shall be granted to those who reject her doctrines, refuse her sacraments, and lose no opportunity of depreciating her ministers and her work." (There is a certain humour in that trinity of enormities, reminding one of the college tutor who said to the insubordinate fresher, "Sir, you have not only broken the law of God, but you have offended me!" And is it permissible to add also that "granted" is rather an offensively majestic word for an anonymous correspondent to use, under the circumstances?)

As a "non-conforming" member of the Church of England, I would remind your correspondent that, while the Church of England remains the Established Church of this realm, all subjects of the King are members of that Church, however that fundamental fact of law may annoy some very estimable persons. Not your correspondent, nor even the "Representative Church Council," who employ themselves and amuse others by laying down exclusive terms of church-franchise, have any right to speak in the name of the Church of England, or to alter in one whit the legal basis of its membership. The great majority of Englishmen have not been baptised and confirmed, but they are none the less members of the Church of England, and they also have to be reckoned with in any real attempt to modify the constitution of their ancestral Church. If they are not members of the National Church, when did they cease to be members? Through whom? By what means? For what reason? How?

I have no more abjured my membership of the National Church by being an Independent than by being a member of the National Liberal Club, or by being a subscriber to THE NATION. Indeed, I sometimes wonder if it is by any means possible for an Englishman to cease to be a member of his National Church. Is not the English Church as truly a national institution as the army or the navy?—Yours, &c.,

BERNARD J. SNELL.

Brixton Independent Church, S.W.

November 12th, 1907.

P.S.—A good story is told in Canon Ainger's "Life" by Miss Sichel. A sergeant was interviewing a recruit as to his religious denomination, and the man said that he belonged to none. "Why not?" "Because I don't believe anything." "None of your nonsense, sir. Then understand, until you do, you're a member of the Church of England."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I notice a strange, though common, misapprehension in the letter of your correspondent, "Audi Alteram Partem." He writes, "till they have at confirmation solemnly taken upon themselves the obligations which were assumed on their behalf by their sponsors at their baptism."

These obligations cannot be taken upon ourselves at confirmation; otherwise up to the time of confirmation the responsibility for our wrong-doings would rest on our god-parents and not on ourselves—surely an immoral doctrine.

We take our baptismal vows upon ourselves gradually, as we grow up and learn to know the difference between right and wrong; and what happens at confirmation is this: We are about to receive the gift of the Holy Spirit, and are called upon by the Church to acknowledge publicly our baptismal vows, much in the same way as we make public acknowledgment of our belief by the recital of the Apostles' Creed. This, surely, is quite distinct from taking our vows upon ourselves for the first time. Confirmation itself is simply the receiving of the Holy Spirit through "the laying-on of hands."

It would certainly be a definite gain if the public acknowledgment of our baptismal vows—a most wholesome requirement—were to be fixed for some occasion other than that of confirmation.—Yours, &c.,

H. R. HUMPHREYS.

Bethnal Green, November 12th, 1907.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondents state what in their opinion the law should be, not what it is. The proposition that every parishioner is in law deemed a member of the Church of England was definitely rejected by the Courts in Baker v. Lee (House of Lords Cases, viii., p. 504), and is, according to the late Lord Selborne, merely “a technical deduction from a former state of the law, which could not or did not survive the Toleration Acts.” The matter is discussed at some length in “Church and Reform,” pp. 170-175. At least half-a-dozen Acts recognise membership of the Church as a distinctive status. The phrase, “National Church,” would appear to have no bearing on the question. The word “national” is defined, with the authority both of the Church and of the State, in the XXXIX. Articles, as equivalent to “particular.” In the phrase, “Every national or particular Church,” “national” is clearly the contrary of “universal,” “catholic,” not “sectional” or “unestablished.” I may add, to be more explicit, according to the judgment of the Court in Baker v. Lee, a Nonconformist is, ipso facto, not a member of the Church of England. The same proposition holds good of unbaptised and excommunicated persons. The law of Church membership is strict, but not enforced.—Yours, &c.,

H. J. BARDSLEY.

THE BIRCHING INCIDENT IN CALCUTTA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the “Diary of the Week” in THE NATION of October 5th, to hand by the last home mail, one of the Notes contains the following passage referring to events in India:

“Meanwhile the prosecutions for Press offences and ‘seditious’ speeches are growing unpleasantly frequent. One of them incidentally reveals the fact that flogging is used as a means of punishing political offences. A Bengal student named Susil Chunder Sen was, as ‘The Times’ reported on Wednesday, ‘birched by order of the Presidency Magistrate for participation in the Bow Bazar riot.’ Public flogging, carried out at the triangle placed outside every magistrate’s court, is still the rule in most Indian provinces. But the flogging of an educated man for a political offence is surely a novel infamy. The flogging of ‘politicals’ is rare even in Russia. Its frequency under Austrian rule in Italy was one of the circumstances most potent in alienating the sympathy even of English Conservatives in 1848. Mr. Morley’s attention will, we hope, be directed to this disgraceful incident.”

The real truth is this, that a mob of school lads thronged the corridors of the police-court at a recent trial, and refusing to disperse when called upon to do so, the police had no other recourse than to use force. The mob hustled the police, and one impudent young rascal, fifteen years of age, assaulted a policeman. The lad, Susil Chunder Sen, was arrested, charged before the magistrate, and was convicted. The kind-hearted magistrate sentenced this rowdy schoolboy to receive the mild punishment of twelve strokes of a birch on the soft end of his back within the precincts of the prison—a much milder punishment than his own mother would have given him on the same part of his body for being a naughty boy. This incident is characterised by you as “the flogging of an educated man for a political offence” and as “a novel infamy.” It was no such thing. It was simply the case of an impudent, rowdy schoolboy getting a very lenient punishment for assaulting a policeman in the execution of his duty. That, and nothing else. I do not blame you for writing so. You, like many more, are the victim of the highly-coloured, inaccurate, and sensational news which is being sent from India for home consumption from time to time. The above-mentioned schoolboy incident is a case in point. If the reports of all the rows that take place in the East End of London, and which come before the police-courts during a single week, were wired out here, in as highly-coloured, distorted, and in as inaccurate a manner as the news you occasionally get from India, we would begin to think that old England was going to the devil. We have our troubles here as you have at home. There is unrest all over the planet, and even inside of it, at the present time, and amongst all nations, although the unrest manifests itself in different ways in different countries. In India we have our unrest also, but the unrest here is simply the travail preceding the birth of a new life. Sedition has to be reckoned with everywhere, but so far as that goes here it is confined within very small compass, and there is probably more seditious feeling harboured in the East End of London than there is in the whole of Bengal. What is wanted here is not repression of the forces of unrest, but the guiding of them by enlightened rulers and capable leaders into the channels which make for the true advancement of the people in all that relates to their material, moral, and social progress.

I have perhaps transgressed too much on your space already, but I would add a word to say that if you could bring about the establishment of a “Government Bureau of Public Information,” linked up with all parts of the Empire, for the daily dissemination of accurate intelligence by wire to all the Colonies and Dependencies, such an institution would be an incalculable benefit both to the United Kingdom and to Greater Britain. We would then be saved from the machinations of those big land sharks and daylight robbers on the different bourses who concoct and send forth lying telegrams for Stock Exchange gambling purposes in Government and other securities. The Colonies and India would all welcome the establishment of such a Government Bureau, and no one can gainsay the fact that it is sadly needed.—Yours, &c.,

JAMES LUKE

“Capital” Office, Calcutta,
October 24th, 1907.

A SUNDAY POST FOR LONDON.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am no Sabbatarian. I do far too much work on Sunday, some of it my own fault and some of it my misfortune; but I trust you will hesitate to give your support, as you are asked to do this week, to a movement for introducing into London a new, very large, and very unnecessary, amount of Sunday labour. If your correspondent wants business letters on Sunday as well as all through the week there is nothing to be said in favour of the proposal. If he only wants private and domestic letters, then there is no reason why we should have them in large towns oftener than in country villages. There are plenty of country places that do well enough without letters from Saturday morning till Monday morning—forty-eight hours. Even where there is a Sunday delivery, the intervals all through the week are twenty-four hours. We in London get letters up to half-past nine on Saturday night, and start again at half-past seven on Monday morning—thirty-four hours—and nearly half that time we are asleep. If there is any really important message, the telegraph office is always open. To desire to have a whole army of postmen at work on Sunday in order that a few of us may know, with only an interval of twenty-four hours instead of thirty-four, how our sick friends are getting on, is not a sign of love but of selfish impatience.

The late Dr. Brooke Herford was asked by a member of his congregation in a town in which letters could be had on Sunday by sending for them: “Should you call me a Sabbath-breaker if I sent for my letters every Sunday morning?” “No,” replied Herford, promptly, “certainly not. I should call you an idiot.” And I venture to think that to the vast majority of persons in London it is a wise relief to be free for one day in seven from the pressure of the constant delivery of letters through the week. What share religion, or even Puritanism, may have had in providing this relief, and at the same time giving our hard-worked letter-carriers and collectors a whole day’s rest, I do not know; but I feel sure that it is the common sense of London that maintains it.—Yours, &c.,

FRANCIS H. JONES.

Dr. Williams’s Library,
London, November 12th, 1907.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

THERE are rumours in quarters which are usually well-informed that two prominent Liberal newspapers are about to be amalgamated. We mention the report with reserve, as up to the present it is without official confirmation; but should it be true, a well-known Liberal daily will in a few weeks join forces with one of its rivals.

* * *

ALTHOUGH Tennyson once offered to defray the cost of an edition of George Darley's Poems, nothing came of the project, and the first collected edition to appear will be "The Complete Poetical Works of George Darley," which Mr. Ramsay Colles has edited for Messrs. Routledge's "Muses' Library." Mr. Colles's edition will contain not only the poems of the rare original editions now in the possession of the Darley family, but also the six Syren Songs contributed to "The Tribute"—a miscellany issued in 1837 for the benefit of a man of letters who had fallen into poverty, to which the other contributors were Alfred and Charles Tennyson, Sir Henry Taylor, Aubrey de Vere, Lord Houghton, and Walter Savage Landor. There is, besides, a poem called "The Sorrows of Hope," which has never been printed before, so that the edition promises to be a notable one in several respects. Darley's work, though never very popular, was praised by such men as Carlyle, Tennyson, and Charles Lamb, and so successful was he in seizing upon the spirit of seventeenth-century poetry that Palgrave printed one of his lyrics in the first edition of "The Golden Treasury," as the work of an anonymous writer of that period.

* * *

THE next issue of that useful annual, "The Literary Year-Book," will contain a number of interesting features. Besides the Directory of Authors, there will be also an index, in which the names are grouped under subject-headings of literary work. By this arrangement, it will be possible to see at a glance the names of authors who have written upon any particular subject. Another useful feature is a classified list of cheap reprints dealing with the various series with which publishers have been so busy of late. The editor attributes the uncertainty still prevailing in the publishing world to the continued activity of the "Times." But he inclines to the view that the campaign has done some good, in the direction of improving trade, owing to the fact that the "Times" has certainly encouraged the book-buying habit.

* * *

THE Oxford University Press is about to issue "Ancient Britain and the Invasions of Julius Cæsar," by Dr. T. Rice Holmes, a companion volume to that author's scholarly book on "Cæsar's Conquest of Gaul." Dr. Rice Holmes expresses the view that "the tendency of modern historians, including the greatest scholar of them all, has been to under-rate the importance of what Cæsar had achieved." He accordingly examines the results of Cæsar's invasions in some detail, though the greater part of the book is occupied with the story of Cæsar's life on our island. Students will be surprised to hear that Dr. Holmes claims to have solved, "to a demonstration," the questions of the identity of Portius Itius and that of the place of Cæsar's landing—two problems which many eminent scholars, including Mommsen, have declared to be insoluble.

* * *

MR. JAMES FITZMAURICE-KELLY's knowledge of Spain and Spanish literature makes him an ideal editor for "Gil Blas," so that the edition of Le Sage's immortal romance in "The World's Classics," to which he contributes an introduction, will be looked for with interest. We are able to give an extract from his estimate of Le Sage:—

"Le Sage is not a typical writer of the eighteenth century. He has no sympathy with its rationalistic spirit, no reforming instinct, no belief that human nature will ever be radically different from what it has been. Therefore he is not a rebel against political or ecclesiastical authority, but he is essentially a critical observer, and in his art he is something of an innovator. In 'Gil Blas' he gives us the first novel of manners, introducing into romance the methods of La Bruyère. He has, however, no heroic standard to uphold, wastes no indignation on rascality, finds the world an amusing spectacle, teaches no lesson but the ancient saw that (on the whole) honesty is the best policy, and throws his practical philosophy and shrewd observation into the form of fiction."

* * *

A NEW version of Mr. W. B. Yeats's prose drama, "Where There is Nothing," will be produced next week in Dublin by the Abbey Theatre Company, under the title, "The Unicorn and the Stars." Lady Gregory has collaborated with Mr. Yeats in the production of the new play, which may be described as a tragi-comedy. It will probably be included in the collected edition of Mr. Yeats's works in verse and prose, shortly to be issued by Messrs. Bollen.

* * *

MESSRS. WILLIAMS & NORGATE have almost ready a book called "National Idealism and a State Church," by Dr. Stanton Coit. Dr. Coit pleads that the State Church should not be disestablished, but transformed (1) by abolishing all tests for the clergy, except those of intellectual equipment and moral fitness, and (2) by democratising its government. He regards the Book of Common Prayer as the characteristic and necessary organ of national religion, but argues that it should be reinterpreted and revised according to the principles of idealistic humanism, social democracy, and science. The terminology appropriate to religion, conceived as the moral idealism of the nation, and the function of prayer therein, are analysed at length, and the work closes with an elaborate scrutiny of the nature and purpose of ritual and a justification of it on educational grounds.

* * *

PROFESSOR JAMES DRUMMOND, late Principal of Manchester College, is a theologian whose books are always sure of a welcome. He is now engaged in correcting the proof-sheets of a new work on Christian Doctrine, which will be published by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The same firm also announces "Four American Leaders," by Mr. Charles Eliot. It contains appreciations of the work and influence of Franklin, Washington, Channing, and Emerson, and attempts to show the part each writer played in shaping the political and intellectual life of the American Republic.

* * *

AMONG Messrs. Constable's announcements is a volume on "Airships, Past and Present," by Captain A. Hildebrandt, of the Prussian Balloon Corps. The author has had many years' practical experience of ballooning, and his book gives a sketch of the past and present state of the art, an account of its applications to scientific ends, and a discussion of the problems which inventors are now busy trying to solve. There is also a chapter on balloon photography, in which Captain Hildebrandt has had the advantage of Professor Miethe's assistance, and the book ends with an account of the author's experience in breeding and training carrier pigeons, a sport which, he holds, might be turned to untold value in time of war.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

- "The Rise of the Greek Epic." By Gilbert Murray. (Frowde. 6s. net.)
- "The Heart of Gambetta." Translated from the French of Francis Laur by Violette Montagu. (Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)
- "Bath under Beau Nash." By Lewis Melville. (Nash. 15s. net.)
- "Annals of an Eton House." By Major Gambier Parry. (Murray. 15s. net.)
- "The Literature of Roguery." By F. W. Chandler. (Constable. 2 vols. 12s. net.)
- "Before and After Waterloo." Letters from Edward Stanley, sometime Bishop of Norwich. (Unwin. 14s. net.)
- "Lincoln." By H. B. Binns. (Dent. 4s. 6d. net.)
- "The English Stage of To-day." By Dr. Mario Borsa. Translated by Selwyn Brinton. (Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)
- "A Pocketful of Sixpences." By G. W. E. Russell. (Grant Richards. 7s. 6d. net.)
- "Immortal Memories." By Clement Shorter. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
- "The Broken Road." By A. E. W. Mason. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)
- "Mr. Strudge." By Percy White. (Nash. 6s.)
- "Nouveaux Cahiers de Jeunesse." Par Ernest Renan. (Paris: Calmann-Lévy. 7fr. 50.)
- "L'Individu et l'Esprit d'Autorité." Par Abel Faure. (Paris: Stock. 3fr. 50.)
- "La Raçon." Roman. Par Marcelle Tinayre. (Paris: Calmann-Lévy. 3fr. 50.)
- "Das Moderne Drama." Von Prof. R. F. Arnold. (Strasburg: Trübner. M. 6.)
- "Friedrich Nietzsche und Richard Wagner." Von Hans Bélar. (Berlin: Wunder. M. 2.)

Reviews.

THE LETTERS OF QUEEN VICTORIA.*
III.

THE general effect of the correspondence must be to evoke a feeling of revulsion in favour of Lord Palmerston with those who, following the lead of such great authorities of his time as Peel, Gladstone, and Cobden, have considered his methods unwise and unduly provocative. Precisely on the points where he interpreted the popular sympathies of his time—his detestation and contempt for the reactionary governments of Austria, Prussia, and Naples, his support to Liberal constitutions, and, above all, his desire for the unity of Italy—the Queen and the Prince did their utmost to thwart and oppose him, and to substitute their own policy of maintaining the status quo. In this view his action in such matters as the supply of arms to the Sicilian insurgents, the use of intemperate language when making an apology to Austria for the assaults on General Haynau by Messrs. Barclay's draymen, the proposed public reception of Kossuth and the Hungarian refugees, who owed their lives to his intervention, the treatment of the claims against Greece of Don Pacifico, seem to be of minor importance. It will be admitted that in many of these matters the conduct of Palmerston was open to grave objection, and was hasty and ill-judged, and that he was sometimes wanting in respect for the Queen. It will be agreed also that his unofficial approval of the coup d'état to the French Ambassador, contrary to the decision of the Cabinet, the immediate cause of his dismissal by Lord John Russell and the Queen, was unjustifiable. But we have the authority of the Queen herself in a letter to Lord John Russell, after the dismissal of Palmerston, that her differences with him were not as to form and method, but as to the substance of his policy.

"Frequently," she wrote, "when our foreign policy was called in question, it has been said by Lord John and his colleagues that the principles on which it was conducted were the right ones, and having been approved of by them received their support, and that it was only the personal manner of Lord Palmerston in conducting the affairs which could be blamed in tracing the causes which led to the disastrous results the Queen complained of."

"The Queen is certainly not disposed to defend the personal manner in which Lord Palmerston has conducted foreign affairs, but she cannot admit that the errors he committed were merely faults in form and method, that they were no more than acts of inconsideration, indiscretion, and bad taste. The Queen considers that she has also to complain of what appear to her deviations from the principles laid down by the Cabinet for his conduct; nay, she sees distinctly in their practical application a personal and arbitrary perversion of the very nature and essence of those principles. She has only to refer here to Italy, Spain, Greece, Holstein, France, &c., &c., which afford ample illustrations of this charge."

Lord John Russell, till the coup d'état business occurred, manfully fought the battle for Palmerston against the Court, so far as general policy was concerned, which he said had been right, and had the approval of the Cabinet; but he admitted that the manner in which it had been exercised had been unfortunate, and had led to hostility and irritation on the part of other Powers. Though the decision of Russell to part with Palmerston was arrived at without concert with the Queen, yet there can be no doubt that it was indirectly due to her previous pressure. Later in life Lord Russell admitted that he ought to have sent for Palmerston before writing the letter of dismissal, and have given him further opportunity for explanation. The breach with Palmerston led to the speedy defeat of the Russell Administration, to the coalition Government of Lord Aberdeen, and later to the long Premiership of Palmerston, showing how fully he had secured the confidence of the public in the essential principles of his foreign policy.

These views of the opposition of the Queen and the Prince to Palmerston's policy, and the efforts to make their own policy prevail, are accentuated by their action in 1859-60 on the Italian question. The posts of Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary were then reversed. Palmerston was Premier, Russell was at the Foreign Office.

* "The Letters of Queen Victoria: A Selection from Her Majesty's Correspondence, 1837-1861." Edited by A. C. Benson and Viscount Esher. Murray, 3 vols., 63s. net.

The Queen treated the latter much as she had treated Palmerston in the earlier period. There were the same constant objections to drafts of despatches, the same appeals against the Foreign Secretary to the Prime Minister, the same demands, when both were against the Queen's views, that the drafts should be submitted to the Cabinet. Behind all these objections and difficulties, raised ostensibly on behalf of peace, was an alternative policy—the desire to maintain the status quo in Italy, to prevent the expulsion of the Austrians, to support the reactionary rulers of Naples and the Duchies against the wishes of their people.

Writing on April 26th, 1860, to Lord Russell, the Queen says:—

"She would consider it the deepest degradation to this country if she was compelled to appear at the Emperor's (Napoleon's) Congress summoned to Paris in order to register and put her seal on acts of spoliation of the Emperor of Austria."

Three days later she says:—

"She thinks that the main argument is omitted in this draft, viz., that the attempts, such as Sardinia is suspected to contemplate, are morally bad and reprehensible in themselves, besides being politically inexpedient. . . . She trusts Lord Russell will find it easy to introduce a passage which would place on record that we do attach importance to public justice and morality."

To this Lord Russell bluntly replies the same day:—

"He is sorry he cannot agree that there would be any moral wrong in assisting to overthrow the Government of the two Sicilies. The best writers on international law consider it meritorious to overthrow a tyrannical government, and there have been few governments so tyrannical as that of Naples."

It would seem that all the letters on this subject have not been printed. Sir Spencer Walpole, in his Life of Lord Russell, refers to a correspondence between the Queen and her Minister, as to a despatch which Lord Russell proposed to send to the Governments of Austria and France, in which he laid down the principle that every people had the right to choose their own Monarchy, and that the restoration of the Dukes of Tuscany and Modena would be a return to that system of foreign interference which forty years ago had been the misfortune of Italy and the danger of Europe. The historian says that the Queen expressed her dislike to this despatch, and appealed to the Cabinet, insisting on the formation of an Italian Confederation, and the restoration of the two Dukes as compensation to Austria for the loss of Lombardy. The Prime Minister, he says, replied that if their advice were not adopted the Ministers might have no alternative but to lay down their offices. These important and significant letters are not included in the present volumes.

It is worthy of note that Palmerston gave a most active support to his colleague at the Foreign Office in all these critical negotiations about Italy. The two together presented a solid front to the opposition of the Queen and the Prince, and succeeded in carrying the Cabinet with them, not without some dissentients. From a letter of the Queen, it appears that Palmerston submitted to her that when a principle of policy had been adopted by the Cabinet and sanctioned by the Sovereign, the Foreign Secretary ought not to be impeded in carrying out the details, either by the objections raised to them by the Sovereign, or by making them dependent on the meetings of Cabinets, difficult to obtain at certain times of year. This was really the common-sense view of the position. The Queen was completely out of touch with her Ministers as to their Italian policy. It would seem that she would have done better to leave the Foreign Minister and the Prime Minister to carry out their policy in their own way. Nothing but confusion and needless delay resulted from bandying about drafts of despatches between the Foreign Minister, the Prime Minister, the Cabinet, and the Queen. In his Life of Lord Palmerston, it is stated by Mr. Ashley that at a critical period of the discussion on the Spanish marriages three weeks were lost owing to the necessity for getting approval of the Queen to the draft of an important despatch, while she was on cruise on the West Coast of Scotland, and that Guizot made a great point of this delay.

It must be admitted that on occasions the Queen and the Prince made most important suggestions on drafts submitted to them. The addition to the despatch to the American Government on the Trent affair, which so largely contributed to the maintenance of peace—the last effort of the Prince—and the important change made in the Proclamation to India, in the name of the Queen, after the Mutiny, when its government was taken out of the hands of the East India Company, are good illustrations of this influence of the Sovereign. But these were cases where there was no difference of policy between the Queen and her Ministers. When there were grave differences of policy the position was very different, and the difficulties of Ministers were greatly increased by the necessity of getting the unwilling consent of the Queen to every step and every despatch by which their policy was being carried out. In view of this, it seems desirable that new editions of the Lives of both Palmerston and Russell, which have been written with great reserve as regards their relations to the Queen, should be issued, now that the seal of secrecy has been removed from correspondence and interviews with her. Unfortunately, Sir Spencer Walpole is dead, and Mr. Evelyn Ashley, I fear, is hors de combat.

The work under review closes with two most deeply pathetic letters of the Queen, written in the agony of her grief at the premature death of her husband. To her uncle, Leopold, she says:—

"My own dearest kindest father, for as such I have always loved you, my life as a happy one is ended, the world is gone from me. . . . Oh, to be cut off in the prime of life, to see our pure, happy, quiet domestic life, which alone enabled me to bear my much disliked position, cut off at forty-two, when I had hoped with such instinctive certainty that God never would part us, and would let us grow old together, though he always talked of the shortness of life, is too awful, too cruel. And yet it must be for his happiness. His purity was too great, his aspirations too high for this miserable world."

But, in the midst of her poignant grief and anguish, the Queen still thought of the duties which lay before her:—

"I am anxious," she added, "to repeat one thing, that one is my firm resolve, my irrevocable decision, viz., that his wishes and his plans, about everything, his views about everything, are to be my laws, and no human being will make me swerve from what he decided and wished; and I look to you to support and help me in this—I am also determined that no one person, may he be ever so good, ever so devoted, among my servants—is to lead or guide or dictate to me."

With this resolve, the widowed Queen faced with courage the joyless life, which was to last nearly forty years. And most truly did she maintain this purpose. Henceforth the wishes and views of her dead husband were the standard by which she regulated her official actions. Lord Palmerston is reported to have said that he found it far more difficult to deal with the late Prince Consort than with the living one.

EVERSLEY.

"HOW TO FISH."*

BY THE RT. HON. SYDNEY BUXTON, M.P.

EVERY additional volume on fishing (and this is somewhere about the two thousandth) is prefaced by the author with the obvious truism that he has nothing new to say—I have said it myself—and he thereupon produces a book—I have done it myself.

Mr. Earl Hodgson tells us "How to Fish," and if he has nothing new or striking to say, says it so freshly, and—may we add?—so dogmatically, and so mingles the practical with the speculative that an odour of novelty is engendered.

A book which tells us how to fish can, of course, teach the novice much concerning the reel, line and rod, and possibly river. It can instruct him in regard to flies—on which a word presently—but I doubt if it can teach him to cast by diagrams. The only diagrams, with their descriptive letterpress, that have seemed to me to be useful and educating, though I have not tried them myself, are those in Mr. C. Shaw's book on "Salmon and Trout Fishing."

The best plan for the novice is to get an expert friend, or instructor, to show him how to hold the rod, and the way in which to use, or not to use, his strength and muscles; to point out the proper distance and curve of the line extended behind, and the angle beyond which the rod should not descend in front.

But even the good fisherman, like the good shot, may not be able to tell you clearly "how it is done." Watching him, it seems so ridiculously easy; he casts so lightly, so simply; he is obviously the master, not the slave of the rod and fly. To observe and take note is, however, itself good practice, and will help to correct errors.

Apart from diagrams and explanations there are, however, for trout fly-fishing, at least, a few golden rules, which can be learnt by heart: Use the wrist and elbow alone, and rely more on the former than on the latter. Keep the elbow down against the side, except for a long cast. Put no apparent force into the operation of the cast, except against a wind. Let the rod, not your force, undertake the final stage of the cast. Keep the eye on the spot at which you are aiming.

The old craze of long lists of flies seems to be somewhat reviving of late. Lists, which in former days used to number a hundred, sixty, fifty patterns, had gradually, by experience, become enormously reduced. For myself, for dry fly-fishing, on the Itchen, for instance, I should be content for the whole year with three flies—olive-quill, red-quill, and iron-blue.

This may be carrying elimination too far, but Mr. Hodgson carries inclusion to the opposite extreme. The unfortunate fisherman, if he is led to follow the advice of our author, will have to go about followed by a traction engine, or at least a motor car, to carry his assortment of flies. We are given a long list of patterns of alleged necessary flies for each month. A little later, in the next edition, we are to have a list, an essential list, for each fishing week; and, a little later still, we are to be provided with a daily list. The preliminary monthly list comprises descriptions of 164 stream and lake flies (some duplicates), each of which presumably must be tied on at least three different sizes of hooks. Heaven help us when we are favoured with the daily list. Poor beggared fishermen; happy, prosperous tackle-maker. Which pattern is the vacillating fisherman to choose? How happy would he be with one or two flies—if only the other half hundred or so were away. The rise is over before he can decide on his choice. Yet, even with this varied selection, the fish may not be induced to rise. The fisherman may, after all, have to follow the example of the irate colonel when the salmon declined to look at his flies. He fastened one of his best Havannahs to the hook and cast it forth. "There, by Jingo, if they won't come for this, they won't come for anything."

This book raises the old, old controversy between "wet" and "dry" fly-fishing, and our author plumps heavily for the wet fly, and annihilates the harmless dry-fly fisherman by dubbing him a purist and a faddist.

I hold no brief on either side. I thoroughly enjoy wet-fly and dry-fly fishing. But I much prefer a day with the dry fly to a day with the wet, not because I am a purist or a faddist, but for the very sensible reason that the one branch of sport gives me a more acute pleasure than the other.

To catch on the Test, or Itchen, a trout with a wet fly (even if I could do it habitually in a legitimate manner, which I doubt), would give me but a tithe of the pleasure and satisfaction I should obtain from catching it with a dry fly. To cast, somewhat monotonously, from a boat, the wind always behind you; to fish a river with the sunk fly, even fishing up-stream, may be, and is, delightful—but there is a yet higher plane.

The surroundings, the sky, the birds, the flowers, the foliage of a dry fly stream are not surpassed in the passive and active pleasure they bring in early summer. Then you are pitting yourself in each case against a particular fish. Your fly, your minute fly, is in severe and active competition with a live fly, the two floating down side by side over a lazy fish, who is only greedy, not hungry. No bungling will be overlooked; you must cast lightly and accurately and with judgment; the fly must simulate life. The pleasure is enhanced in that there is no blind casting. In most cases you see the fish, or, at least, you know exactly where he is lying by the fading rings of his rise. You have approached him with care and caution; you see him rise again, and then you know how far and where to cast.

* "How to Fish." By W. Earl Hodgson. Adam & Charles Black. 3s. 6d. net.

Whether he will favour you depends on your skill, and on his intelligence, alas! also, on his caprice—Mr. Hodgson, however, scoffs at the idea that cycles of competition with fishermen have educated the intelligence and developed the caution of the fish. Skill, care, and observation are all required; and it is a pleasure in life to be able to apply these qualities to a successful conclusion.

As in the case of shooting, it is not the actual bag, so much as the way the game is brought to book, that gives flavour to the day. A really difficult fish, one large fish, is worth many smaller and easier ones; a lovely high and difficult bird is worth dozens of flopping, flustering fowls.

It is true that even dry-fly fishing is not always Paradise—devils may, and do, intrude. The rise may be late, short, and feeble. The fish may be capricious. Wind—that abomination of desolation, a heavy down-stream wind, or worse, a gusty, cross wind—may reduce the pleasure almost to a vanishing-point. Wind affects the temper of the shorn lamb, as we know, and so it does that of the fisherman. What, we may well ask, is the present-day use of wind, now that Nelson is dead, and sailing ships so much a thing of the past? The Liberal Government—instead of disquieting the Church, alarming the Tories, destroying Capital and Confidence—would be much better occupied in abolishing the wind, especially E. and N., and in fixing Easter at a reasonable time of the year.

But even with, and in spite of, its disturbing devils, dry-fly fishing is a magnificent sport, under all and every condition.

As humanely and "collectivistically" inclined, I could wish that a larger number of persons should enjoy such a pleasure; though, at the same time, I sympathise with the view held by a friend of mine, "Free Fishing." Am I in favour of free fishing? Of course I am; what I like is free fishing in preserved waters."

SYDNEY CHARLES BUXTON.

A GERMAN BIOGRAPHY OF CHATHAM.*

PROFESSOR EGERTON says, in his introduction to this version of Dr. von Ruville's work, that it is a humiliating reflection that it should have been reserved to a German scholar to write the first detailed biography of the elder Pitt which has appeared in recent years. It is certainly strange that Chatham's dazzling personality and career should not yet have been made the subject of a close and comprehensive study by a modern English historian. Dr. von Ruville has certain conspicuous qualifications for the task he has set himself. He has emancipated himself from the prejudices which we might expect to find in a German historian discussing the Seven Years' War, and the Peace of Paris. He treats the conduct of English diplomacy in a disinterested and scientific spirit, and an Englishman could not make greater allowance for the difficulties which confronted the ally of Frederick the Great. One reason for Dr. von Ruville's impartiality in this instance is to be found in the circumstances which led up to the writing of this biography. His present work is the sequel to his earlier study of the relations of Bute and Chatham. Now as far as this rather passionless historian can be said to have a hero at all, his hero is Bute. Bute was so signal an object of suspicion and detestation to his contemporaries, that the task of explaining him and justifying him presented an obvious attraction to a historian who stood outside all the traditions. The enthusiasms of Dr. von Ruville are always subdued and restrained, but he makes no secret of his sympathies with Bute, and with Bute's master. So far does he carry this attachment that he defends the confidential letter Bute wrote in 1762 to Choiseul. England was at war with France, and the object of the letter was to stimulate the French Government to offer a more vigorous opposition to Prince Ferdinand, who was commanding the English army. Dr. von Ruville defends this proceeding on the ground that Choiseul, though formally an enemy, was in effect a friend, for he was aiding the English Government's desire for peace; and that Prussia, though formally an ally, was in effect an enemy, for she was thwarting those desires. It is in these departments of policy that Dr. von Ruville is strongest, for he has made a careful study of the diplomacy and foreign policy of the time, and he has formed conclusions that are fresh and interesting. All that he has to say on this part of Chatham's career is well worth study, and though his praise of Bute will not always be found convincing, it is only fair to admit that he puts a case which may certainly modify some of the traditional judgments on the character and conduct of the Favourite.

A different verdict must be passed on Dr. von Ruville's treatment of the subject of his biography. As a contribution to English domestic history, or to the interpretation or elucidation of Chatham's character, the book is singularly disappointing. Its perspective seems to us to be false; its analysis of motives in some cases ludicrous; its general conception alike of the times and the man untrue and inadequate. Let us give two examples of the sort of explanation that is offered when Chatham's behaviour is difficult to understand. Dr. von Ruville attributes Chatham's hesitating and guarded appearances in politics between 1761 and 1765 to his dread of losing the favour of Sir William Pynsent, to whose estate he succeeded in 1765. Chatham, according to this theory, knew that Pynsent had made him his heir, in order to mark his admiration of the great Commoner's fearless resistance to the Court. Chatham was very anxious not to run any risk of losing this inheritance, and therefore he had to make some show of attacking the Court and the Government. Unfortunately, the situation was complicated and difficult, because if Chatham expected something from Pynsent, he expected something also from George the Third. The King was to give him power, and Pynsent was to give him his fortune. He had, therefore, to maintain an uneasy equilibrium, and to discover some way of preserving the good graces of both of them. Hence came his ambiguous silences and his equally ambiguous speeches. But Dr. von Ruville is so much taken with his discovery that he contrives to turn it to still further use. He finds that the thought had sometimes crossed the mind of Sir William Pynsent that Wilkes was a more energetic antagonist of the Court than Chatham, and that perhaps of the two men he had done more to deserve the legacy. Chatham suspected this, and we have here the clue to his bitter attack on No. 45. He was speaking, not as a politician reprobating a violent article, but as a legacy-hunter snarling at a possible rival. The statesman who had shown, judged by all the standards of his time, not merely a delicate but a quixotic sense of honour as Paymaster-General, was, in point of fact, a covetous schemer, whose only concern was to find a successful compromise between his love of money and his love of power. This theory is helped out by an elaborate and interesting study of Chatham's ancestors in order to show that his avarice was inherited.

When Dr. von Ruville does not explain Chatham's conduct by avarice, he explains it by ambition. This explanation, again, he pushes to unusual lengths, for whereas many people put down a man's crimes to his vices, Dr. von Ruville is very loth to give Chatham credit for good motives in his good actions. There are plenty of disfigurements in Chatham's career, and the years which were spent on a savage pursuit of leadership are marked by every species of inconsistency. Smollett has left a record in one of his most bitter satires, of the impression those acts made on some, at any rate, of Chatham's contemporaries. But the great majority of his countrymen believed that his motives were public-spirited, and he carried the nation with him through all his inconstancies. It is unnecessary to defend all that Chatham did in those early days, when he recognised that power was only to be obtained by certain methods, and hoped to justify, by the use he was to make of it, the means to which he had been driven in its attainment. We shall not quarrel with Dr. von Ruville if he likes to put a bad face on all that part of Chatham's career. But we do dissent strongly from his view that all questions of domestic politics interested him solely in so far as they affected his own hopes of aggrandisement. Chatham was the most formidable assailant of corruption, but according to Dr. von Ruville he only objected to corruption because it destroyed the influence his oratory gave him. He was a powerful advocate of Parliamentary Reform, but Dr. von Ruville thinks he kept carefully in mind all the time the sort of Parliament in which he would have an ascendancy. His Royalist sympathies were due to his belief that the King would choose him as Prime Minister. Thus by a few strokes of the brush Dr. von Ruville turns this great tribune into a mere self-seeking egotist, whose professions of Liberal convictions were the disguise of personal ambitions, and whose combative patriotism did not forbid the meanest and most mischievous of the tactics of faction.

* "William Pitt, Earl of Chatham." By Albert von Ruville. Translated by H. J. Chaytor, M.A., Assisted by Mary Morison. With an Introduction by Professor Hugh E. Egerton. In three volumes, 30s. net. Heinemann.

Now Chatham is so strange and puzzling a figure that Dr. von Ruville could make out a very plausible case for his view of his character. Vain, irritable, arrogant, capricious, obsequious to the Crown, insolent to his colleagues, Chatham's personal drawbacks, his artificial manners, his fatal whims and moods, they all lend colour to a malicious interpretation of his motives and his aims. And Dr. von Ruville's poor estimate of his purposes follows naturally from his contempt for the causes to which Chatham devoted himself. He throws cold water on the American Revolution; he gives very scant attention to the democratic movement in England; he is interested in the international struggles in India, but not much interested in the great political problems that confronted English statesmanship there; he has scarcely anything to say on Ireland. In his actual narrative he does much less than justice to the importance of Chatham's interventions on these subjects. He is much more curious about the relations of Chatham to Bute than he is about the relations of Chatham to the various movements of reform that were beginning to disturb the complacent world of intrigue and corruption. This aloofness has disabled Dr. von Ruville from seeing that Chatham was not only a determined personality, who ruled England for five years, during which he gave her the mastery in two continents where France had come very near to wresting it from her, and rescued Central Europe from the clutches of the three great Continental Powers, but a great and heroic Liberal, with the spacious views, profound convictions, and generous sympathies that the term Liberal implies.

It is true that Chatham as a Reformer was a failure. It is true, and this is worse still, that his failure was due to his own capital mistake. Chatham was an ideal leader for a war, when the need of the moment was a Minister of integrity, of imagination, of daring, and endowed above all with the magical power of making men believe in him. For the hard campaign of a continuous warfare against the schemes of the Court he was much less adapted. He was not a good colleague. It was easier to admire his great personality at a distance, than to concert measures with him at close quarters. We know what impression his massive and lonely arrogance made on Conway, his theatrical affectations on Shelburne, his erratic and wayward humour on Burke. A difficult colleague by nature, he was further handicapped by a false theory of the right principles of government. His hatred of party connections—a reasonable and proper state of mind to a contemporary of the Newcastles and Bedfords—led him into the fatal illusion of which he repented so bitterly in his last years. In his own day there was one small set of men who had set themselves to put down corruption, and to resist the power of the Court, and if Chatham with his wider views and his bolder sympathies had allied himself in 1763 instead of in 1770 with the Rockinghams, George III. would never have been able to make Chatham's fame the instrument of all the policies Chatham hated. As it was, the Court used Chatham, taking advantage of his illusions and his illness, to crush freedom alike at home and in the Colonies. The chief blame for that calamity must go to Chatham, though perhaps nobody yet has quite done justice to the disturbances in his life and character that were due to a state of health which at times was hardly to be distinguished from insanity. But all the harm that Chatham did by the mistakes of judgment that strengthened the most formidable of all the enemies of free and honest government, is eclipsed by the memory not only of his prowess as a Minister, but of his valiant championship of great and chivalrous causes. It is the chief weakness of Dr. von. Ruville's book that these splendid chapters in the life of the greatest Englishman of his time are treated as mere incidents and symptoms of a morbid and engrossing ambition.

DEAN HOLE.*

THE appearance of this volume can hardly fail to prove a disappointment to the many friends of the late Dean Hole. If this collection offers at all a fair specimen of the Dean's epistolary style, letter-writing was not his forte. A grand and vigorous personality, with a warm and noble heart; a commanding presence and a very enviable fluency of speech; a voice that rang true and never faltered, and the utter absence of anything in the shape of pretence or insincerity, all contributed to make this man a power among the working-classes, who were proud of him as sometimes their spokesman and always their friend. But the Dean of Rochester was never a student—a scholar or a man of learning. He wrote some popular booklings, of some of which his editor barely makes mention. He seems hardly to have written a sermon during the last forty years of his life; for he trusted much to the inspiration of the moment, and the sound of his voice as it rang through the crowded spaces of his own, and almost every other, Cathedral in England, awoke a measure of enthusiasm in the hearts of his congregation, and returned to himself as a call to do his best as a prophet in his generation.

The exuberant vigour and animal spirits of the man showed itself in all he did; and he never did anything by halves. He went up to Brazenose at Oxford with a half-wish "to get a first." He soon found that he had not the least chance of that. Whereupon he wrote home to his father to send him his hunter, and sent it was accordingly. It was just at the time that Charles Kingsley, an undergraduate at Magdalene College, was hunting occasionally with the Cambridgeshire; though Kingsley was not of a mind to miss the chance of academic distinction, which, of course, he won with flying colours. Just twenty years before this, Pusey, in his nonage, had kept horses at Christchurch—before the profoundly earnest and serious days when he got under the influence of Keble and Newman. Hole was ordained to the family living of Cauntton in 1844. Here for many years he wrote and preached two sermons every week until one lucky day he found himself sermonless, and from that day he read sermons no more. Faithful, sympathetic, and generous, he won the hearts of all the country people who—to a man—were proud of their large-hearted and big-boned vicar, and loved him none the less because some of the unco-guid looked askance at the foxhunting parson. Always an enthusiast in field sports, he found delight in them even to the end; though hunting and shooting and cricket left him long before he reluctantly had to leave them. In 1875 he was promoted to a Canonry at Lincoln. Up to this time he had never even taken his M.A. degree. He seems now first to have thought of Church Preferment. Very soon all eyes began to be turned upon him. In December, 1880, he preached his first sermon at St. Paul's. Perhaps the most interesting letter in this volume is one which gives an account of this sermon.

"The congregation in the evening literally filled that immense church, from the choir to the west door. How far my voice went I know not, but they seemed to be listening in the horizon! I was not nervous in the least degree in the reality, though I had been in the anticipation, because He, Who sends, always supports; and the more one is conscious of utter weakness and unworthiness, the more one seems to hear a voice saying, 'If I condescend to use you as an instrument, your personal failures and feelings cannot interfere.'"

After this Hole was in continual request as a popular preacher, and always commanded large audiences. But no less was he in request as a public speaker on various platforms. His enthusiasm as a gardener and grower of roses awoke enthusiasm in half England. The professional gardeners, so far from being jealous of him, regarded him as their best friend, and he corresponded with more than one of them, even to the end of his life, on equal terms. In

* "The Letters of Samuel Reynolds Hole, Dean of Rochester." Edited with a Memoir by George A. B. Dewar. George Allen & Sons.

Church matters Hole was a real old Tory; but his eyes were not in the back of his head. Therefore, extremists did not love him very much. In 1878, when he was rapidly rising in public estimation, Canon (afterwards Bishop) Ryle denounced him as a "conspirator" to Romanise the Church of England. Hole replied in a vigorous and trenchant letter to the Newark Advertiser, in which he challenges his libeller to prove his assertion. Would that he had written more such letters as these!

As often may be observed of men of genius and serious endeavour, Dean Hole seems to have gone on increasing in actual earnestness and intellectual power as he grew older. The simplicity and dignity of his quite unique hymn, "Sons of Labour," sounds as a call to a higher level of sentiment and aspiration by one who was himself in fellowship with the sons of toil.

THE CRIMINAL CLASSES.*

A FEW years ago a gentleman of the name of Sir Robert Anderson, who held a position in the Metropolitan Police, made himself rather ridiculous by an attack upon one of our greatest Hebrew scholars, Canon Driver, of Oxford, in a book which he entitled "Daniel in the Critics' Den." It was hardly to be expected that a gentleman whose business in life it had been to hunt down criminals, and to see them, as he expresses it, "caged" in prison or penal servitude, would possess much competence in a field so alien from his own. None the less we had the spectacle—impossible in any country but our own—of an ex-police official assailing the most matured scholarship in Europe with an instrument like a constable's baton. In the latest production of Sir Robert Anderson's pen we are happily spared a repetition of this grotesque spectacle. He is certainly more at home discoursing on convicts and criminals than when dealing with Daniel in the lions' den. But the subject of criminals and crime, as well as the more abstruse questions of Old Testament criticism, can only be satisfactorily dealt with by people in possession of a considerable fund of common sense. Sir Robert Anderson is good enough to tell us at the end of some wild statements that he does not suffer from hysterics. We will conclude, therefore, that his book is written in the spirit of the prosecuting attorney, or perhaps more accurately of the ex-detective from Scotland Yard, whose standing attitude towards the prison population is that they are, in Sir Robert's elegant language, "human beasts of prey." A beast of prey is born, and must remain, a beast of prey. He is not the victim of unhappy social and parental conditions. It is of the foundations of his nature to be precisely what he is. All attempts at reforming or amending him would be as futile as trying to turn a tiger into a lamb.

Unfortunately for Sir Robert Anderson, the theory that the delinquent population is composed of human beasts of prey is a discredited assumption. All recent enquiries into its character and composition point to the conclusion that in the majority of cases the habitual criminal class is made up of men who have been born and bred amid miserable surroundings of all kinds. The lives they live are, as a rule, the inevitable product of adverse social circumstances and the lack of ordinary social and industrial opportunity. What can we expect a little social outcast to become when he reaches manhood? He has drawn his first breath in the atmosphere of the slums. He lives from his earliest years amid dissolute and degraded conditions. He is rarely trained into regular habits of industry. All his antecedents are calculated to unfit him for social life. Is it to be wondered at that his nature sinks to the low level of his surroundings, and that he insensibly takes to a career of crime? It is, of course, possible that some criminals are born, not made, but these, when not madmen, are infinitesimal in number, and in no instance would it be possible to prove that a man is doomed by his nature to lead a life of crime. In a country such as Great Britain the movement of crime is mainly dependent upon social and economic conditions; in proportion as these conditions are improved, in the same proportion does the volume of crime diminish. It is to a progressive amelioration of the conditions of life that we must look for a diminution of the criminal classes, and not to the scheme put forward by Sir Robert Anderson, of making punishments more formidable. This scheme was tried in the most drastic fashion in the penal laws of the eighteenth century. But it failed disastrously, and statesmen like Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Macintosh were compelled to mitigate the ferocities of the criminal code in order to make it effective. The twentieth century is not likely to fall back upon the discredited methods of the past.

Sir Robert Anderson is on safer ground when he points out that drink is a potent cause of crime. But it is to be remembered that the drinking habit in its turn is far too often produced by the miserable conditions in which large sections of our population have to live. In any case, Sir Robert Anderson's proposals with reference to the drink traffic are not likely to create a favourable impression as to his power of judgment. In his opinion English Free Trade is "an imposture and a sham," and we shall never be able to remedy the evils of the drink traffic till we adopt Tariff Reform. Tariff Reform alone, he says, can supplement the deficiency in the revenue arising out of a decrease in the sale of intoxicating drink. Temperance reformers must become Tariff Reformers if they want to see a reduction in the proportions of drink and crime. But he has little hopes of the temperance party, as he is convinced that most of them are fanatical adherents of our present fiscal system. The author of "Criminals and Crime" is severe on temperance reformers, but they get off lightly compared with penal reformers who do not happen to see eye to eye with him. He is fond of calling such people doctrinaires, humanity mongers, fools, cranks, faddists, and he compares the eminent people who support these so-called faddists to honest men who, in the sphere of company promoting, blindly lend their names to rogues. It is after outbursts of this kind that Sir Robert Anderson assures us that he is not hysterical. We must accept his word. But in spite of his experiences as a detective, his book contains little or nothing of practical importance. It belongs more to the Middle Ages than to the twentieth century.

A work of a different character from "Criminals and Crime," is Professor Gross's elaborate volume, entitled, in its English dress, "Criminal Investigation." Dr. Gross has been for many years a Professor of Criminology at the Universities of Prague and Vienna, and his work on the methods of criminal investigation has already been translated into almost every European language. The English translation has been done by two Madras barristers, and has been to some extent adapted to the conditions of Indian life. Dr. Gross has a wonderfully comprehensive and minute knowledge of the mental attitude and habits of the criminal classes. It is a volume which ought to be in the hands of all our judges, magistrates, police officers, and prison officials. In many cases our judges and magistrates have little knowledge of the criminal population, until they gain it from their experience on the bench. Dr. Gross would teach them much both in the way of protecting the innocent and detecting the guilty. "The Prisoner at the Bar," by Mr. Arthur Train, is an interesting and amusing account of Mr. Train's experiences of American prisoners in the New York Courts. Mr. Train is Assistant District Attorney of New York County, and in this capacity he has had ample opportunity of forming an estimate of the value of the American criminal courts. He confines himself to facts that have come under his personal observation, and his volume is an admirable and realistic account of the working of the American criminal courts. Mr. Train is alive to the defects of American criminal administration, but we gather from his book that the American system is not as bad as it is sometimes painted.

MESSRS. TRUMAN & KNIGHTLEY send us a useful "Guide to Schools, Tutors, and Educational Homes for Boys and Girls in Great Britain and on the Continent" (Truman & Knightley, 6, Hollis Street, Cavendish Square, 6d. net). The difficulty of choosing a school is very often a serious one, and there is no doubt that the particulars given in this volume will prove helpful to parents and guardians who are confronted by this perplexing problem.

* "Criminals and Crime." By Sir Robert Anderson. Nisbet & Co. 5s. net.

"Criminal Investigation." By H. Gross. The Specialist Press. 30s. net.

"The Prisoner at the Bar." By Arthur Train. Werner Laurie. 8s. 6d. net.

INGOLDSBY.*

THAT a new edition of Barham's masterpiece should be often in demand is the more notable that there are some obstacles to its universal vogue. If not formally on the Index it must be taboo to most Roman Catholics, whose saints and whose dignitaries are not seen here at their best. Now after seventy years the lines on the "Auto-da-fè" seem a cruel satire on an extinct habit of persecution, but in the reign of our George IV. a heretic in Spain was burnt for his faith. Nor can we wonder that, if the Papal Ministers had their way, they would treat Bruno's statue in the Campo dei Fiori as some of our Irish would like to treat Cromwell's by Westminster Hall. "Qui dove il Rogo arse," says the inscription on the former, and the descendants of the persecutors naturally feel more bitterly than the adherents of the victim. Nor is Ingoldsby much more pleasing to our high Anglicans, whose saving gift is not always humour, and who do not like to read that it is only from the paucity of saints in our world that—

"The late Mr. Froude and the live Dr. Pusey
We moderns consider as each worth a Jew's eye."

They, too, like their Roman friends, think it pity that St. Cuthbert and St. Nicholas should play their parts in burlesque, and that St. Gengulphus should claim parity with their historic sanctitude. The Middle Ages were less squeamish. The monks saw no rocks ahead when they allowed the hobby-horse to find a companion in a St. George with a goblet for his morion and a spit for his lance. Nor is it clear that they were wrong. Had the priest of Dionysus the less piety that he could laugh to see the beautiful Eastern god whom he served turned into the pot-bellied craven of Aristophanic extravaganza? Does the real irreverence lie with the laughing spirit which supplies Old Nick's bag with "a nice little cardinal's niece," or with one who was not precisely her uncle?

A more serious obstacle to the general reader lies in the frequent reference to current incidents from which much of the interest is departed. We may all follow the murder of the hour, but few of those who practise the homicidal art rise, like Thurtell or Burke, to the rank of classics. A future generation will be as little interested in Mr. Balfour's spats or Mr. Keir Hardie's cap as ours is with Lord Brougham's trousers—

"Some friends I've consulted, much given to watch one's Apparel, do say it's by far the best way,

And the safest, to do as Lord Brougham does, buy Scotch ones."
or with Sir Charles Wetherall's slovenly dress—

"The loose trousers, 'bows'd up together,' all Guiltless of braces, as those of Charles Wetherall," or with the square-cut coats which Sir Francis Burdett and George Byng, afterwards Father of the House of Commons, tried to bring into fashion. A generation which has forgotten how to pronounce Lord Brougham's name laughs but half-heartedly at his escapades, how he came to logger-heads with Lord Essex over some fishing rights, how he spread a report of his own death, how—

"The 'Times' made it clear he was perfectly lost in his Classic attempt at translating 'Demosthenes.'"

And yet it is a pity, for Barham gives a touch of salt to all such incidents, and a very little added knowledge would keep them sweet. The conjuror's den held a crocodile—

"With a tail such as that which, we all of us know, Mr. Waterton managed to tie in a bow:"

but we don't all of us know, and it may be that explanatory notes are out of place below the text of a mirthful versifier. If the lack of a note sends the reader to Waterton's delightful pages, he has his reward.

This lesser side of Ingoldsby may perhaps find its forerunners in such works as Moore's "Fudge Family in Paris," but Moore, of course, dealt wholly with the present, whereas many of Barham's allusions are set in stories of the past. His tales are said to be a naturalising of French contes, but we may doubt an affiliation where the form is not quite the same and the spirit is very different. There is no malice in Barham, but a strong sense of the ludicrous and a fine power of bringing it out. Note the difference between Mr. Barney Maguire and any Irishman of the same class who figures in Thackeray's pages. Barney is as live a man as any of Thackeray's, but no weapon is hurled against him except a little gibe at "his characteristic modesty," and none can grudge him the pitcher which wets his lips dry with his effusion of "swate poe-thry." Even the "puir Deevle" finds his defects urged against him without animosity. We almost sympathise with—

"Setebos storming because Mephistopheles
Gave him the lie, said he'd blacken his eye,
And dash'd in his face a whole cup of hot coffee-tees."

Such satire as Ingoldsby allows himself is rather like Horace's than like Juvenal's, flicking the lesser faults and leaving the worse vices to the scourge of others. He has his rebuke for the "Guests at Guildhall upon Lord Mayor's day,

All scrambling and scuffling for what was before 'em,
No care for precedence or common decorum."

and for the still existing type of discontented men, who express their dislike for "Such a basin and chop as I once heard a witty one.

Call at the Garrick 'a c—d Committee one,'
An expression, I own, I do not think a pretty one."

For one class Barham is always glad to express a reasonable contempt. In the eyes of Miss Henrietta Petowker the ways of my Lord Tomnoddy, his wrenching off knockers and his assaults on watchmen, were eminently aristocratic and laudable. When Barham lashed that brainless and selfish class, his was labour lost, for my Lord Tomnoddy does not read. When Pope wrote—

"A hundred smart in Timon and Balaam," he knew well that, though a hundred did not smart, yet the Duke of Chandos felt his withers wrung. My Lord Tomnoddy and Sir Carnaby Jenks of the Blues had not even an officious friend to tell them that they had been, in Lord Wharton's phrase, "damnably mauled."

The secret of Barham's success lay in the fact that he found the vehicle that exactly fitted his talents. His "Legends" may be classed under four heads, of which only one falls properly within the limits of his title. The stories which he gathered from or placed around the scenes of his childhood in East Kent have supplied a name to the whole volume. No one really knows any piece of country save that in which he was born and bred, and there are local touches in these stories hardly to be found in the tales taken from the Acts of the Saints. The theme of one of the earlier legends, not the most delicate or the most successful, is borrowed from Prior, but the setting is truly characteristic. "The Wedding Day" ends with a tragic incident, but Barham himself seems to have felt his incapacity to deal with such a theme. Here his weakness lies. The stories of the Saints are mere jest, and would have been better had the humorist been able to weep as well as to laugh. When he does attempt a contrast the expression of it is somewhat crude. Thus in "The Execution" we have the beauty of the morning, the feelings of "the wretch condemned to die," and the visitors, whose drunken sleep deprives them of the spectacle which had allured them to the spot. A poet would have found other expression here than found favour with Barham. This poem, if it can so be called, belongs to our third head, original tales and incidents. Its purpose is directly satiric. Others deal with that strong vein of superstition which is manifest in his biography. Strong as it was, it seems never to have eclipsed his gaiety. What broke his heart and shortened his life was the death of his son. Our fourth class of his works is the stories of plays. We do not know whether Lord Egerton had humour enough to laugh at the parody of his "Catherine of Cleves." At any rate, the faults of the plot lay with his French original, and Lord Egerton's handling of it did not lift it above the reach of the mockers. Shakespeare would surely have laughed at the version of his "Merchant of Venice," and, if he protested at all, would merely plead that Bassanio hardly deserved to be classed with my Lord Tomnoddy. But Barham was sometimes content with a cheap effect.

Messrs. Dent's edition of the "Legends" is a sumptuous volume, with Mr. Arthur Rackham's illustrations, many of them in colours. Most of them have appeared before, but their form is here improved. They are not of uniform merit. The illustrator is especially successful with witches, boys, and young women.

* "The Ingoldsby Legends of Mirth and Marvels." By Thomas Ingoldsby, Esquire. Illustrated by Arthur Rackham. Dent. 15s. net.

SOCIAL PROBLEMS SERIES.

THIS new Series aims at treating current questions of social interest not only in a lucid and popular manner, but also in the light of present-day principles, present-day facts, and, above all, present-day needs.

JUST PUBLISHED.

SOCIALISM

By J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, M.P.

1s. NET PER VOL.

Other Volumes already Issued.

THE CHILDREN. By PROFESSOR ALEX. DARROCH, M.A., Edinburgh University.

TRADE UNIONISM. By R. BELL, M.P., Secretary Amalgamated Railway Servants' Association, London.

HOUSING of the WORKING CLASSES.

By REV. M. KAUFMANN, M.A., author of "Socialism and Modern Thought."

LAND VALUES AND TAXATION.

By EDWIN ADAM, M.A., LL.B.

THE CITIZEN AND HIS DUTIES.

By W. F. TROTTER, M.A., LL.B., Lecturer on Law in the University of Cambridge.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE. By A. H. MATHEW.

Others in Preparation.

A GREAT NEW ART SERIES.

MASTERPIECES IN COLOUR

The First Series at a Popular Price to reproduce the Treasures of Art in

THEIR FULL COLOURS

Each volume is written by a competent authority, who deals in a popular style with the artist's life and work. General Editor: Mr. T. Leman Harz.

The following volumes are issued (or on the eve of publication):—

VELAZQUEZ.

S. L. BENSUSAN.

REYNOLDS.

S. L. BENSUSAN.

ROMNEY.

C. LEWIS HIND.

TURNER.

C. LEWIS HIND.

GREUZE.

MRS. MACKLIN.

BOTTICELLI.

H. BRYAN BINNS.

ROSSETTI.

LUCIEN PISSARO.

BELLINI.

GEORGE HAY.

FRA ANGELICO.

JAMES MASON.

REMBRANDT.

JOSEF ISRAELS.

Volumes in active preparation include, amongst others, Leighton, Watts, Carlo Dolci, Titian, Tintoretto, Luini, Raphael, and Holman Hunt.

This series marks quite a new departure. The half-tone block so familiar in books dealing with artists here gives place for the first time to reproductions in full colours. Many great pictures familiar as black-and-white reproductions are absolutely unknown in the "divine gift of colour," and in this series many a delightful surprise is in store for the art lover.

The day cannot be far off when nobody will think of reproducing a painter's work without strict attention to its colour, and in coming forward with the present experiment the publishers claim to have opened up a new field, for low-priced books have not had colour pictures, and the books that have had colour pictures have not been low-priced.—EXTRACT FROM PROSPECTUS.

Each volume (size 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ by 5 $\frac{1}{4}$) contains the Monograph and eight Pictures printed by a new colour process, which gives results of marvellous fidelity.

The price of each volume is

1s. 6d. net.

Order single volumes or the Series from your Bookseller.

London: T. C. & E. C. JACK,
16, HENRIETTA STREET, W.C.; and EDINBURGH.

ELLIOT STOCK'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW NOVELS.

NEW NOVEL FOUNDED ON ITALIAN LIFE IN THE MIDDLE OF THE LAST CENTURY.

In crown 8vo, bound in cloth, price 6s.

CAPTAIN VIVANTI'S PURSUIT. By G. S. GODKIN, Author of "The Life of Victor Emmanuel," "The Monastery of San Marco," "Stories from Italy," &c.

"A pleasant story. The local colour and suggestion of the period are very well done."—Daily Mail.

"A cleverly conceived story. It is most refreshing to find an author who has an evident purpose in his work, and also the ability to put it in a good setting."—Court Journal.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

JAEL, AN AUSTRALIAN STORY. By E. L. SUTHERLAND.

"Jael ought to sell well as a book for the young person. It is irreproachable in tone, and miles removed from the trashiness which is too often thought good enough for the young sister or niece."—P.T.O. Weekly.

In crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

THE NEW VICAR OF WAKEFIELD. An Australian Story, By S. G. FIELDING, Author of "The Southern Light," "Down to the Sea in Ships," &c.

"It abounds in incident. Good humour ripples through it, and the reader will find plenty to laugh over."—Sydney Daily Telegraph.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 2s. 6d. net.

THE MASTER KEY. A Story of Inspiration. By GEORGE ROYDS.

NEW VOLUMES OF VERSE.

In crown 4to, stiff boards, price 3s. 6d. net.

THE DAYS OF THE FLOOD. An Epic in Three Cantos. By ARTHUR ERNEST CALEB. Author of "Indian Love," "Essays and Poems," "A Christmas Reverie," "A Study of the English Literature."

"A poem in three short cantos, and written in neatly turned blank verse."—The Times.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 4s. 6d.

LIFE'S GAME. Sonnets and Poems. By A. W. ADAMS.

"The sonnets are gracefully and harmoniously written. They make a book which should be read with interest by any sympathetic lover of poetry."—Scotsman.

"Sonnets marked by a reflective and sensitive fancy, which has considerable charm."—Times Literary Supplement.

In foolscap 4to, bound in cloth, price 5s.

EYES IN SOLITUDE. By REV. W. MOORE, Author of "Nocturnes and Other Poems," "Lost Chords," &c.

"The verse has admirable qualities."—Manchester Guardian.

"The volume is altogether a fine one."—Glasgow Herald.

In crown 8vo, bound in limp parchment, price 2s.

THE KNIGHT MYSTIC AND OTHER VERSES. By EDWARD J. THOMPSON.

"A varied collection of verse, by an author of some skill in turning his lines."—Evening Standard.

Elliot Stock, 62, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

The Duma and the Revolution.

THE BEST BOOK ON RUSSIA

issued in recent years is unquestionably

PRINCE KROPOTKIN'S

Autobiography—with a new Introductory Chapter by the Author, and a Preface by George Brandes—

MEMOIRS OF A REVOLUTIONIST

"In this volume," says Dr. Brandes, "will be found a combination of all the elements out of which an eventful life is composed—

Idyll and Tragedy, Drama and Romance.

Parts of his narrative, from the very nature of the events he has to tell, are more intensely exciting than anything in those novels which aim only at being sensational."

"This delightful book," says the Athenæum, "will never be out of date."

New, Cheaper, and Enlarged Edition,
Crown 8vo, 6/-

LONDON: SWAN SONNENSCHN.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

As a study of French character and temperament Professor Barrett Wendell's "The France of To-day" (Constable, 6s. net) is not equal to Philip Gilbert Hamerton's "French and English," while the pictures it gives of French social and family life have none of the intimate knowledge possessed either by that writer or by Miss Betham Edwards. To expect this is perhaps to judge the book by too high a standard, since Professor Wendell describes it as an effort to set forth the impressions of France made on him by a year's experience as lecturer at French universities. It is interesting to see the effect made by such a visit on a cultivated American, who looks at things from a decidedly academic point of view, but who is anxious to set in their true light those qualities of French life likely to be ignored or misunderstood by his fellow countrymen. Professor Wendell is naturally interested first of all in scholastic life, and he observes with surprise the serious interest which French students take in their work. "They are alertly intelligent, serious to a degree which shames you into consciousness of comparative frivolity, intellectually energetic beyond reproach." Those who have observed French students at closer quarters, and upon more equal terms than is possible for a professor, will hold that, although they take their work more seriously, they have quite as full a share of animal spirits as their English or American fellows. Of the teaching at the French universities Professor Wendell speaks highly. It would be, he thinks, a useful corrective to the methods now in vogue in America where the influence of German scholarship has tended "to encourage the notion that the object of all learning is the methodical collection of fact." The other questions discussed in the book are all treated with intelligence and candour, while some of the comparisons between French and Anglo-Saxon standards show real insight into the characters of both peoples.

* * *

THE authoress of "Two Dianas in Somaliland" (Lane, 12s. 6d.) went to Somaliland in order to shoot big game; her cousin (also a woman) went with her. They suffered from the usual discomforts and shot the usual number of unfortunate beasts. They brought home the skins of the beasts, and no doubt they now look horrible in some hall. One of their company of beaters was killed by a rhinoceros; another died in camp. So much for their achievement. Its record is the usual dreary catalogue of slaughter. The book might conceivably have been made interesting. The ladies saw something of the Somalis, and even attended a Somali dance, which the authoress describes as "unvarnished vulgarity." But even if the authoress had an eye for interesting things, she has not written of them in an interesting way. The book is illustrated with photographs—some of them rather good, others indifferent. The photograph never gives enough of the essential detail. As the detective says, "A bad description is better than a good photograph." But the detective had not read "Two Dianas."

* * *

At the moment when Socialism is being attacked and defended on every side, a new and cheaper edition of Mr. Thomas Kirkup's "An Inquiry into Socialism" (Longmans, 4s. 6d. net) is most timely. Those who are anxious to learn what Socialism really is, and what it really is not, cannot do better than turn to Mr. Kirkup's calm and luminous statement. First published in 1887, the work went into a second edition in 1888, and has been out of print since 1890. For the present edition the author has carefully revised the book "in the light of the fresh knowledge and experience which we have gained since 1888." Mr. Kirkup's aim is "to bring out what is fundamental in Socialism, both as contrasted with the present social system, and with theories for which it is usually mistaken. It is an attempt to discover what is enduring and beneficent in the Socialist movement by a study of the forces, principles, and tendencies which are at work in the present stage of historic evolution." This is done in nine chapters. The first deals with the rise and progress of Socialism; the second tells the story of the present competitive system; in the third capitalism is examined; in the fourth the question "What is Socialism?" is answered; the fifth treats of current views on Socialism; in the sixth the moral aspects of Socialism are discussed; in the seventh difficulties and objections to Socialism are dealt with; the eighth is devoted to the prospects of Socialism; and in the last chapter the problem is summed up. The same high qualities that marked Mr. Kirkup's "History of Socialism," to which this is a companion volume—knowledge, judgment, and style—are present here. It is the best examination of Socialism we know.

* * *

THERE is a delicious cry of the wild about Mrs. Thompson Seton's book, "Nimrod's Wife" (Constable, 6s.). This in spite of the fact that, in her earlier chapters at all events, Mrs. Seton does not show herself to be at all an ideal camper. The luggage taken by her party, for which she acknowledges herself largely responsible, must have been enormous. Unlike Nimrod, Mrs. Nimrod shoots, and for shooting a deer out of season the party is brought back to stand trial. The reader fumes at being torn from the woodland just as he was beginning to enjoy it. But a good time comes again another year, much more satisfactory wilds being found. Mrs. Nimrod still shoots, her vanity compelling her to destroy the noble moose of all creatures! But in the end she is cured, and the trip through Norwegian reindeer country is the most beautiful of all. It is a delightfully human book, the terrors and experiences of a mere woman, sometimes alone in the threatening forest, being quietly and very convincingly sketched. The pictures by Walter King Stone and Ernest Thompson Seton make the charming volume complete.

* * *

IN "The Andes and the Amazon" (Fisher Unwin, 21s.), Mr. C. Reginald Enock has written a very full and readable account of life and travel in Peru. Its chief fault is that it is too prolix and attempts to cover too much ground. Had the author left out the chapters upon Peruvian history and upon the Inca remains and Inca civilisation, he would have omitted nothing which is not easily accessible in other forms, and his book would not be so unwieldy as it is. Mr. Enock is an engineer, and what he has to say about the great undeveloped resources of Peru is extremely valuable. Hitherto the main obstacles to the development of a country which is something like thirteen times as large as England and Wales have been political unrest, militarism, and clericalism. Peru, Mr. Enock says, like all other communities of Spanish America, "has endured its baptism of sword and priestcraft." These are now giving way to the principles of fair government, and there is every prospect of a bright future for the republic. The story of Mr. Enock's adventures while prospecting or gathering mineral samples makes most interesting reading. Travel in Peru is not easy. There is great difficulty in obtaining supplies, the roads are often execrable, and the country is infested by thieves, so that the traveller's horses or mules have to be carefully guarded. Mr. Enock has a high opinion of the gaiety and hospitality of the Peruvians, and an account of a carnival battle where the missiles were india-rubber toy balloons filled with water is one of the most entertaining chapters in his book. There have recently appeared a number of books dealing with some of the South American republics, but we have not seen any upon Peru, and Mr. Enock is to be congratulated upon this useful volume.

THE INQUIRER

ONE PENNY WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF LIBERAL RELIGION

Special Articles of Interest to Liberal Thinkers and Workers.
Reviews of Important Books and Magazines.

News of Churches and Societies.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS:

6/6 per year, to all parts of the World.

SPECIMEN COPY FREE ON APPLICATION.

Published every Friday at

3, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

Pp. 776. Portrait and Memoir. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. post free.

COMPENDIUM OF SWEDENBORG'S THEOLOGICAL WRITINGS.

. Because Swedenborg has written so much, many who are strangers to his works are deterred from making their acquaintance from not knowing what to select and where to begin. This work contains the most important passages, arranged under heads, so as to present a complete and authoritative exposition of what he taught.

London: SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury Street.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME I. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. By Post, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2.
COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C.,
and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

A. & C. BLACK'S

FOURTH AUTUMN LIST.

LETTERS OF DR. JOHN BROWN— WITH LETTERS FROM RUSKIN, THACKERAY AND OTHERS.

Edited by his son and D. W. FORREST, D.D. With Biographical Introductions by ELIZABETH T. M'LAREN.
Demy 8vo., cloth. Price 10s. 6d. net.

A BACHELOR GIRL IN BURMA.

By G. E. MITTON, Author of "A Bachelor Girl in London,"
"The Children's Book of London," etc. Containing 95 full-page Illustrations from the Author's photographs, and a sketch map. Large crown 8vo., cloth. Price 6s. net.

SUGGESTION IN EDUCATION.

By M. W. KEATINGE, M.A., Reader in Education in the University of Oxford. Author of "The Great Didactic of John Amos Comenius." Crown 8vo., cloth. Price 4s. 6d. net.

NORMAN ARCHITECTURE.

Illustrated and described by EDITH A. BROWNE.
Author of "Gothic Architecture" in the same series. Containing 48 full-page illustrations from photographs and an illustrated glossary of architectural terms. Square demy 8vo., cloth. Price 3s. 6d. net.

A. & C. BLACK, Soho Square, LONDON, W.

Hon. JOHN COLLIER on "The Home Life of Huxley."
MR. R. BLATCHFORD on "How I Became an Agnostic."

SEE THE Also contains contributions by MR. EDEN
R.P.A. PHILLIPOTS, MR. A. W. BENN, MR. J. M.
ROBERTSON, M.P., MR. LEONARD HUXLEY
ANNUAL. ETC., ETC.,

So large pages, 6d. net, by post 8d.

Watts & Co., Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, London,

ILLUSTRATIONS OF POSITIVISM.

By Dr. J. H. BRIDGES. 254 pp., medium 8vo., in paper covers 1s. net, or in cloth 1s. 6d. net. (Postage 3d. in each case)

WATTS & Co., Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, London.

JUST READY.—An Important Book that comes at an opportune moment.

THE INDUSTRIAL CONFLICT.

By SAMUEL G. SMITH, of the Department of Sociology in the University of Minnesota.

Price 3s. 6d. net.

Postage 4d.

"Students of social problems who are on the look-out for a concise statement of the pros and cons of some of the present-day economic questions will find this volume exceedingly useful."
—Church Family Newspaper.

The Fleming H. Revell Company,
21, Paternoster Square, E.C., and Edinburgh.

Rowntree's
ELECT Cocoa

best for families

The Week in the City.

A FRESH COLLAPSE.

OUTSIDE the United States, the chief financial items of the week have been news of a fresh collapse on the Egyptian Stock Exchange and of a sudden commercial crisis in Portugal. It seems that since the beginning of the month there have been a series of runs on Portuguese banks, which, apparently, have only been rescued from bankruptcy by artificial aid from the Bank of Portugal. If these telegraphic reports are not exaggerated, it is surprising that Portuguese bonds have not fallen more. A number of commercial houses have been broken for want of credit, and the Portuguese currency has depreciated with alarming rapidity. Portugal might be a happy and prosperous little country if it were not, like Spain, the sport of tariff-mongers and "protected" interests. I believe that the big landlords of Portugal are an even greater curse than ours were in the days of the Corn Laws. But Portugal plays a comparatively small part in international trade and finance, and her embarrassments only add a drop to the bucket of depression. London, on the whole, has weathered the week well. The 7 per cent. rate has brought very large amounts of gold, and, in spite of heavy withdrawals for the States, Thursday's Bank return was much stronger than that of the previous week. But, unless something unexpectedly favourable occurs in the States, I doubt if a 7 per cent. rate will see us through the crisis.

THE OUTLOOK FOR TRADE.

It is a great proof of the soundness of our commercial fabric that, so far, home trade shows scarcely any symptoms of decline. In the United States it is far otherwise. There has been no such a disastrous collapse of credit for many years. Last week the New York optimists told us that the premium on gold would rapidly disappear in face of the large imports, and for a day or two the tendency seemed favourable. But this week the premium has risen to 3, 4, or 5 per cent., and there appears to be a universal shortage of currency. Last week Mr. Pierpont Morgan was hailed as the saviour of his country, and every telegram was full of his patriotic exertions. But when it appeared that the first use he had made of his position was to bag an independent concern for the sake of strengthening a Morgan trust, this view had to be modified, and the most subservient journalists dropped the magnificat. It was not only an ugly performance, but a very unfortunate one. It left a nasty taste in the mouth of the public, and has undoubtedly checked the revival of confidence. A fortnight ago, Mr. Carnegie declared in an interview that genuine industry would hardly be affected by what he regarded as a mere Wall Street crisis. But it is clear that he entirely misjudged the situation. On Wednesday, for example, it was stated, in a telegram from New York, that "twenty thousand employés of the Steel Trust have had to be discharged owing to lack of orders." But the stagnation in steel and iron was not confined to New York or to the Steel Trust; for "in the Chicago factories," is added, "25,000 workmen are idle." Hard times are predicted this winter for the American working classes in all the great industrial centres of the United States, and it is to be feared that farmers and agricultural labourers will also feel the pinch. The collapse of credit and scarcity of currency have made it very difficult to move the crops both in the States and in Canada.

THE AMERICAN PRESS.

I have been reading the American papers very carefully, and must say that they make a very unfavourable impression. At the beginning of the crisis they wobbled between sensation-mongering and rose-coloured optimism. Since cash payments were suspended they have been unitedly optimistic, in a way that irresistibly suggests manipulation by the magnates. This, indeed, was broadly conveyed by the correspondent of the "Daily Telegraph," in his telegram of Wednesday. Of course, they do not do the slightest good. The facts which they can only half suppress make their assurances that all is well rather alarming than otherwise. What is the use of dilating upon the strength of Chicago when, for the first time in Chicago's history, Clearing House certificates have been issued? What is the use of a message from Pittsburg that "Pittsburg likes cheques" which can't be cashed, when the panic is so great that the Stock Exchange has to be kept closed? Perhaps readers of THE NATION may like to read a (favourable) specimen of this minimising kind of journalism from the "New York Times" of Monday, November 4th:—

"It would be too much to expect that so intense a strain upon money markets could be undergone without disagreeable reflection in the business world. When corporations find it most difficult to secure ready money with which to meet pay-rolls, it is obvious that it is hardly the time for expansion, which implies new demands upon money. On the contrary, contraction is very plainly indicated. Even before the money situation itself became acute, the high levels attained by wages, by materials, and by food-stuffs, had convinced impartial observers that retrenchment was inevitable. Such retrenchment can only be brought about by contraction, which is really liquidation, and this seems now to be well under way. It was first witnessed in the securities market, and the rest of the country, as usual, smiled over what is called 'the troubles of Wall Street.' It appeared next in the copper trade, where the price of the metal fell from 26 cents to 12 cents in something over six months, and once again the significance of the event was concealed by the general comment that the development represented only the aftermath of speculation in copper, both the metal and the stock. These forerunners of coming events were added to last week by the rather striking reduction in the price of meats, as announced by one of the prominent packing houses, which hazarded the further opinion that all food-stuffs were about to come down, and by the announcements of several railroads, including the Pennsylvania, rightly looked upon as the greatest of this country's railroad properties, that any idea of new work had been abandoned, and that necessary parts of old programmes would be likewise put over for a more favourable moment. This conservative attitude on the part of railroads is now becoming general, and the result will be, of course, a liquidation in labour and, therefore, in the recent prohibitive wage scale. Those who attempt to read into this situation as it develops from day to day, anything alarming, will be the victims of their own faulty reasoning. It simply reflects a retrenchment temporary in duration, and absolutely necessary before the onward march of American industrialism is resumed. Striking proof of this fact is afforded by the sharp movements towards recovery in the copper trade, under the stimulus of price reductions."

Yet if the reader of the "New York Times" turns from "the onward march of American industrialism," to another page of the paper, he will find the Hon. Charles N. Fowler, Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, speaking of "the most frightful conflagration of credit that has ever visited the commercial world!" But the "New York Times" would have people believe that only faulty reasoning can read anything alarming into the situation.

LUCELLUM.

"If," wrote a critic of the Academy Exhibition of 1796, "the portrait painters of the present day be brought before the tribunal of fair criticism, and tried by the evidence before it—viz., their works exhibited in the collection at Somerset House—the pre-eminence cannot be denied to Beechey; Lawrence follows him, and then, magno intervallo, Hoppner and Hamilton"; and, further, that "nothing but the grossest partiality can dispute this fact." Posterity has relegated Beechey to a place behind that of Lawrence, and even of Hoppner; but this opinion is testimony to the favour he enjoyed in his own time, and helps to establish his right to be memorialised as one of the leaders, at least, of the lesser artists who were contemporary with Reynolds and Gainsborough. Here we have the first complete biographical account of Beechey. Mr. W. Roberts disclaims any critical purpose, and confines himself to the facts of the painter's life, work, and surroundings; and no better writer could have been found for the task, for no more patient investigator of the lore relating to pictures and their subjects is living among us. His chronicle of the works executed during the sixty-two years of Beechey's exhibiting career is thoroughly exhaustive and invaluable for purposes of reference. He gives an adequate sketch of the man, gleaned from contemporary records, from which one gathers the impression of a frank, amiable personality with a taste for conviviality and hard swearing, and a great good nature towards his younger fellow-artists. The "Beechey Account Books," detailed in Chapter VIII., are an instructive sidelight on the commercial side of the practice of a successful portrait painter of that day. A good index and copious illustrations enhance the value of this book, which is written with an absence of affectation or exaggeration that many more ornate writers would do well to imitate.

* "Sir William Beechey, R.A." By W. Roberts. London: Duckworth & Co. 7s. 6d. net.

MAPLE & CO

ARE SPECIALISTS
FOR COMFORTABLE

CLUB & LOUNGE CHAIRS & SETTEES

Inspection invited, or Illustrated
Catalogue of Chairs sent free

LARGEST STOCK IN THE WORLD

LONDON PARIS BUENOS AIRES

The pipe that clears today of past regrets and future fears

Omar Khayyam (modernised).

is a pipe filled with

Player's Navy Mixture

A Tobacco of Matchless Charm.

Sold in Two Strengths:

MILD, 5d.
per oz.

MEDIUM, 4½d.
per oz.

John Player & Sons,
Nottingham, will forward Testing Samples
post free to applicants
mentioning this paper.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE

THE most interesting of the London penny evening newspapers, and the only one representing Liberal thought. Publishing five editions daily from noon, it presents the news of the day fully with promptness and accuracy, and generally contains a

CARTOON BY "F.C.G."

On Saturdays the daily paper is always a special enlarged number, and a weekly edition is published, Price One Penny, under the title of the

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

Offices: TUDOR STREET, WHITEFRIARS, E.C.

Suction Gas Power.

80% REDUCTION
OF YOUR GAS ENGINE
GAS BILL.

TANGYES Ltd., Birmingham.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.
In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

BORD'S PIANOS

Illustrated
Lists of the
"BORD"

Pianos will be sent free, showing prices and rates of hire of the various Models, on the THREE YEARS' SYSTEM, from 15s. per month. Second-hand, from 10s. 6d. per month.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

The "BECHSTEIN" Pianos may also be had on the same system, at advantageous prices and terms.

LIBERAL DISCOUNT FOR CASH.

CHAS. STILES & CO.,

74 and 76, Southampton Row, London, W.C.

PIANOS EXCHANGED.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout,
Bathrooms on every Floor,
Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard
and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors, Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplage. "The English Home."ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.*THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of
Other Bibles and Prayer
Books from

B
I
B
L
E
S

Illustrated,
Wide Margin,
Interleaved,
Teachers',
Interlinear,
Revised,
and other Editions.

6d. to £10.53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.*Telephone Central 329*A. LIONEL ISAACS, 5, Pall Mall, S.W.
(CARLTON HOTEL BUILDING).

Choice Books.
Rare Autographs and MSS.
Pictures and Prints.

CATALOGUES ISSUED.

TELEPHONE: 1784 CENTRAL.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold
and Exchanged.THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

[And at READING.]

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK
answered.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club
Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinton Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc.
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.THE QUEEN, Bath Road.

Miss Tye.

Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL, Close Pier; 1st Class; ModerateSILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.*BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.BRIGHTON.*THE HOTEL METROPOLE.

E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL.

H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.ST. ANN'S HOTEL.

First Hotel.

CHINGFORD, ESSEX.ROYAL FOREST HOTEL.

Mr. John Brill.

DARTMOOR-YELVERTON.THE TORS HOTEL.

Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.DEAL.*BEACH HOUSE HOTEL.

S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.EXETER.*DELLERS CAFE.

Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM-ESSEX.THE WHITE HART HOTEL.

Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.ILFRACOMBE.*COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.LEEDS.*HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.LLANELLY.*CLEVELAND HOTEL.

J. T. Weaver.

MALDON.TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill.

C. Simons, Manager.

MALVERN.HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.MANCHESTER.*THE PRINCES CAFE.

Oxford Street.

THE DEANS GATE HOTEL.

Deansgate.

MATLOCK.SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).OXFORD (near).*SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. LecturePENTRE.*PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.PLYMOUTH.*GOODBODY'S CAFES.

And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street.

Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.SPEEDWELL HOTEL.

A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHSEA.STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.SWANAGE."CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.TEIGNMOUTH.*REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.WHITBY.*WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL.

Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.
Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).
Under the Management of the Society of Friends.
Boys from this PUBLIC SCHOOL have done well at the Universities. The School stands in its own grounds of about 45 acres, high above the town and the Thames Valley.
For Honours List, Prospectus, particulars of Scholarships, and other information, apply to the Headmaster, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School.

HASLEMERE, SURREY.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD SCHOOL for GIRLS. Sandy soil; nine acres of ground; nearly 600 ft. above sea level.
Principals: Miss AMY KEMP, Camb. Certif. for Theory and Practice of Teaching (St. George's Training College, Edinburgh); Diploma for the Teaching of German (Berlin); and Miss HELEN T. NEILD, M.A. (Vict.), Classical Tripos (Camb.). Certificated Student of Girton College; 11 years at the Mount School, York.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,
R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.
BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.
Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.
LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.
Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.
ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS:—Entries close December 3rd,
Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.
Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.
YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.
Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.
(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.
A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.
The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.
For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.
Head Master: Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH.
The next ENTRANCE EXAMINATION will be held at the SCHOOL on DECEMBER 3RD & 4TH.
For particulars of admission on the FOUNDATION apply to the HEADMASTER.

BEFORE SELECTING A SCHOOL OR TUTOR
PARENTS SHOULD OBTAIN A COPY OF
"A Practical Guide to Schools, Tutors, and Educational Homes,"
PUBLISHED BY TRUMAN & KNIGHTLEY,
Containing full particulars (including number of pupils, fees, etc.) of over 1,000 establishments in Great Britain and on the Continent. Price 6d. To be obtained post free from the publishers. Address:—6, Holles Street, Cavendish Square, London, W.

TYPEWRITING.

TYPEWRITING.—Typewriting of every description. High-class work, reasonable charges, prompt, accurate.
E. G. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

A READABLE WEEKLY.

"Public Opinion" was very much prized by Thomas Carlyle, and was one of the last journals he read, said Dr. W. R. Nicoll, in "The British Weekly."

PUBLIC OPINION

TWOPENCE, WEEKLY.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

"Public Opinion" is eminently a readable paper. There is no padding in it. It is a paper which exists to put on record the ideas which men are thinking, and especially the ideas which make for Religious, Intellectual, Political, and Social Progress as these are recorded in the world's books, papers, and magazines.

It is a paper specially suited for those who exert public influence—for "Public Opinion" does not reflect one side of life only—it seeks to cover all sides of thought and opinion.

It is the bare truth to say that there is no other paper published in Great Britain which every week contains such stimulus to thought, or such a vast amount of real information presented lucidly and in a readable type.

"Public Opinion" is published every Friday, and its price is Twopence. It has been in existence 47 years.

"Public Opinion" can be obtained from any newsagent or bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d., and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to:—

"PUBLIC OPINION,"
30 & 31, Temple House, Tallis Street, London, E.C.

Specimens sent free on application.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:
HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.
Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."
Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.
Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.
THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—
Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.
Paris—Neale's Library, Rue de Rivoli.
Nice—Galignani's Library.
Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.
Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.
Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Carl Johans Gade, 41 and 43.
Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.
Capetown—Messrs. Gordon and Gotch; Messrs. J. C. Juta and Co.
Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.					Narrow Column.
	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.	1/8 PAGE.	1/8 PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ...	£10 0 0	£5 10 0	£3 0 0	£3 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 10 0	2 10 0	3 0 0
Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:
13 Insertions	8d. per line.
52 "	6d. "

First Number Ready on Monday.

THE NEW QUARTERLY

A Review of Science and Literature.
Edited by DESMOND MACCARTHY.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS.

LORD RAYLEIGH (President of the Royal Society).
How do we Perceive the Direction of Sound?

The Note Books of SAMUEL BUTLER (the author of "Erewhon").

MAX BEERBOHM. On Fires.

HON. R. J. STRUTT, F.R.S. Can we Detect our Drift through Space?

HON. BERTRAND RUSSELL. The Study of Mathematics.

STURGE MOORE. Baudelaire.

G. L. STRACHEY. The Last Elizabethan.

G. A. PALEY. Biology and Politics.

ARTHUR SYMONS. A Triptych of Poets.

Half-a-Crown Net. Yearly Subscription, 10s. post free.

J. M. DENT & CO., 29 & 30, Bedford-st., LONDON, W.C.

J. M. DENT & CO.

Messrs. J. M. DENT & Co. will be pleased to send a complete List of their Autumn Publications, post free, on application to 10, Aldine House, Bedford Street, London, W.C.

THE OLD VENETIAN PALACES

By Thomas Okey.

Author of "Venice and Its Story." With 50 Illustrations in Colour, and many in line by TREVOR HADDON, R.B.A., and several Reproductions from Ruskin Works. Cloth, 4to, 21s. net. [Prospectus post-free.]

From the First Review:—"A remarkably fine book."

OLD AND NEW JAPAN.

By Clive Holland.

Author of "Things Seen in Japan," &c. A series of word pictures depicting the inner life and spirit of the Japanese. With 50 Illustrations. Colour by MONTAGUE SMYTH. Cloth, 15s. net. [Prospectus post-free.]

"Written with a most attractive charm and sympathy. Like the 'Ingoldsby Legends,' this book is a sumptuous piece of publishing."—Morning Leader.

JAMES FRANCIS EDWARD

THE OLD CHEVALIER.

By Martin Haile.

Author of "Mary of Modena, Queen of James II.," to which this volume forms a sequel. Illustrated in Photogravure, cloth, 16s. net. [Just ready. Prospectus free.]

By permission of H.M. the King, Mr. Haile has had access to the large collection of Stuart MSS. at Windsor Castle.

"Mr. Haile is a writer with the true historical instinct, and his book is worthy of the closest attention."—Daily News.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

By Henry Bryan Binns.

Author of "A Life of Walt Whitman." With many Portraits and other Illustrations, crown 8vo, cloth, 4d. 6d. net. (A new volume in the Temple Biographies.)

[Prospectus post-free.]

SIR GEORGE GREY.

By Prof. G. C. Henderson, M.A.

With numerous Portraits, Maps, and Illustrations. Cloth, 12s. 6d. net. [Prospectus post-free.]

"A valuable contribution to the history of the British Empire."—Athenaeum.

"A remarkable book about a remarkable man."—Daily News.

J. NISBET & CO.'s LIST.

By Sir ROBERT ANDERSON, K.C.B.

CRIMINALS AND CRIME

Some Facts and Suggestions. Demy 8vo, 5/- net.

The Daily Mail says: "A remarkable book. . . . Sir Robert Anderson's book and the reforms he advocates deserve careful scrutiny."

The Glasgow Herald says: "The book is a masterly production and a worthy contribution to one of the many social problems of to-day."

FRANK T. BULLEN'S NEW SEA-STORY.

THE CALL OF THE DEEP.

With Coloured Illustrations. 6/-

The Daily Telegraph writes: "An admirable sea story, worthy to rank after Captain Marryat's yarns. . . . Boys will like the book, and so will men and women."

By Mrs. L. T. MEADE.

THE RED CAP OF LIBERTY

A Romance of the French Revolution. 6/-

The Morning Leader says: "The book is as exciting and interesting as anything she has written."

The Dundee Advertiser says: "The story is splendidly written, and grips the attention of the reader right from the beginning."

By F. COWLEY WHITEHOUSE.

THE SNIPER. AN ABSORBING SCHOOL-STORY.

Fully Illustrated. 3/6.

The Daily News says: "One of the best school stories we have seen this season. There is nothing that does not exalt in this restrained but moving story. It belongs to the very best type of schoolboy literature."

By the Author of "Caprice," &c.

FANCIES IN PROSE.

By CONSTANCE EVAN JONES.

Large Crown 8vo, 2/6 net. A Volume of Vivid and Interesting Sketches.

WORKS BY J. A. HOBSON.

In cloth, 2/6 each net.

THE SOCIAL PROBLEM.

Life and Work.

The Daily News says: "A book which deserves to become a conspicuous landmark in the history of social thought."

JOHN RUSKIN. Social Reformer.

By BOLTON KING, M.A.

A HISTORY OF ITALIAN UNITY

(1814-1871). In two vols. With Maps and Plans. Demy 8vo, 24/- net.

By BOLTON KING and THOMAS OKEY.

ITALY TO-DAY. A Study of Her

Position, Her Politics, and Her Society. With Maps. Demy 8vo, 12/- net.

WORKS BY HILAIRE BELLOC.

ROBESPIERRE: A Study and Biography.

Demy 8vo, 5/- net.

DANTON: A Study, with Photogravure

Portrait. Demy 8vo, 5/- net.

By the Right Hon. SIR EDWARD FRY.

STUDIES BY THE WAY.

Demy 8vo, 5/- net.

J. NISBET & CO., Ltd., 22, Barners Street, W., LONDON.

The Nation

VOL. II., No. 8.]

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1907.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 1d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE	PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK ... 257	LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—	“Who are Members of the
The Nullity of Mr. Balfour ... 260	Church of Ripon?” By
The Chaos of a Great State ... 261	the Dean of Ripon ... 274
The New Phase of the Land	“The Censorship of Plays.”
War ... 262	By Violet Hunt ... 274
The Control of Foreign Affairs 263	The Ruin of Macedonia. By
LIFE AND LETTERS:—	Charles Roden Buxton ... 274
The Mother. By John Gals-	The Flight of the Assistant worthy ... 265	Master. By Alfred Fellows
Man and his Microbes ... 266	A Sunday Post for London.
The English Race ... 267	By Charles E. Noverre and
A Man of the People ... 268	Philip J. Dear ... 276
The Character of the Saint ... 269	“Coke of Norfolk.” By J. F.
FRANCIS THOMPSON ... 270	Coiler ... 276
POETRY:—	A Correction. By T. Rice
A Maiden and Her Hair. By	Holmes ... 276
William H. Davies ... 272	Retrenchment and Social
THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 273	Reform. By “Salus Populi” 276
Books to be Read ... 273	REVIEWS:—
	Sir Henry Wotton ... 277
	A Pump-room Hero ... 277
	A Laird's Memories ... 280
	Private Property in War ... 280
	A New England Type ... 282
	THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 284

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

No alarm need be felt as to the Prime Minister's health, or as to his ability to bear the extraordinarily heavy burdens of policy and administration which are laid upon him. He is advised to take a period of rest in the South of France, and his choice, we believe, has rested on Biarritz, which possesses one of the finest winter climates in the world. Bismarck, the third Napoleon, Gladstone, and Mr. Morley, have all resorted to it.

* * *

THE settlement of South Africa under the new Constitution proceeds apace. The elections for the first Assembly in the Orange River Colony took place on Wednesday, and so far as Bloemfontein was concerned, have resulted in a victory for the English Party, led by Sir John Fraser, Mr. Steyn's old rival for the Presidency. Bloemfontein has a large English trading element which clearly commands the majority of voters. On the other hand, Oranija Unie, the Dutch Party, led by Mr. Fischer, the former State Secretary, and General Hertzog, have swept the country districts, and will form the Administration. In all, they return thirty members, so that we imagine the English settlers in the Ladybrand district and elsewhere have united with the Dutch. There are, however, four Independents. The National Scouts have been wiped out, as everyone expected, and General de Wet, who had retired from politics, will probably be a member of the Government. It will certainly reduce the excessive cost of government; but in Mr. Fischer's hands its tone will be moderate and conciliatory. Both Mr. Fischer and General Hertzog, following the general lines of the new South African Party, have repudiated the racial policy, and warmly accepted partnership in the British Empire. “The Imperial Government,” said General Hertzog, “had for ever bound to the Empire the hearts of the Orange River Colony and the whole of South Africa.” The members of the Legislative Council seem to have been fairly divided between the two Parties, and include one ex-Boer General and the editor of the organ of the Oranija Unie. Meanwhile, Lord Harris, Chairman of the Consolidated Goldfields, has joined Sir George Farrar, who commands the Farrar group of mines, in abandoning Chinese labour, expressing confidence in the ability of the mines to provide a substitute. He also declares his confidence in the goodwill and loyalty of the Dutch Government.

* * *

LORD MILNER made a somewhat conspicuous appearance at Rugby, on Tuesday, and has been hailed by the “Morning Post” as the new Unionist Chancellor of the Exchequer, an appointment, by the way, which would involve a change in the British Constitution. Lord Milner proclaimed himself a Tariff Reformer, opposed to any compromise on the question of principle, a friend of universal compulsory military service, and an advocate of Social Reform, which should deal with those two great twin evils, irregular employment and unhealthy conditions of life. He would not oppose the introduction of Old-Age Pensions, but the Unionist Party should offer an iron resistance to a policy of providing funds by starving the Army and Navy. He trembled lest “ignorant idealists” or “vote-catching demagogues” should secure any such reduction. If the people had known what the Government desired in South Africa “they would have spat it out of their mouths,” a view of the South African situation which does not find a single echo among the men who are most concerned with it.

* * *

THE failure of the Prime Minister's proposals for an international reduction of armaments has been followed by the expected set-back to the cause of international peace. The revised plan of German naval construction exhibits a large and extended programme dealing with the most powerful types of vessels, in this respect following the lead of British naval policy. The estimates for 1908 contemplate an expenditure of nearly seventeen millions, including eight and a-half millions for new construction and armaments, which represents an increase of nearly three millions on last year's estimates. Three new battleships of the “Dreadnought” type are to be laid down every year for the next three years, after which the output will diminish. This means that in order to meet the waste produced by the reduction of the life of battleships from twenty-five to twenty years, there will be an increase of five in the number of battleships laid down from 1908 to 1911. The new expenditure will aggravate the serious financial and banking situation in Germany, which is perhaps only less precarious than that of the United States. The complete estimates show a total increase on the current year of nearly seven and three-quarter millions, nearly all of which is due to the Army, the Navy, and the Colonies. New taxation is threatened, and it is not certain whether even the controlling Centre Party will accept it. The Radicals are vaguely hostile, the Socialists determinedly so.

* * *

MR. HALDANE made the curious announcement to a gathering of City Volunteers, on Tuesday, that in the future the honour of Deputy-Lieutenant was to be reserved for those who had “earned it by a military title.” No man would in future be “approved” by the King for this post—hitherto, of course, purely civil—who had not served for ten years in some part of the Forces, or had been connected with a County Association. This is decorative soldiering; it is more important to know the Government's decision in regard to the Army Estimates. There are now, for example, nearly 20,000 men serving in, or in the neighbourhood of, South Africa. We imagine that there is no great demand from South Africa—Dutch or English—for the diminution of the garrison; but it is inconceivable that the Government—in face of the complete reconciliation of the Dutch element—will retain it at that figure, or anything like it. Moreover, we have a shrewd suspicion that Mr. Haldane's scheme will cost far more than its author estimated. All we can say is that the Ministerial party will demand a substantial reduction in the monstrous cost of the army—and will see that they get it.

* * *

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE has promptly given notice of a Bill for establishing, in the form of a Public Commission, a single authority for controlling the Port of London and managing the whole of the lower river from Teddington Lock to the Island of Sheppey. This body is to take over all powers of levying rates and dues now possessed by the Thames Conservancy and Watermen's Company, and other existing bodies, and the Act will enable it to take steps to improve the dock and warehouse accommodation of the Port, to buy up the dock companies, to issue stock, and to call on the County Council to guarantee the payment of interest upon it. Compensation will be given to those whose property is taken. The constitution of the body is, of course, not fixed, but it is clear that it will not be mainly municipal, though the Corporation and the County Council will have seats on it, and that it will consist in the main of representatives of bodies interested in the Port or using it. It proposes, we believe, to find a fund for the much-needed improvement of the Port out of an increase of dock dues. Some of the vested interests—dock and watermen's companies—are hostile, but their position is singularly weak, and the public will support a strong and equitable measure.

* * *

THE advanced wing of the women's suffrage movement has resumed its plan of interrupting Liberal meetings as an act of protest and agitation. Mr. Asquith's powerful reply to Mr. Balfour at Nuneaton on Saturday was much disturbed, and about thirty "suffragettes" were thrown out by the stewards, it seems with needless violence. Mr. Haldane's Sheffield meeting was similarly treated, and the offenders suffered in the same way. The inevitable reply to these tactics was given by a body of Birmingham students, who with cries of "Tit-for-Tat," completely broke up a suffrage meeting in the Town Hall, conducted by Mrs. and Miss Pankhurst. It is fair to remember that the "suffragettes" represent a pioneer force, and that suffrage agitations are usually tumultuous. But the resort to force on such a field means rough retaliation, and also much bad blood between men and women, and therefore the loss of a good deal of the moral leverage that is the best support of the cause of women's suffrage. Mr. Lloyd George, replying to a deputation of suffragists at Glasgow on Thursday, rebuked "hen-pecking" tactics, advised women to convert their own sex first, and added that the vote for women could only come after a special appeal to the electorate, and as part of a scheme of adult suffrage.

* * *

LORD CROMER addressed a meeting of diners of the Unionist Free Trade Club on Thursday, with Lord George Hamilton in the chair. The Free Trade Unionists are, we are afraid, reduced to a few club and dining coteries, and they weaken themselves by the feebleness of their attitude to Mr. Balfour. Lord George Hamilton, for example, did not "altogether approve of Mr. Balfour's handling of the Fiscal question," but he had never encouraged the Protectionist propaganda, and therefore was to be retained in the leadership. Lord Cromer was more vigorous. He insisted that the Empire subsisted on a Free Trade basis, and that a change of Fiscal policy would wake up "dormant Anglophobia" all the world over. For example, the Soudan had been organised without a protest, because all foreign trade had been admitted to it on equal terms with our own. He opposed a non-contributory old age pension scheme, because it must involve an expenditure of from 20 to 30 millions, raised by direct taxation. Only a contributory scheme, with modest State assistance, was possible. Let Tariff Reform sleep; for the effect of Protection on Imperial policy would be deplorable. It is notable that the "Times," which is Free Trade one day and Protectionist the next, thus, according to the "Spectator," reverting to its historic attitude, strongly condemns Lord Cromer's speech.

* * *

THE only logical issue of the controversy between the Bishop of Newcastle and the city incumbents is for the latter to press for the disestablishment of the Church. Both the Bishop and his opponents are perfectly logical, though the principles to which each party appeals are incompatible. The Bishop refuses to license a mission room in the parish of St. Philip because the curate in charge uses Eucharistic vestments and other ritual accessories which have been declared illegal by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and also condemned by the Royal Commission. Following the Bishop's refusal, a number of the Newcastle clergy have written refusing to accept the Judicial Committee as a competent tribunal on ritual questions. Even those who sympathise with this view must see that it is impossible to defend the action of clergy who enjoy all the benefits of establishment but refuse its obligations.

* * *

THE Portuguese Dictatorship has entered this week on a new phase of repression. A decree has been issued forbidding all criticism of Senhor Franco's administration, and the circulation of any news likely to damage the credit of the country. All the more important Lisbon newspapers have been suspended for thirty days. The reign of force is, in short, undisguised, and, as happened when the coup d'état was first carried out, the Government is once more renewing its attentions to the army. All parties are united against Senhor Franco, and he rules only by favour of the King. It is significant that several Liberal leaders, including some peers, have announced their adhesion to Republicanism. It is doubtless true that the political system stood in need of drastic reform. As in Spain, parties succeeded each other by a more or less corrupt connivance; the finances were embarrassed, and education grossly neglected. But the dictatorship can remedy none of these evils. Senhor Franco's first step was to buy the support of the army and the official services by raising salaries and pay all round. The parties of whose complacency towards each other he complained, are now more than ever united against himself, while the suppression of free speech and the Press is hardly the aptest method of promoting the country's political education. There was a time when England, under Palmerston, interfered, perhaps too indiscreetly, to promote democracy in Portugal. To-day, the "Times," alone in the European Press, pronounces, ex cathedra, its blessing on an usurpation which it compares to that of Cromwell. Senhor Franco is a very royalist Cromwell, and he holds his army, not by victories but by bribes.

* * *

THE last railway strike in the North of Italy (our Rome correspondent writes) has had the effect of bringing about a division in the Socialistic Party, which for several years had existed in a latent state. The more or less revolutionary elements have gathered together into the "Syndicalist" group, which was favourable to an open support of the railwaymen in their most extravagant demands, even the passing of the railways into their proprietorship. To reach this end the Syndicalists urged a general strike, not only of the railways, but of all workmen, thus hoping to throw the whole country into anarchy. The large majority of the Socialists refused to follow them on this road, and men like Ferri, Turati, Bissolati, indeed, all the leading figures of the party, were accused of treachery. The dissident Socialists detached themselves from the Confederation of the Working-men, which included all the unions, and has its seat in Turin, and at a meeting held at Parma by the representatives of about 200,000 workers, approved, by a majority of 30,000, the constitution of a General Confederation of Working-men, separate from that of Turin. They established as the fundamental basis of their organisation the following propositions: The gradual suppression of differences between employers and employees; complete autonomy and freedom of initiative for the local organisations; that the members of the General Confederation should consider themselves as the instruments of the working-men collectively, and not as their legislators and masters; that the general strike must be used as defence, as protest, and as means of conquest. Finally, they decided to combine the unions ready to fight with all weapons, none excluded, the present capitalistic organisation, thus weakening and eliminating the bourgeoisie.

* * *

DR. MONCURE D. CONWAY, who died last week in Paris at the age of seventy-five, was during a long and active life as lecturer and writer, a notable figure in "advanced" movements in this country and America. The son of a Virginian slave-owner, he broke away from "the system," and from other forms of orthodoxy in religion and politics at an early age, and at seventeen began his career as an ethical or free-thought preacher. When the Civil War began he became a sort of informal ambassador of the Northern cause in this country, and was thus brought into personal contact with the distinguished men of politics and literature who espoused it. Settling down here, he spent the greater part of his life in advocating, with voice and pen, every cause of liberty, peace, and popular enlightenment which came up for settlement. A Free Trader and a stout internationalist, he fought to his last years with unabated zeal the imperialism of his adopted as of his native country, and was strongly opposed to any Anglo-American alliance, which he feared would be exploited to the crushing of weaker peoples. He published many books and pamphlets, chiefly upon religious and political topics. His leading sphere of activity for twenty years was the platform of the South Place Ethical Society, where he spoke every Sunday to a considerable audience, gathered from all parts of London, and comprising not a few persons of distinction in the world of thought and art. For Dr. Conway had a genius for friendship, and the fascinating volumes of autobiography published a few years ago show him the intimate acquaintance of many famous men and women. His friendship with the Carlyles and with Browning was peculiarly close, and in his later years he was a particularly interesting raconteur.

* * *

THE week has yielded a heavy crop of deaths of minor celebrities. Mr. Evelyn Ashley, the historian of Lord Palmerston, whose secretary he was, and the ablest of the great Lord Shaftesbury's sons, died on Friday week at the family seat, Broadlands, so closely associated with Palmerston's life. Mr. Ashley had a moderate talent for politics, which he cultivated first as a Liberal-Whig member of Parliament and as under-secretary in Gladstone's second Administration, and then as a fervent supporter, outside Parliament, of Liberal Unionism. His presence and speech were agreeable, and his biography of Palmerston, though a little colourless in style and over-reserved in manner, is a competent defence of a statesman who was a hero to his young relative and biographer.—Admiral Sir Leopold McClintock, who died on Tuesday at the age of 88, had a distinguished career as an Arctic explorer in the middle of last century, when science could do little to assist the attainment of the North Pole. He leapt into fame as the volunteer commander of the "Fox," the vessel which brought to England the tragic relics of the Franklin expedition and the full story of the fate of the heroic band. Honours showered on McClintock, and his long later life was filled with varied kinds of naval service.—Mr. Harry Kemble, who died at Jersey on Saturday week, aged 59, was a member of the family which has added so much to the world's pleasure, and an inheritor of its special talent. No actor on the existing English stage excelled or equalled him in the natural gift for comedy. His special success lay in the presentment of pompous, cross-grained old age, and in such characters his mere appearance, and the extreme dryness of his manner, sufficed to set the theatre in a roar. Personally he possessed much of the good humour and charm of his aunt, Fanny Kemble.

* * *

HOUSEHOLDERS must remember that Christmas boxes this year are subject to the ban of the Prevention of Corruption Act, which forbids, under penalties, a servant to accept gifts that are meant to influence him in conducting his master's business. The London tradesmen have met and decided that it is permissible to give Christmas boxes to buyers, or persons buying on behalf of employers; tradesmen in other towns have more properly decided against them. The opinion of the London meeting is flatly against the law, and as the custom is practically universal, we do not see how tradesmen gain by it. It represents in the end an indirect tax on employers and householders, who pay an extra and irregular wage to their servants in the shape of dearer or worse goods. But the practice spreads all through the trading fabric, and lax and kind-hearted people help to sustain it, though it is clearly demoralising to those who give and those who receive. Probably the best plan is for tradesmen who wish to make Christmas presents to servants to take Sir Edward Fry's advice, and ask the consent of their masters. Gifts of pure kindness are not, of course, debarred.

* * *

THIS week there was opened at the Leicester Galleries an Exhibition of illustrative water-colour drawings by Mr. Edmund Dulac, a young artist whose work is unfamiliar to Londoners except through the very occasional examples he has shown at the London Sketch Club. The drawings are reproduced in colour in one of the gift books of the season—the "Stories from the Arabian Nights," retold by Lawrence Housman—and, judging from an advance copy of the book, the reproductions should attract considerable attention. Good as the latter are, however, they do not in every instance do justice to the originals, which show a quite unusual talent. Some of the quaint humour of Mr. Rackham finds its way into Mr. Dulac's characters, and this might suggest a comparison between the two; but it would be unfair to put one against the other, for the reason that each has a perfectly distinct aim. Mr. Rackham is a draughtsman who uses colour as an auxiliary. Mr. Dulac is a painter and a colourist to whom the use of line is a useful but a subsidiary accessory. That, briefly, expresses the difference. The fact that graceful and even noble design at times distinguishes Mr. Dulac's drawings in no way diminishes his claim to be regarded, firstly, as a painter. It is as a painter that he obtains a great beauty and clarity of colour, and, apparently without employing body colour, a quality as rich and soft as milk.

Politics and Affairs.

THE NULLITY OF MR. BALFOUR.

It is perhaps superfluous for us to point out to our readers that, judging by the tone of Opposition speakers and writers, Mr. Balfour's speech at Birmingham has confirmed the confusion of mind among his followers which attends all his speeches on the Tariff question, and which this latter utterance was apparently designed to perpetuate. The extreme Protectionists accept his endorsement of their resolution; the moderates, reading, or trying to read, his inner mind, believe that he can discover a medium policy, or at least patch up an unmeaning formula of unity; the Free Traders accept his mocking pledge that they are to remain members of a Protectionist party. It is true that the Protectionists repudiate that pledge, and profess, through the "Morning Post," their intention of disregarding it on every electoral platform in Great Britain, and of driving every Tory Free Trader into permanent exile. These trifling disharmonies do not really matter, when we pass from considerations of principle to those of tactics. The confidence in Mr. Balfour's faithlessness is so universal, and is held so equally by all sections of his party, that it produces the same effect as an implicit trust in his political honour. The Free Traders convince themselves that what with his private connections and his private hints, his power to take the sting out of a scheme of high tariffs, and his genius for dilatory diplomacy, as illustrated by his proposal to recommend another Colonial Conference before any new policy is initiated, the country, even under a Balfour Government, will be secured from a return to Protection. They think, in a word, that though, or rather because, he betrayed them, and scattered his Free Trade Cabinet, he will develop a similar genius for outwitting his new associates. These, in their turn forecasting events, rely with confidence on his pliability, his want of knowledge of affairs, his passion for keeping the nominal headship of his party, and calculate that he will bow to the situation and recognise their hold on the popular Tory mind. Such a situation also serves the unity-at-all costs section. Mr. Balfour is to them the condition of there being a Tory Party at all. So the man who for nearly five years has debased the moral currency is encouraged to find that his counterfeits really seem to pass for some solid exchange value. His speeches are nothing, and are meant to be nothing; and if Mr. Balfour had a genuine regard for the morale of Toryism, he would perceive that they must in the end have much the same effect on the Tory masses as the bad tending of the faithless herdsmen in "Lycidas" produced in the fold of the Church:—

"The hungry sheep look up and are not fed,
But swol'n with wind, and the rank mist they draw
Rot inwardly, and foul contagion spread."

So long, however, as the Tory leader recognises that his party wants power of intellect and power of will either to drive him into the open, or to drive him out of public life, his barren word-exercises will continue.

Meanwhile it is clear that the Protectionist party feels the necessity of preparing itself in advance against any future lapse of Mr. Balfour into Free Trade doctrine, by providing him with a colleague of the right sort. This they have found in Lord Milner, who at Rugby proposes himself as a Unionist leader, marching under the triple device of Imperialism, Protection, and Conscription, and acclaimed by the Protectionist Press as the appointed framer of the first "reformed" Budget. We cannot say that the moment of Lord Milner's return to public life is happily chosen. Since he retired from South Africa, he has made two contributions to Imperial policy. The first was to offer an embittered opposition to the grant of self-government to the Transvaal and the Orange Colony; the second to argue with equal vehemence for the retention of Chinese labour. What has happened since those loud and confident declarations? Self-government has been established, with the cordial assent of the English and Dutch, and the approval of every member of the Imperial family, and has produced an unexampled effect of peace and concord; and Chinese labour has been abandoned by its chief directors on the Rand, who emphasise this momentous step by expressing complete confidence in their power of replacing it. When the heads of the Farrar group and of the Consolidated Gold Fields give up the Chinaman, Lord Milner's plea for him falls to the ground, just as, with the triumph of the South African Party all over the Continent, and the proclamation of an "Afrikaner" policy by English and Dutch statesmen alike, every characteristic feature of his rule disappears. It is, therefore, as a fallen administrator, recently convicted of crude, hard, and short-sighted ideas, that Lord Milner makes his re-entry into home politics. His Imperialism aimed at turning South Africa into a Crown Colony, held by a great army, and fortified by the Protectionist system which Lord Cromer declares to be fatal to our rule.

But it is precisely this hardness and definiteness of view which commends him to his new party. Lord Milner's conceptions are as sharply defined as Mr. Balfour's are vague. And they are essentially German and bureaucratic. The nation is to be taken in hand for its own good, reorganised, highly taxed, driven into universal military service, raised in its standards of personal efficiency, its housing and environment, by the combined discipline of the drill sergeant and the public official. This programme Lord Milner calls "democratic," and "constructive," and it obviously and avowedly combines Socialist ideas with an absolutist governing system, such as our Imperial guest provides for his own highly-contented subjects. How far it will go depends on the extent to which sheer weariness at Mr. Balfour's nullity of mind pervades the Tory Party. A starving man on a desert island snatches at the first food he can get, for bad, half-poisonous food is better than no food at all; and the essential disservice which Mr. Balfour performs to his country and to his party is that instead of keeping policy on moderate lines, as his apologists say he keeps it, he drives it on to some vigorous form of reaction. Here, it is obvious, lies the great mistake, the incurable and also the unpardonable weakness of the Free Trade section of the Tory Party. So long as trade is good, and Protection lacks the stimulus of trouble among the workmen, Mr. Balfour's Nothingarianism may keep it back, while appearing to encourage it. When the decline comes, and if the Protectionist fallacy gets a hold on the discontented, this politician, being devoid of principle and wanting any deep root of intellectual surety, will be just as Protectionist as his interests incline him to be, and as strong temperaments like Lord Milner's force him to be. And that result, if it comes, will be very largely due to the "intellectuals" of his own camp, who have weakly allowed him to abuse the gift of speech and taint the springs of political conduct.

THE CHAOS OF A GREAT STATE.

THE whirlwind of financial panic, which has swept over the United States, destroying the fabric of credit and withering the pride of unexampled industrial prosperity, leaves the public mind here bewildered and aghast. To judge from the American Press, the public mind there is almost unhinged. The most conflicting palliatives and remedies are proposed. Everyone is for immediate legislation, but nobody is agreed as to what the law should be. While prodigious sensations and disasters crowded one upon another, each with its own peculiar causes and train of consequences, nobody had time to think or to look round. "It seems, in hasty reminiscence, a matter of months," said one American a fortnight ago, "since the Knickerbocker Trust Company closed its doors; but it happened two weeks ago last Tuesday. Within that brief period the whole business outlook of the American Continent in the eyes of the average man has been radically changed." A very little time ago, he went on, everybody was prosperous. Manufacturers had more orders than they could fill; farmers were getting high record prices for their crops; railways were only complaining that they had not enough lines and cars to cope with a superabundant traffic; and the "labour question" was not how to find employment but how to find workmen.

But, as a matter of fact, a great explosion had been in train for months, if not years. While the ploughman toiled and the operative worked at ever higher speed, speculation was undermining credit, rotten concerns were being floated on an overstrained market, and vast sums required for every-day emergencies were being locked up in railway construction or squandered in riotous living. In a word, capital was being wasted or used up faster than it was being created, and credit was being swollen to its utmost limits. So long as no large lender of credit was forced to insist on payment the structure stood, though ever since last January it has been shivering under the repeated blows of Wall Street slumps. But at last, in October, the great catastrophe came. A copper speculator smashed his bank by involving its resources in the support of a cornered stock, and a Trust Company suddenly fell to the ground because its President had tied up its assets in unsaleable securities. How, then, does the case stand now?

At the beginning of the first week of November (a fortnight after the Knickerbocker Trust closed its doors) two Wall Street brokers advertised in the New York papers that they would pay a premium on currency. It was well understood, wrote one of the leading financial editors of New York, in justification of this advertisement, that the actual currency left in certain of the bank reserves was then so low, owing to the hoarding mania, that "employers of labour, who must pay out large sums of petty cash on Saturday, could not get their pay-roll money at their banks, even though their deposit credits far exceeded such requirements." Hence these brokers, seeing profit in a new line of business, addressed themselves to the public, saying in effect: "If you will take a certified cheque on a solvent bank in payment, we will pay you 2, 3, or 4 per cent. premium for your currency." Before the end of the week it was estimated that four million dollars had come out of cellars and safe-deposits in response to this inducement, and a higher premium than that given by the brokers to the hoarders was readily paid to the brokers not only by employers of labour but by banks short of reserve money. "This is one of the heaviest days we have had since the present situation developed," said a representative of the firm of Bolognesi, Hartfield & Co., on Friday, November 8th, to a representative of the "New York Times." "The premium is very attractive to persons with ready cash, and we are getting many offers of both large and small sums. The demand comes from all classes of individuals and firms all over the country, but mostly in this city and vicinity. The premium may go higher, or it may go lower; it will depend altogether on conditions." At the office of Mann, Bill & Ware, another firm of Wall Street brokers, it was stated on the same day that the premium had been above 3 per cent., but had eased off toward the close of business hours. One man came in during the day who said he had 40,000 dollars in cash to sell. The offer was at first regarded as a "bluff," but a representative of the firm accompanied the lucky individual to a neighbouring safety-deposit vault company, and the man took out the 40,000 dollars in cash from his box. The money was in packages, bound with slips just as it had been received from the bank whence the depositor had drawn it out. The 40,000 dollars was sold in a lump to Mann, Bill, & Ware, the seller receiving a certified cheque payable through the Clearing-house in Clearing-house Funds. "Just think of that," said a member of the firm. "There was 40,000 dollars absolutely tied up and doing the greatest amount of harm when it was so badly needed." And the broker proceeded to philosophise as follows:—

"When the people hoard money they are uneasy because it pays them nothing, and as the news spreads that it can be sold at a profit like any other commodity, more and more people let go. We always take pains to learn that the money we buy is really locked up and not in bank, since buying money already in bank would do no good. I look for a disappearance of the premium soon, since the offers to sell are becoming more and more numerous."

It is difficult for people here to understand such a situation; for how, it may be asked, can a premium be paid on currency except in currency; and if it is paid at first in bank cheques, why cannot the seller of 100 dollars of cash, greenbacks, gold certificates, or banknotes promptly cash his 103-dollar cheque and forthwith again sell the cash in Wall Street or anywhere else? The answer to the conundrum is of course that there is an illegal de facto suspension of cash payments throughout the United States. All the banks are virtually closed. There is no run upon them because there is nothing to run for. They are only open to bargain with their depositors, and to dole out a few coins or paper notes in extreme cases of necessity. The whole currency and banking law of the United States is in abeyance, is being violated everywhere daily through the length and breadth of the land. As the "New York Evening Post" puts it quite frankly, the explanation of the premium is that people cannot cash their cheques. "If the bank were paying cash as usual, the employer of labour could get money for his pay-roll, and would certainly not pay two cents extra on the dollar to get his cash in Wall Street. . . . It is not currency which has risen in price, but cheques on a solvent bank which have depreciated." But the "New York Evening Post" erred in thinking that the premium would only last a week. "The money hoarder," wrote our contemporary on November 9th, a few days after the appearance of the premium, "a peculiarly detestable sort of speculator, knew very well that a week would end this abnormal situation, and that the price was high enough."

But is the poor hoarder really to be blamed? The great swindlers of New York denounce him as wanting in patriotism, and the President exhorts the people to trust in the banks and "be normal." But the distrust in the banks is in many cases amply justified. By general admission American bankers are very lax in their methods and ideas. Too often bankers are directed by big financiers, who use them as instruments to pump credit into shrinking speculative concerns of their own. Many years ago an American Secretary of the Treasury thought it necessary to lay down, as a rule for American banks, that the same men should not be borrowers and lenders. He said it was very common there for people to get control of banks in order to lend deposits to themselves, and that it was very difficult in such cases to insist on a proper margin of security. Unfortunately, the system he denounced is still common. Many American banks have "preferential customers," to whom the interest and security of the bank is regularly sacrificed. And this is not all. During the last year or two American bankers have been carried off their legs and their balance by the fictitious prosperity of rising prices. They have been induced to embark a dangerously large proportion of their assets in ventures from which they could not hope to withdraw when bad times came, and in securities which would be unsaleable when speculation collapsed. "We are overloaned," wrote one poor bank cashier before committing suicide the other day, and the same inscription might be written over the doors of many an American bank whose solvency is only conjectural. No one, of course, doubts that there is real wealth in the United States, and that there has been much real prosperity for many years. But a great deal of this wealth was only on paper. It was the offspring of speculation and died with the collapse of the speculative boom. To get out at the top is a rare feat. The average speculator buys more and more as prices rise, and when the bubble is at last pricked by dearth of money and credit, he holds and holds, hoping against hope, until ruin comes. Moreover, where industries are built up on tariffs, as in the United States and Germany, the danger of bad banking is intensified by the artificiality and corruption inseparable from the growth of monopolies that feed on high duties. We cannot hope to escape altogether the effects of the crash in New York. But we do not expect to see anything like the cruel and sudden depression which has swept into the streets tens of thousands of workmen in the great cities of the United States.

THE NEW PHASE OF THE LAND WAR.

MR. BIRRELL has not been compelled to wait many months before sharing the fate of his predecessors. The whole pack are after him. The "Ascendency Gang" (in an historic phrase) in the columns of the "Times" and elsewhere, declare themselves exasperated by his "misplaced jocularities," and his failure to lay Ireland under Coercion and clap Members of Parliament into prison without trial. And the more violent of opposite opinions stimulate the ardour of their meetings by the traditional gibes at the Chief Secretary and his "foreign" Government. He probably expected no less, and will not be disappointed. The vital cause of discontent, now as always, is agrarian. The manifestation of the disease, however seriously it may be regarded by those who directly suffer, is fortunately utterly different in character from former outbreaks. There has never been any disturbance in Ireland which has not been directly traceable to this long Land War; to the attempts, conducted through decades, of a people sunk in unparalleled poverty to get back the means of existence on their own land. Each successive demonstration is an effort to stimulate the process. Each manifestation is an evidence that the process has broken down. And hitherto each manifestation has always succeeded in jogging the memory of the British People, a reminder that Ireland still exists, and is not yet satisfied.

Fortunately the methods to-day have taken a comparatively innocuous form. We are far removed from the hideous tumult of twenty-seven years ago, with cattle maiming and the shooting of landlords and their agents as part of a deliberate policy. We cannot indeed, dismiss cattle-driving as a harmless freak, or as a mere outbreak of village discontent against those who are holding up the rich lands. It is a policy. It is an illegal policy. It must be treated as an illegal policy. But it is not so serious in its operations as to be beyond the resources of the Common Law. Those "Unionists" who mock at the claim of Ireland to a separate national existence declare openly that Ireland should be treated as any other part of the United Kingdom is treated. Ireland has no more a separate existence, says Lord Hugh Cecil, than Kent has a separate existence. Let cattle driving in Ireland be treated, therefore, as cattle driving in Kent would be treated. To proclaim counties and publish special laws would be merely playing into the hands of agitators and extremists on both sides. It would not stop the particular manifestation. Coercion never has stopped any particular manifestation. But it would cause large populations to throw in their lot with the sufferers. It would light just the flame which the extreme agitators desire to kindle, without which the Ascendency leaders are never entirely happy. Given sufficient Coercion, and you might easily excite a general Land War in Ireland, and renew all the old bitter memories which we hoped had for ever died away. In most countries, in any popular controversy, one side is right. It is the peculiarity of Ireland that in most of these agrarian disputes both sides are right. They each refer to different ultimate principles; and these principles come to hopeless collision in actual practice. The object of cattle driving, avowedly, is to make the life and occupation of the graziers impossible; to win back the rich lands for men instead of oxen, and bring the people from the bogs and mountains and rocky seaboard into the land that their fathers once possessed.

The tragic condition of rural Ireland is apparent even to the superficial observer. Alone amongst the nations of Europe it exhibits the poor lands congested, the rich lands deserted. In districts which should be—like Bavaria or the Touraine—one large garden, you may journey for hours scarcely meeting a human being. In districts which naturally would support but a few wild fowl or seagull, the cabins are packed as closely as in the outer suburbs of London. The tragedy of the ox it is called by the author of "Ireland at the Cross Roads": the seeing in Meath, West Meath, Kildare, and all the rich lands—"an Arcady where everything earth has to give of her bounty and riches lies in summer ripeness"—nothing but a "kind of dusk of humanity brooding over the scene." "As you walk along the road in a little valley of greenery, loneliness knocks at your heart, and the nostalgia of your race and kind comes creeping over you. 'Where are the people? Who goes upon this road? Who eats the blackberries in August and smells the hawthorn in May?'" Amidst ruinous, abandoned cottages, in the depopulated countryside the ox "lives and thrives and grows bulky." The curse of the Broken Companionship has fallen upon it. The richest land of Europe has become "one vast wilderness," in which "the beast is ever more and more" and "man is less and less." Distribute the peasant proprietors of Ireland as are distributed the peasant proprietors of Württemberg, of Denmark, of Bulgaria, and the chapter of agrarian agitation in Ireland would be definitely closed.

And here there arises the fundamental conflict between two divergent ideas. The one says: "We are starving in impossible existence upon economic holdings; only supported by nomadic labour in England and remittances from servant girls in America. Give us a chance of life in the purchase of the grazing lands. We are prepared to pay a rent equal to that you are now receiving; to purchase at the full legal value. You promised this opportunity in the Land Bill of four years ago. We have waited patiently four years for the redemption of your promises. We can wait no longer." "I have let my grazing land to good tenants," is the reply. "They pay me well. They are making modest fortunes in a great industry for which this land is specially suited. Why should I evict them against their wishes, in order that you may cut up the land into peasant holdings?" "What are we to do, then?" enquire the peasants. "We cannot go on living under these conditions. If we cannot obtain the grazing land, where can we obtain land?" "That is not my affair," says the landlord. "I have always recognised that this country is unsuited to your particular style of agriculture. Perhaps you had better emigrate to America or find work in England." "We are emigrating as fast as the ships will carry us," is the despairing testimony of actual fact. "Soon there will be none of us left. And when we are all gone, Ireland may be economically prosperous, with huge ranches occupying the good ground, and the rest an empty desolation. But the Irish race will have perished in their own home." "We regret that the Irish race should perish," is the answer, "but we cannot fight against economic law. And, in any case, the graziers, who are our tenants, are engaged in a perfectly legitimate trade, and demand the full protection of the law. So long as they wish to stay, we will see that they are not dispossessed." "Then we will see that they do not wish to stay," is the defiant reply. "If we do nothing, we die; if we fail in such an enterprise, we can but die."

It is law and order, and the just right of security in legitimate occupation, set against the demand of nationality for continuance, and of the very poor for existence; the fighting for a commodity limited in extent, and with a definite monopoly value. We may deprecate conspiracy as much as we please, and utilise normal or abnormal means to try and stamp out the illegal methods of resistance. We have surely learnt enough of Ireland to know that such efforts are like trying to cleanse the skin of the spots which are but outward evidence of the fever raging within. The only real alleviation is the fulfilment of the promises of the Land Act: the purchase of the grazing lands in order that they may be used for raising, not the maximum of cattle, but the maximum of men and women and happy children; the acceleration, by every means possible, of the long process of repatriation of the Irish people in their own land.

THE CONTROL OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

THE Kaiser's official visit to the British Court has come to an end, and the impression which this pleasant episode has made in both countries is of happy augury for their future relations. But how much it means in the purely political field, how far it relaxes the tension between the two groups in which the European Powers are now mustered; above all, whether it can at all affect the disastrous race in naval construction which seems to be entering at this very moment on an acuter phase than ever before—these are questions which could be answered only by guesswork. The recent history of our dealings with Germany is still mysterious. Prince Bülow, indeed, has explained the situation with a certain measure of frankness, in elaborate speeches, after full-dress debates in the Reichstag. But Anglo-German relations have never once of late years been subjected in this country to Parliamentary debate. An official and inspired Press keeps the German public informed of the views of its Foreign Office. That system has, fortunately, no place in our traditions, but its absence aggravates the extreme secrecy of our conduct of Foreign Affairs. It was thought, when the Foreign Office was entrusted to a commoner, that some advance was being made towards a more open and democratic conduct of our external policy. Sir Edward Grey's infrequent attendance at the House, the plan of entrusting questions to a subordinate Minister who has no position in the Foreign Office, the growth of the blocking motion, and the absence of any effective critical group in the Lords, have conspired to make Sir Edward Grey the most reticent and the most autocratic Foreign Minister of our time. Such incidents as the delay in the issue of the Denshawai papers, and the signature of the Anglo-Russian Convention three days after the rising of Parliament, have taught us how easy it is for a Minister to withdraw himself from Parliamentary criticism. It may be said that delicate diplomatic issues such as are involved in our relations with Germany, cannot well be debated in public. But that is hardly true of such a question as the maintenance of the right of commerce destruction; and yet the instructions given to our delegates at the Hague on this and kindred subjects were never once submitted to Parliamentary scrutiny.

The result of this curiously undemocratic system is that our foreign policy is, with rare exceptions, purely personal. An energetic and well-organised agitation does at times influence the Foreign Office. A combination of trading interests and missionary advocacy may make such a movement as that for Congo Reform influential and successful; a purely humanitarian movement like that for Macedonian Reform is, on the other hand, dependent on the temperament of the Minister for the time being. But where the public is quite unorganised and has no information at its disposal, its opinion is never focussed, and may be ignored. Our system is bureaucracy qualified by the occasional irruption of popular emotion. The Crown no doubt provides a certain check, but the late Queen's Letters prove that in her time, at least, the influence of the Crown was thoroughly reactionary and anti-popular. It may be said that the Foreign Minister is, after all, the organ of the Cabinet. That may be true when some immense and interesting issue arises, but in the ordinary work of the Foreign Office the Cabinet does not interfere. Ministers are busy with their own departments, and rarely possess the knowledge that would enable them to intervene with authority. Palmerston said of his own colleagues, when Lord John Russell was Foreign Secretary, that Mr. Gladstone was the only one who followed foreign policy at all closely. In the present Cabinet, since Mr. Bryce's departure, there is no one who has given any proof of a special interest in foreign affairs. We hope, indeed, that the Denshawai sentences and Macedonian reform have been mentioned at Cabinet meetings, but we are not sure. Lord John Russell, apologising to Queen Victoria for some of Palmerston's indiscretions in 1848, remarked that he was "a good colleague" who left his fellow-Ministers alone, and naturally claimed an equal independence for himself. The joint responsibility of the Cabinet for the acts of individual members must often be a pious fiction, which helps to cover a Minister and to reassure the public, but does not in practice guarantee any effective or detailed control.

The public is, as a rule, singularly ready to "trust the expert." On the immense majority of subjects submitted to his judgment, the Foreign Secretary—more especially when he is neither a linguist nor a traveller nor a student—cannot be an expert. That is as it should be. His rôle, acting as a typical representative of the opinions of his party, is rather to form a judgment after hearing the views of the experts. In the India Office, the machinery of a council of veteran administrators, representing various schools of thought, both European and native, is at the disposal of Mr. Morley. Sir Edward Grey stands alone, hampered moreover by a singularly rigid code of etiquette. He does in the last resort govern Egypt, and there everything now turns on the view he forms of the maturity, capacity, and goodwill of the Egyptian nationalists. Their leaders come to London, and mix freely with private members and journalists, but the door of the Foreign Office is closed to them. The whole immense issue lies between Sir Edward Grey and Lord Cromer or Sir Eldon Gorst. They, in turn, are hampered by the same etiquette, and even in Cairo do not meet the popular leaders, but rely, of necessity, on the reports of Levantine and Syrian interpreters and confidential agents. The question of judicial reform in Macedonia is being debated among the Great Powers at this moment. Here the issue lies between Sir Edward Grey and our Ambassador, confined, as he is, to Constantinople, and without direct experience of the local conditions. Our consuls on the spot, able men, speaking the languages of the country, daily meeting the people, are

